[Footnote 205: _Deuteronomy_, xxvii. 17. _Cf._ _Genesis_, xxxi. 44 _sqq._]

[Footnote 206: Plato, _Leges_, viii. 843: ". . . [Greek: ê)\n smikron li/thon o(ri/zonta philai/n kai\ e)/chthran e)/norkon para\ theô=n.]"]

[Footnote 207: Xenophon, _Anabasis_, v. 3. 13. Hermann, _Disputatio de terminis apud Græcos_, p. 11.]

[Footnote 208: _Rei agrariæ auctores legesque variæ_, edited by G[oe]sius, p. 258 _sq._]

[Footnote 209: Siculus Flaccus, 'De conditionibus agrorum,' in _Rei agrariæ auctores_, p. 5.]

[Footnote 210: Dibbs, 'Beating the Bounds,' in _Chambers's Edinburgh Journal_, N.S. xx. (1853) 49 _sqq._ Trumbull, _The Threshold Covenant_, p. 174 _sq._]

The practice of cursing a thief may possibly even be at the bottom of the belief of some savages that such a person will be punished after death. In a following chapter we shall notice instances where the efficacy of a curse is supposed to extend beyond the grave. But we shall also find other reasons for savage doctrines of retribution in the world to come. In the cases referred to above it is not expressly said that the _post mortem_ punishment of the thief is inflicted by a god.

* * * * *

I have here only dealt with rules relating to property which have been recognised by custom or law. But the established principles of ownership have not always been admitted to be just: in the civilised countries of the West they have called forth an opposition which is rapidly gaining in strength. The limited scope of the present work does not allow me to attempt a detailed account of this movement, with its variety of arguments and its multitudinous schemes of reform. The main reasons for complaint are:--first, that our actual law of property does not ensure to every labourer the whole produce of his labour; secondly, that it does not provide for every want {70} a satisfaction proportionate to the available means. However much the opinions of the different schools of socialists may vary, every socialist organisation of property aims either at guaranteeing to the working-classes the entire product of their industry, or at reducing to just proportions individual needs and existing means of satisfaction by recognising the claim of every member of society to the commodities and services necessary to support existence, in preference to the satisfaction of the less pressing wants of others.[211] These aims are greatly hampered by the present system, in which land and capital are the property of private individuals freely struggling for increase of wealth, and especially by the legally recognised existence of unearned income[212]--the "rent" of the Saint-Simonians, the "surplus value" (_Mehrwert_) of Thompson and Marx,--for which the favoured recipient returns no personal equivalent to society, and which he is able to pocket because the wage labourer receives in money-wages less than the full value of the produce of his work. We have here a conflict between different principles of acquisition. Both the rule that the owner of a thing also owns what results from it, and the law of inheritance, leading as they do to unearned income, are intruding upon the principle of labour as a source of property. They, moreover, interfere with the right to subsistence, which in some measure, though often insufficiently, is recognised in all human societies;[213] for, as Marx observed, the accumulation of wealth at one pole means the accumulation of misery at the opposite pole.[214] This conflict between different principles or rights, all of which have deep foundations in human nature and the conditions of social life, has been brought about by certain {71} facts inherent in progressive civilisation. In simple societies the unearned income is small, because no fortunes exist, and the wants of those who are incapable of earning their own livelihood are provided for by the system of mutual aid. Progress in culture, on the other hand, has been accompanied by a more unequal distribution of wealth, and also by a decrease of social solidarity as a result of the increase and greater differentiation of the social unit. The unearned income has grown larger, the disproportion between the returns on capital and the reward for labour has in many cases become enormous, and hand in hand with the opulence of some goes the destitution of others. At the same time the injustice of prerogatives based on birth or fortune is keenly felt, the dignity of labour is recognised, and the working-classes are every day becoming more conscious both of their power and their rights. All this has resulted in a strong and wide-spread conviction that the actual law of property greatly differs from the ideal law. But much struggle will no doubt be required to bring them in harmony with one another. The present rights of property are supported not only by personal interests, but also by a deep-rooted feeling, trained in the school of tradition, that it would be iniquitous of the State to interfere with individuals' long-established claims to use at their pleasure the objects of wealth. The new scheme, on the other hand, derives strength from the fact that it aims at rectifying legal rights in accordance with existing needs, and that it lays stress on a method of acquisition which more than any other seems to appeal to the natural sense of justice in man. We are utterly unable to foresee in detail the issue of this struggle. But that the law of property will sooner or later undergo a radical change must be obvious to every one who realises that, though ideas of right and wrong may for some time outlive the conditions from which they sprang, they cannot do so for ever.

[Footnote 211: See Menger, _Right to the whole Produce of Labour_, p. 5 _sqq._, Goos, _op. cit._ ii. 61.]

[Footnote 212: The term "unearned income" (_arbeitsloses Einkommen_) has been proposed by Menger (_op. cit._ p. 3).]

[Footnote 213: See _supra_, ch. xxiii., vol. i. 526 _sqq._ Among the Eskimo about Behring Strait (Nelson, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 294) and the Greenlanders (Rink, _Eskimo Tales_, p. 29 _sq._), if a man borrows an article from another and fails to return it, the owner is not entitled to claim it back, as they consider that when a person has enough property to enable him to lend some of it he has more than he needs.]

[Footnote 214: Marx, _Capital_, p. 661.]

CHAPTER XXX

THE REGARD FOR TRUTH AND GOOD FAITH

THE regard for truth implies in the first place that we ought to abstain from lying, that is, a wilful misrepresentation of facts, by word or deed, with the intention of producing a false belief. Closely connected with this duty is that of good faith or fidelity to promises, which requires that we should make facts correspond with our emphatic assertions as to our conduct in the future. Within certain limits these duties seem to be universally recognised, though the censure passed on the transgressor varies extremely in degree. But there are also many cases in which untruthfulness and bad faith are looked upon with indifference, or even held laudable or obligatory.

Various uncivilised races are conspicuous for their great regard for truth; of some savages it is said that not even the most trying circumstances can induce them to tell a lie. Among others, again, falsehood is found to be a prevailing vice and the successful lie a matter of popular admiration.

All authorities agree that the Veddahs of Ceylon are models of veracity. They "are proverbially truthful and honest."[1] They think it perfectly inconceivable that any person should say anything which is not true.[2] Mr. Nevill writes, "I never knew a true Vaedda to tell a lie, and the Sinhalese give them the same character."[3] Messrs. Sarasin had a similar experience:{73}--"The genuine Wood-Wedda always speaks the truth; we never heard a lie from any of them; all their statements are short and true."[4] A Veddah who had committed murder and was tried for it, instead of telling a lie in order to escape punishment, said simply nothing.[5]

[Footnote 1: Bailey, 'Wild Tribes of the Veddahs of Ceylon,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. ii. 291.]

[Footnote 2: Hartshorne, in _Indian Antiquary_, viii. 320.]

[Footnote 3: Nevill, in _Taprobanian_, i. 193.]

[Footnote 4: Sarasin, _Forschungen auf Ceylon_, iii. 541. _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 542 _sq._; Schmidt, _Ceylon_, p. 276.]

[Footnote 5: Sarasin, _op. cit._ iii. 543.]

Other instances of extreme truthfulness are provided by various uncivilised tribes in India. The Saoras of the province of Madras, "like most of the hill people, . . . are not inclined to lying. If one Saora kill another he admits it at once and tells why he killed him."[6] The highlander of Central India is described as "the most truthful of beings, and rarely denies either a money obligation or a crime really chargeable against him."[7] A true Gond "will commit a murder, but he will not tell a lie."[8] The Kandhs, says Macpherson, "are, I believe, inferior in veracity to no people in the world. . . . It is in all cases imperative to tell the truth, except when deception is necessary to save the life of a guest."[9] And to break a solemn pledge of friendship is, in their opinion, one of the greatest sins a man can commit.[10] The Korwás inhabiting the highlands of Sirgúja--though they show great cruelty in committing robberies, putting to death the whole of the party attacked, even when unresisting--"have what one might call the savage virtue of truthfulness to an extraordinary degree, and, rightly accused, will at once confess and give you every required detail of the crime."[11] The Santals are noted for veracity and fidelity to their word even in the most trying circumstances.[12] A Kurubar "always speaks the truth."[13] Among the Hos "a reflection on a man's honesty or veracity may be sufficient to send him to self-destruction."[14] Among the Angami Nagas simple truth is highly regarded; it is rare for a statement to be made on oath, and rarer still for it to be false.[15] In the Chittagong Hills the Tipperahs are the only people among whom Captain Lewin {74} has met with meanness and lying;[16] and they, too, have previously been said to be, "as a rule, truthful and simple-minded."[17] The Karens of Burma have the following traditional precept:--"Do not speak falsehood. What you do not know, do not speak. Liars shall have their tongues cut out."[18] Among the Bannavs of Cambodia "severe penalties, such as slavery or exile, are imposed for lying."[19]

[Footnote 6: Fawcett, _Saoras_, p. 17.]

[Footnote 7: Forsyth, _Highlands of Central India_, p. 164. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 361; Sleeman, _Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official_, ii. 109; Hislop, _Aboriginal Tribes of the Central Provinces_, p. 1.]

[Footnote 8: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 284. _Cf._ Forsyth, _op. cit._ p. 155.]

[Footnote 9: Macpherson, 'Religious Opinions and Observances of the Khonds,' in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc._ vii. 196.]

[Footnote 10: Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 94.]

[Footnote 11: Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 230.]

[Footnote 12: Elliot, 'Characteristics of the Population of Central and Southern India,' in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, N.S. i. 106 _sq._]

[Footnote 13: _Ibid._ i. 105.]

[Footnote 14: Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 206. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 204 _sq._; Bradley-Birt, _Chota Nagpore_, p. 103.]

[Footnote 15: Prain, 'Angami Nagas,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, v. 490.]

[Footnote 16: Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 191.]

[Footnote 17: Browne, quoted by Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 110.]

[Footnote 18: Smeaton, _Loyal Karens of India_, p. 254.]

[Footnote 19: Comte, quoted by Mouhot, _Travels in Indo-China, Cambodia, and Laos_, ii. 27. For the truthfulness of the uncivilised races of India see also Sleeman, _op. cit._ ii. 110 _sqq._; Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 256 (Oraons); Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, ii. 478 (Hâbûra); Fraser, _Tour through the Him[=a]l[=a] Mountains_, pp. 264 (inhabitants of Kunawur), 335 (Bhoteas); Iyer, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 73 (Nay[=a]dis of Malabar); Walhouse, 'Account of a Leaf-wearing Tribe on the Western Coast of India,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iv. 370 (Koragars).]

The Andaman Islanders call falsehood _y[=u]bda_, that is, sin or wrong-doing.[20] The natives of Car Nicobar are not only very honest,[21] but "the accusation of untruthfulness brings them up in arms immediately."[22] The Dyaks of Borneo are praised for their honesty and great regard for truth.[23] Mr. Bock states that if they could not satisfactorily reply to his questions they hesitated to answer at all, and that if he did not always get the whole truth he always got at least nothing but the truth from them.[24] Veracity is a characteristic of the Alfura of Halmahera[25] and the Bataks of Sumatra, who only in cases of urgent necessity have recourse to a lie.[26] The Javanese, says Crawfurd, "are honourably distinguished from all the civilised nations of Asia by a regard for truth."[27] "In their intercourse with society," Raffles observes, "they display, in a high degree, the virtues of honesty, plain dealing, and candour. Their ingenuousness is such that, as the first Dutch authorities have acknowledged, prisoners brought to the bar on criminal charges, if really guilty, nine times out of ten confess, without disguise or equivocation, the full extent and exact circumstances of their offences, and communicate, when required, more information on the matter at issue than all the rest of the evidence."[28] Among the natives {75} of the Malay Archipelago there are some further instances of trustworthy and truthful peoples;[29] whereas others are described as distrustful and regardless of truth.[30] Thus the natives of Timor-laut lie without compunction when they think they can escape detection,[31] and of the Niase it is said that "truth is their bitter enemy."[32]

[Footnote 20: Man, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 112.]

[Footnote 21: Distant, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iii. 4.]

[Footnote 22: Kloss, _In the Andamans and Nicobars_, p. 227 _sq._]

[Footnote 23: Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 66-68, 82. Boyle, _Adventures among the Dyaks of Borneo_, p. 215. Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 47.]

[Footnote 24: Bock, _Head-Hunters of Borneo_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 25: Kükenthal, _Forschungsreise in den Molukken_, p. 188.]

[Footnote 26: Junghuhn, _Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 239.]

[Footnote 27: Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, i. 50.]

[Footnote 28: Raffles, _History of Java_, i. 248.]

[Footnote 29: Riedel, _De sluik- en kroesharige rassen tusschen Selebes en Papua_, p. 96 (Serangese). St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, ii. 322 (Malays of Sarawak).]

[Footnote 30: Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 209 (natives of the interior of Sumatra). Riedel, _op. cit._ p. 314 (natives of the Luang-Sermata group). Steller, _De Sangi-Archipel_, p. 23.]

[Footnote 31: Forbes, _A Naturalist's Wanderings in the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 320.]

[Footnote 32: Modigliani, _Viaggio a Nías_, p. 467.]

Veracity and probity were conspicuous virtues among various uncivilised peoples belonging to the Russian Empire. Georgi, whose work dates from the eighteenth century, says of the Chuvashes that they "content themselves with a simple affirmation or denial, and always keep their word";[33] of the Barabinzes, that "lying, duplicity, and fraud, are unknown among them";[34] of the Tunguses, that they "always appear to be what they really are," and that "lying seems to them the absurdest thing in the world, which prevents them being either suspicious or necessitated to accompany their affirmations by oaths or solemn protestations";[35] of the Kurilians, that they always speak the truth "with the most scrupulous fidelity."[36] Castrén states that the Zyrians, like the Finnish tribes generally, are trustworthy and honest,[37] and that the Ostyaks have no other oaths but those of purgation. Among them "witnesses never take the oath, but their words are unconditionally believed in, and everybody, with the exception of lunatics, is allowed to give evidence. Children may witness against their parents, brothers against brothers, a husband against his wife, and a wife against her husband."[38]

[Footnote 33: Georgi, _Russia_, i. 110.]

[Footnote 34: _Ibid._ ii. 229.]

[Footnote 35: _Ibid._ iii. 78. _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 109.]

[Footnote 36: _Ibid._ iii. 192. _Cf._ Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 236.]

[Footnote 37: Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, i. 257.]

[Footnote 38: _Ibid._ i. 309 _sq._]

The Aleuts were highly praised by Father Veniaminof for their truthfulness:--"These people detest lying, and never spread false rumours. . . . They are very much offended if any one doubts their word." They "despise hypocrisy in every respect," and "do not flatter nor make empty promises, even in order to escape reproof."[39] The regard in which truth is held by the Eskimo seems to vary among different tribes. Armstrong blames the Western Eskimo for being much {76} addicted to falsehood, and for seldom telling the truth, if there be anything to gain by a lie.[40] The Point Barrow Eskimo "are in the main truthful, though a detected lie is hardly considered more than a good joke, and considerable trickery is practised in trading."[41] Of the Eskimo at Igloolik, an island near Melville Peninsula, we are told that "their lies consist only of vilifying each other's character, with false accusations of theft or ill behaviour. When asking questions of an individual, it is but rarely that he will either advance or persist in an untruth. . . . Lying among them is almost exclusively confined to the ladies."[42] In his description of the Eskimo on the western side of Davis Strait and in the region of Frobisher Bay, Mr. Hall says that they despise and shun one who will _shag-la-voo_, that is, "tell a lie," and that they are rarely troubled by any of this class.[43] The Greenlanders are generally truthful towards each other, at least the men.[44] But if he can help it, a Greenlander will not tell a truth which he thinks may be unpleasant to the hearer, as he is anxious to stand on as good a footing as possible with his fellow-men.[45]

[Footnote 39: Veniaminof, quoted by Dall, _Alaska_, pp. 396, 395.]

[Footnote 40: Armstrong, _Discovery of the North-West Passage_, p. 196 _sq._]

[Footnote 41: Murdoch, 'Ethnological Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 41.]

[Footnote 42: Lyon, _Private Journal during the Voyage of Discovery under Captain Parry_, p. 349.]

[Footnote 43: Hall, _Arctic Researches_, p. 567.]

[Footnote 44: Dalager, _Grønlandske Relationer_, p. 69. Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 171, 175. Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 158.]

[Footnote 45: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 101. _Idem_, _First Crossing of Greenland_, ii. 334 _sq._]

The Thompson River Indians of British Columbia maintain that it is bad to lie, that if you do so people will laugh at you and call you a "liar."[46] Speaking of the Iroquois, Mr. Morgan says that the love of truth was a marked trait of the Indian character. "This inborn sentiment flourished in the period of their highest prosperity, in all the freshness of its primeval purity. On all occasions and at whatever peril, the Iroquois spoke the truth without fear and without hesitation. Dissimulation was not an Indian habit. . . . The Iroquois prided themselves upon their sacred regard for the public faith, and punished the want of it with severity when an occasion presented itself."[47] Loskiel likewise states that they considered lying and cheating heinous and scandalous offences.[48] Among the Chippewas there were a few persons addicted to lying, but these {77} were held in disrepute.[49] The Shoshones, a tribe of the Snake Indians, were frank and communicative in their intercourse with strangers, and perfectly fair in their dealings.[50] The Seminole Indians of Florida are commended for their truthfulness.[51] With special reference to the Navahos, Mr. Matthews observes, "As the result of over thirty years' experience among Indians, I must say that I have not found them less truthful than the average of our own race."[52] Among the Dacotahs lying "is considered very bad"; yet in this respect "every one sees the mote in his brother's eye, but does not discover the beam that is in his own,"[53] want of truthfulness and habitual dishonesty in little things being prevalent traits in their character.[54] So, also, the Thlinkets admit that falsehood is criminal, although they have recourse to it without hesitation whenever it suits their purpose.[55] Of the Chippewyans, again, it is said that they carry the habit of lying to such an extent, even among themselves, that they can scarcely be said to esteem truth a virtue.[56] The Crees are "not very strict in their adherence to truth, being great boasters."[57] Heriot[58] and Adair[59] speak of the treacherous or deceitful disposition of the North American Indians; but the latter adds that, though "privately dishonest," they are "very faithful indeed to their own tribe."

[Footnote 46: Teit, 'Thompson Indians of British Columbia,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, Anthropology, i. 366.]

[Footnote 47: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, pp. 335, 338.]

[Footnote 48: Loskiel, _History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Indians in North America_, i. 16.]

[Footnote 49: Keating, _Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_, ii. 168.]

[Footnote 50: Lewis and Clarke, _Travels to the Source of the Missouri River_, p. 306.]

[Footnote 51: Maccauley, 'Seminole Indians of Florida,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ v. 491.]

[Footnote 52: Matthews, 'Study of Ethics among the Lower Races,' in _Jour. of American Folk-Lore_, xii. 5.]

[Footnote 53: Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, ii. 196.]

[Footnote 54: Eastman, _Dacotah_, p. xvii.]

[Footnote 55: Douglas, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 177.]

[Footnote 56: Richardson, _Arctic Searching Expedition_, ii. 18. _Cf._ _ibid._ ii. 19.]

[Footnote 57: Richardson, in Franklin, _Journey to the Shores of the Polar Sea_, p. 63.]

[Footnote 58: Heriot, _Travels through the Canadas_, p. 319.]

[Footnote 59: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 4.]

Of the regard in which truth is held by the Indians of South America the authorities I have consulted have little to say. The Coroados are not deceitful.[60] The Tehuelches of Patagonia nearly always lie in minor affairs, and will invent stories for sheer amusement. "In anything of importance, however, such as guaranteeing the safety of a person, they were very truthful, as long as faith was kept with them. After a time," Lieutenant Musters adds, "when they ascertained that I invariably avoided deviating in any way from the truth, they left off lying to me even in minor matters. This will serve to show that they are not of the treacherous nature assigned to {78} them by some ignorant writers."[61] Among the Fuegians, according to Mr. Bridge, no one can trust another, lying tales of slander are very common, great exaggeration is used, and it is not even considered wrong to tell a lie.[62] Snow, however, speaks of "the honesty they undoubtedly evince in many of their transactions";[63] and Darwin states that the Fuegian boy on board the Beagle "showed, by going into the most violent passion, that he quite understood the reproach of being called a liar, which in truth he was."[64]

[Footnote 60: von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 242.]

[Footnote 61: Musters, _At Home with the Patagonians_, p. 195 _sq._]

[Footnote 62: Bridges, in _A Voice for South America_, xiii. 202 _sq._ _Cf._ Hyades and Deniker, _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn_, vii. 242; King and Fitzroy, _Voyages of the "Adventure" and "Beagle,"_ ii. 188.]

[Footnote 63: Snow, _Two Years Cruise off Tierra del Fuego_, i. 347.]

[Footnote 64: Darwin, _Journal of Researches_, p. 227.]

Of the Australian aborigines we are told that some tribes and families display on nearly all occasions honesty and truthfulness, whereas others "seem almost destitute of the better qualities."[65] According to Mr. Mathew, they are not wantonly untruthful, although one can rely on them being faithful to a trust only on condition that they are exempt from strong temptation.[66] Mr. Curr admits that under some circumstances they are treacherous, and that it costs them little pain to lie; but from his own observations he has no doubt that the black feels, in the commencement of his career at least, that lying is wrong.[67] Mr. Howitt has found the South Australian Kurnai "to compare not unfavourably with our own people in their narration of occurrences, or as witnesses in courts of justice as to facts. Among them a person known to disregard truth is branded as a liar (_jet-bolan_)."[68] Among the aborigines of New South Wales people who cause strife by lying are punished, and "liars are much disliked"; Dr. Fraser was assured by a person who had had much intercourse with them for thirty years that he never knew them to tell a lie.[69] Among the tribes of Western Victoria described by Mr. Dawson liars are detested; should any man, through lying, get others into trouble, he is punished with the boomerang, whilst women and young people, for the same fault, are beaten with a stick.[70] In his description of his expeditions into Central Australia Eyre writes, "In their intercourse with each other I {79} have generally found the natives to speak the truth and act with honesty, and they will usually do the same with Europeans if on friendly terms with them."[71] With regard to West Australian tribes Mr. Chauncy states that they are certainly not remarkable for their treachery, and that he has very seldom known any of them accused of it. He adds that they are "habitually honest among themselves, if not truthful," and that, during his many years' acquaintance with them, he does not remember ever hearing a native utter a falsehood with a definite idea of gaining anything by it. "If questioned on any subject, he would form his reply rather with the view of pleasing the enquirer than of its being true; but this was attributable to his politeness."[72] According to a late Advocate-General of West Australia, "when a native is accused of any crime, he often acknowledges his share in the transaction with perfect candour."[73] Very different from these accounts is Mr. Gason's statement concerning the Dieyerie in South Australia. "A more treacherous race," he says, "I do not believe exists. They imbibe treachery in infancy, and practise it until death, and have no sense of wrong in it. . . . They seem to take a delight in lying, especially if they think it will please you. Should you ask them any question, be prepared for a falsehood, as a matter of course. They not only lie to the white man, but to each other, and do not appear to see any wrong in it."[74] The natives of Botany Bay and Port Jackson in New South Wales are by older writers described as no strangers to falsehood.[75] And speaking of a tribe in North Queensland, Mr. Lumholtz observed that "an Australian native can betray anybody," and that "there is not one among them who will not lie if it is to his advantage."[76]

[Footnote 65: Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. 25.]

[Footnote 66: Mathew, 'Australian Aborigines,' in _Jour. and Proceed. Roy. Soc. N.S. Wales_, xxiii. 387.]

[Footnote 67: Curr, _Australian Race_, i. 43, 100.]

[Footnote 68: Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, p. 256.]

[Footnote 69: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, pp. 41, 90.]

[Footnote 70: Dawson, _Australian Aborigines_, p. 76.]

[Footnote 71: Eyre, _Expeditions of Discovery into Central Australia_, ii. 385.]

[Footnote 72: Chauncy, quoted by Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ ii. 275, 281. _Cf._ Oldfield, 'Aborigines of Australia,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. iii. 255.]

[Footnote 73: Moore, quoted by Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ ii. 278.]

[Footnote 74: Gason, 'Dieyerie Tribe of Australian Aborigines,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 257 _sq._]

[Footnote 75: Collins, _English Colony in New South Wales_, i. 600. Barrington, _History of New South Wales_, p. 22.]

[Footnote 76: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 100.]

According to Mr. Hale, the Polynesians are not naturally treacherous, by no means from a horror of deception, but apparently from a mere inaptitude at dissembling; and it is said that the word of a Micronesian may generally be relied upon.[77] To the Tonga Islanders a false accusation appeared more horrible than deliberate murder does to us, and they also put this {80} principle into practice.[78] We are told by Polack that among the Maoris of New Zealand lying is universally practised by all classes, and that an accomplished liar is accounted a man of consummate ability.[79] But Dieffenbach found that, if treated with honesty, they were always ready to reciprocate such treatment;[80] and, according to another authority, they believed in an evil spirit whom they said was "a liar and the father of lies."[81] The broad statement made by von Jhering, that among the South Sea Islanders lying is regarded as a harmless and innocent play of the imagination,[82] is certainly not correct. The treacherous disposition attributed to the Caroline Islanders[83] and the natives of New Britain[84] does not imply so much as that. The New Caledonians are, comparatively speaking, "not naturally dishonest."[85] The Solomon Islanders are praised as faithful and reliable workmen and servants,[86] though cheating in trade is nowadays very common among some of them.[87] Of the people of Erromanga, in the New Hebrides, the Rev. H. A. Robertson states that "truth, in heathenism, was told only when it suited best, but," he adds, "it is not that natives are always reckless about the truth so much as that they seem utterly incapable of stating anything definitely, or stating a thing just as it really occurred."[88] In the opinion of some authorities, the Fijians are very untruthful and regard adroit lying as an accomplishment.[89] Their propensity to lie, says the missionary Williams, "is so strong that they seem to have no wish to deny its existence, or very little shame when convicted of a falsehood." The universal prevalence of the habit of lying is so thoroughly taken for granted, "that it is common to hear, after the most ordinary statement, the rejoinder, 'That's a lie,' or something to the same effect, at which the accused person does not think of taking offence." But the same writer adds:--"Natives have often told me lies, manifestly without any ill-will, and when it would have been far more to their advantage to have spoken the truth. The Fijians hail as agreeable companions those who are {81} skilful in making tales, but, under some circumstances, strongly condemn the practice of falsehood. . . . On matters most lied about by civilised people, the native is the readiest to speak the truth. Thus, when convicted of some offence, he rarely attempts to deny it, but will generally confess all to any one he esteems. . . . The following incident shows that lying _per se_ is condemned and considered disreputable. A white man, notorious for falsehood, had displeased a powerful chief, and wrote asking me to intercede for him. I did so; when the chief dismissed the case briefly, saying, 'Tell--that no one hates a foreigner; but tell him that every one hates a liar!'"[90] Other writers even deny that the Fijians were habitual liars;[91] and Erskine found that those chiefs with whom he had to deal were so open to appeals to their good faith as to convince him "that they had a due appreciation of the virtue of truth."[92]

[Footnote 77: Hale, _U.S. Exploring Expedition, Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, pp. 16, 73.]

[Footnote 78: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 163 _sq._]

[Footnote 79: Polack, _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_, ii. 102 _sq._ See also Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, pp. 44, 46.]

[Footnote 80: Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 109.]

[Footnote 81: Yate, _Account of New Zealand_, p. 145.]

[Footnote 82: von Jhering, _Der Zweck im Recht_, ii. 606.]

[Footnote 83: Angas, _Polynesia_, p. 386.]

[Footnote 84: Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 262.]

[Footnote 85: Anderson, _Travel in Fiji and New Caledonia_, p. 233.]

[Footnote 86: Parkinson, _Zur Ethnographie der nordwestlichen Salomo Inseln_, p. 4.]

[Footnote 87: Sommerville, 'Ethnogr. Notes in New Georgia,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxvi. 393.]

[Footnote 88: Robertson, _Erromanga_, p. 384 _sq._]

[Footnote 89: Wilkes, _U.S. Exploring Expedition_, iii. 76.]

[Footnote 90: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 107 _sq._]

[Footnote 91: Erskine, _Cruise among the Islands of the Western Pacific_, p. 264. Anderson, _Travel in Fiji and New Caledonia_, p. 130.]

[Footnote 92: Erskine, _op. cit._ p. 264.]

Nowhere in the savage world is truth held in less estimation than among many of the African races. The Negroes are described as cunning and liars by nature.[93] They "tell a lie more readily than they tell the truth," and falsehood "is not recognised amongst them as a fault."[94] They lie not only for the sake of gaining some advantage by it, or in order to please or amuse, but their lies are often said to be absolutely without purpose.[95] Of the natives of the Gold Coast the old traveller Bosman says, "The Negroes are all, without exception, crafty, villainous and fraudulent, and very seldom to be trusted, being sure to slip no opportunity of cheating an European, nor indeed one another."[96] Among all the Bakalai tribes "lying is thought an enviable accomplishment."[97] The Bakongo, in their answers, "will generally try and tell the questioner what they think will please him most, quite ignoring the truthfulness we consider it necessary to observe in our replies."[98] Miss Kingsley's experience of West African natives is likewise that they "will say 'Yes' to any mortal thing, if they think you want them to."[99] The Wakamba are described as great liars.[100] {82} Among the Waganda "truth is held in very low estimation, and it is never considered wrong to tell lies; indeed, a successful liar is considered a smart, clever fellow, and rather admired."[101] Untruthfulness is said to be "a national characteristic" of the tribes inhabiting the region of Lake Nyassa.[102] From his experience of the Eastern Central Africans, the Rev. D. Macdonald writes: "'Telling lies' is much practised and is seldom considered a fault. . . . The negro often thinks that he is flattered by being accused of falsehood. So, when natives wish to pay a high compliment to a European who has told them an interesting story, they look into his face and say, 'O father, you are a great liar.'"[103] To the Wanika, says Mr. New, lying is "almost as the very breath of their nostrils, and all classes, young and old, male and female, indulge in it. A great deal of their lying is without cause or object; it is lying for lying's sake. You ask a man his name, his tribe, where he lives, or any other simple question of like nature, and the answer he gives you will, as a rule, be the very opposite to the truth; yet he has nothing to evade or gain by so doing. Lying seems to be more natural to him than speaking the truth. He lies when detection is evident, and laughs at it as though he thought it a good joke. He hears himself called a _mulongo_ (liar) a score of times a day, but he notices it not, for there is no opprobrium in the term to him. To hide a fault he lies with the most barefaced audacity and blindest obstinacy. . . . When his object is gain, he will invent falsehoods wholesale. . . . He boasts that _ulongo_ (lying) is his _pesa_ (piece, ha'pence), and holds bare truth to be the most unprofitable commodity in the world. But while he lies causelessly, objectlessly, recklessly in self-defence or for self-interest, he is not a malicious liar. He does not lie with express intent to do others harm; this he would consider immoral, and he has sufficient goodness of heart to avoid indulging therein. . . . I have often been struck with the manner in which he has controlled his tongue when the character and interest of others have been at stake."[104] If a Bantu of South-Eastern Africa "undertakes the charge of any form of property, he accounts for it with as great fidelity as if he were the Keeper of the Great Seal. But, on the other hand, there are many circumstances in which falsehood is not reckoned even a disgrace, and if a man could {83} extricate himself from difficulties by lying and did not do so, he would be simply thought a fool."[105] Andersson speaks of the "lying habits" of the Herero.[106] Of the Bachapins, a Bechuana tribe, Burchell observes that among their vices a universal disregard for truth and a want of honourable adherence to their promise stand high above the rest, the consequence of this habitual practice of lying being "the absence of shame, even on being detected."[107] Among the Kafirs "deception is a practised art from early childhood; even the children will not answer a plain question."[108] It is considered a smart thing to deceive so long as a person is not found out, but it is awkward to be detected; hence a native father will enjoy seeing his children deceive people cleverly.[109] "In trading with them, you may make up your mind that all they tell you is untrue, and act accordingly. . . . Your own natives, on the other hand, if they like you, will lie for your benefit as strongly as the opposite party against you; and both sides think it all fair trade."[110] And in a Kafir lawsuit "defendant, plaintiff, and witnesses are allowed to tell as many lies as they like, in order to make the best of their case."[111] But we also hear that Kafirs do not tell lies to their chiefs, and that there are many among them who would never deceive a white man whom they are fond of or respect.[112] Among the Bushmans veracity is said to be too often, yet not always, disregarded, "and the neglect of it considered a mere venial offence."[113] "The first version of what a Bushman or any native has to say can never be relied on; whatever you ask him about, he invariably says first, 'I don't know,' and then promises to tell you all he does know. Ask him for news, and he says, 'No; we have got no news,' and shortly afterwards he will tell you news of perhaps great interest."[114] In Madagascar there was no stigma attached to deceit or fraud; they "were rather admired as proofs of superior cunning, as things to be imitated, so far at least as they would not bring the offender within the penalties of the native laws."[115] Ellis says that "the best sign of genius in children is esteemed a quickness to deceive, {84} overreach and cheat. The people delight in fabulous tales, but in none so much or universally as in those that relate instances of successful deceit or fraud. . . . Their constant aim is, in business to swindle, in professed friendship to extort, and in mere conversation to exaggerate and fabricate."[116] These statements refer to the Hovas; but among the Betsileo, inhabiting the same island, lying and cheating are equally rife, and "neither appears to have been thought a sin, so long as it remained undiscovered."[117] At the same time many of the Madagascar proverbs are designed to put down lying, and to show that truth is always best.[118]

[Footnote 93: Baker, _Albert N'yanza_, i. 289. Burton, _Mission to Gelele_, ii. 199.]

[Footnote 94: Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 580.]

[Footnote 95: Hübbe-Schleiden, _Ethiopien, Studien über West-Afrika_, p. 186 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: Bosman, _New Description of the Coast of Guinea_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 97: Du Chaillu, _Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa_, p. 390. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 331.]

[Footnote 98: Ward, _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_, p. 47.]

[Footnote 99: Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 525.]

[Footnote 100: Krapf, _Travels in Eastern Africa_, p. 355.]

[Footnote 101: Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, i. 224. _Cf._ Felkin, 'Notes on the Waganda Tribe,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 722; Ashe, _Two Kings of Uganda_, p. 295.]

[Footnote 102: Macdonald, 'East Central African Customs,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxii. 119.]

[Footnote 103: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 262 _sq._]

[Footnote 104: New, _Life, Wanderings, and Labours in Eastern Africa_, p. 96 _sqq._]

[Footnote 105: Macdonald, _Light in Africa_, p. 211.]

[Footnote 106: Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 217. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 499 (Bayeye).]

[Footnote 107: Burchell, _Travels in the Interior of Southern Africa_, ii. 553 _sq._]

[Footnote 108: Holden, _The Past and Future of the Kaffir Races_, p. 179.]

[Footnote 109: Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 285.]

[Footnote 110: Leslie, _Among the Zulus and Amatongas_, p. 199. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 202.]

[Footnote 111: Maclean, _Compendium of Kafir Laws and Customs_, p. 58.]

[Footnote 112: Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 286.]

[Footnote 113: Burchell, _op. cit._ ii. 54.]

[Footnote 114: Chapman, _Travels in the Interior of South Africa_, i. 76 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: Sibree, _The Great African Island_, p. 338.]

[Footnote 116: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 143 _sq._]

[Footnote 117: Sibree, _op. cit._ p. 125. Shaw, 'Betsileo,' in _Antananarivo Annual_, iii. 79.]

[Footnote 118: Clemes, 'Malagasy Proverbs,' _ibid._ iv. 29.]

But in Africa, also, there are many peoples who have been described as regardful of truth and hostile to falsehood. Early travellers speak very highly of the sincerity of the Hottentots. Father Tachart says that they have more honesty than is almost anywhere found among Christians;[119] and Kolben agrees with him, asserting that the word of a Hottentot is sacred, and that there is hardly anything upon earth which he looks upon as a fouler crime than breach of engagement.[120] According to Barrow, the Hottentots are perfectly honest and faithful, and, "if accused of crimes of which they have been guilty, they generally divulge the truth."[121] Of the Manansas Dr. Holub states that, so far as his experience goes, they are beyond the average for honesty and fidelity, and are consequently laughed at by the more powerful tribes as "the simpletons of the North."[122] The Bahima in the Uganda Protectorate are usually very honest and truthful, and most of the Nandi think it very wicked to tell a lie.[123] Among the For tribe of Central Africa "lying is held to be a great crime; even the youngest children are severely beaten for it, and any one over fifteen or sixteen who is an habitual liar suffers the loss of one lip as a penalty."[124] Speaking of the natives of Sierra Leone, Winterbottom remarks that, in proportion as we advance into the interior of the country, the people are found to be more devoid of art and more free from suspicion.[125] "Those who have dealings with the Fán universally {85} prefer them in point of honesty and manliness to the Mpongwe and Coast races," and it is an insult to call one of them a liar or coward.[126] Monrad, who wrote in the beginning of the nineteenth century, asserts that among the Negroes of Accra lying is by no means common and that they are as a rule honest towards their own people.[127] According to an early authority, the people of Great Benin were very straightforward and did not cheat each other.[128] Mr. and Mrs. Hinde write that the Masai are as a race truthful, and that a grown-up person among them will not lie; "he may refuse to answer a question, but, once given, his word can be depended on."[129] Dr. Baumann, on the other hand, says that they often lie, but that they regard lying as a great fault.[130] The Guanches of the Canary Islands are stated to have been "slaves to their word."[131] Of the Berbers of Morocco Leo Africanus writes:--"Most honest people they are, and destitute of all fraud and guile. . . . They keep their couenant most faithfully; insomuch that they had rather die than breake promise."[132] M. Dyveyrier found the same virtue among the Touareg, another Berber people:--"La fidélité aux promesses, aux traités, est poussée si loin par les Touareg, qu il est difficile d'obtenir d'eux des engagements. . . . Il est de maxime chez les Touâreg, en matière de contrat, de ne s'engager que pour la moitié de ce qu'on peut tenir, afin de ne pas s'exposer au reproche d'infidélité. . . . Le mensonge, le vol domestique et l'abus de confiance sont inconnus des Touâreg."[133] As regards the truthfulness of the African Arabs opinions vary. Parkyns asks, "Who is more trustworthy than the desert Arab?"[134] According to Rohlfs and Chavanne, on the other hand, the Arabs of the Sahara are much addicted to lying;[135] and of the Arabs of Egypt Mr. St. John observes:--"There is no general appreciation of a man's word. . . . 'Liar' is a playful appellative scarcely reproachful; and 'I have told a lie' a confession that may be made without a blush."[136] Herodotus' statement that "the Arabs observe pledges as religiously as any people,"[137] is true of the Bedouins of Arabia in the {86} present day. "No vice or crime is more deservedly stigmatised as infamous among Bedouins than treachery. An individual in the great Arabian Desert will be forgiven if he should kill a stranger on the road, but eternal disgrace would be attached to his name, if it were known that he had robbed his companion, or his protected guest, even of a handkerchief."[138] Wallin affirms that you may put perfect trust in the promise of a Bedouin, as soon as you have eaten salt and bread with him.[139] But whilst faithfulness to a tacit or express promise is thus regarded by him as a sacred duty, lying and cheating are as prevalent in the desert as in the market-towns of Syria.[140] Speaking of the Bedouins of the Euphrates, Mr. Blunt observes:--"Truth, in ordinary matters, is not regarded as a virtue by the Bedouins, nor is lying held shameful. Every man, they say, has a right to conceal his own thought. In matters of importance, the simple affirmation is confirmed by an oath, and then the fact stated may be relied on. There is only one exception to the general rule of lying among them. The Bedouin, if questioned on the breed of his mare, will not give a false answer. He may refuse to say, or he may answer that he does not know; but he will not name another breed than that to which she really belongs. . . . The rule, however, does not hold good on any other point of horse dealing. The age, the qualities, and the ownership of the horse may be all falsely stated."[141]

[Footnote 119: Tachart, quoted by Kolben, _Present State of the Cape of Good Hope_, i. 167.]

[Footnote 120: _Ibid._ i. 59.]

[Footnote 121: Barrow, _Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa_, i. 151 _sq._]

[Footnote 122: Holub, _Seven Years in South Africa_, ii. 209.]

[Footnote 123: Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, ii. 630, 879.]

[Footnote 124: Felkin, in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 232.]

[Footnote 125: Winterbottom, _Account of the Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_, i. 206 _sq._]

[Footnote 126: Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 225 _sq._]

[Footnote 127: Monrad, _Guinea-Kysten og dens Indbyggere_, p. 6.]

[Footnote 128: Quoted by Ling Roth, _Great Benin_, p. 45.]

[Footnote 129: Hinde, _The Last of the Masai_, p. 34.]

[Footnote 130: Baumann, _Durch Massailand_, p. 165.]

[Footnote 131: Bory de St. Vincent, _Essais sur les Isles Fortunées_, p. 70.]

[Footnote 132: Leo Africanus, _History and Description of Africa_, i. 183.]

[Footnote 133: Dyveyrier, _Exploration du Sahara_, p. 384 _sq._]

[Footnote 134: Parkyns, _Life in Abyssinia_, ii. 182.]

[Footnote 135: Chavanne, _Die Sahara_, p. 392.]

[Footnote 136: St. John, _Adventures in the Lybian Desert_, p. 31.]

[Footnote 137: Herodotus, iii. 8.]

[Footnote 138: Burckhardt, _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 190 _sq._]

[Footnote 139: Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iii. 116.]

[Footnote 140: Burckhardt, _op. cit._ p. 104 _sq._ _Cf._ Wallin, _op. cit._ iv. 89 _sq._; Doughty, _Arabia Deserta_, i. 241.]

[Footnote 141: Blunt, _Bedouin Tribes of the Euphrates_, ii. 203 _sq._ _Cf._ Niebuhr, _Travels through Arabia_, ii. 302:--"There is no instance of false testimony given in respect to the descent of a horse. Every Arabian is persuaded that himself and his whole family would be ruined, if he should prevaricate in giving his oath in an affair of such consequence."]

Various statements of travellers thus directly contradict the common opinion that want of truthfulness is mostly a characteristic of uncivilised races.[142] And we have much reason to assume that a foreigner visiting a savage tribe is apt rather to underrate than to overestimate its veracity. Mr. Savage Landor gives us a curious insight into an explorer's method of testing it. "If you were to say to an Ainu, 'You are old, are you not?' he would answer {87}'Yes'; but if you asked the same man, 'You are not old, are you?' he would equally answer 'Yes.'" And then comes the conclusion:--"Knowingly speaking the truth is not one of their characteristics; indeed, they do not know the difference between falsehood and truth."[143] It is hardly surprising to hear from other authorities that the Ainu are remarkably honest, and regard veracity as one of the most imperative duties.[144] Speaking of the Uaupés and other Brazilian tribes, Mr. Wallace observes:--"In my communications and inquiries among the Indians on various matters, I have always found the greatest caution necessary, to prevent one's arriving at wrong conclusions. They are always apt to affirm that which they see you wish to believe, and, when they do not at all comprehend your question, will unhesitatingly answer, 'Yes.'"[145] Savages who are inclined to give inaccurate answers to questions made by strangers, may nevertheless be truthful towards each other. As the regard for life and property, so the regard for truth varies according as the person concerned is a foreigner or a tribesman. "Perfidy and faithlessness," says Crawfurd, "are vices of the Indian islanders, and those vices of which they have been most frequently accused by strangers. This sentence against them must, however, be understood with some allowances. In their domestic and social intercourse, they are far from being a deceitful people, but in reality possess more integrity than it is reasonable to look for with so much misgovernment and barbarity. It is in their intercourse with strangers and with enemies that, like other barbarians, the treachery of their character is displayed."[146] The natives of the interior of Sumatra are "dishonest in their dealings with strangers, which they esteem no moral defect."[147] Dalager states that the same Greenlanders who, among themselves, in the sale of an object {88} which, the buyer had not seen, would depreciate it rather than overpraise it--even though the seller was anxious to get rid of it--told frightful lies in their transactions with Danish traders.[148] The Touareg, whilst scrupulously faithful to a promise given to one of their own people, do not regard as binding a promise given to a Christian;[149] and their Arab neighbours say that their word, "like water fallen on the sand, is never to be found again."[150] The Masai, according to Herr Merker, hold any kind of deceit to be allowable in their relations with persons of another race.[151] The Hovas of Madagascar even considered it a duty for anyone speaking with foreigners on political matters to state the exact opposite to the truth, and punished him who did otherwise.[152]

[Footnote 142: Burton, _City of the Saints_, p. 130. Vierkandt, _Naturvölker und Kulturvölker_, p. 273. von Jhering, _Der Zweck im Recht_, ii. 606.]

[Footnote 143: Landor, _Alone with the Hairy Ainu_, p. 283.]

[Footnote 144: Holland, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iii. 237. von Siebold, _Aino auf der Insel Yesso_, p. 25.]

[Footnote 145: Wallace, _Travels on the Amazon_, p. 494 _sq._]

[Footnote 146: Crawfurd, _op. cit._ i. 71 _sq._ _Cf._ Christian, _Caroline Islands_, p. 71 _sq._]

[Footnote 147: Marsden, _op. cit._ p. 208.]

[Footnote 148: Dalager, _op. cit._ p. 60 _sq._]

[Footnote 149: von Bary, quoted by Chavanne, _Die Sahara_, p. 186.]

[Footnote 150: Dubois, _Timbuctoo_, p. 231.]

[Footnote 151: Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 115.]

[Footnote 152: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 144. Professor Stanley Hall observes ('Children's Lies,' in _American Journal of Psychology_, iii. 62) that "truth for our friends and lies for our enemies is a practical, though not distinctly conscious rule widely current with children."]

In point of truthfulness savages are in many cases superior to nations more advanced in culture. "A Chinese," says Mr. Wells Williams, "requires but little motive to falsify, and he is constantly sharpening his wits to cozen his customer--wheedle him by promises and cheat him in goods or work."[153] His ordinary speech is said to be so full of insincerity that it is very difficult to learn the truth in almost any case.[154] He feels no shame at being detected in a lie, nor does he fear any punishment from his gods for it;[155] if you call him a liar, "you arouse in him no sense of outrage, no sentiment of degradation."[156] Yet the moral teachings of the Chinese inculcate truthfulness as a stringent duty. One of their injunctions is, "Let children always be taught to speak the simple truth."[157] Many sayings may be quoted from Confucius in which sincerity is celebrated as highly and demanded as urgently as it ever was by any {89} Christian moralist. Faithfulness and sincerity, he said, should be held as first principles. Sincerity is the way of Heaven, the end and beginning of things, without which there would be nothing. It is as necessary to truly virtuous conduct as a boat is to a man wishing to cross a river, or as oars are to a boat. The superior man ought to feel shame when his conduct is not in accord with his words.[158] But there are instances in which sincerity has to yield to family duties: a father should conceal the misconduct of his son, and a son that of his father.[159] Moreover, the great moralists themselves did not always act up to their lofty principles. Confucius and Mencius sometimes did not hesitate to tell a lie for the sake of convenience.[160] The former could excuse himself from seeing an unwelcome visitor on the ground that he was sick, when there was nothing the matter with him;[161] and he deliberately broke an oath which he had sworn, because it had been forced from him.[162] In Japan, Burma, and Siam, truth is more respected than in China. "In love of truth," says Professor Rein, "the Japanese, so far as my experience goes, are not inferior to us Europeans." [163] The Burmese, though partial to much exaggeration, are generally truthful.[164] And "the mendacity so characteristic of Orientals is not a national defect among the Siamese. Lying, no doubt, is often resorted to as a protection against injustice and oppression, but the chances are greatly in favour of truth when evidence is sought."[165]

[Footnote 153: Wells Williams, _The Middle Kingdom_, i. 834.]

[Footnote 154: Smith, _Chinese Characteristics_, p. 271.]

[Footnote 155: Cooke, _China_, p. 414. Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 122. Bowring, _Siam_, i. 106. Wells Williams, _op. cit._ i. 834.]

[Footnote 156: Smith, _Chinese Characteristics_, p. 271.]

[Footnote 157: Wells Williams, _op. cit._ i. 522.]

[Footnote 158: _Lun Yü_, i. 8. 2; vii. 24; ix. 24; xii. 10. 1; xv. 5. 2. _Chung Yung_, xx. 18. Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, pp. 103, 114, 146. Legge, _Chinese Classics_, i. 100.]

[Footnote 159: _Lun Yü_, xiii. 18. 2.]

[Footnote 160: Legge, _Chinese Classics_, i. 100. Smith, _Chinese Characteristics_, p. 267.]

[Footnote 161: _Lun Yü_, vi. 13.]

[Footnote 162: _Lun Yü_, xvii. 20.]

[Footnote 163: Rein, _Japan_, p. 393.]

[Footnote 164: MacMahon, _Far Cathay and Farther India_, p. 62. Forbes, _British Burma_, p. 45. Fytche, _Burma Past and Present_, ii. 67.]

[Footnote 165: Bowring, _Siam_, i. 105.]

Lying has been called the national vice of the Hindus.[166] "It is not too much to assert that the mass of Bengalis have no notion of truth and falsehood."[167] A gentleman {90} who has been brought into the closest intimacy with natives of all classes, declares "that when a question is asked, the full bearing of which on themselves or those connected with them they cannot see, you may rely upon it that the first answer you receive is false; but that, when they see that the truth cannot injure themselves or any one they care for, they will speak the truth."[168] The testimony of a Hindu is not generally regarded as evidence.[169] Forgery is frequently resorted to, cheating is rife. "In almost all business transactions of the smallest kind a written agreement must be made on both sides, and this must be stamped and registered, because it is believed that a man's word is not binding."[170] Nor is a lie held disreputable, especially if not found out.[171] But in India, as elsewhere, the question whether truth or falsehood is to be spoken depends on the relationship between the speaker and the party addressed. In their relations with each other, says Sir W. H. Sleeman, members of a village community spoke as much truth as those of any other community in the world, but in their relations with the government they told as many lies; "if a man had told a lie to _cheat_ his neighbour, he would have become an object of hatred and contempt--if he had told a lie to _save_ his neighbour's fields from an increase of rent or tax, he would have become an object of esteem and respect."[172] Of the Sûdra inhabitants of Central India Sir John Malcolm likewise observes that "they may be said, in their intercourse with strangers and with officers of government, to evade the truth, and often to assert positive falsehoods"; whereas, "in their intercourse with each other, falsehood is not common, and many (particularly some of the cultivators) are distinguished by their adherence to truth."[173] The ancient Hindus were praised for their veracity and good faith; {91} in his History of India, written in the second century of the Christian era, Arrian states that no Indian was ever known to tell an untruth.[174] In the sacred books of India truthfulness is highly celebrated. "If veracity and a thousand horse-sacrifices are weighed against each other, it is found that truth ranks even higher than a thousand horse-sacrifices."[175] "Verily the gods are the truth, and man is the untruth."[176] "There is one law which the gods do keep, namely, the truth. It is through this that their conquest, their glory is unassailable: and so, forsooth, is his conquest, his glory unassailable whosoever, knowing this, speaks the truth."[177] Attendance on, or the worship of, the sacred fire means speaking the truth:--"Whosoever speaks the truth, acts as if he sprinkled that lighted fire with ghee; for even so does he enkindle it: and ever the more increases his own vital energy, and day by day does he become better. And whosoever speaks the untruth, acts as if he sprinkled that lighted fire with water; for even so does he enfeeble it: and ever the less becomes his own vital energy, and day by day does he become more wicked. Let him, therefore, speak nothing but the truth."[178] Fearful denunciations are particularly pronounced against those who deliver false testimony in a court of justice.[179] By giving false evidence concerning small cattle, a witness commits the sin of killing ten men; by false evidence concerning cows, horses, and men, he commits the sin of killing a hundred, a thousand, and ten thousand men respectively; but by false evidence concerning land, he commits the sin of killing the whole human race.[180] The sin of falsehood thus admits of different degrees according to the magnitude of the injury inflicted by it. Indeed, "in some cases a man who, though knowing the facts to be different, gives such false evidence from a pious motive, does not lose heaven; such evidence they call the speech of the gods."[181] {92} Moreover, "whenever the death of a Sûdra, of a Vaisya, of a Kshatriya, or of a Brâhmana would be caused by a declaration of the truth, a falsehood may be spoken; for such falsehood is preferable to the truth."[182] According to Buddhist conceptions of lying, "the magnitude of the crime increases in proportion to the value of the article, or the importance of the matter, about which the lie is told."[183] And it is a lesser wrong to lie in self-defence than to lie with a view to procuring an advantage by injuring one's neighbour. Thus, to deny the possession of any article, in order to retain it, is not a lie of a heinous description, whereas to bear false witness in order that the proper owner may be deprived of that which he possesses, is a lie to which a greater degree of culpability is attached.[184] The Buddhist precept of truthfulness is more restricted than that laid down by Brahmanism:--"It is said by the Brahmans that it is not a crime to tell a lie on behalf of the guru, or on account of cattle, or to save the person's own life, or to gain the victory in any contest; but this is contrary to the precept."[185] One of the conditions that make a Buddha is, never, under the influence of desire and other passions, to utter a conscious lie, for the sake of wealth or any other advantage.[186] From the time that Gautama became a Bodhisattva, or claimant for the Buddhaship, through all his births until the attainment of the Buddhaship, he never told a lie; and "it were easier for the sakwala [or system of worlds] to be blown away than for a supreme Buddha to utter an untruth."[187] His followers are not equally scrupulous. The Buddhists of Ceylon, we are told, lie without compunction, and are not ashamed to be detected in a lie.[188] And religious Mongols "do not hesitate to tell lies even when saying their prayers."[189]

[Footnote 166: Caldwell, _Tinnevelly Shanars_, p. 38. _Cf._ Kearns, _Tribes of South India_, pp. 64 (Reddies and Hindus generally), 68 (Reddies and Naickers); Burton, _Sindh_, pp. 197, 284; _Idem_, _Sind Revisited_, i. 314.]

[Footnote 167: Trevelyan, quoted by Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 401.]

[Footnote 168: Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 399 _sq._]

[Footnote 169: Percival, _Land of the Veda_, p. 288.]

[Footnote 170: Wilkins, _op. cit._ p. 407 _sq._]

[Footnote 171: _Ibid._ p. 400. Caldwell, _op. cit._ p. 40.]

[Footnote 172: Sleeman, _op. cit._ ii. 123. _Cf._ _ibid._ ii. 118, 129 _sq._; Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_, ii. 478 (Hâbûra).]

[Footnote 173: Malcolm, _Memoir of Central India_, ii. 171. _Cf._ Hislop, _op. cit._ p. 1.]

[Footnote 174: Arrian, _Historia Indica_, xii. 5.]

[Footnote 175: _Institutes of Vishnu_, viii. 36.]

[Footnote 176: _Satapatha-Brâhmana_, i. 1. 1. 4; iii. 3. 2. 2.]

[Footnote 177: _Ibid._ iii. 4. 2. 8. _Cf._ _ibid._ i. 1. 1. 5.]

[Footnote 178: _Ibid._ ii. 2. 2. 19.]

[Footnote 179: _Laws of Manu_, viii. 82.]

[Footnote 180: _Gautama_, xiii. 14 _sqq._]

[Footnote 181: _Laws of Manu_, viii. 103.]

[Footnote 182: _Laws of Manu_, viii. 104.]

[Footnote 183: Hardy, _Manual of Budhism_, p. 486.]

[Footnote 184: _Ibid._ p. 485.]

[Footnote 185: _Ibid._ p. 486.]

[Footnote 186: _Jâtaka Tales_, p. 23.]

[Footnote 187: Hardy, _op. cit._ p. 486.]

[Footnote 188: Knox, quoted by Schmidt, _Ceylon_, p. 239.]

[Footnote 189: Gilmour, _Among the Mongols_, p. 259.]

{93} According to Zoroastrianism, truthfulness is a most sacred duty. Lying is a creation of the evil spirits, and the most efficacious weapon against it is the holy religion revealed to man by Zarathustra.[190] In one of the Pahlavi texts it is said that when the Spirit of Wisdom was asked, "Through how many ways and motives and good works do people arrive most at heaven?" he answered thus: "The first good work is liberality, the second truth."[191] Contracts are inviolable, both those which are pledged with hand or pawn, and those by a mere word.[192] It is a duty to keep faith even with an unbeliever:--"Break not the contract, O Spitama, neither the one that thou hadst entered into with one of the unfaithful, nor the one that thou hadst entered into with one of the faithful who is one of thy own faith."[193] Greek historians and cuneiform inscriptions also bear witness to the great detestation in which falsehood was held by the ancient Persians. Herodotus writes:--"Their sons are carefully instructed from their fifth to their twentieth year in three things alone--to ride, to draw the bow, and to speak the truth. . . . The most disgraceful thing in the world, they think, is to tell a lie; the next worse, to owe a debt: because, among other reasons, the debtor is obliged to tell lies."[194] In the inscriptions of Darius lying is taken as representative of all evil. He is favoured by Ormuzd "because he was not a heretic, nor a liar, nor a tyrant." His great fear is lest it may be thought that any part of the record which he has set up has been falsely related; and he even abstains from narrating certain events of his reign "lest to him who may hereafter peruse the tablet, the many deeds that have been done by him may seem to be falsely recorded."[195] Professor Spiegel tries to prove that {94} falsehood, not truthfulness, was a national characteristic of the ancient Eranians, to which their noblest men offered fruitless resistance;[196] but the facts he quotes in support of his opinion refer to their dealings with foreign nations, and have consequently little bearing on the subject. The modern Persians are notorious liars, who do not even claim to be believed, and smile when detected in a lie.[197] The nomad alone is faithful to his word; the expression, "I am a nomad," means, "You may trust me."[198]

[Footnote 190: _Bundahis_, i. 24; xxviii. 14, 16. _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xix. 4, 6; xxx. 5; xxxvi. 29. Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxii. Spiegel, _Erânische Alterthumskunde_, iii. 684 _sq._ Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. 164 _sq._ Meyer, _Geschichte des Alterthums_, i. 534, 536.]

[Footnote 191: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxxvii. 2 _sqq._]

[Footnote 192: _Vendîdâd_, iv. 5 _sqq._]

[Footnote 193: _Yasts_, x. 2.]

[Footnote 194: Herodotus, i. 136, 138. _Cf._ Stobæus, _Florilegium_, 44, vol. ii. 227; Xenophon, _Cyri Institutio_, i. 6. 33.]

[Footnote 195: Rawlinson, in his translation of Herodotus, i. 262 _sq._ n. 3.]

[Footnote 196: Spiegel, _op. cit._ iii. 686.]

[Footnote 197: Polak, _Persien_, i. 10. Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iv. 192, 247. Wilson, _Persian Life and Customs_, p. 229 _sqq._]

[Footnote 198: Polak, _op. cit._ ii. 95.]

Falsehood is a prevailing vice in other Muhammedan countries also. "Constant veracity," says Mr. Lane, "is a virtue extremely rare in modern Egypt"; and a deceitful disposition in commercial transactions is one of the most notorious faults of the Egyptian.[199] Mr. Lane partly ascribes this habit to the influence of Islam, which allows, and even commands, falsehood in certain cases. The common Moslem doctrine is, that a lie is permissible when told in order to save one's own life, or to reconcile persons at variance with each other, or to please or persuade one's wife, or to obtain any advantage in a war with the enemies of the faith.[200] But in other cases lying was highly reprobated by the Prophet; and that the people have not forgotten its sinfulness appears from the phrase, "No, I beg forgiveness of God, it was so and so," which they seldom omit when retracting an unintentional mis-statement.[201] I think it is erroneous to regard the want of truthfulness among Muhammedan nations as a result of their religion. The Eastern Christians and Buddhists are no less addicted to falsehood than the Muhammedans.[202]

[Footnote 199: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, i. 382 _sq._ _Cf._ Burckhardt, _Arabic Proverbs_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 200: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, i. 383. Muir, _Life of Mahomet_, i. p. lxxiii. _sq._ n. [dagger].]

[Footnote 201: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, i. 383 _sq._]

[Footnote 202: Vámbéry, _Der Islam im neunzehnten Jahrhundert_, p. 232.]

The Homeric poems make us acquainted with gods and men who have recourse to fraud and lying whenever it suits their purpose.[203] The great Zeus makes no difficulty {95} in sending a lying dream to Agamemnon. Pallas Athene is guilty of gross deceit and treachery to Hector; she expressly recommends dissimulation, and loves Odysseus on account of his deceitful character.[204] No man deals more in feigned stories than this master of cunning, who makes a boast of his falsehood.[205] In the period which lies between the Homeric age and the Persian wars veracity made perhaps some progress among the Greeks,[206] but it never became one of their national virtues.[207] Yet in the Greek literature deceit is frequently condemned as a vice, and truthfulness praised as a virtue.[208] Achilles expresses his horror of lying.[209] "Not to tell a lie," was one of the maxims of Solon.[210] Pindar strongly censures a character like that of Odysseus,[211] and ends up his eulogy on Psaumis by the assurance that he never would contaminate his speech with a lie.[212] According to Pythagoras, men become like gods when they speak the truth.[213] According to Plato, the habit of lying makes the soul ugly[214]; "truth is the beginning of every good thing, both to gods and men."[215] Yet a distinction should be made between different kinds of untruth. Though the many are too fond of saying that at proper times and places falsehood may often be right,[216] it must be admitted that a lie is in certain cases useful and not hateful, as in dealing with enemies, or when those whom we call our friends in a fit of madness or illusion are going to do some harm.[217] Moreover, the rulers of the State are allowed to lie for the public good, just as physicians make use of medicines; and they will find a considerable dose of falsehood and deceit necessary for this purpose.[218] On the other hand, if the ruler catches anybody besides himself lying in the {96} State, lie will punish him for introducing a practice "which is equally subversive and destructive of ships or State."[219] Next to him who takes a false oath, he who tells a falsehood in the presence of his superiors--elders, parents, or rulers--is most hateful to the gods.[220]

[Footnote 203: _Cf._ Kames, _Sketches of the History of Man_, iv. 150 _sq._; Mahaffy, _Social Life in Greece_, p. 26 _sqq._]

[Footnote 204: _Odyssey_, xiii. 331 _sq._]

[Footnote 205: _Ibid._ ix. 19 _sq._]

[Footnote 206: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 413.]

[Footnote 207: _Cf._ Thucydides, iii. 83.]

[Footnote 208: See Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 403 _sqq._]

[Footnote 209: _Iliad_, ix. 312 _sq._]

[Footnote 210: Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, i. 2 (60).]

[Footnote 211: Pindar, _Nemea_, viii. 26.]

[Footnote 212: _Idem_, _Olympia_, iv. 17.]

[Footnote 213: Stobæus, _op. cit._ xi. 25, vol. i. 312.]

[Footnote 214: Plato, _Gorgias_, p. 524 _sq._]

[Footnote 215: _Idem_, _Leges_, v. 730.]

[Footnote 216: _Ibid._ xi. 916.]

[Footnote 217: Plato, _Respublica_, ii. 382.]

[Footnote 218: _Ibid._ iii. 389; v. 459.]

[Footnote 219: Plato, _Respublica_, iii. 389.]

[Footnote 220: _Idem_, _Leges_, xi. 917. _Idem_, _Respublica_, iii. 389.]

Not without reason did the Romans of the republican age contrast their own _fides_ with the mendacity of the Greeks and the perfidy of the Ph[oe]nicians. "The goddess of faith (of human and social faith)," says Gibbon, "was worshipped, not only in her temples, but in the lives of the Romans; and if that nation was deficient in the more amiable qualities of benevolence and generosity, they astonished the Greeks by their sincere and simple performance of the most burdensome engagements."[221] Their annals are adorned with signal examples of uprightness, which, though to a great extent fictitious, yet bear testimony to the estimation in which that quality was held.[222] The Greeks had no Regulus who "chose to deliver himself up to a cruel death rather than to falsify his word to the enemy."[223] The basest forms of falsehood were severely punished by law. According to the Twelve Tables, any one who had slandered or libelled another by imputing to him a wrongful or immoral act, was to be scourged to death,[224] and capital punishment was also inflicted on false witnesses[225] and corrupt judges.[226] However, already before the end of the Republic dishonesty, perjuries, and forgeries became common in Rome.[227]

[Footnote 221: Gibbon, _History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, v. 311.]

[Footnote 222: _Cf._ Inge, _Society in Rome under the Cæsars_, p. 33 _sq._]

[Footnote 223: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 13.]

[Footnote 224: _Lex Duodecim Tabularum_, viii. 1.]

[Footnote 225: _Ibid._ viii. 23. Aulus Gellius, _Noctes Atticæ_, xx. i. 53.]

[Footnote 226: _Lex Duodecim Tabularum_, ix. 3. Aulus Gellius, _op. cit._ xx. i. 7.]

[Footnote 227: Inge, _op. cit._ p. 35.]

The ancient Scandinavians considered it disgraceful for a man to tell a lie, to break a promise, or to commit a treacherous act.[228] To kill or rob openly was a pardonable offence, if an offence at all; but he who did it secretly was a _nithinger_, a "hateful man," unless indeed he afterwards {97} openly declared his deed.[229] In the Irish Senchus Mór it is said that not only false witness, but lying in general, deprives the guilty person of "half his honour-price up to the third time";[230] and, according to the commentary to the Book of Aicill, the double of his own full honour-price is due from each person who commits the crime of secret murder.[231]

[Footnote 228: Maurer, _Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes_, ii. 154, 183 _sq._ Rosenberg, _Nordboernes Aandsliv_, i. 487.]

[Footnote 229: Wilda, _Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 569. Nordström, _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_, ii. 320 _sqq._ Keyser, _Efterladte Skrifter_, ii. pt. i. 361. Rosenberg, _Nordboernes Aandsliv_, i. 487. von Amira, 'Recht,' in Paul's _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_, ii. pt. ii. 173.]

[Footnote 230: _Ancient Laws of Ireland_, i. 57.]

[Footnote 231: _Ibid._ iii. 99.]

In the Old Testament there are recorded, from the patriarchal age, some cases of lying, which, far from being condemned, in no way prevented the liar being a special object of divine favour. It must be admitted, however, that undue importance has been attached to some of these acts of falsehood,[232] which were committed among foreigners with a view to escaping an impending danger.[233] For instance, when Isaac, dwelling in Gerar, said of his wife that she was his sister, for fear lest the men of the place should kill him,[234] he did a thing which few conscientious men under similar circumstances would hesitate to do. As for Jacob's long course of double-dealing with his father-in-law, who was equally greedy and unscrupulous, it should be remembered that they were natives of different lands.[235] Again, when Jacob, at the instigation of his mother, grossly deceived his own blind father, the intriguers, as has been pointed out,[236] manifestly felt that the blessing extorted from Isaac ought to descend upon Jacob rather than upon Esau, and inasmuch as the word of the father was held to carry with it divine validity and potency, the securing of it by fair means or foul was deemed an urgent necessity. It is obvious that the ancient Hebrews did not condemn deceit as wrong in the abstract, and that they were very unscrupulous in the use of means. Whenever {98} David was threatened by any danger, he immediately employed a falsehood which served his turn; though not incapable of generosity, he deceived enemies and friends indifferently, and there is probably no record of treachery and lying consistently pursued which surpasses in baseness his affair with his faithful servant Uriah the Hittite.[237] It is true that his conduct towards Uriah was condemned; "the thing that David had done displeased the Lord."[238] But it is significant that Yahveh himself occasionally had recourse to deceit for the purpose of carrying out his plans. In order to ruin Ahab he commissioned a lying spirit to deceive his prophets;[239] and once he threatened to use deception as a means of taking revenge upon idolaters.[240] But to bear false witness against a neighbour was strictly prohibited;[241] the false witness should suffer the punishment which he was minded to bring upon the person whom he calumniated.[242] In Ecclesiasticus lying is severely censured:--"A lie is a foul blot in a man, yet it is continually in the mouth of the untaught. A thief is better than a man that is accustomed to lie: but they both shall have destruction to heritage. The disposition of a liar is dishonourable, and his shame is ever with him."[243] "Lying lips are abomination to the Lord: but they that deal truly are his delight."[244] According to the Talmud, "four shall not enter Paradise: the scoffer, the liar, the hypocrite, and the slanderer."[245] Only for the sake of peace, and especially domestic peace, may a man tell a lie without sinning;[246] but he who changes his word commits as heavy a sin as he who worships idols.[247] The duty of truthfulness was particularly emphasised by the Essenes.[248] He who entered their sect had to pledge himself always to love {99} truth and strive to reclaim all liars.[249] "They are eminent for fidelity," says Josephus. "Whatsoever they say also is firmer than an oath; but swearing is avoided by them, and they esteem it worse than perjury; for they say that he who cannot be believed without [swearing by] God is already condemned."[250]

[Footnote 232: _E.g._, by McCurdy, 'Moral Evolution of the Old Testament,' in _American Journal of Theology_, i. 665 _sq._; von Jhering, _Zweck im Recht_, ii. 606 _sq._; Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 402.]

[Footnote 233: _Genesis_, xii. 12 _sq._; xx. 2.]

[Footnote 234: _Ibid._ xxvi. 7.]

[Footnote 235: _Ibid._ ch. xxix. _sqq._]

[Footnote 236: McCurdy, _loc. cit._ p. 666.]

[Footnote 237: _Cf._ Kuenen, _Religion of Israel_, i. 327; McCurdy, _loc. cit._ p. 681.]

[Footnote 238: _2 Samuel_, xi. 27; xii. 1 _sqq._]

[Footnote 239: _1 Kings_, xxii. 20 _sqq._]

[Footnote 240: _Ezekiel_, xiv. 7 _sqq._ _Cf._ Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 402.]

[Footnote 241: _Deuteronomy_, v. 20.]

[Footnote 242: _Ibid._ xix. 1 6 _sqq._]

[Footnote 243: _Ecclesiasticus_, xx. 24 _sqq._]

[Footnote 244: _Proverbs_, xii. 22.]

[Footnote 245: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 57.]

[Footnote 246: Hershon, _Treasures of the Talmud_, p. 69 _sq._]

[Footnote 247: _Sanhedrin_, fol. 92 A, quoted by Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 558.]

[Footnote 248: Philo Judæus, _Quod liber sit quisque virtuti studet_, p. 877 (_Opera_, ii. 458).]

[Footnote 249: Josephus, _De bello Judaico_, ii. 8. 7.]

[Footnote 250: _Ibid._ ii. 8. 6.]\

"Speak every man truth with his neighbour,"[251] was from early times regarded as one of the most imperative of Christian maxims.[252] According to St. Augustine, a lie is not permissible even when told with a view to saving the life of a neighbour; "since by lying eternal life is lost, never for any man's temporal life must a lie be told."[253] Yet all lies are not equally sinful; the degree of sinfulness depends on the mind of the liar and on the nature of the subject on which the lie is told.[254] This became the authorised doctrine of the Church.[255] Thomas Aquinas says that, although lying is always sinful, it is not a mortal sin if the end intended be not contrary to charity, "as appears in a jocose lie, that is intended to create some slight amusement, and in an officious lie, in which is intended even the advantage of our neighbour."[256] Yet from early times we meet within the Christian Church a much less rigorous doctrine, which soon came to exercise a more powerful influence on the practice and feelings of men than did St. Augustine's uncompromising love of truth. The Greek Fathers maintained that an untruth is not a lie when there is a "just cause" {100} for it; and as a just cause they regarded not only self-defence, but also zeal for God's honour.[257] This zeal, together with an indiscriminate devotion to the Church, led to those "pious frauds," those innumerable falsifications of documents, inventions of legends, and forgeries of every description, which made the Catholic Church a veritable seat of lying, and most seriously impaired the sense of truth in the minds of Christians.[258] By a fiction, Papacy, as a divine institution, was traced back to the age of the Apostles, and in virtue of another fiction Constantine was alleged to have abdicated his imperial authority in Italy in favour of the successor of St. Peter.[259] The Bishop of Rome assumed the privilege of disengaging men from their oaths and promises. An oath which was contrary to the good of the Church was declared not to be binding.[260] The theory was laid down that, as faith was not to be kept with a tyrant, pirate, or robber, who kills the body, it was still less to be kept with an heretic, who kills the soul.[261] Private protestations were thought sufficient to relieve men in conscience from being bound by a solemn treaty or from the duty of speaking the truth; and an equivocation, or play upon words in which one sense is taken by the speaker and another sense intended by him for the hearer, was in some cases held permissible.[262] According to Alfonso de' Liguori--who lived in the eighteenth century and was beatified in the nineteenth, and whose writings were declared by high authority not to contain a word that could be justly found fault with,[263]--{101} there are three sorts of equivocation which may be employed for a good reason, even with the addition of a solemn oath. We are allowed to use ambiguously words having two senses, as the word _volo_, which means both to "wish" and to "fly"; sentences bearing two main meanings, as "This book is Peter's," which may mean either that the book belongs to Peter or that Peter is the author of it; words having two senses, one more common than the other or one literal and the other metaphorical--for instance, if a man is asked about something which it is in his interest to conceal, he may answer, "No, I say," that is "I say the word 'no'"[264] As for mental restrictions, again, such as are "purely mental," and on that account cannot in any manner be discovered by other persons, are not permissible; but we may, for a good reason, make use of a "non-pure mental restriction," which, in the nature of things, is discoverable, although it is not discovered by the person with whom we are dealing.[265] Thus it would be wrong secretly to insert the word "no" in an affirmative oath without any external sign; but it would not be wrong to insert it in a whispering voice or under the cover of a cough. The "good reason" for which equivocations and non-pure mental restrictions may be employed is defined as "any honest object, such as keeping our goods spiritual or temporal."[266] In support of this casuistry it is uniformly said by Catholic apologists that each man has a right to act upon the defensive, that he has a right to keep guard over the knowledge which he possesses in the same way as he may defend his goods; and as for there being any deceit in the matter--why, soldiers use stratagems in war, and opponents use feints in fencing.[267]

[Footnote 251: _Ephesians_, iv. 25.]

[Footnote 252: Gass, _Geschichte der christlichen Ethik_, i. 90.]

[Footnote 253: St. Augustine, _De mendacio_, 6 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, xl. 494 _sq._).]

[Footnote 254: _Idem_, _Enchiridion_, 18 (Migne, _op. cit._ xl. 240); _Idem_, _De mendacio_, 21 (Migne, xl. 516). For St. Augustine's views on lying see also his treatise _Contra mendacium_, addressed to Consentius (Migne, xl. 517 _sqq._), and Bindemann, _Der heilige Augustinus_, ii. 465 _sqq._]

[Footnote 255: Gratian, _Decretum_, ii. 22. 2. 12, 17. _Catechism of the Council of Trent_, iii. 9. 23.]

[Footnote 256: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 110. 3 _sq._ St. Augustine says (_De mendacio_, 2 [Migne, _op. cit._ xl. 487 _sq._]; _Quæstiones in Genesim_, 145, _ad Gen._ xliv. 15 [Migne, xxxiv. 587]) that jokes which "bear with them in the tone of voice, and in the very mood of the joker a most evident indication that he means no deceit," are not accounted lies, though the thing he utters be not true. This statement is also incorporated in Gratian's _Decretum_ (ii. 22. 2. 18).]

[Footnote 257: Gass, _op. cit._ i. 91, 92, 236 _sqq._ Newman, _Apologia pro vita sua_, p. 349 _sq._]

[Footnote 258: von Mosheim, _Institutes of Ecclesiastical History_, i. 275. Middleton, _Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers, which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church_, _passim_. Lecky, _Rise, and Influence of Rationalism in Europe_, i. 396 _sqq._ Gass, _op. cit._ i. 91, 235. von Eicken, _System der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, pp. 654-656, 663.]

[Footnote 259: von Eicken, _op. cit._ p. 656. Poole, _Illustrations of the History of Medieval Thought_, p. 249.]

[Footnote 260: Gregory IX. _Decretales_, ii. 24. 27.]

[Footnote 261: Simancas, _De catholicis institutionibus_, xlvi. 52 _sq._ p. 365 _sq._]

[Footnote 262: Alagona, _Compendium manualis D. Navarri_, xii. 88, p. 94 _sq._:--"Fur, qui est furatus aliquid, si interrogetur a judice non competenti, vel non juridice, an sit furatus tale quid, potest secura conscientia respondere simpliciter, non sum furatus, intelligendo intra se in tali die, vel anno." See also Kames, _op. cit._ iv. 158 _sq._]

[Footnote 263: Meyrick, _Moral and Devotional Theology of the Church of Rome_, i. 3.]

[Footnote 264: Alfonso de' Liguori, _Theologia moralis_, iii. 151, vol. i. 249.]

[Footnote 265: _Ibid._ iii. 152, vol. i. 249.]

[Footnote 266: _Ibid._ iii. 151, vol. i. 249.]

[Footnote 267: Meyrick, _op. cit._ i. 25]

Adherence to truth and especially perfect fidelity to a promise were strongly insisted upon by the code of Chivalry.[268] However exacting or absurd the vow might {102} be, a knight was compelled to perform it in all the strictness of the letter. A man frequently promised to grant whatever another should ask, and he would have lost the honour of his knighthood if he had declined from his word.[269] We are told by Lancelot du Lac that when King Artus had given his word to a knight to make him a present of his wife, he would neither listen to the lamentations of the unfortunate woman, nor to any representations which could be made him; he replied that a king must not go from his word, and the queen was accordingly delivered to the knight.[270] The knights taken in war were readily allowed liberty for the time they asked, on their word of honour that they would return of their own accord, whenever it should be required.[271] So great, it is said, was the knight's respect for an oath, a promise, or a vow, that when they lay under any of these restrictions, they appeared everywhere with little chains attached to their arms or habits to show all the world that they were slaves to their word; nor were these chains taken off till their promise had been performed, which sometimes extended to a term of four or five years.[272] It cannot be expected, of course, that reality should have always come up to the ideal. In the thirteenth century the Count of Champagne declared that he confided more in the lowest of his subjects than in his knights.[273] Moreover, the knightly duty of sincerity seems to have gone little beyond the formal fulfilment of an engagement. "The age of Chivalry was an age of chicane, and fraud, and trickery, which were not least conspicuous among the knightly classes."[274] It is significant that the English law of the thirteenth century, though quite willing to admit in vague phrase that no one should be suffered to gain anything by fraud, was inclined to hold that a man has himself to thank if he is misled by deceit, the king's court generally providing no remedy for him who to {103} his disadvantage had trusted the word of a liar.[275] Towards the end of the Middle Ages and later, crimes against the Mint and the offence of counterfeiting seals, usually accompanied by that of forging letters or official documents, were extremely common in England;[276] and false weights, false measures, and false pretences of all kinds were ordinary instruments of commerce.[277]

[Footnote 268: _Book of the Ordre of Chyualry_, foll. 18 b, 31 b, 34 b. Robertson, _History of the Reign of Charles V._ i. 84. Sainte-Palaye, _Mémoires sur l'ancienne chevalerie_, i. 76 _sq._]

[Footnote 269: Mills, _History of Chivalry_, p. 152.]

[Footnote 270: Lancelot du Lac, vol. ii. fol. 2 a.]

[Footnote 271: Sainte-Palaye, _op. cit._ i. 135.]

[Footnote 272: _Ibid._ i. 236 _sq._]

[Footnote 273: _Ibid._ ii. 47. _Cf._ Kames, _op. cit._ iv. 157.]

[Footnote 274: Pike, _History of Crime in England_, i. 283.]

[Footnote 275: Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 535 _sq._]

[Footnote 276: Pike, _op. cit._ i. 265, 269; ii. 392.]

[Footnote 277: _Ibid._ i. 142; ii. 238.]

In modern times, according to Mr. Pike, the Public Records testify a decrease of deception in England.[278] Commercial honesty has improved, and those mean arts to which, during the reigns of the Tudors, even men in the highest positions frequently had recourse, have now, at any rate, descended to a lower grade of society.[279] At present, in the civilised countries of the West, opinion as to what the duty of sincerity implies varies not only in different individuals, but among different classes or groups of people, as also among different nations. Duplicity is held more reprehensible in a gentleman than in a shopkeeper or a peasant. The notion which seems to be common in England, that an advocate is over-scrupulous who refuses to say what he knows to be false if he is instructed to say it,[280] appears strange at least to some foreigners;[281] and in certain countries it is commonly regarded as blamable if a person ostensibly professes a religion in which he does not believe, say, by going to church. The Quakers deem all complimentary modes of speech, for instance in addressing people, to be objectionable as being inconsistent with truth.[282] Certain philosophers have expressed the opinion that veracity is an unconditional duty, which is not to be limited by any expediency, but must be respected in all circumstances. According to Kant, it would be a crime to tell a falsehood to a murderer who asked us whether {104} our friend, of whom he was in pursuit, had taken refuge in our house.[283] Fichte maintains that the defence of so-called necessary lies is "the most wicked argument possible amongst men."[284] Dymond says, "If I may tell a falsehood to a robber in order to save my property, I may commit parricide for the same purpose."[285] But this rigorous view is not shared by common sense, nor by orthodox Protestant theology.[286] Jeremy Taylor asks, "Who will not tell a harmless lie to save the life of his friend, of his child, of himself, of a good and brave man?"[287] Where deception is designed to benefit the person deceived, says Professor Sidgwick, "common sense seems to concede that it may sometimes be right: for example, most persons would not hesitate to speak falsely to an invalid, if this seemed the only way of concealing facts that might produce a dangerous shock: nor do I perceive that any one shrinks from telling fictions to children, on matters upon which it is thought well that they should not know the truth."[288] In the case of grown-up people, however, this principle seems to require the modification made by Hutcheson, that there is no wrong in false speech when the party deceived himself does not consider it an injury to be deceived.[289] Otherwise it might easily be supposed to give support to "pious fraud," which in its crudest form is nowadays generally disapproved of, but which in subtle disguise still has many advocates among religious partisans. It is argued that the most important truths of religion cannot be conveyed into the minds of ordinary men, except by being enclosed, as it were, in a shell of fiction, and that by relating such fictions as if they were facts we are really performing an act of substantial veracity.[290] But this argument seems chiefly to have been invented for the {105} purpose of supporting a dilapidated structure of theological teaching, and can hardly be accepted by any person unprejudiced by religious bias. As a means of self-defence deviation from truth has been justified not only in the case of grosser injuries, but in the case of illegitimate curiosity, as it seems unreasonable that a person should be obliged to supply another with information which he has no right to exact.[291] The obligation of keeping a promise, again, is qualified in various ways. Thoughtful persons would commonly admit that such an obligation is relative to the promisee, and may be annulled by him.[292] A promise to do an immoral act is held not to be binding, because the prior obligation not to do the act is paramount.[293] If, before the time comes to fulfil a promise, circumstances have altered so much that the effects of keeping it are quite different from those which were foreseen when it was made, all would agree that the promisee ought to release the promiser; but if he declines to do so, some would say that the latter is in every case bound by his promise, whilst others would maintain that a considerable alteration of circumstances has removed the obligation.[294] How far promises obtained by force or fraud are binding is a much disputed question.[295] According to Hutcheson, for instance, no regard is due to a promise which has been extorted by unjust violence.[296] Adam Smith, on the other hand, considers that whenever such a promise is violated, though for the most necessary reason, it is always with some degree of dishonour to the person who made it, and that "a brave man ought to die rather than make a promise {106} which he can neither keep without folly nor violate without ignominy."[297]

[Footnote 278: _Ibid._ i. 264. _Cf._ _ibid._ ii. 474.]

[Footnote 279: _Ibid._ ii. 14 _sq._]

[Footnote 280: Sidgwick, _Methods of Ethics_, p. 316. Paley, _Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy_, iii. 15 (_Complete Works_, ii. 117). The same view was expressed by Cicero (_De officiis_, ii. 14).]

[Footnote 281: See also Dymond, _Essays on the Principles of Morals_, ii. 5, p. 50 _sqq._]

[Footnote 282: Gurney, _Views and Practices of the Society of Friends_, p. 401.]

[Footnote 283: Kant, 'Ueber ein vermeintes Recht, aus Menschenliebe zu Lügen,' in _Sämmtliche Werke_, vii. 309.]

[Footnote 284: Fichte, _Das System der Sittenlehre_, p. 371; English translation, p. 303 _sq._]

[Footnote 285: Dymond, _op. cit._ ii. 6, p. 57.]

[Footnote 286: Reinhard, _System der Christlichen Moral_, iii. 193 _sqq._ Martensen, _Christian Ethics_, 'Individual Ethics,' p. 216 _sqq._ Newman, _Apologia pro vita sua_, p. 274.]

[Footnote 287: Taylor, _Whole Works_, xii. 162.]

[Footnote 288: Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 316.]

[Footnote 289: Hutcheson, _System of Moral Philosophy_, ii. 32.]

[Footnote 290: Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 316.]

[Footnote 291: Schopenhauer, _Die Grundlage der Moral_, § 17 (_Sämmtliche Werke_, vi. 247 _sqq._).]

[Footnote 292: Whewell, _Elements of Morality_, p. 156. Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 305.]

[Footnote 293: Dymond, _op. cit._ ii. 6, p. 55. Whewell, _op. cit._ p. 156 _sq._ Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 305. This is also the opinion of Thomas Aquinas (_op. cit._ ii.-ii. 110. 3. 5).]

[Footnote 294: Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 306 _sq._ Thomas Aquinas says (_op. cit._ ii.-ii. 110. 3. 5) that a person who does not do what he has promised is excused "if the conditions of persons and things are changed."]

[Footnote 295: Dymond, _op. cit._ ii. 6, p. 55 _sq._ Whewell, _op. cit._ pp. 155, 159 _sqq._ Sidgwick, _op. cit._ p. 305 _sq._ Adam Smith, _Theory of Moral Sentiments_, p. 486 _sqq._]

[Footnote 296: Hutcheson, _System of Moral Philosophy_, ii. 34.]

[Footnote 297: Adam Smith, _op. cit._ p. 489.]

In point of veracity and good faith the old distinction between duties which we owe to our fellow-countrymen and such as we owe to foreigners is still preserved in various cases. It is particularly conspicuous in the relations between different states, in peace or war. Stratagems and the employment of deceptive means necessary to procure intelligence respecting the enemy or the country are held allowable in warfare, independently of the question whether the war is defensive or aggressive.[298] Deceit has, in fact, often constituted a great share of the glory of the most celebrated commanders; and particularly in the eighteenth century it was a common opinion that successes gained through a spy are more creditable to the skill of a general than successes in regular battles.[299] Lord Wolseley writes:--"As a nation we are bred up to feel it a disgrace even to succeed by falsehood; the word spy conveys something as repulsive as slave; we will keep hammering along with the conviction that honesty is the best policy, and that truth always wins in the long run. These pretty little sentences do well for a child's copy-book, but the man who acts upon them in war had better sheathe his sword for ever."[300] At the same time, there are some exceptions to the general rule that deceit is permitted against an enemy. Under the customs of war it has been agreed that particular acts and signs shall have a specific meaning in order that belligerents {107} may carry on certain necessary intercourse, and it is forbidden to employ such acts or signs in deceiving an enemy. Thus information must not be surreptitiously obtained under the shelter of a flag of truce; buildings not used as hospitals must not be marked with an hospital flag; and persons not covered by the provisions of the Geneva Convention must not be protected by its cross.[301] A curious arbitrary rule affects one class of stratagems by forbidding certain permitted means of deception from the moment at which they cease to deceive. It is perfectly legitimate to use the distinctive emblems of an enemy in order to escape from him or to draw his forces into action; but it is held that soldiers clothed in the uniforms of their enemy must put on a conspicuous mark by which they can be recognised before attacking, and that a vessel using the enemy's flag must hoist its own flag before firing with shot or shell.[302] Disobedience to this rule is considered to entail grave dishonour; for "in actual battle enemies are bound to combat loyally, and are not free to ensure victory by putting on a mask of friendship."[303] But, as Mr. Hall observes, it is not easy to see why it is more disloyal to wear a disguise when it is obviously useless, than when it serves its purpose.[304] Finally, it is universally agreed that promises given to the enemy ought to be kept;[305] this was admitted even by Machiavelli[306] and Bynkershoek,[307] who did not in general burden belligerents with particularly heavy duties. But the restrictions which "international law" {108} lays on deceit against enemies do not seem to be taken very seriously. Treaties between nations and promises given by one state to another, either in war or peace, are hardly meant to be kept longer than it is convenient to keep them. And when an excuse for the breach of faith is felt necessary, that excuse itself is generally a lie.

[Footnote 298: _Conférence de Bruxelles_, art. 14. _Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field_, art. 16, 101. _Conférence internationale de la paix, La Haye_, 1899, 'Règlement concernant les lois de la guerre sur terre,' art. 24, pt. i. p. 245. Roman Catholicism admits the employment of stratagems in wars which are just (Gratian, _op. cit._ ii. 23. 2. 2; Ayala, _De jure et officiis bellicis et disciplina militari_, i. 8. 1 _sq._; Ferraris, quoted by Adds, _Catholic Dictionary_, p. 945; Nys, _Le droit de la guerre et les précurseurs de Grotius_, p. 128 _sq._), on the authority of St. Augustine, the great advocate of general truthfulness (_Quæstiones in Jesum Nave_, 10, _ad Jos._ viii. 2 [Migne, _op. cit._ xxxiv. 781]:--"Cum autem justum bellum susceperit, utrum aperta pugna utrum insidiis vincat, nihil ad justitiam interest").]

[Footnote 299: Halleck, _International Law_, i. 567. Maine, _International Law_, p. 149 _sqq._]

[Footnote 300: Wolseley, _Soldier's Pocket-Book for Field Service_, p. 169.]

[Footnote 301: _Conférence de Bruxelles_, art. 13 _sq._ _Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field_, art. 101, 114, 117. _Manual of the Laws of War on Land, prepared by the Institute of International Law_, (art. 8

(_d_). Hall, _Treatise on International Law_, p. 537 _sq._]

[Footnote 302: Hall, _op. cit._ p. 538 _sq._ Bluntschli, _Droit international_, § 565, p. 328 _sq._]

[Footnote 303: Bluntschli, _op. cit._ § 565, p. 329.]

[Footnote 304: Hall, _op. cit._ p. 539.]

[Footnote 305: Heffter, _Das Europäische Völkerrecht der Gegenwart_, § 125, p. 262.]

[Footnote 306: Machiavelli, _Discorsi_, iii. 40 (_Opere_, iii. 164).]

[Footnote 307: Bynkershoek, _Quæstiones juris publici_, i. 1, p. 4. The maxim of Canon Law, "Fides servanda hosti" (Gratian, _Decretum_, ii. 23. i. 3), however, was greatly impaired by the principle, "Juramentum contra utilitatem ecclesiasticam praestitum non tenet" (Gregory IX. _Decretales_, ii. 24, 27. See Nys, _Le droit de la guerre et les précurseurs de Grotius_, p. 126 _sq._).]

CHAPTER XXXI

THE REGARD FOR TRUTH AND GOOD FAITH (_concluded_)

THE condemnation of untruthfulness and bad faith springs from a variety of sources. In the first place, he who tells a lie, or who breaks a promise, generally commits an injury against another person. His act consequently calls forth sympathetic resentment, and becomes an object of moral censure.

Men have a natural disposition to believe what they are told. This disposition is particularly obvious in young children; it is acquired wisdom and experience only that teach incredulity, and, as Adam Smith observes, they very seldom teach it enough.[1] Even people who are themselves pre-eminent liars are often deceived by the falsehoods of others.[2] When detected a deception always implies a conflict between two irreconcilable ideas; and such a conflict gives rise to a feeling of pain,[3] which may call forth resentment against its volitional cause, the deceiver.

[Footnote 1: Reid, _Inquiry into the Human Mind_, vi. 24, p. 430 _sqq._ Adam Smith, _Theory of Moral Sentiments_, p. 494 _sq._ Dugald Stewart, _Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers of Man_, ii. 340 _sq._]

[Footnote 2: Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 106 (Mpongwe).]

[Footnote 3: Lehmann, _Hovedlovene for det menneskelige Følelseliv_, p. 181. _Cf._ Bain, _Emotions and the Will_, p. 218.]

But men are not only ready to believe what they are told, they also like to know the truth. Curiosity, or the love of truth, is coeval with the first operations of the intellect; it seems to be an ultimate fact in the human {110} frame.[4] In our endeavour to learn the truth we are frustrated by him who deceives us, and he becomes an object of our resentment.

[Footnote 4: Dugald Stewart, _op. cit._ ii. 334, 340.]

Nor are we injured by a deception merely because we like to know the truth, but, chiefly, because it is of much importance for us that we should know it. Our conduct is based upon our ideas; hence the erroneous notion as regards some fact in the past, present, or future, which is produced by a lie or false promise, may lead to unforeseen events detrimental to our interests. Moreover, on discovering that we have been deceived, we have the humiliating feeling that another person has impertinently made our conduct subject to his will. This is a wound on our pride, a blot on our honour. Francis I. of France laid down as a principle, "that the lie was never to be put up with without satisfaction, but by a base-born fellow."[5] "The lie," says Sainte-Palaye, "has always been considered the most fatal and irreparable affront that a man of honour could receive."[6]

[Footnote 5: Millingen, _History of Duelling_, i. 71.]

[Footnote 6: Sainte-Palaye, _Mémoires sur l'ancienne chevalerie_, i. 78.]

How largely the condemnation of falsehood and bad faith is due to the harm suffered by the victim appears from the fact that a lie or breach of faith is held more condemnable in proportion to the magnitude of the harm caused by it. But even in apparently trifling cases the reflective mind strongly insists upon the necessity of truthfulness and fidelity to a given word. Every lie and every unfulfilled promise has a tendency to lessen mutual confidence, to predispose the perpetrator to commit a similar offence in the future, and to serve as a bad example for others. "The importance of truth," says Bentham, "is so great, that the least violation of its laws, even in frivolous matters, is always attended with a certain degree of danger. The slightest deviation from it is an attack upon the respect we owe to it. It is a first transgression which facilitates a second, and familiarises the odious ideal {111} of falsehood."[7] Contrariwise, as Aristotle observes, he who is truthful in unimportant matters will be all the more so in important ones.[8] Similar considerations, however, require a certain amount of reflection and farsightedness; hence intellectual development tends to increase the emphasis laid on the duties of sincerity and good faith. At the earlier stages of civilisation it is frequently considered good form to tell an untruth to a person in order to please him, and ill-mannered to contradict him, however much he be mistaken,[9] for the reason that farther consequences are left out of account. The utilitarian basis of the duty of truthfulness also accounts for those extreme cases in which a deception is held permissible or even a duty, when promoting the true interests of the person subject to it.

[Footnote 7: Bentham, _Theory of Legislation_, p. 260.]

[Footnote 8: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, iv. 7. 8.]

[Footnote 9: Besides statements referred to above, see Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 137; Hennepin, _New Discovery of a Vast Country in America between New France and New Mexico_, ii. 70; Dall, _Alaska_, p. 398 (Aleuts); Oldfield, in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. iii. 255 (West Australian natives). "The natives of Africa," says Livingstone (_Expedition to the Zambesi_, p. 309), "have an amiable of desire to please, and often tell what they imagine will be gratifying, rather than the uninteresting naked truth." An English sportsman, after firing at an antelope, inquired of his dark attendant, "Is it wounded?" The answer was, "Yes! the ball went right into his heart." These mortal wounds never proving fatal, he asked a friend, who understood the language, to explain to the man that he preferred the truth in every case. "He is my father," replied the native, "and I thought he would be displeased if I told him that he never hits at all." The wish to please is likewise a fertile source of untruth in children, especially girls (Sully, _Studies of Childhood_, p. 256).]

The detestation of falsehood is in a very large measure due to the motive which commonly is at the bottom of a lie. It is doubtful whether a lie ever is told simply from love of falsehood.[10] The intention to produce a wrong belief has a deeper motive than the mere desire to produce such a belief; and in most cases this motive is the deceiver's hope of benefiting himself at the expense of the person deceived. A better motive makes the act less detestable, or may even serve as a justification. But the broad doctrine that the end sanctifies the means is generally rejected; and the principle which sometimes allows {112} deceit from a benevolent motive has been restricted within very narrow limits by a higher conception of individual freedom and individual rights. Thus the emancipation of morality from theology has brought discredit on the old theory that religious deception is permissible when it serves the object of saving human souls from eternal perdition. The opinion that no motive whatsoever can justify an act of falsehood has been advocated not only by intuitional moralists, but on utilitarian grounds.[11] But it certainly seems absurd to the common sense of mankind that we should be allowed to save our own life or the life of a fellow-man by killing the person who wants to take it, but not by deceiving him.

[Footnote 10: Dugald Stewart, _op. cit._ ii. 342.]

[Footnote 11: Macmillan, _Promotion of General Happiness_, p. 166 _sq._]

It is easy to see why falsehood is so frequently held permissible, praiseworthy, or even obligatory, when directed against a stranger. In early society an injury inflicted on a stranger calls forth no sympathetic resentment. On the contrary, being looked upon with suspicion or hated as an enemy, he is considered a proper object of deception. Among the Bushmans "no one dare give any information in the absence of the chief or father of the clan."[12] "A Bedouin," says Burckhardt, "who does not know the person interrogating him, will seldom answer with truth to questions concerning his family or tribe. The children are taught never to answer similar questions, lest the interrogator may be a secret enemy and come for purposes of revenge."[13] Among the Beni Amer a stranger can never trust a man's word on account of "their contempt for everything foreign."[14] That even civilised nations allow stratagem in warfare is the natural consequence of war itself being allowed; and if good faith is to be preserved between enemies, that is because only thereby useless cruelty can be avoided and an end be put to hostilities.

[Footnote 12: Chapman, _Travels in the Interior of South Africa_, i. 76.]

[Footnote 13: Burckhardt, _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 210.]

[Footnote 14: Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 337.]

However, deceit is not condemned merely because it is {113} an injury to the party deceived and as such apt to arouse sympathetic resentment, but it is an object of disinterested, moral resentment also because it is intrinsically antipathetic. Lying is a cheap and cowardly method of gaining an undue advantage, and is consequently despised where courage is respected.[15] It is the weapon of the weak, the woman,[16] and the slave.[17] Fraud, says Cicero, is the property of a fox, force that of a lion; "both are utterly repugnant to society, but fraud is the more detestable."[18] "To lie is servile," says Plutarch, "and most hateful in all men, hardly to be pardoned even in poor slaves."[19] On account of its cowardliness, lying was incompatible with Teutonic and knightly notions of manly honour; and among ourselves the epithets "liar" and "coward" are equally disgraceful to a man. "All . . . in the rank and station of gentlemen," Sir Walter Scott observes, "are forcibly called upon to remember that they must resent the imputation of a voluntary falsehood as the most gross injury."[20] Fichte asks, "Whence comes that internal shame for one's self which manifests itself even stronger in the case of a lie than in the case of any other violation of conscience?" And his answer is, that the lie is accompanied by cowardice, and that nothing so much dishonours us in our own eyes as want of courage.[21] According to Kant, "a lie is the abandonment, and, as it were, the annihilation, of the dignity of a man."[22]

[Footnote 15: _Cf._ Schopenhauer, _Die Grundlage der Moral_, § 17 (_Sämmtliche Werke_, vi. 250); Grote, _Treatise on the Moral Ideals_, p. 254.]

[Footnote 16: Women are commonly said to be particularly addicted to falsehood (Schopenhauer, _Parerga und Paralipomena_, ii. 497 _sq._ Galton, _Inquiries into Human Faculty_, p. 56 _sq._ Krauss, _Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven_, pp. 508, 514. Maurer, _Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammmes_, ii. 159 [ancient Scandinavians]. Döllinger, _The Gentile and the Jew_, ii. 234 [ancient Greeks]. Lane, _Arabian Society in the Middle Ages_, p. 219. Le Bon, _La civilisation des Arabes_, p. 433. Loskiel, _History of the Mission of the United Brethren_, i. 16 [Iroquois]. Hearne, _Journey to the Northern Ocean_, p. 307 _sq._ [Northern Indians]. Lyon, _Private Journal_, p. 349 [Eskimo of Igloolik]. Dalager, _Grønlandske Relationer_, p. 69; Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 175).]

[Footnote 17: See _infra_, p. 129 _sq._]

[Footnote 18: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 13.]

[Footnote 19: Plutarch, _De educatione puerorum_, 14.]

[Footnote 20: Scott, 'Essay on Chivalry,' in _Miscellaneous Prose Works_, vi. 58.]

[Footnote 21: Fichte, _Das System der Sittenlehre_, p. 370; English translation, p. 302 _sq._]

[Footnote 22: Kant, _Metaphysische Anfangungsgründe der Tugendlehre_, p. 84.]

{114} But a lie may also be judged of from a very different point of view. It may be not only a sign of cowardice, but a sign of cleverness. Hence a successful lie may excite admiration, a disinterested kindly feeling towards the liar, genuine moral approval; whereas to be detected in a lie is considered shameful. And not only is the clever liar an object of admiration, but the person whom he deceives is an object of ridicule. To the mind of a West African native, Miss Kingsley observes, there is no intrinsic harm in lying, "because a man is a fool who believes another man on an important matter unless he puts on the oath."[23] A Syrian proverb says, "Lying is the salt (goodness) of men, and shameful only to one who believes."[24]

[Footnote 23: Kingsley, _West African Studies_, p. 414. _Cf._ Sommerville, 'Ethnogr. Notes in New Georgia,' _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxvi. 394.]

[Footnote 24: Burton and Drake, _Unexplored Syria_, i. 275. See also Burckhardt, _Arabic Proverbs_, p. 44 _sq._]

The duties of sincerity and good faith are also to some extent, and in certain cases principally, founded on prudential considerations. Although, as the _Märchen_ tells us, it happens every day in the world that the fraudulent is successful,[25] there is a widespread notion that, after all, "honesty is the best policy." "Nothing that is false can be lasting," says Cicero.[26] "The liar is short-lived" (that is, soon detected), say the Arabs.[27] According to a Wolof proverb, "lies, however numerous, will be caught by truth when it rises up."[28] The Basutos have a saying that "cunning devours its master."[29] It has been remarked that "if there were no such thing as honesty, it would be a good speculation to invent it, as a means of making one's fortune."[30]

[Footnote 25: Grimm, _Kinder und Hausmärchen_, 'Katze und Maus in Gesellschaft,' 'Die drei Spinnerinnen,' 'Das tapfere Schneiderlein,' &c.]

[Footnote 26: Cicero, _De officiis_, ii. 12.]

[Footnote 27: Burckhardt, _Arabic Proverbs_, p. 119.]

[Footnote 28: Burton, _Wit and Wisdom from West Africa_, p. 15.]

[Footnote 29: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 307.]

[Footnote 30: Quoted by Bentham, _Theory of Legislation_, p. 64.]

Moreover, lying is attended not only with social disadvantages, but with supernatural danger. The West African Fjort have a tale about a fisherman who every day used to catch and smuggle into his house great quantities of fish, {115} but denied to his brother and relatives that he had caught anything. All this time the fetish Sunga was watching, and was grieved to hear him lie thus. The fetish punished him by depriving him of the power of speech, that he might lie no more, and so for the future he could only make his wants known by signs.[31] In another instance, the Fjort tell us, the earth-spirit turned into a pillar of clay a woman who said that she had no peas for sale, when she had her basket full of them.[32] The Nandi of the Uganda Protectorate believe that "God punishes lying by striking the untruthful person with lightning."[33] The Dyaks of Borneo think that the lightning god is made angry even by the most nonsensical untruth, such as the statement that a man has a cat for his mother or that vermin can dance.[34] In Aneiteum, of the New Hebrides, the belief prevailed that liars would be punished in the life to come;[35] according to the Banks Islanders, they were excluded from the true Panoi or Paradise after death.[36] We have already noticed the emphasis which some of the higher religions lay on veracity and good faith, and other statements maybe added testifying the interest which gods of a more civilised type take in the fulfilment of these duties. In ancient Egypt Amon Ra, "the chief of all the gods," was invoked as "Lord of Truth";[37] and Ma[=a], or Maat, represented as his daughter, was the goddess of truth and righteousness.[38] In a Babylonian hymn the moon god is appealed to as the guardian of truth.[39] The Vedic gods are described as "true" and "not deceitful," as friends of honesty and righteousness;[40] and Agni was the lord of vows.[41] The {116} Zoroastrian Mithra was a protector of truth, fidelity, and covenants;[42] and Rashnu Razista, "the truest true," was the genius of truth.[43] According to the Iliad, Zeus is "no abettor of falsehoods";[44] according to Plato, a lie is hateful not only to men but to gods.[45] Among the Romans Jupiter and Dius Fidius were gods of treaties,[46] and Fides was worshipped as the deity of faithfulness.[47] How shall we explain this connection between religious beliefs and the duties of veracity and fidelity to promises?

[Footnote 31: Dennett, _Folklore of the Fjort_, p. 88 _sq._]

[Footnote 32: _Ibid._ p. 5.]

[Footnote 33: Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, ii. 879.]

[Footnote 34: Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 47.]

[Footnote 35: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 326.]

[Footnote 36: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 274.]

[Footnote 37: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 112. _Cf._ Brugsch, _Die Aegyptologie_, pp. 49, 91, 92, 97; Amélineau, _Essai sur l'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypte Ancienne_, pp. 182, 188, 251.]

[Footnote 38: Wiedemann, 'Ma[=a], déesse de la vérité,' in _Annales du Musée Guimet_, x. 561 _sqq._ Amélineau, _op. cit._ p. 187. _Infra_, p. 699.]

[Footnote 39: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 37.]

[Footnote 40: Bergaigne, _La religion védique_, iii. 199. Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 18.]

[Footnote 41: _Satapatha-Brâhmana_, iii. 2. 2. 24.]

[Footnote 42: Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 78. Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, pp. lvii., 164. Spiegel, _Erânische Alterthumskunde_, iii. 685.]

[Footnote 43: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xxiii. 168.]

[Footnote 44: _Iliad_, iv. 235.]

[Footnote 45: Plato, _Respublica_, ii. 382.]

[Footnote 46: Fowler, _Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic_, pp. 141, 229 _sq._]

[Footnote 47: Cicero, _De officiis_, iii. 29. _Idem_, _De natura deorum_, ii. 23; iii. 18. _Idem_, _De legibus_, ii. 8, 11. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitates Romanæ_, ii. 75.]

Apart from the circumstances which in some cases make gods vindicators of the moral law in general, as conceived of by their worshippers, there are quite special reasons for their disapproval of insincerity and bad faith. Here again we notice the influence of magic beliefs on the religious sanction of morality.

There is something uncanny in the untrue word itself. As Professor Stanley Hall points out, children not in frequently regard every deviation from the most painfully literal truth as alike heinous, with no perspective or degrees of difference between the most barefaced intended and unintended lies. In some children this fear of telling an untruth becomes so neurotic that to every statement, even to yes or no, a "perhaps" or "I think" is added mentally, whispered, or aloud. One boy had a long period of fear that, like Ananias and Sapphira, he might some moment drop down dead for a chance and perhaps unconscious lie.[48] On the other hand, an acted lie is felt to be much less harmful than a spoken one; to point the wrong way when asked where some one is gone is less objectionable than to speak wrongly, to nod is less sinful than to say yes. Indeed, acted lies are for the most {117} part easily gotten away with, whereas some mysterious baneful energy seems to be attributed to the spoken untruth. That its evil influence is looked upon as quite mechanical appears from the palliatives used for it. Many American children are of opinion that a lie may be reversed by putting the left hand on the right shoulder and that even an oath may be neutralised or taken in an opposite sense by raising the left instead of the right hand.[49] Among children in New York "it was sufficient to cross the fingers, elbows, or legs, though the act might not be noticed by the companion accosted, and under such circumstances no blame attached to a falsehood."[50] To think "I do not mean it," or to attach to a statement a meaning quite different from the current one, is a form of reservation which is repeatedly found in children.[51] Nor are feelings and ideas of this kind restricted to the young; they are fairly common among grown-up people, and have even found expression in ethical doctrines. They lie at the root of the Jesuit theory of mental reservations. According to Thomas Aquinas, again, though it is wrong to tell a lie for the purpose of delivering another from any danger whatever, it is lawful "to hide the truth prudently under some dissimulation, as Augustine says."[52] It is not uncommonly argued that in defence of a secret we may not "lie," that is, produce directly beliefs contrary to facts; but that we may "turn a question aside," that is, produce indirectly, by natural inference from our answer, a negatively false belief; or that we may "throw the inquirer on a wrong scent," that is, produce similarly a positively false belief.[53] This extreme formalism may no doubt to some extent be traced to the influence of early training. From the day we learned to speak, the duty of telling the truth has been strenuously enjoined upon us, and the word "lie" has been associated with sin of the {118} blackest hue; whereas other forms of falsehood, being less frequent, less obvious, and less easy to define, have also been less emphasised. But after full allowance is made for this influence, the fact still remains that a mystic efficacy is very commonly ascribed to the spoken word. Even among ourselves many persons would not dare to praise their health or fortune for fear lest some evil should result from their speech; and among less civilised peoples much greater significance is given to a word than among us. Herodotus, after mentioning the extreme importance which the ancient Persians attached to the duty of speaking the truth, adds that they held it unlawful even "to talk of anything which it is unlawful to do."[54] I think, then, we may assume that, if for some reason or other, falsehood is stigmatised, the mysterious tendency inherent in the word easily develops into an avenging power which, as often happens in similar cases, is associated with the activity of a god.

[Footnote 48: Stanley Hall, 'Children's Lies,' in _American Journal of Psychology_, iii. 59 _sq._]

[Footnote 49: Stanley Hall, 'Children's Lies,' in _American Journal of Psychology_, iii. 68 _sq._]

[Footnote 50: Bergen and Newell, 'Current Superstitions,' in _Journal of American Folk-lore_, ii. 111.]

[Footnote 51: Stanley Hall, _loc. cit._ p. 68.]

[Footnote 52: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 110. 3. 4.]

[Footnote 53: See Sidgwick, _Methods of Ethics_, p. 317.]

[Footnote 54: Herodotus, i. 139.]

The punishing power of a word is particularly conspicuous in the case of an oath. But the evil attending perjury does not come from the lie as such: it is in the first place a result of the curse which constitutes the oath. An oath is essentially a conditional self-imprecation, a curse by which a person calls down upon himself some evil in the event of what he says not being true. The efficacy of the oath is originally entirely magical, it is due to the magic power inherent in the cursing words. In order to charge them with supernatural energy various methods are adopted. Sometimes the person who takes the oath puts himself in contact with some object which represents the state referred to in the oath, so that the oath may absorb, as it were, its quality and communicate it to the perjurer. Thus the Kandhs swear upon the lizard's skin, "whose scaliness they pray may be their lot if forsworn," or upon the earth of an ant-hill, "like which they desire that, if false, they may be reduced to powder."[55] The Tunguses regard it as the most dreadful {119} of all their oaths when an accused person is compelled to drink some of the blood of a dog which, after its throat has been cut, is impaled near a fire and burnt, or has its flesh scattered about piece-meal, and to swear:--"I speak the truth, and that is as true as it is that I drink this blood. If I lie, let me perish, burn, or be dried up like this dog."[56] In other cases the person who is to swear takes hold of a certain object and calls it to inflict on him some injury if he perjure himself. The Kandhs frequently take oath upon the skin of a tiger, "from which animal destruction to the perjured is invoked."[57] The Angami Nagas, when they swear to keep the peace, or to perform any promise, "place the barrel of a gun, or a spear, between their teeth, signifying by this ceremony that, if they do not act up to their agreement, they are prepared to fall by either of the two weapons."[58] The Chuvashes, again, put a piece of bread and a little salt in the mouth and swear, "May I be in want of these, if I say not true!" or "if I do not keep my word!"[59] Another method of charging an oath with supernatural energy is to touch, or to establish some kind of contact with, a holy object on the occasion when the oath is taken. The Iowa have a mysterious iron or stone, wrapped in seven skins, by which they make men swear to speak the truth.[60] The people of Kesam, in the highlands of Palembang, swear by an old sacred knife,[61] the Bataks of South Tóba on their village idols,[62] the Ostyaks on the nose of a bear, which is regarded by them as an animal endowed with supernatural power.[63] Among the Tunguses a criminal may be compelled to climb one {120} of their sacred mountains, repeating as he mounts, "May I die if I am guilty," or, "May I lose my children and my cattle," or, "I renounce for ever all success in hunting and fishing if I am guilty."[64] In Tibetan law-courts, when the great oath is taken, "it is done by the person placing a holy scripture on his head, and sitting on the reeking hide of an ox and eating part of the ox's heart."[65] Hindus swear on a copy of the Sanskrit _haribans_, or with Ganges water in their hands, or touch the legs of a Brâhmana in taking an oath.[66] Muhammedans swear on the Koran, as Christians do on the Bible. In Morocco an oath derives efficacy from contact with, or the presence of, any lifeless object, animal, or person endowed with _baraka_, or holiness, such as a saint-house or a mosque, corn or wool, a flock of sheep or a horse, or a shereef. In mediæval Christendom sacred relics were generally adopted as the most effective means of adding security to oaths, and "so little respect was felt for the simple oath that, ere long, the adjuncts came to be looked upon as the essential feature, and the imprecation itself to be divested of binding force without them."[67]

[Footnote 55: Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 83.]

[Footnote 56: Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 86.]

[Footnote 57: Macpherson, _op. cit._ p. 83. _Cf._ Hose, 'Natives of Borneo,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiii. 165 (Kayans).]

[Footnote 58: Butler, _Travels in Assam_, p. 154. Mac Mahon, _Far Cathay_, p. 253. Prain, 'Angami Nagas,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, v. 490. _Cf._ Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, pp. 193 (Toungtha), 244 _sq._ (Pankhos and Bunjogees); St. John, 'Hill Tribes of North Aracan,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ ii. 242.]

[Footnote 59: Georgi, _op. cit._ i. 110.]

[Footnote 60: Hamilton, quoted by Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 427.]

[Footnote 61: _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 104.]

[Footnote 62: von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 213.]

[Footnote 63: Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, i. 307, 309; iv. 123 _sq._ _Cf._ Ahlqvist, 'Unter Wogulen und Ostjaken,' in _Acta Societatis Scientiarum Fennicæ_, xiv. 298.]

[Footnote 64: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 86.]

[Footnote 65: Waddell, _Buddhism of Tibet_, p. 569, n. 7.]

[Footnote 66: Grierson, _Bih[=a]r Peasant Life_, p. 401. Sleeman, _Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official_, ii. 116.]

[Footnote 67: Lea, _Superstition and Force_, p. 29. See also Kaufmann, _Deutsche Geschichte_, ii. 297; Ellinger, _Das Verhältniss der öffentlichen Meinung zu Wahrheit und Lüge im 10. 11. und 12. Jahrhundert_, pp. 30, 111.]

Finally, as an ordinary curse, so an oath is made efficacious by bringing in the name of a supernatural being, to whom an appeal is made. When the Comanches of Texas make a sacred pledge or promise, "they call upon the great spirit as their father, and the earth as their mother, to testify to the truth of their asseverations."[68] Of the Chukchi we are told that "as often as they would certify the truth of any thing by oath or solemn protestations they take the sun for their guarantee and security."[69] Among the Tunguses an accused person takes a knife in his hand, brandishes it towards the sun, and says, "If I {121} am guilty, may the sun send diseases into my bowels as mortal as a stab with this knife would be!"[70] An Arab from the province of Dukkâla in Morocco presses a dagger against his chest, saying, "By this poison, may God thrust it into my heart if I did so or so!" If a Masai is accused of having done something wrong, he drinks some blood, which is given him by the spokesman, and says, "If I have done this deed may God kill me"; and it is believed that if he has committed the crime he dies, whereas no harm befalls him if he is innocent.[71] Among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast, "to make an oath binding on the person who takes it, it is usual to give him something to eat or to drink which in some way appertains to a deity, who is then invoked to visit a breach of faith with punishment."[72] Among the Shekani and Bakele people of Southern Guinea, when a covenant between different tribes is about to be formed, their great spirit, Mwetyi, "is always invoked as a witness, and is commissioned with the duty of visiting vengeance upon the party who shall violate the engagement."[73] It seems to be a common practice in certain parts of Africa to swear by some fetish.[74] The Efatese, of the New Hebrides, invoked punishment from the gods in their oaths.[75] In Florida, of the Solomon Group, a man will deny an accusation by some _tindalo_ (that is, the disembodied spirit of some man who already in his lifetime was supposed to be endowed with supernatural power), or by the ghostly frigate-bird, or by the ghostly shark.[76] When an ancient Egyptian wished to give assurance of his honesty and good faith, he called Thoth to witness, the advocate in the heavenly court of justice, without whose justification no soul could stand in the day of judgment.[77] The Eranians swore by Mithra,[78] the Greeks by Zeus,[79] the {122} Romans by Jupiter and Dius Fidius.[80] A god is more able than ordinary mortals to master the processes of nature, and he may also better know whether the sworn word be true or false.[81] It is undoubtedly on account of their superior knowledge that sun or moon or light gods are so frequently appealed to in oaths. The Egyptian god Ra is a solar,[82] and Thoth a lunar[83] deity. The Zoroastrian Mithra, who "has a thousand senses, and sees every man that tells a lie,"[84] is closely connected with the sun;[85] and Rashnu Razista, according to M. Darmesteter, is an offshoot either of Mithra or Ahura Mazda himself.[86] Dius Fidius seems originally to have been a spirit of the heaven, and a wielder of the lightning, closely allied to the great Jupiter.[87] Zeus is all-seeing, the infallible spy of both gods and men.[88] Now, even though the oath has the form of an appeal to a god, it may nevertheless be of a chiefly magic character, being an imprecation rather than a prayer. The oaths which the Moors swear by Allah are otherwise exactly similar in nature to those in which he is not mentioned at all. But the more the belief in magic was shaken, the more the spoken word was divested of that mysterious power which had been attributed to it by minds too apt to confound words with facts, the more prominent became the religious element in the oath. The fulfilment of the self-imprecation was made dependent upon the free will of the deity appealed to, and was regarded as the punishment for an offence committed by the perjurer against the god himself.[89]

[Footnote 68: Neighbors, in Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, i. 132.]

[Footnote 69: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 183.]

[Footnote 70: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 85 _sq._]

[Footnote 71: Hollis, _Masai_, p. 345.]

[Footnote 72: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 196.]

[Footnote 73: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 392.]

[Footnote 74: Schultze, _Der Fetischismus_, p. 111.]

[Footnote 75: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 334.]

[Footnote 76: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 217.]

[Footnote 77: Tiele, _History of the Egyptian Religion_, p. 229. Amélineau, _op. cit._ p. 251.]

[Footnote 78: _Yasts_, x.]

[Footnote 79: _Iliad_, iii. 276 _sqq._ Farnell, _Cults of the Greek States_, i. 70.]

[Footnote 80: von Lasaulx, _Der Eid bei den Römern_, p. 9.]

[Footnote 81: _Cf._ James, _Expedition from Pittsburg to the Rocky Mountains_, i. 267 (Omahas); Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 231 (Ostyaks).]

[Footnote 82: Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 87 _sq._ Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 14. Erman, _Handbook of Egyptian Religion_, p. 10.]

[Footnote 83: Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 145. Erman, _op. cit._ p. 11.]

[Footnote 84: _Yasts_, x. 107.]

[Footnote 85: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xxiii. 122, n. 4. Meyer, _Geschichte des Alterthums_, i. 541 _sq._ Geiger, _op. cit._ i. p. lvi.]

[Footnote 86: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xxiii. 168.]

[Footnote 87: Fowler, _Roman Festivals_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 88: _Cf._ _Iliad_, iii. 277; Ovid, _Metamorphoses_, iv. 172; Darmesteter, _Essais orientaux_, p. 107; Usener, _Götternamen_, p. 177 _sqq._]

[Footnote 89: Grotius says (_De jure belli et pacis_, ii. 13. 12) that even he who swears by false gods is bound, "because, though under false notions, he refers to the general idea of Godhead, and therefore the true God will interpret it as a wrong to himself if perjury be committed."]

{123} Owing to its invocation of supernatural sanction, perjury is considered the most heinous of all acts of falsehood.[90] But it has a tendency to make even the ordinary lie or breach of faith a matter of religious concern. If a god is frequently appealed to in oaths, a general hatred of lying and unfaithfulness may become one of his attributes, as is suggested by various facts quoted above. There is every reason to believe that a god is not, in the first place, appealed to because he is looked upon as a guardian of veracity and good faith, but that he has come to be looked upon as a guardian of these duties because he has been frequently appealed to in connection with them.

[Footnote 90: Among various peoples perjury is punished even by custom or law. Thus among the Gaika tribe of the Kafirs a person may be fined for taking a false oath in a law case (Brownlee, in Maclean, _Compendium of Kafir Laws and Customs_, p. 124). In Abyssinia a man convicted of perjury "would not only lose his reputation, and be for ever incapacitated from being witness even on the most trivial question, but he would likewise in all probability be bound and severely fined, and might indeed think himself fortunate if he got off with all his limbs in their proper places, or without his hide being scored" (Parkyns, _Life in Abyssinia_, ii. 258 _sq._). The laws of the Malays punish perjury (Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, iii. 90). In India, according to the Laws of Manu (viii. 219 _sq._), he who broke an agreement after swearing to it was to be banished, imprisoned, and fined. Mediæval law-books punished perjurers with the loss of the right hand, by which the oath was sworn (Wilda, _Das Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 983 _sq._; Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 541). In a Danish law of 1537 it is said that the perjurer shall lose the two offending fingers so as to appease the wrath of God (Stemann, _Den danske Retshistorie indtil Christian V.'s Lov_, p. 645). In other cases, again, no civil punishment is affixed to a false oath--for instance, among the Rejangs (Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 240) and Bataks of Sumatra (_Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 86), the Ossetes (Kovalewsky, _Coutume contemporaine_, p. 324), Persians (Polak, _Persien_, ii. 83), and, as it seems, the ancient Hebrews (Keil, _Manual of Biblical Archæology_, ii. 348; Greenstone, 'Perjury,' in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, ix. 640), Greeks (Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 245, note), and Teutons in early times (Wilda, _op. cit._ p. 982; Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 681). Cicero says (_De legibus_, ii. 9) that "the divine punishment of perjury is destruction, the human punishment infamy"; but though perjury _per se_ was not punished in Rome, the law appears from very early times to have contained provisions for punishing false testimony (Hunter, _Roman Law_, p. 1063; see also Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 681). However, the fact that perjury is not treated as a crime by no means implies that it is not regarded as a sin. The punishment of it is left to the offended deity (Marsden, _op. cit._ p. 219; _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 86; Crawfurd, _op. cit._ iii. 90 [Javanese]).]

It seems that sometimes the habit of oath-taking has, in another respect also, made it prudential for men to speak the simple truth in all circumstances. Sir W. H. Sleeman {124} observes that among the woods and hills of India the cotton and other trees are supposed by the natives to be occupied by deities who are vested with a local superintendence over the affairs of a district, or perhaps of a single village. "These," he says, "are always in the view of the people, and every man knows that he is every moment liable to be taken to their court, and to be made to invoke their vengeance upon himself or those dear to him, if he has told a falsehood in what he has stated, or tells one in what he is about to state. Men so situated adhere habitually, and I may say religiously, to the truth; and I have had before me hundreds of cases in which a man's property, liberty, or life, has depended upon his telling a lie, and he has refused to tell it to save either."[91] On the other hand, there are peoples among whom a person's word can hardly be trusted unless confirmed by an oath.[92] And one of the arguments adduced by the Quakers against the taking of oaths is that, if on any particular occasion a man swear in addition to his yea or nay, in order to make it more obligatory or convincing, its force becomes comparatively weak at other times when it receives no such confirmation.[93]

[Footnote 91: Sleeman, _op. cit._ ii. 111 _sq._]

[Footnote 92: See, besides _supra_, Kingsley, _West African Studies_, p. 414; Chanler, _Through Jungle and Desert_, p. 186 _sq._ (Wamsara).]

[Footnote 93: Gurney, _Views and Practices of the Society of Friends_, p. 327.]

Modes of conduct which are recommended by prudence tend on that account in various ways to be regarded as morally compulsory or praiseworthy. This subject will be discussed in connection with duties and virtues which are called "self-regarding," but in the present place it is necessary to remind ourselves of the share which early education has in making prudence a matter of moral consideration. Few duties owe so much to the training of parents and teachers as does veracity. Children easily resort to falsehood, in self-defence or otherwise, and truthfulness is therefore enjoined on them with particular emphasis.[94]

[Footnote 94: _Cf._ Priestley, in 'Essay III.' introductory to Hartley's _Theory of the Human Mind_, p. xlix. _sq._]

{125} The moral ideas referring to truthfulness are, finally, much influenced by the force of habit. Where lying is frequent it is, other things being equal, less strenuously condemned, if condemned at all, than in communities which are strictly truthful. It is natural to speak the truth. Von Jhering's suggestion that man was originally a liar, and that veracity is the result of human progress,[95] is not consistent with facts. Language was not invented to disguise the truth, but to express it. As Hutcheson remarked long ago, "truth is the natural production of the mind when it gets the capacity of communicating it, dissimulation and disguise are plainly artificial effects of design and reflection."[96] It may be doubted whether there are any other mendacious creatures in the world than men.[97] It is said that "lies are told, if not in speech yet in acts, by dogs";[98] but the instances reported of canine deceitfulness[99] are hardly conclusive. As a cautious writer observes, the question is not whether there may be "objective deceitfulness" in the dog's conduct, but whether the motive is deceit: and "the deceitful intent is a piece, not of the observed fact, but of the observer's inference."[100] Nor is the child, strictly speaking, a born liar. M. Compayré even goes so far as to say that, if the child has not been subjected to bad influences, or if a discipline of repression and constraint has not driven him to seek a refuge in dissimulation, he is usually frankness and sincerity itself.[101] Montaigne remarked that the falsehood of a child grows with its growth.[102] According to M. Perez, useful dissimulations are practised by children already at the age of two years, but generally it is only after they are three or four years old that fear of being scolded or punished will lead {126} them into falsehood.[103] We are even told that certain savages are too stupid or too ignorant to tell lies. A Hindu gentleman of the plains, in the valley of the Nerbudda, when asked what made the uncultured people of the woods to the north and south so truthful, replied, "They have not yet learned the value of a lie."[104] But as we know how readily truthful savages become liars when their social conditions change, we may conclude that their veracity was due rather to absence of temptation than to lack of intelligence. In a small community of savages living by themselves, there is no need for lying, nor much opportunity to practise it. There is little scope for those motives which most commonly induce people to practise falsehood--fear and love of gain, combined with a hope of success.[105] Harmony and sympathy generally prevail between the members of the group, and deception is hardly possible since secrets do not exist.

[Footnote 95: von Jhering, _Zweck im Recht_, ii. 606.]

[Footnote 96: Hutcheson, _System of Moral Philosophy_, ii. 28. _Cf._ Reid, _op. cit._ vi. 24, p. 428 _sqq._; Dugald Stewart, _op. cit._ ii. 333.]

[Footnote 97: _Cf._ Schopenhauer, _Essays_, p. 145.]

[Footnote 98: Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 405.]

[Footnote 99: Romanes, _Animal Intelligence_, pp. 443, 444, 451.]

[Footnote 100: Lloyd Morgan, _Animal Life and Intelligence_, p. 400.]

[Footnote 101: Compayré, _L'évolution intellectuelle et morale de l'enfant_, p. 309. See also Sully, _Studies of Childhood_, p. 263 _sq._]

[Footnote 102: Montaigne, _Essais_, i. 9 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 16).]

[Footnote 103: Perez, _First Three Years of Childhood_, pp. 87, 89.]

[Footnote 104: Sleeman, _op. cit._ ii. 110.]

[Footnote 105: _Cf._ Sarasin, _Forschungen auf Ceylon_, iii. 543 (Veddahs).]

The case is different when savages come into frequent contact with foreigners. To deceive a stranger is easy, and no scruple is made of doing so. On the contrary, as we have seen, he is regarded as a proper object of deception, and this opinion is only too often justified by his own behaviour. But when commonly practised in relation to strangers, falsehood easily becomes a habit which affects the general conduct of the man. Hamzé, the teacher of the Druses, said, "When a man once gets into the way of speaking falsely, it is to be apprehended that, in spite of himself, and by the mere force of habit, he will get to speak falsely towards the brethren"; hence it is advisable to speak the truth at all times and before all men.[106] There is indeed abundant evidence that intercourse with strangers, and especially with people of a different race, has had a destructive influence on savage veracity.

[Footnote 106: Churchill, _Mount Lebanon_, iii. 225 _sq._]

This has been noticed among many of the uncivilised tribes of India. "Formerly," says Mr. Man, "a Sonthal, as a rule, {127} disdained to tell a falsehood, but the influences of civilisation, transfused through the contagious ethics of his Bengali neighbours, have somewhat impaired his truthfulness. In the last four or five years a great change for the worse has become evident, although even now, as a people, they are glorious exceptions to the prevailing idiosyncrasy of the lower class of natives in Bengal. With the latter, speaking the truth has been always an accident; with the Sonthal it was a characteristic principle."[107] Indeed, the Santals in Singbhúm, who live much to themselves, are still described by Colonel Dalton as "a very simple-minded people, almost incapable of deception."[108] The Tipperah, "where he is brought into contact with, or under the influence of the Bengallee, easily acquires their worst vices and superstitions, losing at the same time the leading characteristic of the primitive man--the love of truth."[109] Other tribes, like the Garos and Bhúmij, have likewise been partly contaminated by their intercourse with Bengalis, and acquired from them a propensity to lie, which, in former days, was altogether foreign to them.[110] The Kakhyens are at the present time lazy, thievish, and untrustworthy, "whether their character has been deteriorated by knavish injustice on the part of Chinese traders, or high-handed extortion and wrong on the part of Burmese."[111] The Ladakhis are, in general, "frank, honest, and moral when not corrupted by communication with the dissolute Kashmiris."[112] Of the Paháriás, who according to an earlier authority would sooner die than lie,[113] it is now reported that "those who have most to do with them say they cannot rely on their word, and that they not only lie without scruple, but are scarcely annoyed at being detected."[114] The Todas, whilst they call falsehood one of the worst vices and have a temple dedicated to Truth, seem nowadays only too often to forget both the temple and its object;[115] and we are told that the dissimulation they practise in their dealings with Europeans has been brought about by the habit of paying them for every insignificant item of information.[116] According to an {128} Indian civil servant quoted by Mr. Spencer, various other hill tribes, originally distinguished by their veracity, have afterwards been rendered less veracious by contact with the whites.[117]

[Footnote 107: Man, _Sonthalia_, p. 14. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 20.]

[Footnote 108: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, _op. cit._ p. 217.]

[Footnote 109: Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 216.]

[Footnote 110: Dalton, _op. cit._ pp. 68, 177.]

[Footnote 111: Anderson, _Mandalay to Momien_, p. 151.]

[Footnote 112: Moorcroft and Trebeck, _Travels in the Himalayan Provinces of Hindustan_, i. 321.]

[Footnote 113: Shaw, quoted by Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 274.]

[Footnote 114: Cumming, _In the Himalayas_, p. 404 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: Harkness, _A Singular Aboriginal Race inhabiting the Neilgherry Hills_, p. 18.]

[Footnote 116: Metz, _Tribes inhabiting the Neilgherry Hills_, p. 13.]

[Footnote 117: Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, ii. 234. See also Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 152. (Bódo and Dhimáls); Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 206 (Múndas).]

Of the Andaman Islanders Mr. Man observes:--"It has been remarked with regret by all interested in the race, that intercourse with the alien population has, generally speaking, prejudicially affected their morals; and that the candour, veracity, and self-reliance they manifest in their savage and untutored state are, when they become associated with foreigners, to a great extent lost, and habits of untruthfulness, dependence, and sloth engendered."[118] Riedel makes a similar remark with reference to the natives of Ambon and Uliase.[119] Mr. Sommerville believes that the natives of New Georgia, in the Solomon Islands, learned their practice of cheating from European traders.[120]

[Footnote 118: Man, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 92.]

[Footnote 119: Riedel, _De sluik- en kroesharige rassen tusschen Selebes en Papua_, p. 41.]

[Footnote 120: Sommerville, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxvi. 394.]

Among the Ostyaks increasing civilisation has proved injurious to their ancient honesty, and those who live in the neighbourhood of towns or large villages have become even more deceitful than the colonists.[121] A similar change has taken place with other tribes belonging to the Russian Empire, for instance the Tunguses[122] and Kamchadales.[123]

[Footnote 121: Castrén, _op. cit._ ii. 121.]

[Footnote 122: Dall, _Alaska_, p. 518.]

[Footnote 123: Steller, _Beschreibung von dem Lande Kamtschatka_, p. 285. Sarytchew, 'Voyage of Discovery to the North-East of Siberia,' in _Collection of Modern and Contemporary Voyages_, v. 67.]

We hear the same story from America.[124] Among the Omahas "formerly only two or three were notorious liars; but now, there are about twenty who do not lie."[125] The old men of the Ojibwas all agree in saying that before the white man came and resided among them there was less lying than there is now.[126] The Indians of Mexico, Lumholtz writes, "do not tell the truth unless it suits them."[127] But with reference to some of them, the Tarahumares, he adds that, where they have had little or nothing to do with the whites, they are trustworthy, and profit is no inducement to them, as they believe {129} that their gods would be angry with them for charging an undue price.[128]

[Footnote 124: Domenech, _Seven Years Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 69. _Cf._ Hearne, _Journey to the Northern Ocean_, pp. 307, 308, 310 (Chippewyans); Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 335 _sq._]

[Footnote 125: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 370.]

[Footnote 126: Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, ii. 139.]

[Footnote 127: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, ii. 477.]

[Footnote 128: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, i. 244, 418.]

The deceitfulness of many African peoples is undoubtedly in some degree a result of their intercourse with foreigners. In Sierra Leone, says Winterbottom, the natives on the sea coast, who are chiefly engaged in commerce, "are in general shrewd and artful, sometimes malevolent and perfidious. Their long connection with European slave traders has tutored them in the arts of deceit."[129] The Yorubas, according to Burton, are eminently dishonest only "in and around the cities."[130] Among the Kalunda those who live near the great caravan roads and have had much to do with foreign traders are suspicious and false.[131] And the Hottentots, of whose truthfulness earlier writers spoke very highly, are nowadays said to be addicted to lying.[132]

[Footnote 129: Winterbottom, _Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_, i. 206.]

[Footnote 130: Burton, _Abeokuta_, i. 303.]

[Footnote 131: Pogge, _Im Reiche des Muata Jamwo_, p. 236.]

[Footnote 132: Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 307 _sq._]

It has also been noticed that mendacity is favoured among children by much intercourse with strangers, when "first impressions" are consciously made, as also by frequent change of environment, or of school or residence, as such changes give rise to a feeling that "new leaves" can be easily turned.[133]

[Footnote 133: Stanley Hall, in _American Journal of Psychology_, iii. 70.]

When a social unit is composed of loosely connected sub-groups, the intercourse between members of different sub-groups resembles in many respects that between foreigners. Social incoherence is thus apt to lead to deceitful habits, as was the case in the Middle Ages. The same phenomenon is to be observed in the East; perhaps also among the Desert Arabs and the Fuegians, who live in small parties which only occasionally meet and soon again separate.

Another factor which has favoured deception is social differentiation. The different classes of society have often little sympathy for each other, their interests are not infrequently conflicting, deceit is a means of procuring advantages, and, for the inferior classes especially, a means of self-protection. As Euripides observes, slaves are in {130} the habit of concealing the truth.[134] In Eastern Africa, says Livingstone, falsehood is a vice prevailing among the free, but still more among the slaves; "one can scarcely induce a slave to translate anything truly: he is so intent on thinking of what will please."[135]

[Footnote 134: Euripides, _Ph[oe]nissæ_, 392. _Cf._ Burton, _Arabian Nights_, i. 176, n. 1.]

[Footnote 135: Livingstone, _Expedition to the Zambesi_, p. 309. See also Polack, _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_, ii. 59.]

Hardly anything has been a greater inducement to falsehood than oppression. Whilst the old Makololo were truthful, this is not the case with their sons, "who, having been brought up among the subjected tribes, have acquired some of the vices peculiar to a menial and degraded race."[136] The Wanyoro, who are described as "splendid liars," exercised deception chiefly to evade the intolerable exactions of their own chiefs, whereas they are fairly truthful in contact with Europeans who attempt to treat them justly.[137] The duplicity and cunning of the Malagasy are "the natural result of centuries of superstition, ignorance, and submission to the rule of tyrannical despots, with whom the spy system has always been a necessity."[138] In Morocco the independent Jbâla, or mountaineers of the North, are more to be trusted than the Arabs of the plains, who have long been suffering from the extortions of rapacious officials. The duplicity of Orientals is very largely due to their despotic form of government.[139] In India, Mr. Percival observes, "despotism in one form or other that has so long prevailed, and the consequent oppression attendant thereon, must have rendered it difficult to make way without fraud. Deception and arts of cunning, under such circumstances, being the only means at the command of the inferior portions of the community for gaining their ends, and securing the plainest rights, they would resort to them as the only way of avoiding certain ruin."[140] The Chinese habit of lying has {131} been attributed partly to the truckling fear of officers.[141] In China and many other parts of the East, says Sir J. Bowring, "there is a fear of truth _as_ truth, lest its discovery should lead to consequences of which the inquirer never dreams, but which are present to the mind of the person under interrogation."[142]

[Footnote 136: Livingstone, _Expedition to the Zambesi_, p. 283.]

[Footnote 137: Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, ii. 591.]

[Footnote 138: Little, _Madagascar_, p. 72.]

[Footnote 139: Vámbéry, _Der Islam im neunzehnten Jahrhundert_, p. 231.]

[Footnote 140: Percival, _Land of the Veda_, p. 288. _Cf._ Malcolm, _Memoir of Central India_, ii. 171; Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 152.]

[Footnote 141: Wells Williams, _The Middle Kingdom_, i. 835.]

[Footnote 142: Bowring, _Siam_, i. 105 _sq._]

* * * * *

The regard for truth displays itself not only in the condemnation of falsehood, but in the idea that, under certain circumstances, it is a person's duty to inform others of the truth, although there is no deception in withholding it. This duty is limited by utilitarian considerations, and it is less insisted on than the duty of refraining from falsehood; positive commandments, as we have seen, are generally less stringent than the corresponding negative commandments.[143] But to disclose the truth for the benefit of others, when it is attended with injurious consequences for the person who discloses it, can hardly fail to evoke moral approval, and may be deemed a merit of the highest order.

[Footnote 143: _Supra_, i. 303 _sqq._]

The regard for truth goes a step further still. It may be obligatory or praiseworthy not only to spread the knowledge of truth, but to seek for it. The possession of knowledge, of some kind or other, is universally respected. A Wolof proverb says, "Not to know is bad, not to wish to know is worse."[144] In the moral and religious systems of the East knowledge is one of the chief pursuits of man. Confucius described virtue as consisting of knowledge, magnanimity, and valour.[145] The ancients, he says, "wishing to rectify their hearts, . . . first desired to be sincere in their thoughts. Wishing to be sincere in their thoughts, they first extended to the utmost their knowledge. Such extension of knowledge lay in the investigation of things."[146] Knowledge is to be pursued not for theoretical, but for {132} moral purposes; the Master said, "It is not easy to find a man who has learned for three years without coming to be good."[147] The Hindus maintain that ignorance is the greatest of evils, and that the sole and ultimate object of life should be to give and receive instruction.[148] It is said in the Laws of Manu, "A man is not therefore considered venerable because his head is gray; him who, though young, has learned the Veda, the gods consider to be venerable."[149] According to the Mahabharata, it is by knowledge that a creature is liberated, by knowledge that he becomes the Eternal, Imperceptible, and Undecaying.[150] Buddhism regards sin as folly and delusion as the cause of crime;[151] "the unwise man cannot discover the difference between that which is evil and that which is good, as a child knows not the value of a coin that is placed before him."[152] And the highest of all gifts, the source of abiding salvation, is the knowledge of the identity between the individual and God, in whom and by whom the individual lives, and moves, and has his being.[153] According to one of the Pahlavi texts, wisdom is better than wealth of any kind;[154] through the power of wisdom it is possible to do every duty and good work;[155] the religion of the Mazda-worshippers is apprehended more fully by means of the most perfect wisdom, and "even the struggle and warfare of Irân with foreigners, and the smiting of Aharman and the demons it is possible to effect through the power of wisdom."[156] A strong dash of intellectualism is a prominent feature in the Rabbinic religion. The highest virtue lies not only in the fulfilment but in the study of the law. There is a special merit bound up in it that will assist man both in this world and in the world to come; and it is said that even a bastard who is learned in {133} the law is more honoured than a high-priest who is not.[157] Among Muhammedans, also, great respect is shown to men of learning.[158] Knowledge, the Prophet said, "lights the way to Heaven"--"He dies not who gives life to learning"--"With knowledge the servant of God rises to the heights of goodness and to a noble position"--"The ink of the scholar is more holy than the blood of the martyr."[159]

[Footnote 144: Burton, _Wit and Wisdom from West Africa_, p. 6.]

[Footnote 145: _Chung Yung_, xx. 8. Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, p. 105.]

[Footnote 146: _Tâ Hsio_, 4.]

[Footnote 147: _Lun Yü_, viii. 12. _Cf._ Faber, _Digest of the Doctrines of Confucius_, p. 60; de Lanessan, _La morale des philosophes chinois_, p. 27.]

[Footnote 148: Percival, _Land of the Veda_, p. 263.]

[Footnote 149: _Laws of Manu_, ii. 156.]

[Footnote 150: Muir, _Original Sanskrit Texts_, v. 327.]

[Footnote 151: Rhys Davids, _Hibbert Lectures on the History of Buddhism_, p. 208.]

[Footnote 152: Hardy, _Manual of Budhism_, p. 505.]

[Footnote 153: Rhys Davids, _op. cit._ p. 209.]

[Footnote 154: _Dinâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xlvii. 6.]

[Footnote 155: _Ibid._ i. 54.]

[Footnote 156: _Ibid._ lvii. 15 _sq._]

[Footnote 157: Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 495. Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 35.]

[Footnote 158: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 301 _sq._]

[Footnote 159: Ameer Ali, _Ethics of Islâm_, pp. 47, 49.]

In Christianity the knowledge of truth became a necessary requirement of salvation. But here, as in the East, the truth which alone was valued was religious truth. All knowledge that was not useful to salvation was, indeed, despised, and science was regarded not only as valueless, but as sinful.[160] "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God."[161] If it happened that any one gave himself to letters, or lifted up his mind to the contemplation of the heavenly bodies, he passed instantly for a magician or a heretic.[162] So also every mental disposition which is essential to scientific research was for centuries stigmatised as offensive to the Almighty; it was a sin to doubt the opinions which had been instilled in childhood before they had been examined, to notice any objection to those opinions, to resolve to follow the light of evidence wherever it might lead.[163] Yet we are told, even by highly respectable writers, that the modern world owes its scientific spirit to the extreme importance which Christianity {134} assigned to the possession of truth, of _the_ truth.[164] According to M. Réville, "it was the orthodox intolerance of the Church in the Middle Ages which impressed on Christian society this disposition to seek truth at any price, of which the modern scientific spirit is only the application. The more importance the Church attached to the profession of the truth--to the extent even of considering involuntary error as in the highest degree a damnable crime--so much the more the sentiment of the immense value of this truth arose in the general persuasion, along with a resolve to conquer it wherever it was felt not to be possessed. How otherwise," M. Réville asks, "can we explain that science was not developed and has not been pursued with constancy, except in the midst of Christian societies?"[165] This statement is characteristic of the common tendency to attribute to the influence of the Christian religion almost anything good which may be found among Christian nations. But, surely, the patient and impartial search after hidden truth, for the sake of truth, which constitutes the essence of scientific research, is not congenial to, but the very opposite of, that ready acceptance of a revealed truth for the sake of eternal salvation, which was insisted upon by the Church. And what about that singular love of abstract knowledge which flourished in ancient Athens, where Aristotle declared it a sacred duty to prefer truth to everything else,[166] and Socrates sacrificed his life on its altar? It seems that the modern scientific spirit is only a revival and development of a mental disposition which was for ages suppressed by the persecuting tendencies of the Church and the extreme contempt for learning displayed by the barbarian invaders and their descendants. Even when they had settled in the countries which they had conquered, the {135} Teutons would not permit their children to be instructed in any science, for fear lest they should become effeminate and averse from war;[167] and long afterwards it was held that a nobleman ought not to know letters, and that to write and read was a shame to gentry.[168]

[Footnote 160: Gibbon, _Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, ii. 185. von Eicken, _Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, pp. 128-130, 589 _sqq._]

[Footnote 161: _1 Corinthians_, iii. 19. _Cf._ Lactantius, _Divines Institutiones_, iii. 3 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vi. 354 _sqq._); St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, viii. 10 (Migne, xli. 234).]

[Footnote 162: Chapelain, _De la lecture des vieux romans_, p. 20. As late as the middle of the seventeenth century a powerful party was rising in England who said that all learning was unfavourable to religion, and that it was sufficient for everyone to be acquainted with his mother-tongue alone (Twells, _Life of Pocock_, p. 176). The Duke de Saint Simon, who in 1721 and 1722 was the French ambassador in Madrid, states (_Mémoires_, xxxv. 209) that in Spain science was a crime, and ignorance and stupidity the chief virtues.]

[Footnote 163: Lecky, _Rationalism in Europe_, ii. 87 _sq._]

[Footnote 164: Ritchie, _Natural Rights_, p. 172. _Cf._ Kuenen, _Hibbert Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions_, p. 290.]

[Footnote 165: Réville, _Prolegomena of the History of Religions_, p. 226.]

[Footnote 166: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, i. 6. 1. Prof. Ritchie argues (_op. cit._ p. 172 _sq._) that a devotion to truth as such was in the ancient world known only to a few philosophers. Prof. Fowler is probably more correct in saying

(_Principles of Morals_, ii. 45, 220 _sq._; _Progressive Morality_, p. 114) that it was more common amongst the Greeks than amongst ourselves.]

[Footnote 167: Procopius, _De bello Gothorum_, i. 2. Robertson, _History of the Reign of Charles V._ i. 234. Millingen, _op. cit._ i. 22 _sq._ n. [dagger]]

[Footnote 168: Alain Chartier, quoted by Sainte-Palaye, _op. cit._ ii. 104. See also De la Nouë, _Discours politiques et militaires_, p. 238; Lyttleton, _Life of Henry II._ ii. 246 _sq._ The ignorance of the mediæval clergy has been somewhat exaggerated by Robertson (_op. cit._ pp. 21, 22, 278 _sq._). Even in the dark ages it was not a very uncommon thing for the clergy to be able to read and write (Maitland, _The Dark Ages_, p. 16 _sqq._).]

The regard for knowledge springs in the first instance from the love of it. As Aristotle said, "all men are by nature desirous of knowledge."[169] But this feeling is not equally strong, nor equally deep, in all. The curiosity of savages, however great it often may be,[170] has chiefly reference to objects or events which immediately concern their welfare or appear to them alarming, or to trifles which attract attention on account of their novelty. If their curiosity were more penetrating, they would no longer remain savages; an extended desire of knowledge leads to civilisation. But curiosity or love of knowledge, whether in savage or civilised men, is not resolvable merely into views of utility; as Dr. Brown observed, we feel it without reflecting on the pleasure which we are to enjoy or the pain which we are to suffer.[171] When highly developed, it drives men to scientific investigations even though no practical benefits are expected from the results. This devotion to truth for its own sake, pure and disinterested as it is, has a singular tendency to excite regard and admiration in everyone who has come under its influence. From the utilitarian point of view it has been defended on {136} the ground that, on the whole, every truth is in the long run useful and every error harmful, and that we can never exactly tell in advance what benefits may accrue even from a knowledge which is apparently fruitless. But it seems that our love of truth is somewhat apt to mislead our moral judgment. When duly reflecting on the matter, we cannot help making a moral distinction between him who pursues his studies merely from an instinctive craving for knowledge, and him who devotes his life to the search of truth from a conviction that he may thereby promote human welfare.

[Footnote 169: Aristotle, _Metaphysica_, i. 1. 1, p. 980. _Cf._ Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 4.]

[Footnote 170: Murdoch, 'Ethnological Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 42 (Eskimo). Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 177. Anderson, _Mandalay to Momien_, p. 151 (Kakhyens). Foreman, _Philippine Islands_, p. 188 (Tagálog natives of the North). Bock, _Head Hunters of Borneo_, p. 209 (Dyaks). Forbes, _A Naturalist's Wanderings in the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 320 (natives of Timor-laut). Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 108.]

[Footnote 171: Dugald Stewart, _op. cit._ ii. 336. Brown, _Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind_, lec. 67, p. 451.]

CHAPTER XXXII

THE RESPECT FOR OTHER MEN'S HONOUR AND SELF-REGARDING PRIDE--POLITENESS

THERE are many acts, forbearances, and omissions, the offensiveness of which mainly or exclusively springs from men's desire to be respected by their fellow-men and their dislike of being looked down upon. Foremost among these are attacks upon people's honour and good name. A man's honour may be defined as the moral worth he possesses in the eyes of the society of which he is a member, and it behoves other persons to acknowledge this worth and, especially, not to detract from it by imputing to him, on insufficient grounds, such behaviour as is generally considered degrading.

The censure to which he is subject or the contempt in which he is held may no doubt affect his welfare in various ways, but it is chiefly painful as a violation of his personal dignity. Hence the duty of respecting a man's honour is on the whole contained in the more comprehensive obligation of showing deference, in words and deeds, for his feeling of self-regarding pride.

This feeling, or at least the germ of it, is found already in some of the lower animals. Among "high-life" dogs, says Professor Romanes, "wounded sensibilities and loss of esteem are capable of producing much keener suffering than is mere physical pain." A reproachful word or look from any of his friends made a {138} Skye terrier miserable for a whole day; and another terrier, who when in good humour used to perform various tricks, was never so pleased as when his joke was duly appreciated, whereas "nothing displeased him so much as being laughed at when he did not intend to be ridiculous."[1] Monkeys also, according to Dr. Brehm, are "very sensitive to every kind of treatment they may receive, to love and dislike, to encouraging praise and chilling blame, to pleasant flattery and wounding ridicule, to caresses and chastisement."[2]

[Footnote 1: Romanes, _Animal Intelligence_, pp. 439, 444.]

[Footnote 2: Brehm, _From North Pole to Equator_, p. 299. _Cf._ _ibid._ pp. 304-306, Brehm, _Thierleben_, i. 75, 157; Schultze, _Vergleichende Seelenkunde_, i. pt. i. 110; Perty, _Das Seelenleben der Thiere_, p. 66.]

Among the savage races of men, as among civilised peoples, self-regarding pride is universal, and in many of them it is a very conspicuous trait of character.[3] The Veddah of Ceylon, says Mr. Nevill, "is proud in the extreme, and considers himself no man's inferior. Hence he is keenly sensitive to ridicule, contempt, and even patronage. There is nothing he dreads more than being laughed at as a savage, because he dislikes clothes and cultivation."[4] Australian aborigines are described as "extravagantly proud,"[5] as "vain and fond of approbation."[6] In Fiji "anything like a slight deeply offends a native, and is not soon forgotten."[7] The Negroes of Sierra Leone "possess a great share of pride, and are easily affected by an insult: they cannot hear even a harsh expression, or a raised tone of voice, without shewing that {139} they feel it."[8] The Araucanians, inhabiting parts of Chili, "are naturally fond of honourable distinction, and there is nothing they can endure with less patience than contempt or inattention."[9] The North American Indians, says Perrot, "ont généralement touts beaucoup de vaine gloire dans leurs actions bonnes ou mauvaises. . . . L'ambition est en un mot une des plus fortes passions qui les anime."[10] The Indian of British Columbia, for instance, "watches that he may receive his proper share of honour at festivals; he cannot endure to be ridiculed for even the slightest mistake; he carefully guards all his actions, and looks for due honour to be paid to him by friends, strangers, and subordinates. This peculiarity appears most clearly in great festivals."[11] Thus, in numerous instances, "persons who have been hoarding up property for ten, fifteen, or twenty years (at the same time almost starving themselves for want of clothing), have given it all away to make a show for a few hours, and to be thought of consequence."[12] Speaking of the Eskimo about Behring Strait, Mr. Nelson observes, "As with all savages, the Eskimo are extremely sensitive to ridicule and are very quick to take offence at real or seeming slights."[13] Among the Atkha Aleuts it has happened that men have committed suicide from disappointment at the failure of an undertaking, fearing that they would become the laughing-stock of the village.[14] Among many other savages shame or wounded pride is not uncommonly a cause of suicide.[15] The Hos of Chota Nagpore have a saying that for a wife who has been reproved by her husband {140}"nothing remains but the water at the bottom of the well";[16] and in New Zealand native women sometimes killed themselves because they had been rebuked for negligence in cooking or for want of care towards a child.[17]

[Footnote 3: Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 107; Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, p. 56. Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, i. 54. Raffles, _History of Java_, i. 249. St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, ii. 323 (Malays of Sarawak). Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 94. Stewart, 'Notes on Northern Cachar,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 609 (Nagas). Bergmann, _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_, ii. 290, 295, 296, 312. Högström, _Beskrifning öfver de til Sveriges Krona lydande Lapmarker_, p. 152 (Lapps). Dall, _Alaska_, p. 392 _sq._ (Aleuts). Brett, _Indian Tribes of Guiana_, p. 103.]

[Footnote 4: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 192. _Cf._ Sarasin, _Ergebnisse naturwissenschaftlicher Forschungen auf Ceylon_, iii. 537.]

[Footnote 5: Hale, _U.S. Exploring Expedition. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, p. 109.]

[Footnote 6: Mathew, in Curr, _The Australian Race_, iii. 155.]

[Footnote 7: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 105. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 103 _sq._]

[Footnote 8: Winterbottom, _Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_, i. 211.]

[Footnote 9: Molina, _History of Chili_, ii. 113.]

[Footnote 10: Perrot, _Memoire sur les m[oe]urs, coustumes et relligion des sauvages de l'Amerique septentrionale_, p. 76. _Cf._ Buchanan, _Sketches of the History, Manners, and Customs of the North American Indians_, p. 165; Matthews,

Ethnography and Philology of the Hidatsa Indians, p. 41.]

[Footnote 11: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 19.]

[Footnote 12: Duncan, quoted by Mayne, _Four Years in British Columbia_, p. 295.]

[Footnote 13: Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 300.]

[Footnote 14: Yakof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 158. _Cf._ Dall, _op. cit._ p. 391 (Aleuts).]

[Footnote 15: See _infra_, on Suicide; Lasch, 'Besitzen die Naturvölker ein persönliches Ehrgefühl?' in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissenschaft_, iii. 837 _sqq._]

[Footnote 16: Bradley-Birt, _Chota Nagpore_, p. 104. _Cf._ Dalton, _Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 206.]

[Footnote 17: Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 57.]

Like other injuries, an insult not only affects the feelings of the victim, but arouses sympathetic resentment in outsiders, and is consequently disapproved of as wrong. Among the Maoris, if anybody wantonly tried to hurt another's feelings, it was immediately repressed, and "such a person was spoken of as having had no parents, or, as having been born (laid) by a bird."[18] In the Malay Archipelago, "among some of the tribes, abusive language cannot with impunity be used even to a slave. Blows are still more intolerable, and considered such grievous affronts, that, by law, the person who receives them is considered justified in putting the offender to death."[19] The natives of the Tonga Islands hold no bad moral habit to be more "ridiculous, depraved, and unjust, than publishing the faults of one's acquaintances and friends . . . . ; and as to downright calumny or false accusation, it appears to them more horrible than deliberate murder does to us: for it is better, they think, to assassinate a man's person than to attack his reputation."[20] According to the customary laws of the Fantis in West Africa, "where a person has been found guilty of using slanderous words, he is bound to retract his words publicly, in addition to paying a small fine by way of compensation to the aggrieved party. Words imputing witchcraft, adultery, immoral conduct, crime, and all words which sound to the disreputation of a person of whom they are spoken are actionable."[21]

[Footnote 18: _Ibid._ p. 53.]

[Footnote 19: Crawfurd, _op. cit._ iii. 119 _sq._]

[Footnote 20: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 163 _sq._]

[Footnote 21: Sarbah, _Fanti Customary Laws_, p. 94.]

Among the Aztecs of ancient Mexico he who wilfully calumniated another, thereby seriously injuring his {141} reputation, was condemned to have his lips cut off, and sometimes his ears also; whilst in Tezcuco the slanderer suffered death.[22] In the Chinese penal code a special book is provided for the prevention and punishment of opprobrious and insulting language, as "having naturally a tendency to produce quarrels and affrays."[23] Among Arabs all insulting expressions have their respective fines ascertained in the _[k.]ady_'s court.[24] It is said in the Talmud:--"Let the honour of thy neighbour be to thee like thine own. Rather be thrown into a fiery furnace than bring any one to public shame."[25]

[Footnote 22: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, ii. 463.]

[Footnote 23: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, p. 354 n.*]

[Footnote 24: Burckhardt, _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 70 _sq._]

[Footnote 25: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 57.]

The Roman Law of the Twelve Tables contained provisions against libellers,[26] and throughout the whole history of Roman law an attack upon honour or reputation was deemed a serious crime.[27] As for wrongful prosecution, which may be regarded as an aggravated form of defamation, the law of the later Empire required that any one bringing a criminal charge should bind himself to suffer in case of failure the penalty that he had endeavoured to call down upon his adversary.[28] Among Teutonic peoples defamatory words and libelling were already at an early date punished with a fine.[29] The Salic Law decrees that a person who calls a freeborn man a "fox" or a "hare" or a "dirty fellow," or says that he has thrown away his shield, must pay him three solidi;[30] whilst, according to one text of the same law, it cost 188 solidi (or nearly as much as was paid for the murder of a Frankish freeman)[31] to call a freeborn woman a witch or a harlot, in case the truth of the charge could not be proved.[32] {142} The oldest English laws exacted _bót_ and _wíte_ from persons who attacked others with abusive words.[33] In the thirteenth century, in almost every action before an English local court, the plaintiff claimed compensation not only for the "damage," but also for the "shame" which had been done him.[34] We further find that regular actions for defamation were common in the local courts; whereas in later days the ecclesiastical procedure against defamatory speech seems to have been regarded as the usual, if not the only, engine which could be brought to bear upon cases of libel and slander.[35] In England, as in Rome, there was a strong feeling that men should not make charges which they could not prove: before the Conquest a person might lose his tongue, or have to redeem it with his full _wer_, if he brought a false and scandalous accusation; and under Edward I. a statute decreed that if the appellee was acquitted his accuser should lie in prison for a year and pay damages by way of recompense for the imprisonment and infamy which he had brought upon the innocent.[36]

[Footnote 26: _Lex Duodecim Tabularum_, viii. 1.]

[Footnote 27: _Digesta_, xlvii. 10. 15. 25. _Codex Justinianus_, ix. 36. Hunter, _Exposition of Roman Law_, p. 1069 _sq._ Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 794 _sq._]

[Footnote 28: Günther, _Die Idee der Wiedervergeltung_, i. 141 _sqq._ Mommsen, _op. cit._ p. 496 _sq._]

[Footnote 29: Wilda, _Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 776 _sqq._ Nordström, _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_, ii. 293 _sqq._ Stemann, _Den

danske Retshistorie indtil Christian V.'s Lov_, p. 686 _sq._ Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 672 _sqq._]

[Footnote 30: _Lex Salica_, xxx. 4, 5, 2; Hessel's edition, col. 181 _sqq._]

[Footnote 31: _Ibid._ xv. col. 91 _sqq._]

[Footnote 32: _Ibid._ lxvii. 2, col. 403.]

[Footnote 33: _Laws of Hlothhaere and Eadric_, 11.]

[Footnote 34: Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law till the Time of Edward I._ ii. 537.]

[Footnote 35: _Ibid._ ii. 538. Stephen, _History of the Criminal Law of England_, ii. 409.]

[Footnote 36: Pollock and Maitland, _op. cit._ ii. 539.]

The condemnation of an insult is greatly influenced by the _status_ of, or the relations between, the parties concerned. Among the Goajiro Indians of Colombia a poor man may be insulted with impunity, when the same treatment to a rich man would cause certain bloodshed.[37] In Nias an affront is punished with a fine, which varies according to the rank of the parties.[38] The Chinese penal code lays down that a person who is guilty of addressing abusive language to his or her father or mother, or father's parents, or a wife who rails at her husband's parents or grandparents, shall be strangled;[39] and the same punishment is prescribed for a slave who abuses his master.[40] {143} According to the Laws of Manu, a Kshatriya shall be fined one hundred _panas_ for defaming a Brâhmana, a Vaisya shall be fined one hundred and fifty or two hundred _panas_, and a Sûdra shall suffer corporal punishment; whereas a Brâhmana shall pay only fifty _panas_ for defaming a Kshatriya, twenty-five for defaming a Vaisya, and twelve for defaming a Sûdra.[41] In ancient Teutonic law the fines for insulting behaviour were graduated according to the rank of the person offended.[42] The starting-point of the Roman law was that an _injuria_--which was pre-eminently an affront to the dignity of the person--could not be done to a slave as such, only to the master through the medium of his slave;[43] and even in later times, in the case of trifling injuries, such as mere verbal insults, the master had no action, unless by leave of the Praetor, or unless the insult were meant for the master himself.[44] These and similar variations spring from the same causes as do corresponding variations in the case of other injuries dealt with above. But there are also special reasons why social superiority or inferiority influences moral opinions concerning offences against persons self-regarding pride. The respect due to a man is closely connected with his station, and in the case of defamation the injury suffered by the loss of honour or reputation is naturally proportionate to the esteem in which the offended party is held. At the same time the harmfulness of an insult also depends upon the reputation of the person who offers it. According to the Gotlands Lag, one of the ancient provincial laws of Sweden, a slave can not only be insulted with impunity, but has himself to pay no fine for insulting another person[45]--obviously because he was too degraded a being to be able to detract from anybody's honour or good name.

[Footnote 37: Simons, 'Exploration of the Goajira Peninsula,' in _Proceed. Roy. Geo. Soc._ N.S. vii. 786.]

[Footnote 38: von Rosenberg, _Der malayische Archipel_, p. 167.]

[Footnote 39: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. cccxxix. p. 357.]

[Footnote 40: _Ibid._ sec. cccxxvii. p. 356.]

[Footnote 41: _Laws of Manu_, viii. 267 _sq._ _Cf._ _Gautama_, xii. 8 _sqq._ It is also said that "a once-born man (a Sûdra), who insults a twice-born man with gross invective, shall have his tongue cut out; for he is of low origin" (_ibid._ viii. 270. See also _Institutes of Vishnu_, v. 23; _Gautama_, xii. 1; _Âpastamba_, ii. 10. 27. 14).]

[Footnote 42: Keyser, _Efterladte Skrifter_, ii. pt. i. 295.]

[Footnote 43: Hunter, _Exposition of Roman Law_, p. 164. Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 786, n. 3.]

[Footnote 44: _Digesta_, xlvii. 10. 15. 35. Hunter, _op. cit._ p. 165.]

[Footnote 45: _Gotlands-Lagen_, i. 19. 37.]

{144} The condemnation of such conduct as is offensive to other persons' self-regarding pride includes condemnation of pride itself, when displayed in an excessive degree; whereas the opposite disposition--modesty--which implies regard for other people's "self-feeling," is praised as a virtue. The Fijians say of a boasting person, "You are like the _kaka_ (parrot); you only speak to shout your own name."[46] On the other hand, among the Tonga Islanders "a modest opinion of oneself is esteemed a great virtue, and is also put in practice."[47] Confucius taught that humility belongs to the characteristics of a superior man.[48] Such a man, he said, is modest in his speech, though he exceeds in his actions;[49] he has dignified ease without pride, whereas the mean man has pride without a dignified ease;[50] he prefers the concealment of his virtue, when it daily becomes more illustrious, whereas the mean man seeks notoriety when he daily goes more and more to ruin.[51] So also humility has a distinguished place in the teachings of Lao-tsze:--"I have three precious things which I hold fast and prize, namely, compassion, economy, and humility"; "He who knows the glory, and at the same time keeps to shame, will be the whole world's valley . . . , eternal virtue will fill him, and he will return home to Taou."[52] In the Book of the Dead the soul of the ancient Egyptian pleads, "I am not swollen with pride."[53] According to Zoroastrianism, the sin of pride has been created by Ahriman.[54] Overbearingness was censured in ancient Scandinavia,[55] Greece,[56] and Rome. During our prosperity, says Cicero, "we ought with great care to {145} avoid pride and arrogance."[57] The Hebrew prophets condemned not only pride but eminence, because an eminent man is apt to be proud.[58] We read in the Talmud:--"He who humiliates himself will be lifted up; he who raises himself up will be humiliated. Whosoever runs after greatness, greatness runs away from him; he who runs from greatness, greatness follows him."[59] Christianity enjoined humility as a cardinal duty in every man.[60] In the Koran it is said, "God loves not him who is proud, and boastful."[61] Pride has thus come to be stigmatised not only as a vice, but as a sin of great magnitude. One reason for this is that it is regarded as even more offensive to the "self-feeling" of a great god or the Supreme Being than it is to that of a man. But pride must also appear as irreligious arrogance to those who maintain that man is by nature altogether corrupt, and that everything good in him is a gift of God.[62]

[Footnote 46: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 107.]

[Footnote 47: Mariner, _op. cit._ ii. 164.]

[Footnote 48: _Lun Yü_, v. 15. _Chung Yung_, xxvii. 7.]

[Footnote 49: _Lun Yü_, xiv. 29.]

[Footnote 50: _Ibid._ xiii. 26. _Cf._ _ibid._ xx. 2. 1.]

[Footnote 51: _Chung Yung_, xxxiii. 1.]

[Footnote 52: Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, p. 194 _sq._ _Tâo Teh King_, xxviii. 1.]

[Footnote 53: _Book of the Dead_, ch. 125, p. 216. _Cf._ Amélineau, _Essai sur l'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypt Ancienne_, p. 353.]

[Footnote 54: _Vendîdâd_, i. 11.]

[Footnote 55: Maurer, _Die Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes zum Christenthume_, ii. 150.]

[Footnote 56: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, i. 253. Hermann, _Lehrbuch der Griechischen Antiquitäten_, ii. pt. i. 34 _sq._ Blümner, _Ueber die Idee des Schicksals in den Tragödien des Aischylos_, p. 131.]

[Footnote 57: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 26.]

[Footnote 58: _Cf._ Kuenen, _Religion of Israel_, i. 62 _sq._]

[Footnote 59: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 58.]

[Footnote 60: _St. Matthew_, v. 11, 12, 39; vi. 25, 26, 30 _sqq._; xviii. 4; &c.]

[Footnote 61: _Koran_, iv. 40. _Cf._ Ameer Ali, _Ethics of Islâm_, p. 44.]

[Footnote 62: Manzoni, _Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica_, p. 182 _sqq._]

At the same time, whilst pride is held blamable, humility may also go too far to be approved of, and may even be an object of censure. In early ethics, as we have noticed above, revenge is enjoined as a duty and forgiveness of enemies is despised; and this is the case not only among savages.[63] The device of Chivalry was, "It is better to die than to be avenged by shame";[64] and side by side with the nominal acceptance of the Christian doctrine of absolute placability the idea still prevails, in many European countries, that an assault upon honour shall be followed by a challenge to mortal combat. Too great humility is regarded as a sign of weakness, cowardice, hypocrisy, or a defective sense of honour. We are not allowed to be indifferent to the estimation in which we are held by our neighbours. Such indifference springs either from a feeble moral constitution and absence of moral shame, or from {146} a depreciation of other people's opinions in comparison with our own, and this is offensive to their _amour-propre_. Outward humility may thus suggest inward pride and appear arrogant.

[Footnote 63: _Supra_, i. 73 _sq._]

[Footnote 64: Laurent, _Études sur l'histoire de l'Humanité_, vii. 184.]

A person's "self-feeling" may be violated in innumerable ways, by words and deeds. Almost any deviation from what is usual may arouse a suspicion of arrogance. This largely accounts for the fact mentioned in a previous chapter that habits have a tendency to become true customs, that is, rules of duty. Transgressions of the established forms of social intercourse are particularly apt to be offensive to people's self-regarding pride. Many of these forms originated in a desire to please, but by becoming habitual they at the same time became obligatory. Politeness is a duty rather than a virtue.

There is probably no people on earth which does not recognise some rules of politeness. Many savages are conspicuous for their civility.[65] It has been observed that Christian missionaries working among uncivilised races often are in manners much inferior to those they are teaching, and thus lower the native standard of refinement.[66] The Samoans, we are told, "are a nation of gentlemen," and contrast most favourably with the generality of Europeans who come amongst them.[67] On their first intercourse with Europeans, the Maoris "always manifest a degree of politeness which would do honour to a more civilised people"; but by continued intercourse they lose a great part of this characteristic.[68] Among the Fijians "the rules of politeness are minute, and receive scrupulous attention. They affect the language, and are seen in forms of salutation, in attention to strangers, at meals, in dress, and, indeed, influence their manners in-doors and {147} out. None but the very lowest are ill-behaved, and their confusion on committing themselves shows that they are not impudently so."[69] The Malagasy "are a very polite people, and look with contempt upon those who neglect the ordinary usages and salutations";[70] "even the most ragged and tattered slave possesses a natural dignity and ease of manner, which contrasts favourably with the rude conduct and boorish manners of the lower class at home."[71] Of the Point Barrow Eskimo Mr. Murdoch observes that "many of them show a grace of manner and a natural delicacy and politeness which is quite surprising"; and he mentions the instance of a young Eskimo being so polite in conversing with an American officer that "he would take pains to mispronounce his words in the same way as the latter did, so as not to hurt his feelings by correcting him bluntly."[72] The forms of Kafir politeness "are very strictly adhered to, and are many."[73] Of the Negroes of Fida Bosman wrote, "They are so civil to each other and the inferior so respectful to the superior, that at first I was very much surprised at it."[74] Monrad found the Negroes of Accra surpass many civilised people in politeness.[75] So also in Morocco even country-folks are much more civil in their general behaviour than the large majority of Europeans. "The conversations of the Arabs," says d'Arvieux, "are full of civilities; one never hears anything there that they think rude and unbecoming."[76] Politeness is a characteristic of all the great nations of the East. The Chinese have brought the practice of it "to a pitch of perfection which is not only unknown in Western lands, but, previous to experience, is unthought of and almost unimaginable. The rules of ceremony, we are reminded in the Classics, are three {148} hundred, and the rules of behaviour three thousand."[77] In Europe courtesy was recommended as the most amiable of knightly qualities; and from "the wild and overstrained courtesies of Chivalry" has been derived our present system of manners.[78]

[Footnote 65: Waitz-Gerland, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, vi. 143 _sqq._ (Polynesians). Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 195 (Efatese). Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 157. MacGregor, 'Lagos, Abeokuta and the Alake,' in _Jour. African Soc._ July, 1904, p. 466 (Yorubas).]

[Footnote 66: Brenchley, _Jottings during the Cruise of H.M.S. 'Curaçoa' among the South Sea Islands_, p. 349.]

[Footnote 67: Hood, _Cruise in H.M.S. 'Fawn' in the Western Pacific_, p. 59 _sq._]

[Footnote 68: Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 108 _sqq._ See also Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 53 _sqq._]

[Footnote 69: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 129. _Cf._ _ibid._ pp. 128, 131 _sq._; Anderson, _Notes of Travel in Fiji_, p. 135.]

[Footnote 70: Sibree, _The Great African Island_, p. 325.]

[Footnote 71: Little, _Madagascar_, p. 71.]

[Footnote 72: Murdoch, 'Ethn. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 42.]

[Footnote 73: Leslie, _Among the Zulus and Amatongas_, p. 203.]

[Footnote 74: Bosman, _Description of the Coast of Guinea_, p. 317.]

[Footnote 75: Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 9.]

[Footnote 76: d'Arvieux, _Travels in Arabia the Desart_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 77: Smith, _Chinese Characteristics_, p. 35.]

[Footnote 78: _Ordre of Chyualry_, fol. 46. Robertson, _History of the Reign of Charles V._ i. 84. Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, iv. 211. Turner, _History of England_, iii. 473. Mills, _History of Chivalry_, i. 161 _sq._ Scott, 'Essay on Chivalry,' in _Miscellaneous Prose Works_, vi. 58.]

The rules of politeness and good manners refer to all sorts of social intercourse and vary indefinitely in detail. They tell people how to sit or stand in each other's presence, or how to pass through a door; a Zulu would be fined for going out of a hut back first.[79] They prescribe how to behave at a meal; the Indians of British Columbia consider it improper to talk on such an occasion,[80] and it appears that in England also, in the fifteenth century, "people did not hold conversation while eating, but that the talk and mirth began with the liquor."[81] Politeness demands that a person should never interrupt another while speaking;[82] or that he should avoid contradicting a statement;[83] or, not infrequently, that he should rather tell a pleasant untruth than an unpleasant truth.[84] At times it requires the use of certain phrases, words of thanks, flattery, or expressions of self-humiliation. In Chinese there is "a whole vocabulary of words which are indispensable to one who wishes to pose as a 'polite' person, words in which whatever belongs to the speaker is treated with scorn and contempt, and whatever relates to the person addressed is honourable. The 'polite' Chinese will refer to his wife, if driven to the extremity of referring {149} to her at all, as his 'dull thorn,' or in some similar elegant figure of speech."[85]

[Footnote 79: Tyler, _Forty Years among the Zulus_, p. 190 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: Woldt, _Kaptein Jacobsens Reiser til Nordamerikas Nordvestkyst_, p. 99.]

[Footnote 81: Wright, _Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages_, p. 396.]

[Footnote 82: Domenech, _Seven Years Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 72. Richardson, _Arctic Searching Expedition_, i. 385 (Kutchin). Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 157. Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 136 _sq._ d'Arvieux, _op. cit._ p. 139 _sq._; Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iii. 259 (Bedouins).]

[Footnote 83: Nansen, _First Crossing of Greenland_, ii. 334 _sq._; Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 157 (Greenlanders). Dobrizhofifer, _op. cit._ ii. 137 (Abipones). d'Arvieux, _op. cit._ p. 141 (Bedouins).]

[Footnote 84: _Supra_, ii. 111.]

[Footnote 85: Smith, _Chinese Characteristics_, p. 274.]

Politeness enjoins the performance of certain ceremonies upon persons who meet or part. The custom of salutation is of world-wide prevalence, though there are certain savages who are said to have no greetings except when they have learnt the practice from the whites.[86] As a ceremony prescribed by public opinion it is an obligatory tribute paid to another person's "self-feeling," whatever be the original nature of the act which has been adopted for the purpose. The form of salutation has sometimes been borrowed from questions springing from curiosity or suspicion. Among the Californian Miwok, when anybody meets a stranger he generally salutes him, "Whence do you come? What are you at?"[87] The Abipones "would think it quite contrary to the laws of good-breeding, were they to meet any one and not ask him where he was going";[88] and a similar question is also a very common mode of greeting among the Berbers of Southern Morocco. Very frequently a salutation consists of some phrase which is expressive of goodwill. It may be an inquiry about the other person's health or welfare, as the English "How are you?" "How do you do?" Among the Burmese two relatives or friends who meet begin a conversation by the expressions, "Are you well? I am well," if they have been some time separated; whereas those who are daily accustomed to meet say, "Where are you going?"[89] The Moors ask, "What is your news?" or, "Is nothing wrong?" The ordinary salutation of the Zulus is, "I see you, are you well?" after which the snuffbox, the token of friendship, is passed round.[90] Among several tribes of California, again, a person when greeting another {150} simply utters a word which means "friendship."[91]

The goodwill is often directly expressed in the form of a wish, like our "Good day!" "Good night!" Among the Hebrews the salutation at meeting or entering another's house seems at first to have consisted most commonly in an inquiry after mutual welfare,[92] but in later times "Health!" or "Peace to thee!" became the current greeting.[93] According to the Laws of Manu, a Brâhmana should be saluted, "May thou be long-lived, O gentle one!"[94] The Greeks said [Greek: chai=re] ("Be joyful!"); the Romans, _Salve!_ ("Be in health!") especially on meeting, and _Vale!_ ("Be well!") on parting. The good wish may have the form of a prayer. The Moors say, "May God give thee peace!" "May God give thee a good night!" and the English "Good-bye" and the French _Adieu_ are prayers curtailed by the progress of time. But there is no foundation for Professor Wundt's assertion that "the words employed in greeting are one and all prayer formulæ in a more or less rudimentary state."[95] A salutation may, finally, be a verbal profession of subjection, as the Swedish "Ödmjukaste tjänare," that is, (I am your) "most humble servant."

[Footnote 86: Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 177. Dall, _op. cit._ p. 397 (Aleuts). Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 125; Rink, _Danish Greenland_, p. 223; Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 157 (Greenlanders). Prescott, in Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, iii. 244 (Dacotahs). Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, pp. 230 (Kumi), 256 (Kukis).]

[Footnote 87: Powers, _Tribes of California_, p. 347.]

[Footnote 88: Dobrizhoffer, _op. cit._ ii. 138.]

[Footnote 89: Forbes, _British Burma_, p. 69.]

[Footnote 90: Tyler, _op. cit._ p. 190.]

[Footnote 91: Powers, _op. cit._ p. 58.]

[Footnote 92: _Genesis_, xliii. 27. _Exodus_, xviii. 7.]

[Footnote 93: _Judges_, xix. 20. _1 Chronicles_, xii. 18. _Cf._ Keil, _Manual of Biblical Archæology_, ii. 183.]

[Footnote 94: _Laws of Manu_, ii. 125.]

[Footnote 95: Wundt, _Ethik_, p. 179.]

Salutations may consist not only in words spoken, but in conventional gestures, either accompanied by some verbal expression or performed silently.[96] They may be tokens of submission or reverence, as cowering, crouching, and bowing. Or they may originally have been signs of disarming or defencelessness, as uncovering some particular portion of the body. Von Jhering suggests that the offering of the hand belongs to the same group of salutations, its object being to indicate that the other person has nothing to fear;[97] but in many cases at least handshaking seems to have the same origin as other ceremonies consisting {151} in bodily contact. Salutatory gestures may express not only absence of evil intentions but positive friendliness; among respectable Moors it is a common mode of greeting that each party places his right hand on his heart to indicate, as Jackson puts it, "that part to be the residence of the friend."[98] Various forms of salutation by contact, such as clasping, embracing, kissing, and sniffing, are obviously direct expressions of affection;[99] and we can hardly doubt that the joining of hands serves a similar object when we find it combined with other tokens of goodwill. Among some of the Australian natives, friends, on meeting after an absence, "will kiss, shake hands, and sometimes cry over one another."[100] In Morocco equals salute each other by joining their hands with a quick motion, separating them immediately, and kissing each his own hand. The Soolimas, again, place the palms of the right hands together, carry them then to the forehead, and from thence to the left side of the chest.[101] But bodily union is also employed as a method of transferring either blessings or conditional curses, and it seems probable that certain salutatory acts have vaguely or distinctly such transference in view. Among the Masai, who spit on each other both when they meet and when they part, spitting "expresses the greatest goodwill and the best of wishes";[102] and in a previous chapter I have endeavoured to show that the object of certain reception ceremonies is to transfer a conditional curse to the stranger who is received as a guest.[103] On the same principle as underlies these ceremonies, handshaking may be a means of joining in compact, analogous to a common meal[104] and the blood-covenant.[105]

[Footnote 96: See Tylor, 'Salutations,' in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, xxi. 235 _sqq._; Ling Roth, 'Salutations,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xix. 166 _sqq._]

[Footnote 97: von Jhering, _Der Zweck im Recht_, ii. 649 _sqq._]

[Footnote 98: Jackson, _Account of Timbuctoo, &c._ p. 235.]

[Footnote 99: See _infra_, on the Origin and Development of the Altruistic Sentiment.]

[Footnote 100: Hackett, 'Ballardong or Ballerdokking Tribe,' in Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 343.]

[Footnote 101: Laing, _Travels in the Timannee, Kooranko, and Soolima Countries_, p. 368.]

[Footnote 102: Thomson, _Through Masai Land_, p. 166.]

[Footnote 103: _Supra_, i. 590 _sq._]

[Footnote 104: _Supra_, i. 587.]

[Footnote 105: See _infra_, on the Origin and Development of the Altruistic Sentiment.]

Being an homage rendered to other persons self-regarding {152} pride, the rule of politeness is naturally most exacting in relation to superiors. Many of its forms have, in fact, originated in humble or respectful behaviour towards rulers, masters, or elders, and, often in a modified shape, become common between equals after they have lost their original meaning.[106] It has been noticed that the cruelty of despots always engenders politeness, whereas the freest nations are generally the rudest in manners.[107] Politeness is further in a special degree shown by men to women, not only among ourselves, but even among many savages;[108] in this case courtesy is connected with courtship. Strangers or remote acquaintances, also, have particular claims to be treated with civility, whereas politeness is of little moment in the intercourse of friends; it imitates kindness, and is resorted to where the genuine feeling is wanting.[109] And in the capacity of guest, the stranger is often for the time being flattered with exquisite marks of honour, for reasons which have been stated in another connection.

[Footnote 106: See Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, ii. 'Ceremonial Institutions,' _passim_.]

[Footnote 107: Johnston, _Uganda_, ii. 685.]

[Footnote 108: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur Ethn._ iii. 270. Chanler, _Through Jungle and Desert_, p. 485 (Wakamba). See also _supra_, i. ch. xxvi.]

[Footnote 109: _Cf._ Tucker, _Light of Nature_, ii. 599 _sqq._; Joubert, _Pensées_, i. 243.]

CHAPTER XXXIII

REGARD FOR OTHER PERSONS' HAPPINESS IN GENERAL--GRATITUDE--PATRIOTISM AND COSMOPOLITANISM

IN previous chapters we have dealt with moral ideas concerning various modes of conduct which have reference to other men's welfare--to their life or bodily comfort, their liberty, property, knowledge of truth, or self-regarding pride. But the list of duties which we owe to our fellow-creatures is as yet by no means complete. Any act, forbearance, or omission, which in some way or other diminishes or increases their happiness may on that account become a subject of moral blame or praise, being apt to call forth sympathetic retributive emotions.

To do good to others is a rule which has been inculcated by all the great teachers of morality. According to Confucius, benevolence is the root of righteousness and a leading characteristic of perfect virtue.[1] In the Taouist 'Book of Secret Blessings' men are enjoined to be compassionate and loving, and to devote their wealth to the good of their fellow-men.[2] The moralists of ancient India teach that we should with our life, means, understanding, and speech, seek to advance the welfare of other creatures in this world; that we should do so without expecting reciprocity; and that we should enjoy the prosperity of others even though ourselves unprosperous.[3] The writers {154} of classical antiquity repeatedly give expression to the idea that man is not born for himself alone, but should assist his fellow-men to the best of his ability.[4] In the Old Testament we meet with the injunction, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself";[5] and this was declared by Christ to be of equal importance with the commandment, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God."[6]

[Footnote 1: _Lun Yü_, xvii. 6. Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, p. 108.]

[Footnote 2: Douglas, _op. cit._ p. 272 _sq._]

[Footnote 3: Muir, _Religious and Moral Sentiments rendered from Sanskrit Writers_, p. 107 _sq._ Monier Williams, _Indian Wisdom_, p. 448.]

[Footnote 4: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 275 _sqq._]

[Footnote 5: _Leviticus_, xix. 18.]

[Footnote 6: _St. Matthew_, xxii. 39.]

To a reflecting mind it is obvious that the moral value of beneficence exclusively lies in the benevolent motive, and that there is nothing praiseworthy in promoting the happiness of others from selfish considerations. Confucius taught that self must be conquered before a man can be perfectly virtuous.[7] According to Lao-tsze, self-abnegation is the cardinal rule for both the sovereign and the people.[8] Self-denial is the chief demand of the Gospel, and is emphasised as a supreme duty by Islam.[9] Generally speaking, the merit attached to a good action is proportionate to the self-denial which it costs the agent. This follows from the nature of moral approval in its capacity of a retributive emotion, as is proved by the fact that the degree of gratitude felt towards a benefactor is in a similar way influenced by the deprivation to which he subjects himself. On the other hand, there is considerable variety of opinion, even among ourselves, as to the dictates of duty, in cases where our own interests conflict with those of our fellow-men. To Professor Sidgwick it is a moral axiom that "I ought not to prefer my own lesser good to the greater good of another."[10] According to Hutcheson, we do not condemn those as evil who will not sacrifice their private interest to the advancement of the positive good of others, "unless the private interest be very small, and the publick good very great."[11]

[Footnote 7: _Lun Yü_, xii. i. 1.]

[Footnote 8: Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, p. 192.]

[Footnote 9: Ameer Ali, _Ethics of Islâm_, p. 32.]

[Footnote 10: Sidgwick, _Methods of Ethics_, p. 383.]

[Footnote 11: Hutcheson, _Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions, &c._ p. 312.]

The idea that it is bad to cause harm to others and {155} good or obligatory to promote their happiness, is in different ways influenced by the relationship between the parties; and to many cases it does not apply at all. We have previously noticed that according to early ethics an enemy is a proper object of hatred, not of love;[12] and according to more advanced ideas a person who treats us badly has at all events little claim upon our kindness. The very opposite is the case with a benefactor or friend. To requite a benefit, or to be grateful to him who bestows it, is probably everywhere, at least under certain circumstances, regarded as a duty. This is a subject which in the present connection calls for special consideration.

[Footnote 12: _Supra_, i. p. 73 _sq._]

The duty of gratefulness presupposes a disposition for gratitude.[13] According to travellers' accounts, this feeling is lacking in many uncivilised races.[14] Lyon writes of the Eskimo of Igloolik:--"Gratitude is not only rare, but absolutely unknown amongst them, either by action, word, or look, beyond the first outcry of satisfaction. Nursing their sick, burying the dead, clothing and feeding the whole tribe, furnishing the men with weapons, and the women and children with ornaments, are insufficient to awaken a grateful feeling, and the very people who relieved their distresses when starving are laughed at in time of plenty for the quantity and quality of the food which was bestowed in charity."[15] Various other tribes in {156} North America have been accused of ingratitude;[16] and of some South American savages we are told that they evinced no thankfulness for the presents which were given them.[17] The Fijians are described as utterly indifferent to their benefactors. The Rev. Th. Williams writes:--"If one of them, when sick, obtained medicine from me, he thought me bound to give him food; the reception of food he considered as giving him a claim on me for covering; and, that being secured, he deemed himself at liberty to beg anything he wanted, and abuse me if I refused his unreasonable request."[18] Mr. Lumholtz had a similar experience with regard to the natives of Herbert River, Northern Queensland:--"If you give one thing to a black man, he finds ten other things to ask for, and he is not ashamed to ask for all that you have, and more too. He is never satisfied. Gratitude does not exist in his breast."[19] In several languages there is no word expressive of what we term gratitude or no phrase corresponding to our "thank you";[20] and on this fact much stress has been {157} laid, the deficiency of language being regarded as an indication of a corresponding deficiency in feelings.

[Footnote 13: For the definition of gratitude, see _supra_, i. 93.]

[Footnote 14: Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamischatka_, p. 292. Bergmann, _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_, ii. 310, 316. Foreman, _Philippine Islands_, p. 183. Modigliani, _Viaggio a Nías_, p. 467. Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 286 (Malays). Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 207 (Malays of Sumatra). Forbes, _A Naturalist's Wanderings in the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 320 (natives of Timor-laut). Mrs. Forbes, _Insulinde_, p. 178 (natives of Ritabel). Hagen, _Unter den Papua's_, p. 266 (Papuans of Bogadjim). Romilly, _Western Pacific and New Guinea_, p. 239. La Pérouse, _Voyage round the World_, ii. 109 (Samoans). Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, p. 48; Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 110. Ling Roth, _Aborigines of Tasmania_, p. 63. Gason, 'Manners and Customs of the Dieyerie Tribe,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 258. Baker, _Albert N'yanza_, i. 242 (Latukas), 289 (Negroes), von François, _Nama und Damara_, p. 191 (Herero).]

[Footnote 15: Lyon, _Private Journal during the Voyage of Discovery under Captain Parry_, p. 348 _sq._ See also Parry, _Journal of a Second Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage_, p. 524 _sq._]

[Footnote 16: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 174. Sarytschew, 'Voyage of Discovery to the North-East of Siberia,' in _Collection of Modern Voyages_, vi. 78 (Aleuts). Harmon, _Voyages and Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 291 (Tacullies). Heriot, _Travels through the Canadas_, p. 319. Lafitau, _M[oe]urs des sauvages ameriquains_, i. 106. Burton, _City of the Saints_, p. 125 (Sioux and prairie tribes generally).]

[Footnote 17: von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 228, 241 _sq._ (Coroados). Stokes, quoted by King and Fitzroy, _Voyages of the 'Adventure' and 'Beagle,'_ i. 77 (Fuegians).]

[Footnote 18: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 111. See also Anderson, _Notes of Travel in Fiji and New Caledonia_, pp. 124, 131.]

[Footnote 19: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 20: Southey, _History of Brazil_, iii. 399 (Abipones, Guaranies). Hearne, _Journey to the Northern Ocean_, p. 307 (Northern Indians). Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 192 (Toungtha). Foreman, _op. cit._ p. 182 _sq._ (Bisayans). Modigliani, _Viaggio a Nías_, p. 467. Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 74 (Dyaks). Chalmers, _Pioneering in New Guinea_, p. 187; Romilly, _Western Pacific and New Guinea_, p. 239 _sq._ (However, Mr Romilly's statement that "in all the known New Guinea languages there is not even a word for 'thank you,'" is not quite correct, as appears from Chalmers _op. cit._ p. 187.) Wilson, _Missionary Voyage to the Southern Pacific Ocean_, p. 365; Waitz-Gerland, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, vi. 116 (Tahitians). Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 48 (Maoris). New, _Life and Labours in Eastern Africa_, p. 100 (Wanika). von François, _op. cit._ p. 191 (Herero). In the Vedic language, also, there was no word for "thanks" (Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 305); and many Eastern languages of the present day lack an equivalent for "thank you" (Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 81, n. _a_.; Pool, _Studies in Muhammedanism_, p. 176; Polak, _Persien_, i. 9). When one of the missionaries in India was engaged in the translation of the Scriptures into Bengali, he found no common word in that language suitable to express the idea of gratitude (Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 397).]

Here again we must distinguish between a traveller's actual experience and the conclusions which he draws from it; and it seems that in many cases our authorities have been too ready to charge savages with a total lack of grateful feelings, because they have been wanting in gratitude on certain occasions. It is too much to expect that a savage should show himself thankful to any stranger who gives him a present. Speaking of the Ahts of British Columbia, Mr Sproat remarks that the Indian's suspicion prevents a ready gratitude, as he is prone to see, in apparent kindness extended to him, some under-current of selfish motive. "He is accustomed, among his own people, to gifts made for purposes of guile, and also to presents made merely to show the greatness and richness of the giver; but, I imagine," our author adds, "when the Aht ceases to suspect such motives--when he does not detect pride, craft, or carelessness--he is grateful, and probably grateful in proportion to the trouble taken to serve him."[21] As for the ingratitude of the Northern Queensland natives, Mr. Lumholtz himself admits that "they assume that the gift is bestowed out of fear";[22] and of the New Zealanders we are told that their total want of gratitude was particularly due to the fact that "no New Zealander ever did any kindness, or gave anything, to another, without mainly having an eye to himself in the transaction."[23] Moreover, gratitude often requires not only the absence of a selfish motive in the benefactor, but some degree of self-sacrifice. "A person," says Mr. Sproat, "may keep an Indian from starving all the winter through, yet, when summer comes, very likely he will not walk a yard for his preserver without payment. The savage does not, in this instance, {158} recognise any obligation; but thinks that a person who had so much more than he could himself consume might well, and without any claim for after services, part with some of it for the advantage of another in want."[24] Mr. Powers makes a similar observation with reference to the aborigines of California:--"White men," he says, "who have had dealings with Indians, in conversation with me have often bitterly accused them of ingratitude. 'Do everything in your power for an Indian,' they say, 'and he will accept it all as a matter of course; but for the slightest service you require of him he will demand pay.' These men do not enter into the Indian's ideas. This 'ingratitude' is really an unconscious compliment to our power. The savage feels, vaguely, the unapproachable elevation on which the American stands above him. He feels that we had much and he had little, and we took away from him even his little. In his view giving does not impoverish us, nor withholding enrich us. Gratitude is a sentiment not in place between master and slave; it is a sentiment for equals. The Indians are grateful to one another."[25] Nor are men very apt to feel grateful for benefits to which they consider themselves to have a right. Thus, according to Mr. Howitt, the want of gratitude among the South Australian Kurnai for kindnesses shown them by the whites is due to the principle of community, which is so strong a feature of the domestic and social life of these aborigines. "For a supply of food, or for nursing when sick, the Kurnai would not feel grateful to his family group. There would be a common obligation upon all to share food, and to afford personal aid and succour. This principle would also come into play as regards the simple personal property they possess, and would extend to the before-unknown articles procured from the whites. The food, the clothes, the medical attendance which the Kurnai receive from the whites, they take in the accustomed manner; and, in addition to {159} this, we must remember that the donors are regarded as having unlimited resources. They cannot be supposed by the Kurnai to be doing anything but giving out of their abundance."[26] Mr. Guppy found the same principle at work among the Solomon Islanders:--"Often when during my excursions I have come upon some man who was preparing a meal for himself and his family, I have been surprised at the open-handed way in which he dispensed the food to my party of hungry natives. No gratitude was shown towards the giver, who apparently expected none."[27] It has also been observed that the want of gratitude with which Arabs have often been charged by Europeans has arisen "from the very common practice of hospitality and generosity, and from the prevailing opinion that these virtues are absolute duties which it would be disgraceful and sinful to neglect."[28]

[Footnote 21: Sproat, _Scenes and Studies of Savage Life_, p. 165 _sq._]

[Footnote 22: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 159.]

[Footnote 23: Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 48.]

[Footnote 24: Sproat, _op. cit._ p. 165 _sq._]

[Footnote 25: Powers, _Tribes of California_, p. 411.]

[Footnote 26: Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, p. 257.]

[Footnote 27: Guppy, _Solomon Islands_, p. 127.]

[Footnote 28: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 298. See also Burton, _Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah and Meccah_, i. 51.]

We should further remember that savages often take care not to display their emotions. Among the Melanesians, according to Dr. Codrington, "it is not the custom to say anything by way of thanks; it is rather improper to show emotion when anything is given, or when friends meet again; silence with the eyes cast down is the sign of the inward trembling or shyness which they feel, or think they ought to feel, under these circumstances. There is no lack of a word which may be fairly translated 'thank'; and certainly no one who has given cause for it will say that Melanesians have no gratitude; others probably are ready enough to say it."[29] Of the North American Chippewas Major Strickland writes:--"If an Indian makes a present, it is always expected that one equally valuable should be given in return. No matter what you give them, or how valuable or rich the present, they seldom betray the least emotion or appearance of gratitude, it being considered beneath the dignity of a red man to betray his feelings. For all this seeming indifference, {160} they are in reality as grateful, and, I believe, even more so than our own peasantry."[30] The Aleuts also, although they are chary of expressions of thanks, "do not forget kindness, and endeavour to express their thankfulness by deeds. If anyone assists an Aleut, and afterwards offends him, he does not forget the former favour, and in his mind it often cancels the offence."[31] From the want of a word for a feeling we must not conclude that the feeling itself is wanting. Mr. Sproat observes:--"The Ahts have, it is true, no word for gratitude, but a defect in language does not absolutely imply defect in heart; and the Indian who, in return for a benefit received, says, with glistening eyes, that his heart is good towards his benefactor, expresses his gratitude quite as well perhaps as the English man who says 'Thank you.'"[32]

[Footnote 29: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 354.]

[Footnote 30: Strickland, _Twenty-seven Years in Canada West_, ii. 58.]

[Footnote 31: Veniaminof, quoted by Dall, _Alaska_, p. 395.]

[Footnote 32: Sproat, _op. cit._ p. 165. See also Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 74 (Dyaks).]

It is not surprising, then, that in various cases a people which to one traveller appears to be quite destitute of gratitude is by another described as being by no means lacking in this feeling;[33] and sometimes contradictory statements are made even by the same writer. Thus Mr. Lumholtz, who gives such a gloomy picture of the character of the Northern Queensland natives, nevertheless tells us of a native who, though himself very hungry, threw the animals which the traveller had shot for him to an old man--his wife's uncle--whom they met, in order to give some proof of the gratitude he owed the person from whom he had received his wife;[34] and regarding the Fijians Mr. Williams himself states that thanks for presents "are always expressed aloud, and generally with a kind wish for the giver."[35] As we have noticed before, retributive kindly emotions, of which gratitude is only the most developed form, are commonly found among gregarious animals, social affection being not only a friendly {161} sentiment towards another individual, but towards an individual who is conceived of as a friend.[36] And it is all the more difficult to believe in the absolute want of gratitude in some savage races, as the majority of them--to judge from my collection of facts--are expressly acquitted of such a defect, and several are described as remarkably grateful for benefits bestowed upon them.

[Footnote 33: _E.g._, the Fuegians, Sioux, Ahts, Aleuts, Kamchadales, Tasmanians, Zulus (see _supra_ and _infra_).]

[Footnote 34: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 221.]

[Footnote 35: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 132.]

[Footnote 36: _Supra_, i. 94.]

The Fuegians use the word _chapakouta_, which means glad, satisfied, affectionate, grateful, to express thanks.[37] Jemmy Button, the young Fuegian who was brought to England on board the _Beagle_, gave proofs of sincere gratitude;[38] and Admiral Fitzroy also mentions a Patagonian boy who appeared thankful for kindness shown to him.[39] Of the Mapuchés of Chili Mr. E. R. Smith observes:--"Whatever present is made, or favour conferred, is considered as something to be returned; and the Indian never fails, though months and years may intervene, to repay what he conscientiously thinks an exact equivalent for the thing received."[40] The Botocudos do not readily forget kind treatment;[41] and the Tupis "were a grateful race, and remembered that they had received gifts, after the giver had forgotten it."[42] The Guiana Indians "are grateful for any kindness."[43] The Navahos of New Mexico have a word for thanks, and employ it on all occasions which we would consider appropriate.[44] The Sioux "evinced the warmest gratitude to any who had ever displayed kind feelings towards them."[45] In his 'Voyages from Montreal to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans,' Mackenzie mentions the gratitude shown him by a young Indian whom he had cured of a bad wound. When well enough to engage in a hunting party, the young man brought to his physician the tongue of an elk, and when they parted both he and his relatives expressed the heartiest acknowledgment for the care bestowed on him.[46] If an Aleut receives a gift he accepts it, saying _Akh!_ which means "thanks."[47] Some of the Point Barrow Eskimo visited by Mr. Murdoch "seem to feel truly {162} grateful for the benefits and gifts received, and endeavoured by their general behaviour, as well as in more substantial ways, to make some adequate return"; whereas others appeared to think only of what they might receive.[48]

[Footnote 37: Hyades and Deniker, _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn_, vii. 314.]

[Footnote 38: King and Fitzroy, _op. cit._ ii. 327.]

[Footnote 39: _Ibid._ ii. 173.]

[Footnote 40: Smith, _Araucanians_, p. 258.]

[Footnote 41: Wied-Neuwied, _Reise nach Brasilien_, ii. 16.]

[Footnote 42: Southey, _op. cit._ i. 247.]

[Footnote 43: Im Thurn, _Among the Indians of Guiana_, p. 213.]

[Footnote 44: Matthews, 'Study of Ethics among the Lower Races,' in _Journal of American Folk-Lore_, xii. 9.]

[Footnote 45: Eastman, _Dacotah_, p. ix.]

[Footnote 46: Mackenzie, _Voyages from Montreal to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans_, p. 137 _sq._]

[Footnote 47: Veniaminof, quoted by Dall, _op. cit._ p. 395.]

[Footnote 48: Murdoch, 'Ethnol. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 42. See also Seemann, _Voyage of 'Herald,'_ ii. 67 (Western Eskimo).]

Of the Tunguses it is said, "If you make them a present, they hardly thank you; but though so unpolite, they are exceedingly grateful."[49] The Jakuts never forget a benefit received; "for they not only make restitution, but recommend to their offspring the ties of friendship and gratitude to their benefactors."[50] The Veddah of Ceylon is described as very grateful for attention or assistance.[51] "A little kindly sympathy makes him an attached friend, and for his friend . . . . he will readily give his life."[52] Mr. Bennett once had an interview with two village Veddahs, and on that occasion gave them presents. Two months after a couple of elephant's tusks found their way into his front verandah at night, but the Veddahs who had brought them never gave him an opportunity to reward them. "What a lesson in gratitude and delicacy," he exclaims, "even a Veddah may teach!"[53]

[Footnote 49: Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 111.]

[Footnote 50: Sauer, _Expedition to the Northern Parts of Russia, performed by Billings_, p. 124.]

[Footnote 51: Tennent, _Ceylon_, ii. 445. Sarasin, _Forschungen auf Ceylon_, iii. 546.]

[Footnote 52: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 192.]

[Footnote 53: Pridham, _Account of Ceylon_, i. 460 _sq._]

The Alfura of Halmahera,[54] the Bataks of Sumatra,[55] and the Dyaks of Borneo[56] are praised for their grateful disposition of mind. Of the Hill Dyaks Mr. Low observes that gratitude "eminently adorns the character of these simple people, and the smallest benefit conferred upon them calls forth its vigorous and continued exercise."[57] The Motu people of New Guinea are "capable of appreciating kindness,"[58] and have words for expressing thanks.[59] Chamisso speaks highly of the gratitude evinced by the natives of Ulea, Caroline Islands:--"Any thing, a useful instrument, for example, which they have received as a gift from a friend, retains and bears among them as a lasting memorial the name of the friend who bestowed it."[60] When Professor Moseley at Dentrecasteaux Island, of the Admiralty Group, gave a hatchet as pay to his guide, according {163} to promise, the guide seemed grateful, and presented him with his own shell adze in return.[61] Though the Tahitians never return thanks nor seem to have a word in their language expressive of gratitude, they are not devoid of the feeling itself.[62] Backhouse tells us of a Tasmanian native who, having been nursed through an illness, showed many demonstrations of gratitude; and he adds that this virtue was often exhibited among these people--a statement which is corroborated by the accounts of other travellers.[63] Of the Australian aborigines Mr. Ridley writes:--"I believe they are as a people remarkably susceptible of impressions from kind treatment. They recognised me as one who sought their good, and were evidently pleased and thankful to see that I thought them worth looking after."[64] The Adelaide and Encounter Bay blacks are said to display attachment to persons who are kind to them.[65] Speaking of the Central Australian tribes, Messrs. Spencer and Gillen observe that, though they are not in the habit of showing anything like excessive gratitude on receiving gifts from the white man, they are in reality by no means incapable of that feeling;[66] and other writers report instances of gratitude displayed by natives of West Australia[67] and Queensland.[68]

[Footnote 54: Kükenthal, _Forschungsreise in den Molukken und Borneo_, i. 188.]

[Footnote 55: Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 239.]

[Footnote 56: Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 74, 76.]

[Footnote 57: Low, _Sarawak_, p. 246.]

[Footnote 58: Stone, _A Few Months in New Guinea_, p. 95.]

[Footnote 59: Chalmers, _Pioneering in New Guinea_, p. 187.]

[Footnote 60: von Kotzebue, _Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea_, iii. 214.]

[Footnote 61: Moseley, 'Inhabitants of the Admiralty Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vi. 416.]

[Footnote 62: Waitz-Gerland, _op. cit._ vi. 116.]

[Footnote 63: Ling Roth, _Aborigines of Tasmania_, pp. 47, 62, 64.]

[Footnote 64: Ridley, _Aborigines of Australia_, p. 24. See also _ibid._ p. 20 _sqq._]

[Footnote 65: Wyatt, 'Manners and Superstitions of the Adelaide and Encounter Bay Aboriginal Tribes,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 162.]

[Footnote 66: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 48 _sqq._]

[Footnote 67: Salvado, _Mémoires historiques sur l'Australie_, p. 146.]

[Footnote 68: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 44.]

Concerning the people of Madagascar the missionary Ellis writes:--"Whether the noble and generous feeling of gratitude has much place amongst the Malagasy has been questioned. Though often characterised by extreme apathy, they are certainly susceptible of tenderness of feeling, and their customs furnish various modes of testifying their sense of any acts of kindness shewn them, and their language contains many forms of speech expressive of thankfulness. The following are among those in most general use: 'May you live to grow old--may you live long--may you live sacred--may you see, or obtain, justice from the sovereign.'" Moreover, with all their expressions of thankfulness, considerable action is used: sometimes the two hands are extended open as if to make a present; or the party stoops down to the ground, and clasps the legs, or touches the knee and the feet of the person he is thanking.[69]

Ingratitude, {164} again, is expressed by many strong metaphors, such as "son of a thunderbolt," or "offspring of a wild boar."[70] The Bushmans, according to Burchell, are not incapable of gratitude.[71] The statement made by certain travellers or colonists that the Zulus are devoid of this feeling, is contradicted by Mr. Tyler, who asserts that "many instances might be related in which a thankful spirit has been manifested, and gifts bestowed for favours received."[72] The Basutos have words to express gratitude.[73] Among the Bakongo, says Mr. Ward, "evidences of gratitude are rare indeed, although occasionally one meets with this sentiment in odd guises. Once, by a happy chance, I saved a baby's life. The child was brought to me by its mother in convulsions, and I was fortunate enough to find in my medicine chest a drug that effected an almost immediate cure. Yet the service I rendered to this woman, instead of meeting with any appreciation, only procured for me the whispered reputation of being a witch." But twenty months afterwards, at midnight when all the people were sleeping, the same woman came to Mr. Ward and gave him some fowl's eggs in payment. "I come," she said, "in the darkness that my people may not know, for they would jeer at me if they knew of this gift."[74] A traveller tells us that the inhabitants of Great Benin "if given any trifles expressed their thanks."[75] Writing on the natives of Accra, Monrad states that gratitude is among the virtues of the Negroes, and induces them even to give their lives in return for benefits conferred on them.[76] The Feloops, bordering on the Gambia, "display the utmost gratitude and affection towards their benefactors."[77] As regards the Eastern Central Africans, Mr. Macdonald affirms without any hesitation that they have gratitude, "even though we define gratitude as being much more than an 'acute sense of favours to come.'"[78] The Masai and Wadshagga have "a curious habit of spitting on things or people as a compliment or sign of gratitude"[79]--originally, I presume, with a view to transferring to them a blessing. The Barea are said to be thankful for benefits.[80] According to Palgrave, "gratitude is no {165} less an Arab than a European virtue, whatever the ignorance or the prejudices of some foreigners may have affirmed to the contrary";[81] and Burckhardt says that an Arab never forgets the generosity shown to him even by an enemy.[82]

[Footnote 69: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 258. See also Rochon, _Voyage to Madagascar_, p. 56.]

[Footnote 70: Ellis, _op. cit._ i. 139 _sq._]

[Footnote 71: Burchell, _Travels in the Interior of Southern Africa_, ii. 68, 86, 447.]

[Footnote 72: Tyler, _Forty Years among the Zulus_, p. 194.]

[Footnote 73: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 306.]

[Footnote 74: Ward, _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_, p. 47 _sqq._]

[Footnote 75: Punch, quoted by Ling Roth, _Great Benin_, p. 45.]

[Footnote 76: Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 8.]

[Footnote 77: Mungo Park, _Travels in the Interior of Africa_, p. 14.]

[Footnote 78: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 10.]

[Footnote 79: Johnston, _Kilima-njaro Expedition_, p. 438.]

[Footnote 80: Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 533.]

[Footnote 81: Palgrave, quoted in Spencer's _Descriptive Sociology_, 'Asiatic Races,' p. 31.]

[Footnote 82: Burckhardt, _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 105.]

In other statements gratitude is directly represented as an object of praise, or its absence as an object of disapproval. Among the Atkha Aleuts, according to Father Yakof, gratitude to benefactors was considered a virtue.[83] Among the Omahas, if a man receives a favour and does not manifest his thankfulness, the people exclaim:--"He does not appreciate the gift! He has no manners."[84] The Kamchadales "are not only grateful for favours, but they think it absolutely necessary to make some return for a present."[85] The Chinese say that "kindness is more binding than a loan."[86] According to the 'Divine Panorama,' a well-known Taouist work, those who forget kindness and are guilty of ingratitude shall be tormented after death and "shall not escape one jot of their punishments."[87] In one of the Pahlavi texts gratitude is represented as a means of arriving at heaven, whilst ingratitude is stigmatised as a heinous sin;[88] and according to Ammian ungrateful persons were even punished by law in ancient Persia.[89] The same, we are told, was the case in Macedonia.[90] The duty of gratitude was strongly inculcated by Greek and Roman moralists.[91] Aristotle observes that we ought, as a general rule, rather to return a kindness to our benefactor than to confer a gratuitous favour upon a brother in arms, just as we ought rather to repay a loan to a creditor than to spend the same sum upon a present to a friend.[92] According to {166} Xenophon the requital of benefits is enjoined by a divine law.[93] "There is no duty more indispensable than that of returning a kindness," says Cicero; "all men detest one forgetful of a benefit."[94] Seneca calls ingratitude a most odious vice, which it is difficult to punish by law, but which we refer for judgment to the gods.[95] The ancient Scandinavians considered it dishonourable for a man to kill even an enemy in blood-revenge if he had received a benefit from him.[96]

[Footnote 83: Yakof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on the Population, &c. of Alaska_, p. 158.]

[Footnote 84: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 270.]

[Footnote 85: Dobell, _Travels in Kamtschatka_, i. 75.]

[Footnote 86: Davis, _China_, ii. 123.]

[Footnote 87: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, ii. 374 _sq._ See also _Thâi-Shang_, 4.]

[Footnote 88: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxxvi. 28; xxxvii. 6; xliii. 9.]

[Footnote 89: Ammianus Marcellinus, xxiii. 6. 81.]

[Footnote 90: Seneca, _De beneficiis_, iii. 6. 2.]

[Footnote 91: See Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 305 _sqq._]

[Footnote 92: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, x. 2. 3.]

[Footnote 93: Xenophon, _Memorabilia_, iv. 4. 24.]

[Footnote 94: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 15 (47); ii. 18 (63).]

[Footnote 95: Seneca, _De beneficiis_, iii. 6. 1 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: Maurer, _Die Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes_, ii. 174.]

We may assume that among beings capable of feeling moral emotions the general disposition to be kind to a benefactor will inevitably lead to the notion that ungrateful behaviour is wrong. Such behaviour is offensive to the benefactor; as Spinoza observes, "he who has conferred a benefit on anyone from motives of love or honour will feel pain, if he sees that the benefit is received without gratitude."[97] This by itself tends to evoke in the bystander sympathetic resentment towards the offender; but his resentment is much increased by the retributive kindliness which he is apt to feel, sympathetically, towards the benefactor. He wants to see the latter's kindness rewarded; and he is shocked by the absence of a similar desire in the very person who may be naturally expected to feel it more strongly than anybody else.

[Footnote 97: Spinoza, _Ethica_, iii. 42. A Japanese proverb says that "thankless labour brings fatigue" (Reed, _Japan_, ii. 109).]

The moral ideas concerning conduct which affects other persons' welfare vary according as the parties are members of the same or different families, or of the same or different communities. For reasons which have been stated in previous chapters parents have in this respect special duties towards their children, and children towards their parents; and a tribesman or a fellow-countryman has claims which are not shared by a foreigner. But there are duties not only to particular individuals, but also to {167} whole social aggregates. Foremost among these is the duty of patriotism.

The duty of patriotism is rooted in the patriotic sentiment, in a person's love of the social body of which he is himself a member, and which is attached to the territory he calls his country. It involves a desire to promote its welfare, a wish that it may prosper for the time being and for all future. This desire is the outcome of a variety of sentiments: of men's affection for the people among whom they live, of attachment to the places where they have grown up or spent part of their lives, of devotion to their race and language, and to the traditions, customs, laws, and institutions of the society in which they were born and to which they belong.

Genuine patriotism presupposes a power of abstraction which the lower savages can hardly be supposed to possess. But it seems to be far from unknown among uncultured peoples of a higher type. North American Indians are praised for their truly patriotic spirit, for their strong attachment to their tribe and their country.[98] Carver says of the Naudowessies:--"The honour of their tribe, and the welfare of their nation, is the first and most predominant emotion of their hearts; and from hence proceed in a great measure all their virtues and their vices. Actuated by this, they brave every danger, endure the most exquisite torments, and expire triumphing in their fortitude, not as a personal qualification, but as a national characteristic."[99]

Patriotism and public spirit were often strongly manifested by the Tahitians.[100] The Maori "loves his country and the rights of his ancestors, and he will fight for his children's land."[101] Of the Guanches of Teneriffe we are told that patriotism was {168} their chief virtue.[102] The same quality distinguishes the Yorubas of West Africa; "no race of men," says Mr. MacGregor, "could be more devoted to their country."[103] Burckhardt writes:--"As to the attachment which a Bedouin entertains for his own tribe, the deep-felt interest he takes in its power and fame, and the sacrifices of every kind he is ready to make for its prosperity--these are feelings rarely operating with equal force in any other nation; and it is with an exulting pride of conscious patriotism, not inferior to any which ennobled the history of Grecian or Helvetian republics, that an Aeneze, should he be suddenly attacked, seizes his lance, and waving it over his head exclaims, 'I am an Aeneze.'"[104]

[Footnote 98: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 378 _sq._ Heriot, _Travels through the Canadas_, p. 317. Loskiel, _History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Indians_, i. 17 (Iroquois).]

[Footnote 99: Carver, _Travels through the Interior Parts of North America_, p. 412.]

[Footnote 100: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 128.]

[Footnote 101: Angas, _Savage Life and Scenes in Australia and New Zealand_, i. 338. See also Travers, 'Life and Times of Te Rauparaha,' in _Trans. and Proceed. New Zealand Institute_, v. 22.]

[Footnote 102: Bory de St. Vincent, _Essais sur les Isles Fortunées_, p. 70.]

[Footnote 103: MacGregor, 'Lagos, Abeokuta, and the Alake,' in _Jour. African Soc._ 1904, p. 466.]

[Footnote 104: Burckhardt, _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 205.]

Many of the elements out of which patriotism proper has grown are clearly distinguishable among savages, even the very lowest. We have previously noticed the savage's attachment to members of his own community or tribe. Combined with this is his love of his native place, and of the mode of life to which he is habituated. There is a touching illustration of this feeling in the behaviour of the wild boy who had been found in the woods near Aveyron--where he had spent most part of his young life in perfect isolation from all human beings--when he, after being removed to Paris, was once taken back to the country, to the vale of Montmorence. Joy was painted in his eyes, in all the motions and postures of his body, at the view of the hills and the woods of the charming valley; he appeared more than ever restless and savage, and "in spite of the most assiduous attention that was paid to his wishes, and the most affectionate regard that was expressed for him, he seemed to be occupied only with an anxious desire of taking his flight."[105] How much greater must not the love of home be in him who has there his relatives and friends! Mr. Howitt tells us of {169} an Australian native who, on leaving his camp with him for a trip of about a week, burst into tears, saying to himself once and again, "My country, my people, I shall not see them."[106] The Veddahs of Ceylon "would exchange their wild forest life for none other, and it was with the utmost difficulty that they could be induced to quit even for a short time their favourite solitude."[107] The Stiêns of Cambodia are so strongly attached to their forests and mountains that to leave them seems almost like death.[108] Solomon Islanders not seldom die from home-sickness on their way to the Fiji or Queensland plantations.[109] The Hovas of Madagascar, when setting out on a journey, often take with them a small portion of their native earth, on which they gaze during their absence, invoking their god that they may be permitted to return to restore it to the place from which it was taken.[110] Mr. Crawfurd observes that in the Malay Archipelago the attachment to the native spot is strongest with the agricultural tribes;[111] but, though a settled life is naturally most favourable to its development, this feeling is not inconsistent with nomadism. The Nishinam, who are the most nomadic of all the Californian tribes, have very great attachment for the valley or flat which they count their home.[112]

[Footnote 105: Itard, _Account of the Discovery and Education of a Savage Man_, p. 70 _sqq._]

[Footnote 106: Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, ii. 305.]

[Footnote 107: Hartshorne, 'Weddas,' in _Indian Antiquary_, viii. 317.]

[Footnote 108: Mouhot, _Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China_, i. 243.]

[Footnote 109: Guppy, _op. cit._ p. 167.]

[Footnote 110: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 141.]

[Footnote 111: Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, i. 84.]

[Footnote 112: Powers, _op. cit._ p. 318 _sq._ For other instances of love of home among uncivilised races see von Spix and von Martius, _op. cit._ ii. 242, note (Coroados); von Kotzebue, _op. cit._ iii. 45 (Indians of California); Gibbs, _Tribes of Western Washington and North-Western Oregon_, p. 187; Elliott, _Report of the Seal Islands of Alaska_, p. 240; Hooper, _Ten Months among the Tents of the Tuski_, p. 209; von Siebold, _Aino auf der Insel Yesso_, p. 11; Mallat, _Les Philippines_, ii. 95 (Negritos); von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 194 (Bataks); Earl, _Papuans_, p. 126 (natives of Rotti, near Timor); Ling Roth, _Aborigines of Tasmania_, p. 46; Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 174; Cumming, _In the Himalayas_, p. 404 (Paharis); Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 302 (Bedawees); Tristram, _Great Sahara_, p. 193 _sq._ (Beni M'zab); Burton, _Zanzibar_, ii. 96 (Wanika); _Emin Pasha in Central Africa_, p. 315 (Monbuttu); Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 198 (Ovambo); Rowley, _Africa Unveiled_, p. 63 _sq._ (Kroos of the Grain Coast below Liberia); Price, 'Quissama Tribe,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ i. 187.]

{170} Moreover, as we have noticed above, savages have the greatest regard for their native customs and institutions.[113] Many of them have displayed that love of national independence which gives to patriotism its highest fervour.[114] And among some uncivilised peoples, at least, the force of racial and linguistic unity shows itself even outside the social or political unit. Burckhardt observes that the Bedouins are not only solicitous for the honour of their own respective tribes, but consider the interests of all other tribes as more or less attached to their own, and frequently evince a general _esprit de corps_, lamenting "the losses of any of their tribes occasioned by attacks from settlers or foreign troops, even though at war with those tribes."[115] A Tongan "loves the island on which he was born, in particular, and all the Tonga islands generally, as being one country, and speaking one language."[116] Travellers have noticed how gratifying it is, when visiting an uncultured people, to know a little of their language; there is at once a sympathetic link between the native and the stranger.[117] Even the almost inaccessible Berber of the Great Atlas, in spite of his excessive hatred of the European, will at once give you a kindly glance as soon as you, to his astonishment, utter to him a few words in his own tongue.

[Footnote 113: See _supra_, i. 118 _sq._]

[Footnote 114: _Cf._ Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 95, 105; Lomonaco, 'Sulle razze indigene del Brasile,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xix. 57 (Tupis); Brett, _Indian Tribes of Guiana_, p. 348; Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, iii. 189 (Iroquois); Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 323 (Greenlanders); Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 81 (Kandhs); Sarasin, _op. cit._ iii. 530 (Veddahs); Casati, _Ten Years in Equatoria_, i. 188, 304 (Negroes of Central Africa); Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 422 _sq._ (Bushmans).]

[Footnote 115: Burckhardt, _Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 205.]

[Footnote 116: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 156.]

[Footnote 117: See Stokes, _Discoveries in Australia_, ii. 25.]

Like other species of the altruistic sentiment, patriotism is apt to overestimate the qualities of the object for which it is felt; and it does so all the more readily as love of one's country is almost inseparably intermingled with love of one's self. The ordinary, typical patriot has a strong will to believe that his nation is the best. If, as many {171} people nowadays seem to maintain, such a will to believe is an essential characteristic of true patriotism, savages are as good patriots as anybody. In their intercourse with white men they have often with astonishment noticed the arrogant air of superiority adopted by the latter; in their own opinion they are themselves vastly superior to the whites. According to Eskimo beliefs, the first man, though made by the Great Being, was a failure, and was consequently cast aside and called _kob-lu-na_, which means "white man"; but a second attempt of the Great Being resulted in the formation of a perfect man, and he was called _in-nu_, the name which the Eskimo give to themselves.[118] Australian natives, on being asked to work, have often replied, "White fellow works, not black fellow; black fellow gentleman."[119] When anything foolish is done, the Chippewas use an expression which means "as stupid as a white man."[120] If a South Sea Islander sees a very awkward person, he says, "How stupid you are; perhaps you are an Englishman."[121] Mr. Williams tells us of a Fijian who, having been to the United States, was ordered by his chiefs to say whether the country of the white man was better than Fiji, and in what respects. He had not, however, gone far in telling the truth, when one cried out, "He is a prating fellow"; another, "He is impudent"; and some said, "Kill him."[122] The Koriaks are more argumentative; in order to prove that the accounts they hear of the advantages of other countries are so many lies, they say to the stranger, "If you could enjoy these advantages at home, what made you take so much trouble to come to us?"[123] But the Koriaks, in their turn are looked down upon by their neighbours, the Chukchi, who call the surrounding peoples old women, only fit to guard their flocks, and to be their attendants.[124] The Ainu despise the Japanese {172} just as much as the Japanese despise them, and are convinced of "the superiority of their own blood and descent over that of all other peoples in the world."[125] Even the miserable Veddah of Ceylon has a very high opinion of himself, and regards his civilised neighbours with contempt.[126] As is often the case with civilised men, savages attribute to their own people all kinds of virtue in perfection. The South American Mbayás, according to Azara, "se croient la nation la plus noble du monde, la plus généreuse, la plus exacte à tenir sa parole avec loyauté, et la plus vaillante."[127] The Eskimo of Norton Sound speak of themselves as _yu'-p[)i]k_, meaning fine or complete people, whereas an Indian is termed _iñ-k[)i]-l[)i]k_, from a word which means "a louse egg."[128] When a Greenlander saw a foreigner of gentle and modest manners, his usual remark was, "He is almost as well-bred as we," or, "He begins to be a man," that is, a Greenlander.[129] The savage regards his people as the people, as the root of all others, and as occupying the middle of the earth. The Hottentots love to call themselves "the men of men."[130] The Indians of the Ungava district, Hudson Bay, give themselves the name _nenenot_, that is, true or ideal red men.[131] In the language of the Illinois Indians the word _illinois_ means "men"--"as if they looked upon all other Indians as beasts."[132] The aborigines of Hayti believed that their island was the first of all things, that the sun and moon issued from one of its caverns, and men from another.[133] Each Australian tribe, says Mr. Curr, regards its country as the centre of the earth, which in most cases is believed not to extend more than a couple of hundred miles or so in any direction.[134]

[Footnote 118: Hall, _Arctic Researches_, p. 566 _sq._]

[Footnote 119: Hale, _U.S. Exploring Expedition. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, p. 109.]

[Footnote 120: Keating, _Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_, ii. 168. See also Boller, _Among the Indians_, p. 54 _sq._]

[Footnote 121: Williams, _Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands_, p. 514.]

[Footnote 122: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 105.]

[Footnote 123: Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 224.]

[Footnote 124: Sauer, _op. cit._ p. 255.]

[Footnote 125: Batchelor, 'Notes on the Ainu,' in _Trans. Asiatic Soc. Japan_, x. 211 _sq._ Howard, _Life with Trans-Siberian Savages_, p. 182.]

[Footnote 126: Nevill, in _Taprobanian_, i. 192. Sarasin, _op. cit._ iii. 530, 534. 553.]

[Footnote 127: Azara, _Voyages dans l'Amérique méridionale_, ii. 107.]

[Footnote 128: Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 306 _sq._]

[Footnote 129: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 126.]

[Footnote 130: Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 92.]

[Footnote 131: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 267.]

[Footnote 132: Marquette, _Recit des voyages_, p. 47 _sq._]

[Footnote 133: Brett, _Indian Tribes of Guiana_, p. 376.]

[Footnote 134: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 50. For other instances of national conceit or pride among savages see Darwin, _Journal of Researches_, p. 207 (Fuegians); von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 332 (Bakaïri); von Humboldt, _Personal Narrative of Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent_, v. 423, and Brett, _op. cit._ p. 128 (Guiana Indians); James, _Expedition to the Rocky Mountains_, i. 320 (Omahas); Murdoch, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 42 (Point Barrow Eskimo); Krasheninnikoff, _op. cit._ p. 180 (Kamchadales); Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ ii. 284 (Australian natives); Macpherson, _op. cit._ p. 67 (Kandhs); Munzinger, _Ueber die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_, p. 94; Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 198 (Ovambo).]

{173} We meet with similar feelings and ideas among the nations of archaic culture. The Chinese are taught to think themselves superior to all other peoples. In their writings, ancient and modern, the word "foreigner" is regularly joined with some disrespectful epithet, implying or expressing the ignorance, brutality, obstinacy, or meanness of alien nations, and their obligations to or dependence upon China.[135] To Confucius himself China was "the middle kingdom," "the multitude of great states," "all under heaven," beyond which were only rude and barbarous tribes.[136] According to Japanese ideas, Nippon was the first country created, and the centre of the world.[137] The ancient Egyptians considered themselves as the peculiar people, specially loved by the gods. They alone were termed "men" (_romet_); other nations were negroes, Asiatics, or Libyans, but not men; and according to the myth these nations were descended from the enemies of the gods.[138] The national pride of the Assyrians, so often referred to by the Hebrew prophets,[139] is conspicuous everywhere in their cuneiform inscriptions: they are the wise, the brave, the powerful, who, like the deluge, carry away all resistance; their kings are the "matchless, irresistible"; and their gods are much exalted above the gods of all other nations.[140] To the Hebrews their own land was "an exceeding good land," "flowing with milk and honey," "the glory of all lands";[141] and its inhabitants were a holy {174} people which the Lord had chosen "to be a special people unto Himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth."[142] Concerning the ancient Persians, Herodotus writes:--"They look upon themselves as very greatly superior in all respects to the rest of mankind, regarding others as approaching to excellence in proportion as they dwell nearer to them; whence it comes to pass that those who are the farthest off must be the most degraded of mankind."[143] To this day the monarch of Persia retains the title of "the Centre of the Universe"; and it is not easy to persuade a native of Isfahan that any European capital can be superior to his native city.[144] The Greeks called Delphi--or rather the round stone in the Delphic temple--"the navel" or "middle point of the earth";[145] and they considered the natural relation between themselves and barbarians to be that between master and slave.[146]

[Footnote 135: Philip, _Life and Opinions of the Rev. W. Milne_, p. 257. _Cf._ Staunton, in _Narrative of the Chinese Embassy to the Khan of the Tourgouth Tartars_, p. viii.]

[Footnote 136: Legge, _Chinese Classics_, i. 107. See also Giles, _op. cit._ ii. 116, n. 2.]

[Footnote 137: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 207.]

[Footnote 138: Erman, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 32.]

[Footnote 139: _Isaiah_, x. 7 _sqq._; xxxvii. 24 _sqq._ _Ezekiel_, xxxi. 10 _sq._ _Zephaniah_, ii. 15.]

[Footnote 140: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 104.]

[Footnote 141: _Numbers_, xiii. 27; xiv. 7. _Ezekiel_, xx. 6, 15.]

[Footnote 142: _Deuteronomy_, vii. 6.]

[Footnote 143: Herodotus, i. 134.]

[Footnote 144: Rawlinson, in his translation of Herodotus, i. 260 _sq._ n. 5.]

[Footnote 145: Pindar, _Pythia_, vi. 3 _sq._ _Idem_, _Nemea_, vii. 33 _sq._ Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 40, 166. Sophocles, _[OE]dipus Tyrannus_, 480, 898. Livy, xxxviii. 48. _Cf._ Herodotus' theory of "extremities" (iii. 115 _sq._), and Rawlinson's commentary, in his translation of Herodotus, i. 260 _sq._ n. 6.]

[Footnote 146: Euripides, _Iphigenia in Aulide_, 1400 _sq._ Aristotle, _Politica_, i. 2, 6, pp. 1252 b, 1255 a.]

In the archaic State the national feeling is in some cases greatly strengthened by the religious feeling; whilst in other instances religion inspires devotion to the family, clan, or caste rather than to the nation, or constitutes a tie not only between compatriots but between members of different political communities. The ancestor-worship of the Chinese has hardly been conducive to genuine patriotism. Whatever devotion to the common weal may have prevailed among the Vedic Aryans, it has certainly passed away beneath the influence of Brahmanism, or been narrowed down to the caste, the village, or the family.[147] The Zoroastrian Ahura-Mazda was not a national god, but "the god of the Aryans," that is, of all the peoples who inhabited ancient Iran; and these were constantly at war {175} with one another.[148] Muhammedans, whilst animated with a common hatred towards the Christians, show little public spirit in relation to their respective countries,[149] composed as they are of a variety of loosely connected, often very heterogeneous elements, ruled over by a monarch whose power is in many districts more nominal than real. In ancient Greece and Rome patriotism no doubt contained a religious element--each state and town had its tutelary gods and heroes, who were considered its proper masters;[150] but in the first place it was free citizens' love of their native institutions, a civic virtue which grew up on the soil of liberty. When the two Spartans who were sent to Xerxes to be put to death were advised by one of his governors to surrender themselves to the king, their answer was, "Had you known what freedom is, you would have bidden us fight for it, not with the spear only, but with the battle-axe."[151] And of the Athenians who lived at the time of the Persian wars, Demosthenes said that they were ready to die for their country rather than to see it enslaved, and that they considered the outrages and insults which befell him who lived in a subjugated city to be more terrible than death.[152] In classical antiquity "the influence of patriotism thrilled through every fibre of moral and intellectual life."[153] In some Greek cities emigration was prohibited by law, at Argos even on penalty of death.[154] Plato, in the Republic, sacrificed the family to the interests of the State. Cicero placed our duty to our country next after our duty to the immortal gods and before our duty to our parents.[155] "Of all connections," he says, "none is more weighty, none is more dear, than that between every individual and his country. Our parents are dear to us; {176} our children, our kinsmen, our friends, are dear to us; but our country comprehends alone all the endearments of us all. What good man would hesitate to die for her if he could do her service?"[156]

[Footnote 147: Wheeler, _History of India_, ii. 586 _sq._ See also Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Gentium_, p. 529.]

[Footnote 148: Meyer, _Geschichte des Alterthums_, i. 540. Spiegel, _Erânische Alterthumskunde_, iii. 687 _sqq._]

[Footnote 149: Polak, _Persien_, i. 12. Urquhart, _Spirit of the East_, ii. 427, 439 (Turks). Burckhardt, _Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 204 _sq._ (Turks and Arab settlers).]

[Footnote 150: Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Gentium_, p. 529. Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 221.]

[Footnote 151: Herodotus, vii. 134 _sq._]

[Footnote 152: Demosthenes, _De Corona_, 205, p. 296.]

[Footnote 153: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 200.]

[Footnote 154: Plutarch, _Lycurgus_, xxvii. 5. Ovid, _Metamorphoses_, xv. 29.]

[Footnote 155: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 45 (160). _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 23 (90).]

[Footnote 156: _Ibid._ i. 17 (57). _Cf._ Cicero, _De legibus_, ii. 2, (5).]

The duty of patriotism springs, in the first instance, from the patriotic feeling; when the love of country is common in a nation public resentment is felt towards him who does not act as that sentiment requires him to act. Moreover, lack of patriotism in a person may also be resented by his fellow-countrymen as an injury done to themselves; and as we have seen before, anger, and especially anger felt by a whole community, has a tendency to lead to moral disapproval. For analogous reasons deeds of patriotism are apt to evoke moral praise. However, in benefiting his own people the patriot may cause harm to other people; and where the altruistic sentiment is broad enough to extend beyond the limits of the State and strong enough to make its voice heard even in competition with the love of country and the love of self, his conduct may consequently be an object of reproach. At the lower stages of civilisation the interests of foreigners are not regarded at all, except when sheltered by the rule of hospitality; but gradually, owing to circumstances which will be discussed in the following chapter, altruism tends to expand, and men are at last considered to have duties to mankind at large. The Chinese moralists inculcated benevolence to all men without making any reference to national distinctions.[157] Mih-tsze, who lived in the interval between Confucius and Mencius, even taught that we ought to love all men equally; but this doctrine called forth protests as abnegating the peculiar devotion due to relatives.[158] In Thâi-Shang it is said that a good man will feel kindly towards every creature, and should not hurt even the insect tribes, grass, and trees.[159] Buddhism {177} enjoins the duty of universal love:--"As a mother, even at the risk of her own life, protects her son, her only son, so let a man cultivate goodwill without measure toward all beings, . . . unhindered love and friendliness toward the whole world, above, below, around."[160] According to the Hindu work Panchatantra it is the thought of little-minded persons to consider whether a man is one of ourselves or an alien, the whole earth being of kin to him who is generously disposed.[161] In Greece and Rome philosophers arose who opposed national narrowness and prejudice. Democritus of Abdera said that every country is accessible to a wise man, and that a good soul's fatherland is the whole earth.[162] The same view was expressed by Theodorus, one of the later Cyrenaics, who denounced devotion to country as ridiculous.[163] The Cynics, in particular, attached slight value to the citizenship of any special state, declaring themselves to be citizens of the world.[164] But, as Zeller observes, in the mouth of the Cynic this doctrine was meant to express not so much the essential oneness of all mankind, as the philosopher's independence of country and home.[165] It was the Stoic philosophy that first gave to the idea of a world-citizenship a definite positive meaning, and raised it to historical importance. The citizen of Alexander's huge empire had in a way become a citizen of the world; and national dislikes were so much more readily overcome as the various nationalities comprised in it were united not only under a common government but also in a common culture.[166] Indeed, the founder of Stoicism was himself only half a Greek. But there is also an obvious connection between the cosmopolitan idea and the Stoic {178} system in general.[167] According to the Stoics, human society has for its basis the identity of reason in individuals; hence we have no ground for limiting this society to a single nation. We are all, says Seneca, members of one great body, the universe; "we are all akin by Nature, who has formed us of the same elements, and placed us here together for the same end."[168] "If our reason is common," says Marcus Aurelius, "there is a common law, as reason commands us what to do and what not to do; and if there is a common law we are fellow-citizens; if this is so, we are members of some political community--the world is in a manner a state."[169] To this great state, which includes all rational beings, the individual states are related as the houses of a city are to the city collectively;[170] and the wise man will esteem it far above any particular community in which the accident of birth has placed him.[171]

[Footnote 157: _Lun Yü_, xii. 22. Mencius, vii. 1. 45. Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, pp. 108, 205.]

[Footnote 158: Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 119. Legge, _Chinese Classics_, ii. 476, n. 45. de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 684.]

[Footnote 159: _Thâi-Shang_, 3.]

[Footnote 160: Quoted by Rhys Davids, _Hibbert Lectures on the History of Buddhism_, p. 111.]

[Footnote 161: Muir, _Religious and Moral Sentiments rendered from Sanskrit Writers_, p. 109.]

[Footnote 162: Stobæus, _Florilegium_, xl. 7, vol. ii. 80. _Cf._ Natorp, _Die Ethika des Demokritos_, p. 117, n. 41.]

[Footnote 163: Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, ii. 98 _sq._]

[Footnote 164: _Ibid._ vi. 12, 63, 72, 98. Epictetus, _Dissertationes_, iii. 24. 66. Stobæus, xlv. 28, vol. ii. 252.]

[Footnote 165: Zeller, _Socrates and the Socratic Schools_, p. 326 _sq._ _Idem_, _Stoics, Epicureans, and Sceptics_, p. 327.]

[Footnote 166: _Cf._ Plutarch, _De Alexandri Magni fortuna aut virtute_, i. 6, p. 329.]

[Footnote 167: See Zeller, _Stoics, &c._ p. 327 _sq._]

[Footnote 168: Seneca, _Epistulæ_, xcv. 52.]

[Footnote 169: Marcus Aurelius, _Commentarii_, iv. 4. _Cf._ _ibid._ vi. 44, and ix. 9; Cicero, _De legibus_, i. 7 (23); Epictetus, _Dissertationes_, i. 13. 3.]

[Footnote 170: Marcus Aurelius, iii. 11.]

[Footnote 171: Seneca, _De otio_, iv. 1. _Idem_, _Epistulæ_, lxviii. 2. Epictetus, _Dissertationes_, iii. 22. 83 _sqq._]

But the Roman ideal of patriotism, with its utter disregard for foreign nations,[172] was not opposed by philosophy alone: it met with an even more formidable antagonist in the new religion. The Christian and the Stoic rejected it on different grounds: whilst the Stoic felt himself as a citizen of the world, the Christian felt himself as a citizen of heaven, to whom this planet was only a place of exile. Christianity was not hostile to the State.[173] At the very time when Nero committed his worst atrocities, St. Paul declared that there is no power but of God, and that whosoever resists the power resists the ordinance of God and shall be condemned;[174] and Tertullian says that all Christians send up their prayers for the life of the emperors, for their ministers, for magistrates, for the good of the {179} State and the peace of the Empire.[175] But the emperor should be obeyed only so long as his commands do not conflict with the law of God--a Christian ought rather to suffer like Daniel in the lions' den than sin against his religion;[176] and nothing is more entirely foreign to him than affairs of State.[177] Indeed, in the whole Roman Empire there were no men who so entirely lacked patriotism as the early Christians. They had no affection for Judea, they soon forgot Galilee, they cared nothing for the glory of Greece and Rome.[178] When the judges asked them which was their country they said in answer, "I am a Christian."[179] And long after Christianity had become the religion of the Empire, St. Augustine declared that it matters not, in respect of this short and transitory life, under whose dominion a mortal man lives, if only he be not compelled to acts of impiety or injustice.[180] Later on, when the Church grew into a political power independent of the State, she became a positive enemy of national interests. In the seventeenth century a Jesuit general called patriotism "a plague and the most certain death of Christian love."[181]

[Footnote 172: _Cf._ Lactantius, _Divinæ Institutiones_, vi. ('De vero cultu'), 6 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vi. 655).]

[Footnote 173: _St. Matthew_, xxii. 21. _1 Peter_, ii. 13 _sq._]

[Footnote 174: _Romans_, xiii. 1 _sq._ See also _Titus_, iii. 1.]

[Footnote 175: Tertullian, _Apologeticus_, 39 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 468). See also Ludwig, _Tertullian's Ethik_, p. 98 _sq._]

[Footnote 176: Tertullian, _De idololatria_, 15 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 684).]

[Footnote 177: Tertullian, _Apologeticus_, 38 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 465):--"Nec ulla magis res aliena, quam publica."]

[Footnote 178: See Renan, _Hibbert Lectures on the Influence of Rome on Christianity_, p. 28.]

[Footnote 179: Le Blant, _Inscriptions chrétiennes_, i. 128.]

[Footnote 180: St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, v. 17.]

[Footnote 181: von Eicken, _Geschichte und System der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, p. 809.]

With the fall of the Roman Empire patriotism died out in Europe, and remained extinct for centuries. It was a feeling hardly compatible either with the migratory life of the Teutonic tribes or with the feudal system, which grew up wherever they fixed their residence. The knights, it is true, were not destitute of the natural affection for home. When Aliaumes is mortally wounded by Géri li Sors he exclaims, "Holy Virgin, I shall never more see Saint-Quentin nor Néèle";[182] and the troubadour Bernard de Ventadour touchingly sings, "Quan la doussa aura venta--Deves nostre païs,--M'es veiaire que senta--Odor de {180} Paradis."[183] But to a man of the Middle Ages "his country" meant little more than the neighbourhood in which he lived.[184] Kingdoms existed, but no nations. The first duty of a vassal was to be loyal to his lord;[185] but no national spirit bound together the various barons of one country. A man might be the vassal of the king of France and of the king of England at the same time; and often, from caprice, passion, or sordid interest, the barons sold their services to the enemies of the kingdom. The character of his knighthood was also perpetually pressing the knight to a course of conduct distinct from all national objects.[186] The cause of a distressed lady was in many instances preferable to that of the country to which he belonged --as when the Captal de Bouche, though an English subject, did not hesitate to unite his troops with those of the Compte de Foix to relieve the ladies in a French town, where they were besieged and threatened with violence by the insurgent peasantry.[187] When a knight's duties towards his country are mentioned in the rules of Chivalry they are spoken of as duties towards his lord:--"The wicked knight," it is said, "that aids not his earthly lord and natural country against another prince, is a knight without office."[188] Far from being, as M. Gautier asserts,[189] the object of an express command in the code of Chivalry, true patriotism had there no place at all. It was not known as an ideal, still less did it exist as a reality, among either knights or commoners. As a duke of Orleans could bind himself by a fraternity of arms and alliance to a duke of Lancaster,[190] so English merchants were in the habit of supplying nations at war against England with provisions bought at English fairs, and weapons wrought by English hands.[191] If, as M. Gaston Paris maintains, a {181} deep feeling of national union had inspired the Chanson de Roland,[192] it is a strange, yet undeniable, fact that no distinct trace of this feeling displayed itself in the mediæval history of France before the English wars.

[Footnote 182: _Li Romans de Raoul de Cambrai_, 210, p. 185.]

[Footnote 183: Quoted by Gautier, _La Chevalerie_, p. 64.]

[Footnote 184: See Cibrario, _Della economia politica del medio eve_, i. 263; de Crozals, _Histoire de la civilization_, ii. 287.]

[Footnote 185: _Ordre of Chyualry_, foll. 13 b. 32 b.]

[Footnote 186: See Mills, _History of Chivalry_, i. 140 _sq._]

[Footnote 187: Scott, _Essay on Chivalry_, p. 31.]

[Footnote 188: _Ordre of Chyualry_, fol. 14 b.]

[Footnote 189: Gautier, _op. cit._ p. 33.]

[Footnote 190: Sainte-Palaye, _Mémoires sur l'ancienne Chevalerie_, ii. 72.]

[Footnote 191: Pike, _History of Crime in England_, i. 264 _sq._]

[Footnote 192: Paris, _La poésie du moyen age_, p. 107. M. Gautier says (_op. cit._ p. 61) that Roland is "la France faite homme."]

Besides feudalism and the want of political cohesion, there were other factors that contributed to hinder the development of national personality and patriotic devotion. This sentiment presupposes not only that the various parts of which a country is composed shall have a vivid feeling of their unity, but also that they, united, shall feel themselves as a nation clearly distinct from other nations. In the Middle Ages national differences were largely obscured by the preponderance of the Universal Church, by the creation of the Holy Roman Empire, by the prevalence of a common language as the sole vehicle of mental culture, and by the undeveloped state of the vernacular tongues. To make use of the native dialect was a sign of ignorance, and to place worldly interests above the claims of the Church was impious. When Macchiavelli declared that he preferred his country to the safety of his soul, people considered him guilty of blasphemy; and when the Venetians defied the Papal thunders by averring that they were Venetians in the first place, and only Christians in the second, the world heard them with amazement.[193]

[Footnote 193: 'National Personality,' in _Edinburgh Review_, cxciv. 133.]

In England the national feeling developed earlier than on the Continent, no doubt owing to her insular position and freer institutions; as Montesquieu observes, patriotism thrives best in democracies.[194] At the time of the English Reformation the sense of corporate national life had evidently gained considerable strength, and the love of England has never been expressed in more exquisite form than it was by Shakespeare. At the same time the sense of patriotism was often grossly perverted by religious {182} bigotry and party spirit.[195] Even champions of liberty, like Lord Russell and Algernon Sidney, accepted French gold in the hope of embarrassing the King; and Sidney went so far as to try to instigate De Witt to invade England. Loyalism, in particular, proved a much stronger incentive than love of country. A loyalist like Strafford would have employed half-savage Irish troops against his own countrymen, and the Scotch Jacobites invited a French invasion.

[Footnote 194: Montesquieu, _De l'esprit des Lois_, iv. 5 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 206 _sq._).]

[Footnote 195: See _Edinburgh Review_, cxciv. 133, 136 _sq._; Pearson, _National Life and Character_, p. 190.]

In France the development of the national feeling was closely connected with the strengthening of the royal power and its gradual victory over feudalism. The word _patrie_ was for the first time used by Charles VII.'s chronicler, Jean Chartier, and he also condemned as _renégats_ those Frenchmen who, at the end of the hundred years war, fought on the side of the English.[196] But patriotism was for a long time inseparably confounded with loyalty to the sovereign. According to Bossuet "tout l'État est en la personne du prince";[197] and Abbé Coyer observes that Colbert believed _royaume_ and _patrie_ to signify one and the same thing.[198] In the eighteenth century the spirit of rebellion succeeded that of devotion to the king; but the key-note of the great movement which led to the Revolution was the liberty and equality of the individual, not the glory or welfare of the nation. Men were looked upon as members of the human race, rather than as citizens of any particular country. To be a citizen of every nation, and not to belong to one's native country alone, was the dream of French writers in the eighteenth century.[199] "The true sage is a cosmopolitan," says a writer of comedy.[200] Diderot asks which is the greater merit, to enlighten the human race, which remains for ever, or to save one's fatherland, which is {183} perishable.[201] According to Voltaire patriotism is composed of self-love and prejudice,[202] and only too often makes us the enemies of our fellow-men:--"Il est clair qu'un pays ne peut gagner sans qu'un autre perde, et qu'il ne peut vaincre sans faire des malheureux. Telle est donc la condition humaine, que souhaiter la grandeur de son pays, c'est souhaiter du mal à ses voisins."[203] In Germany, Lessing, Goethe, and Schiller felt themselves as citizens of the world, not of the German Empire, still less as Saxons or Suabians; and Klopstock, with his enthusiasm for German nationality and language, almost appeared eccentric.[204] Lessing writes point-blank:--"The praise of being an ardent patriot is to my mind the very last thing that I should covet; . . . I have no idea at all of love of the Fatherland, and it seems to me at best but an heroical weakness, which I can very readily dispense with."[205]

[Footnote 196: Guibal, _Histoire du sentiment national en France pendant la guerre de Cent ans_, p. 526 _sq._]

[Footnote 197: Legrand, _L'idée de patrie_, p. 20.]

[Footnote 198: Block, _Dictionnaire général de la politique_, ii. 518.]

[Footnote 199: Texte, _Jean-Jacques Rousseau and the Cosmopolitan Spirit in Literature_, p. 79.]

[Footnote 200: Palissot de Montenoy, _Les philosophes_, iii. 4, p. 75.]

[Footnote 201: Diderot, _Essai sur les règnes de Claude et de Néron_, ii. 75 (_[OE]uvres_, vi. 244).]

[Footnote 202: Voltaire, _Pensées sur l'administration publique_, 14 (_[OE]uvres complètes_, v. 351).]

[Footnote 203: _Idem_, _Dictionnaire philosophique_, art. Patrie (_[OE]uvres complètes_, viii. 118).]

[Footnote 204: See Strauss, _Der alte und der neue Glaube_, p. 259 _sq._]

[Footnote 205: Lessing, quoted by Ziegler, _Social Ethics_, p. 121.]

The first French revolution marks the beginning of a new era in the history of patriotism. It inspired the masses with passion for the unity of the fatherland, the Republic "one and indivisible." At the same time it declared all nations to be brothers, and when it made war on foreign nations the object was only to deliver them from their oppressors.[206] But gradually the interest in the affairs of other countries grew more and more selfish, the attempt to emancipate was absorbed in the desire to subjugate; and this awoke throughout Europe a feeling which was destined to become the most powerful force in the history of the nineteenth century, the feeling of nationality. When Napoleon introduced French administration in the countries whose sovereigns he had deposed or degraded, the people resisted the change. The resistance was popular, as the rulers were absent or helpless, and it was national, being directed against foreign institutions.{184} It was stirred by the feeling of national rather than political unity, it was a protest against the dominion of race over race. The national element in this movement had in a manner been anticipated by the French Revolution itself. The French people was regarded by it as an ethnological, not as an historic, unit; descent was put in the place of tradition; the idea of the sovereignty of the people uncontrolled by the past gave birth to the idea of nationality independent of the political influence of history. But, as has been truly remarked, men were made conscious of the national element of the revolution by its conquests, not in its rise.[207]

[Footnote 206: Block, _op. cit._ ii. 376.]

[Footnote 207: See 'Nationality,' in _Home and Foreign Review_, i. 6 _sqq._]

Ever since, the racial feeling has been the most vigorous force in European patriotism, and has gradually become a true danger to humanity. Beginning as a protest against the dominion of one race over another, this feeling led to a condemnation of every state which included different races, and finally developed into the complete doctrine that state and nationality should so far as possible be coextensive.[208] According to this theory the dominant nationality cannot admit the inferior nationalities dwelling within the boundaries of the state to an equality with itself, because, if it did, the state would cease to be national, and this would be contrary to the principle of its existence; or the weaker nationalities are compelled to change their language, institutions, and individuality, so as to be absorbed in the dominant race. And not only does the leading nationality assert its superiority in relation to all others within the body politic, but it also wants to assert itself at the expense of foreign nations and races. To the nationalist all this is true patriotism; love of country often stands for a feeling which has been well described as love of more country.[209] But at the same time opposite ideals are at work. The fervour of nineteenth century nationalism has not been able to quench the {185} cosmopolitan spirit. In spite of loud appeals made to racial instincts and the sense of national solidarity, the idea has been gaining ground that the aims of a nation must not conflict with the interests of humanity at large; that our love of country should be controlled by other countries' right to prosper and to develop their own individuality; and that the oppression of weaker nationalities inside the state and aggressiveness towards foreign nations, being mainly the outcome of vainglory and greed, are inconsistent with the aspirations of a good patriot, as well as of a good man.

[Footnote 208: _Ibid._ p. 13 _sq._]

[Footnote 209: Robertson, _Patriotism and Empire_, p. 138.]

* * * * *

Our long discussion of moral ideas regarding such modes of conduct as directly concern other men's welfare has at last come to an end. We have seen that they may be ultimately traced to a variety of sources: to the influence of habit or education, to egoistic considerations of some kind or other which have given rise to moral feelings, to notions of social expediency, to disinterested likings or dislikes, and, above all, to sympathetic resentment or sympathetic approval springing from an altruistic disposition of mind. But how to account for this disposition? Our explanation of that group of moral ideas which we have been hitherto investigating is not complete until we have found an answer to this important question. I shall therefore in the next chapter examine the origin and development of the altruistic sentiment.

CHAPTER XXXIV

THE ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF THE ALTRUISTIC SENTIMENT

THERE is one form of the altruistic sentiment which man shares with all mammals and many other animals, namely, maternal affection. As regards its origin various theories have been set forth.

According to Aristotle, parents love their children as being portions of themselves.[1] A similar explanation of maternal affection has been given by some modern writers.[2] Thus Professor Espinas regards this sentiment as modified self-love and love of property. The female, he says, at the moment when she gives birth to little ones resembling herself, has no difficulty in recognising them as the flesh of her flesh; the feeling she experiences towards them is made up of sympathy and pity, but we cannot exclude from it an idea of property which is the most solid support of sympathy. She feels and understands up to a certain point that these young ones which are herself at the same time belong to her; the love of herself, extended to those who have gone out from her, changes egoism into sympathy and the proprietary instinct into an affectionate impulse.[3] This hypothesis, however, seems to me to be very inadequate. It does not explain why, for instance, a bird takes more care of her eggs than of other matter segregated from {187} her body, which may equally well be regarded as a part of herself. Nor does it account for a foster-mother's affection for her adopted offspring.[4] Of this many instances have been noticed in the lower animals; and among some savage peoples adopted children are said to be treated by their foster-parents with the same affection as if they were their own flesh and blood.[5]

[Footnote 1: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, viii. 12. 2 _sq._]

[Footnote 2: Hartley, _Observations on Man_, i. 496 _sq._ Fichte, _Das System der Sittenlehre_, p. 433.]

[Footnote 3: Espinas, _Des sociétés animales_ (2nd ed.), p. 444 _sq._, quoted by Ribot, _Psychology of the Emotions_, p. 280.]

[Footnote 4: _Cf._ Spencer, _Principles of Psychology_, ii. 624.]

[Footnote 5: Murdoch, 'Ethnol. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 419 (Point Barrow Eskimo). Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 135.]

A very different explanation of maternal love has been given by Professor Bain. He derives parental affection from the "intense pleasure in the embrace of the young." He observes that "such a pleasure once created would associate itself with the prevailing features and aspects of the young, and give to all of these their very great interest. For the sake of the pleasure, the parent discovers the necessity of nourishing the subject of it, and comes to regard the ministering function as a part or condition of the delight."[6] But if the satisfaction in animal contact were at the bottom of the maternal feeling, conjugal affection ought by far to surpass it in intensity; and yet, among the lower races at least, the case is exactly the reverse, conjugal affection being vastly inferior in degree to a mother's love of her child. It may indeed be fairly doubted whether there is any "intense pleasure" at all in embracing a new-born baby--unless it be one's own. It seems much more likely that parents like to touch their children because they love them, than that they love them because they like to touch them. Attraction, showing itself either by elementary movements of approach, or by contact, or by the embrace, is the outward _expression_ of tenderness.[7] Professor Bain himself observes that as anger reaches a satisfying term by knocking some one down, love is completed and satisfied with an embrace.[8] But this by no means implies that the embrace is the cause of love; it {188} only means that love has a tendency to express itself outwardly in an act of embrace.

[Footnote 6: Bain, _Emotions and the Will_, p. 140.]

[Footnote 7: Ribot, _op. cit._ p. 234.]

[Footnote 8: Bain, _op. cit._ p. 126.]

In the opinion of Mr. Spencer, again, parental love is essentially love of the weak or helpless. This instinct, he remarks, is not adequately defined as that which attaches a creature to its young. Though most frequently and most strongly displayed in this relation, the so-called parental feeling is really excitable apart from parenthood; and the common trait of the objects which arouse it is always relative weakness or helplessness.[9] This hypothesis undoubtedly contains part of the truth. That the maternal instinct is in some degree love of the helpless is obvious from the fact that, among those of the lower animals which are not gregarious, mother and young separate as soon as the latter are able to shift for themselves; nay, in many cases they are actually driven away by her. Moreover, in species which are so constituted that the young from the very outset can help themselves there is no maternal love. These facts indicate where we have to look for the source of this sentiment. When the young are born in a state of utter helplessness somebody must take care of them, or the species cannot survive, or, rather, such a species could never have come into existence. The maternal instinct may thus be assumed to owe its origin to the survival of the fittest, to the natural selection of useful spontaneous variations.

[Footnote 9: Spencer, _Principles of Psychology_, ii. 623 _sq._ See also Hartley, _op. cit._ i. 497.]

This is also recognised by Mr. Spencer;[10] but his theory fails to explain the indisputable fact that there is a difference between maternal love and the mere love of the helpless. Even in a gregarious species mothers make a distinction between their own offspring and other young. During my stay among the mountaineers of Morocco I was often struck by the extreme eagerness with which in the evening, when the flock of ewes and the flock of lambs were reunited, each mother sought for her own lamb, and each lamb for its own mother. A similar {189} discrimination has been noticed even in cases of conscious adoption. Brehm tells us of a female baboon which had so capacious a heart that she not only adopted young monkeys of other species, but stole young dogs and cats which she continually carried about; yet her kindness did not go so far as to share food with her adopted offspring, although she divided everything quite fairly with her own young ones.[11] To account for the maternal sentiment we must therefore assume the existence of some other stimulus besides the signs of helplessness, which produces, or at least strengthens, the instinctive motor response in the mother. This stimulus, so far as I can see, is rooted in the external relationship in which the offspring from the beginning stand to the mother. She is in close proximity to her helpless young from their tenderest age; and she loves them because they are to her a cause of pleasure.

[Footnote 10: Spencer, _op. cit._ ii. 623.]

[Footnote 11: Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 70.]

In various animal species the young are cared for not only by the mother, but by the father as well. This is the general rule among birds: whilst the hatching of the eggs and the chief part of the rearing-duties belong to the mother, the father acts as a protector, and provides food for the family. Among most of the mammals, on the other hand, the connections between the sexes are restricted to the time of the rut, hence the father may not even see his young. But there are also some mammalian species in which male and female remain together even after the birth of the offspring and the father defends his family against enemies.[12] Among the Quadrumana this seems to be the rule.[13] All the best authorities agree that the Gorilla and the Chimpanzee live in families. When the female is pregnant the male builds a rude nest in a tree, where she is delivered; and he spends the night crouching at the foot of the tree, protecting the female and their young one, which are in the nest above, from the nocturnal attacks of leopards. Passing from the {190} highest monkeys to the savage and barbarous races of men, we meet with the same phenomenon. In the human race the family consisting of father, mother, and offspring is probably a universal institution, whether founded on a monogamous, polygynous, or polyandrous marriage. And, as among the lower animals having the same habit, whilst the immediate care of the children chiefly belongs to the mother, the father is the guardian of the family.[14]

[Footnote 12: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 11 _sq._]

[Footnote 13: _Ibid._ p. 12 _sqq._]

[Footnote 14: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 14 _sqq._]

The stimuli to which the paternal instinct responds are apparently derived from the same circumstances as those which call into activity the maternal instinct, that is, the helplessness and the nearness of the offspring. Wherever this instinct exists, the father is near his young from the beginning, living together with the mother. And here again the sentimental response is in all probability the result of a process of natural selection, which has preserved a mental disposition necessary for the existence of the species. Among birds paternal care is indispensable. Equal and continual warmth is the first requirement for the development of the embryo and the preservation of the young ones; and for this the mother almost always wants the assistance of the father, who provides her with necessaries, and sometimes relieves her of the brooding. Among mammals, again, whilst the young at their tenderest age can never do without the mother, the father's aid is generally not required. That the Primates form an exception to this rule is probably due to the small number of young, the female bringing forth but one at a time, and besides, among the highest apes and in man, to the long period of infancy.[15] If this is true we may assume that the paternal instinct occurred in primitive man, as it occurs, more or less strongly developed, among the anthropoid apes and among existing savages.

[Footnote 15: See _ibid._ p. 20 _sqq._ Fiske, _Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy_, ii. 342 _sq._]

By origin closely allied to the paternal feeling is the attachment between individuals of different sex, which {191} induces male and female to remain with one another beyond the mere act of propagation till after the birth of the offspring. It is obvious that, where the generative power is restricted to a certain season--a peculiarity which primitive man seems to have shared with other mammals[16]--it cannot be the sexual instinct that causes the prolonged union of the sexes, nor can I conceive any other egoistic motive that could account for this habit. Considering that the union lasts till after the birth of the offspring and that it is accompanied with parental care, I conclude that it is for the benefit of the young that male and female continue to live together. The tie which joins them seems therefore, like parental affection, to be an instinct developed through natural selection. The tendency to feel some attachment to a being which has been the cause of pleasure--in this case sexual pleasure--is undoubtedly at the bottom of this instinct. Such a feeling may originally have induced the sexes to remain united and the male to protect the female even after the sexual desire was gratified; and if procuring great advantage to the species in the struggle for existence, conjugal attachment would naturally have developed into a specific characteristic.

[Footnote 16: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. ii.]

We have reason to believe that the germ of this sentiment occurred already in our earliest human ancestors, that marriage, in the natural history sense of the term, is a habit transmitted to man from some ape-like progenitor.[17] In the course of evolution conjugal affection has increased both in intensity and complexity; but advancement in civilisation has not at every step been favourable to its development. When restricted to men only, a higher culture on the contrary tends to alienate husband and wife, as is the case in Eastern countries and as was the case in ancient Greece. Another fact leading to conjugal apathy is the custom which compels the women before marriage to live strictly apart from the men. In China it often happens that the parties have not even seen each {192} other till the wedding day;[18] and in Greece Plato urged in vain that young men and women should be more frequently permitted to meet one another, so that there should be less enmity and indifference in the married life.[19] Conjugal love is both a cause and an effect of monogamy; but, as we shall see subsequently, the course of civilisation does not involve a steady progress towards stricter monogamy. The notions about women also influence the emotions felt towards them; and we have noticed that the great religions of the world have generally held them in little regard.[20] In its fully developed form the passion which unites the sexes is perhaps the most compound of all human feelings. Mr. Spencer thus sums up the masterly analysis he has given of it:--"Round the physical feeling forming the nucleus of the whole, are gathered the feelings produced by personal beauty, that constituting simple attachment, those of reverence, of love, of approbation, of self-esteem, of property, of love of freedom, of sympathy. These, all greatly exalted, and severally tending to reflect their excitements on one another, unite to form the mental state we call love."[21]

[Footnote 17: _Ibid._ _op. cit._ chs. i., iii.]

[Footnote 18: Katscher, _Bilder aus dem chinesischen Leben_, pp. 71, 84.]

[Footnote 19: Plato, _Leges_, vi. 771 _sq._]

[Footnote 20: _Supra_, i. 662 _sqq._]

[Footnote 21: Spencer, _Principles of Psychology_, i. 488.]

The duration of conjugal and parental feelings varies extremely. Most birds, with the exception of those belonging to the Gallinaceous family, when pairing do so once for all till either one or the other dies;[22] whereas among the mammals man and possibly some apes[23] are the only species whose conjugal unions last any considerable time after the birth of the offspring. Among many of the lower races of men lifelong marriages seem to be the rule, and among a few separation is said to be entirely unknown; but there is abundant evidence that marriage has, upon the whole, become more durable with advancing civilisation.[24] One cause of this is that conjugal affection has become more lasting. And the greater duration of this sentiment may be explained partly from the refinement {193} of the uniting passion, involving appreciation of mental qualities which last long after youth and beauty have passed away, and partly also from the greater durability of parental feelings, which form a tie not only between parents and children, but between husband and wife.

[Footnote 22: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 11.]

[Footnote 23: _Ibid._ pp. 13, 14, 535.]

[Footnote 24: _Ibid._ ch. xxiii.]

The parental feelings originally only last as long as the young are unable to shift for themselves--the paternal feeling possibly less. As Mr. Fiske observes, "where the infancy is very short, the parental feeling, though intense while it lasts, presently disappears, and the offspring cease to be distinguished from strangers of the same species. And in general the duration of the feelings which insure the protection of the offspring is determined by the duration of the infancy."[25] Among certain savages parental love is still said to be restricted to the age of helplessness. We are told that the affection of a Fuegian mother for her child gradually decreases in proportion as the child grows older, and ceases entirely when it reaches the age of seven or eight; thenceforth the parents in no way meddle with the affairs of their son, who may leave them if he likes.[26] When the parental feelings became more complex, through the association of other feelings, as those of property and pride, they naturally tended to extend themselves beyond the limits of infancy and childhood. But the chief cause of this extension seems to lie in the same circumstances as made man a gregarious animal. Where the grown-up children continued to stay with their parents, parental affection naturally tended to be prolonged, not only by the infusion into it of new elements, but by the direct influence of close living together. It was, moreover, extended to more distant descendants. The same stimuli as call forth kindly emotions towards a person's own children evoke similar emotions towards his grand- and great-grandchildren.

[Footnote 25: Fiske, _op. cit._ ii. 343.]

[Footnote 26: Bove, _Patagonia, Terra del Fuoco_, p. 133. See also Wied-Neuwied, _Reise nach Brasilien_, ii. 40 (Botocudos), Im Thurn, _Among the Indians of Guiana_, p. 219; Scaramucci and Giglioli, 'Notizie sui Danakil,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xiv. 35.]

{194} It is an old truth that children's love of their parents is generally much weaker than the parents' love of their children. The latter is absolutely necessary for the subsistence of the species, the former is not;[27] though, when a richer food-supply favoured the formation of larger communities, filial attachment must have been of advantage to the race.[28] No individual is born with filial love. However, Aristotle goes too far when saying that, whilst parents love their children from their birth upward, "children do not begin to love their parents until they are of a considerable age, and have got full possession of their wits and faculties."[29] Under normal circumstances the infant from an early age displays some attachment to its parents. Professor Sully tells us of a girl, about seventeen months old, who received her father after a few days absence with special marks of affection, "rushing up to him, smoothing and stroking his face and giving him all the toys in the room."[30] Filial love is retributive; the agreeable feeling produced by benefits received makes the individual look with pleasure and kindliness upon the giver. And here again the affection is strengthened by close living together, as appears from the cooling effect of long separation of children from their parents. But the filial feeling is not affection pure and simple, it is affection mingled with regard for the physical and mental superiority of the parent.[31] As the parental feeling is partly love of the weak and young, so the filial feeling is partly regard for the strong and (comparatively) old.

[Footnote 27: This observation was made already by Hutcheson (_Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue_, p. 219) and Adam Smith (_Theory of Moral Sentiments_, p. 199). The latter wrote, a hundred years before the publication of 'The Origin of Species,' that parental tenderness is a much stronger affection than filial piety, because "the continuance and propagation of the species depend altogether upon the former, and not upon the latter."]

[Footnote 28: Darwin maintains (_Descent of Man_, p. 105) that the filial affections have been to a large extent gained through natural selection.]

[Footnote 29: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, viii. 12. 2.]

[Footnote 30: Sully, _Studies of Childhood_, p. 243.]

[Footnote 31: See _supra_, i. 618 _sq._]

Besides parental, conjugal, and filial attachment we find among all existing races of men altruism of the fraternal {195} type, binding together children of the same parents, relatives more remotely allied, and, generally, members of the same social unit. But I am inclined to suppose that man was not originally a gregarious animal, in the proper sense of the word, that he originally lived in families rather than in tribes, and that the tribe arose as the result of increasing food-supply, allowing the formation of larger communities, combined with the advantages which under such circumstances accrued from a gregarious life. The man-like apes are not gregarious; and considering that some of them are reported to be encountered in greater numbers in the season when most fruits come to maturity,[32] we may infer that the solitary life generally led by them is due chiefly to the difficulty they experience in getting food at other times of the year. That our earliest human or half-human ancestors lived on the same kind of food, and required about the same quantities of it as the man-like apes, seems to me a fairly legitimate supposition; and from this I conclude that they were probably not more gregarious than these apes. Subsequently man became carnivorous; but even when getting his living by fishing or hunting, he may still have continued as a rule this solitary kind of life, or gregariousness may have become his habit only in part. "An animal of a predatory kind," Mr. Spencer observes, "which has prey that can be caught and killed without help, profits by living alone: especially if its prey is much scattered, and is secured by stealthy approach or by lying in ambush. Gregariousness would here be a positive disadvantage. Hence the tendency of large carnivores, and also of small carnivores that have feeble and widely-distributed prey, to lead solitary lives."[33] It is certainly a noteworthy fact that even now there are rude savages who live rather in separate families than in tribes; and that their solitary life is due to want of {196} sufficient food is obvious from several facts which I have stated in full in another place.[34] These facts, as it seems to me, give much support to the supposition that the kind of food man subsisted upon, together with the large quantities of it which he wanted, formed in olden times a hindrance to a true gregarious manner of living, except perhaps in some unusually rich places.

[Footnote 32: Savage, 'Observations on the External Characters and Habits of the _Troglodytes Niger_, in _Boston Journal of Natural History_, iv. 384. _Cf._ von Koppenfels, 'Meine Jagden auf Gorillas,' in _Die Gartenlaube_, 1877, p. 419.]

[Footnote 33: Spencer, _Principles of Psychology_, ii. 558.]

[Footnote 34: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 43 _sqq._]

But man finally overcame this obstacle. "He has," to quote Darwin, "invented and is able to use various weapons, tools, traps, &c., with which he defends himself, kills or catches prey, and otherwise obtains food. He has made rafts or canoes for fishing or crossing over to neighbouring fertile islands. He has discovered the art of making fire, by which hard and stringy roots can be rendered digestible, and poisonous roots or herbs innocuous."[35] In short, man gradually found out new ways of earning his living and more and more emancipated himself from direct dependence on surrounding nature. The chief obstacle to a gregarious life was by this means surmounted, and the advantages of such a life were considerable. Living together in larger groups, men could resist the dangers of life and defend themselves much better than when solitary--all the more so as the physical strength of man, and especially savage man, is comparatively slight. The extension of the small family group may have taken place in two different ways: either by adhesion, or by natural growth and cohesion. In other words, new elements whether other family groups or single individuals may have united with it from without, or the children, instead of separating from their parents, may have remained with them and increased the group by forming new families themselves. There can be little doubt that the latter was the normal mode of extension. When gregariousness became an advantage to man, he would feel inclined to remain with those with whom he was living even after the family had fulfilled its object--the preservation of {197} the helpless offspring. And he would be induced to do so not only from egoistic considerations, but by an instinct which, owing to its usefulness, would gradually develop, practically within the limits of kinship--the gregarious instinct.

[Footnote 35: Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 48 _sq._]

By the gregarious instinct I understand an animal's proneness to live together with other members of its own species, apart from parental, conjugal, and filial attachment. It involves, or leads to, pleasure in the consciousness of their presence. The members of a herd are at ease in each other's company, suffer when they are separated, and rejoice when they are reunited. By actual living together the instinct is individualised,[36] and it is strengthened by habit. The pleasure with which one individual looks upon another is further increased by the solidarity of interests. Not only have they enjoyments in common, but they have the same enemies to resist, the same dangers to encounter, the same difficulties to overcome. Hence acts which are beneficial to the agent are at the same time beneficial to his companions, and the distinction between _ego_ and _alter_ loses much of its importance.

[Footnote 36: In mankind we very early recognise the child's tendency to sympathise with persons who are familiar to it (Compayré, _L'évolution intellectuelle et morale de l'enfant_, p. 288).]

But the members of the group do not merely take pleasure in each other's company. Associated animals very frequently display a feeling of affection for each other--defend each other, help each other in distress and danger, perform various other services for each other.[37] Considering that the very object of the gregarious instinct is the preservation of the species, I think we are obliged to regard the mutual affection of associated animals as a development of this instinct. With the pleasure they take in each other's company is intimately connected kindliness towards its cause, the companion himself. In this explanation of social affection I believe no further step can be made. Professor Bain asks why a more lively feeling should grow up towards a fellow-being than towards an {198} inanimate source of pleasure; and to account for this he suggests, curiously enough, "the primary and independent pleasure of the animal embrace"[38]--although embrace even as an outward expression of affection plays a very insignificant part in the social relations of gregarious animals. It might as well be asked why there should be a more lively feeling towards a sentient creature which inflicts pain than towards an inanimate cause of pain. Both cases call for a similar explanation. The animal distinguishes between a living being and a lifeless thing, and affection proper, like anger proper, is according to its very nature felt towards the former only. The object of anger is normally an enemy, the object of social affection is normally a friend. Social affection is not only greatly increased by reciprocity of feeling, but could never have come into existence without such reciprocity. The being to which an animal attaches itself is conceived of as kindly disposed towards it; hence among wild animals social affection is found only in connection with the gregarious instinct, which is reciprocal in nature.

[Footnote 37: Darwin, _op. cit._ p. 100 _sqq._ Kropotkin, _Mutual Aid_, ch. i. _sq._]

[Footnote 38: Bain, _op. cit._ p. 132.]

Among men the members of the same social unit are tied to each other with various bonds of a distinctly human character--the same customs, laws, institutions, magic or religious ceremonies and beliefs, or notions of a common descent. As men generally are fond of that to which they are used or which is their own, they are also naturally apt to have likings for other individuals whose habits or ideas are similar to theirs. The intensity and extensiveness of social affection thus in the first place depend upon the coherence and size of the social aggregate, and its development must consequently be studied in connection with the evolution of such aggregates.

This evolution is largely influenced by economic conditions. Savages who know neither cattle-rearing nor agriculture, but subsist on what nature gives them--game, fish, fruit, roots, and so forth--mostly live in single families consisting of parents and children, or in larger {199} family groups including in addition a few other individuals closely allied.[39] But even among these savages the isolation of the families is not complete. Persons of the same stock inhabiting neighbouring districts hold friendly relations with one another, and unite for the purpose of common defence. When the younger branches of a family are obliged to disperse in search of food, at least some of them remain in the neighbourhood of the parent family, preserve their language, and never quite lose the idea of belonging to one and the same social group. And in some cases we find that people in the hunting or fishing stage actually live in larger communities, and have a well-developed social organisation. This is the case with many or most of the Australian aborigines. Though in Australia, also, isolated families are often met with,[40] the rule seems to be that the blacks live in hordes. Thus the Arunta of Central Australia are distributed in a large number of small local groups, each of which occupies a given area of country and has its own headman.[41] Every family, consisting of a man and one or more wives and children, has a separate lean-to of shrubs;[42] but clusters of these shelters are always found in spots where food is more or less easily obtainable,[43] and the members of each group are bound together by a strong "local feeling."[44] The local influence makes itself felt even outside the horde. "Without belonging to the same group," say Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, "men who inhabit localities close to one another are more closely associated than men living at a distance from one another, and, as a matter of fact, this local bond is strongly marked. . . . Groups which are contiguous locally are constantly meeting to perform ceremonies."[45] At the time when the series of initiation ceremonies called the _Engwura_ are performed, men and women gather together from all parts of the tribe, councils of the elder {200} men are held day by day, the old traditions of the tribe are repeated and discussed, and "it is by means of meetings such as this, that a knowledge of the unwritten history of the tribe and of its leading members is passed on from generation to generation."[46] Nay, even members of different tribes often have friendly intercourse with each other; in Central Australia, when two tribes come into contact with one another on the border-land of their respective territories, the same amicable feelings as prevail within the tribe are maintained between the members of the two.[47] Now it seems extremely probable that Australian blacks are so much more sociable than most other hunting people because the food-supply of their country is naturally more plentiful, or, partly thanks to their boomerangs, more easily attainable. A Central Australian native is, as a general rule, well nourished; "kangaroo, rock-wallabies, emus, and other forms of game are not scarce, and often fall a prey to his spear and boomerang, while smaller animals, such as rats and lizards, are constantly caught without any difficulty by the women."[48] Circumstances of an economic character also account for the gregariousness of the various peoples on the north-west coast of North America who are neither pastoral nor agricultural--the Thlinkets, Haidas, Nootkas, and others. On the shore of the sea or some river they have permanent houses, each of which is inhabited by a number of families;[49] the houses are grouped in villages, some of which are very populous;[50] and though the tribal bond is not conspicuous for its strength, there are councils which discuss and decide all important questions concerning the tribe.[51] The territory inhabited by these peoples, with its bays, sounds, and rivers, supplies them with food in abundance; "its enormous wealth of fish allows its inhabitants to enjoy a pampered existence."[52]

[Footnote 39: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 43 _sqq._ Hildebrand, _Recht und Sitte_, p. 1 _sqq._]

[Footnote 40: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 45.]

[Footnote 41: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 8 _sqq._]

[Footnote 42: _Ibid._ p. 18.]

[Footnote 43: _Ibid._ p. 31.]

[Footnote 44: _Ibid._ p. 544.]

[Footnote 45: _Ibid._ p. 14.]

[Footnote 46: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 272.]

[Footnote 47: _Ibid._ p. 32.]

[Footnote 48: _Ibid._ pp. 7, 44.]

[Footnote 49: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 22.]

[Footnote 50: Krause (_Die Tlinkit-Indianer_, p. 100) speaks of a Thlinket village which consisted of sixty-five houses and five or six hundred inhabitants.]

[Footnote 51: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 36 _sq._]

[Footnote 52: Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, ii. 92.]

{201} To pastoral people sociality, up to a certain degree, is of great importance. They have not only to defend their own persons against their enemies, but they have also to protect valuable property, their cattle. Moreover, they are often anxious to increase their wealth by robbing their neighbours of cattle, and this is best done in company. But at the same time a pastoral community is never large, and, though cohesive so long as it exists, it is liable to break up into sections. The reason for this is that a certain spot can pasture only a limited stock of cattle. The thirteenth chapter of Genesis well illustrates the social difficulties experienced by pastoral peoples. Abraham went up out of Egypt together with his wife and all that he had, and Lot went with him. Abraham was very rich in cattle, and Lot also had flocks, and herds, and tents. But "the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together"; they were obliged to separate.[53]

[Footnote 53: _Genesis_, xiii. 1 _sqq._ See Hildebrand, _op. cit._ p. 29 _sq._; Grosse, _Die Formen der Familie_, pp. 99, 100, 124 _sq._]

The case is different with people subsisting on agriculture. A certain piece of land can support a much larger number of persons when it is cultivated than when it consists merely of pasture ground. Its resources largely depend on the labour bestowed on it, and the more people the more labour. The soil also constitutes a tie which cannot be loosened. It is a kind of property which, unlike cattle, is immovable; hence even where individual ownership in land prevails, the heirs to an estate have to remain together. As a matter of fact, the social union of agricultural communities is very close, and the households are often enormous.[54]

[Footnote 54: See Grosse, _op. cit._ p. 136 _sqq._]

But living together is not the only factor which, among savages, establishes a social unit. Such a unit may be based not only on local proximity, but on marriage or a common descent; it may consist not only of persons who live together in the same district, but of persons who are of the same family, or who are, or consider themselves to be, {202} of the same kin. These different modes of organisation often, in a large measure, coincide. The family is a social unit made up of persons who are either married or related by blood, and at the same time, in normal cases, live together. The tribe is a social unit, though often a very incoherent one,[55] consisting of persons who inhabit the same district and also, at least in many cases, regard themselves as descendants of some common ancestor. The clan, which is essentially a body of kindred having a common name, may likewise on the whole coincide with the population of a certain territory, with the members of one or more hordes or villages. This is the case where the husband takes his wife to his own community and descent is reckoned through the father, or where he goes to live in his wife's community and descent is reckoned through the mother. But frequently the system of maternal descent is combined with the custom of the husband taking his wife to his own home, and this, in connection with the rule of clan-exogamy, occasions a great discrepancy between the horde and the clan. The local group is then by no means a group of clansmen; the children, live in their father's community, but belong to their mother's clan, whilst the next generation of children within the community must belong to another clan.[56]

[Footnote 55: See Cunow, _Die Verwandtschafts-Organisationen der Australneger_, p. 121, n. 1.]

[Footnote 56: _Cf._ Giddings, _Principles of Sociology_, p. 259.]

Kinship certainly gives rise to special rights and duties, but when unsupported by local proximity it loses much of its social force. Among the Australian natives, for instance, the clan rules seem generally to be concerned with little or nothing else than marriage, sexual intercourse, and, perhaps, blood-revenge.[57] "The object of caste" (clan), says Mr. Curr, "is not to create or define a bond of union, but to secure the absence of any blood relationship between {203} persons proposed to marry. So far from being a bond of friendship, no Black ever hesitates to kill one of another tribe because he happens to bear the same caste- (clan-) name as himself."[58] It appears that the system of descent itself is largely influenced by local connections.[59] Sir E. B. Tylor has found by means of his statistical method that the number of coincidences between peoples among whom the husband lives with the wife's family and peoples who reckon kinship through the mother only, is proportionally large, and that the full maternal system never appears among peoples whose exclusive custom is for the husband to take his wife to his own home;[60] and I have myself drawn attention to the fact that where the two customs, the woman receiving her husband in her own hut and the man taking his wife to his, occur side by side among the same people, descent in the former case is traced through the mother, in the latter through the father.[61] Nay, even where kinship constitutes a tie between persons belonging to different local groups, its social force is ultimately derived not merely from the idea of a common origin, but from near relatives' habit of living together. Men became gregarious by remaining in the circle where they were born; if, instead of keeping together with their kindred, they had preferred to isolate themselves or to unite with strangers, there would certainly be no blood-bond at all. The mutual attachment and the social rights and duties which resulted from this gregarious condition were associated with the relation in which members of the group stood to one another--the relation of kinship as expressed by a common name,--and these associations might last even after the local tie was broken. By means of the name former connections were kept up. Even we ourselves are generally more disposed to count kin with distant relatives who have our own surname than with relatives who have a different name; and still greater is the influence which language in this respect exercises on the mind of a savage, {204} to whom a person's name is part of his personality. The derivative origin of the social force in kinship accounts for its formal character, when personal intercourse is wanting; it may enjoin duties, but hardly inspires much affection. If in modern society much less importance is attached to kinship than at earlier stages of civilisation, this is largely due to the fact that relatives, except the nearest, have little communication with each other. And if, as Aristotle observes, friendship between kinsfolk varies according to the degree of relationship,[62] it does so in the first instance on account of the varying intimacy of their mutual intercourse.

[Footnote 57: Cunow, _op. cit._ pp. 97, 136. Dr. Stirling says (_Report of the Horn Expedition to Central Australia_, 'Anthropology,' p. 43) that the laws arising out of the "class" (clan) divisions "have extraordinary force and are, in general, implicitly obeyed whether in respect of actual marriage, illicit connections, or social relations"; but I find no further reference to these "social relations."]

[Footnote 58: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 69.]

[Footnote 59: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 107 _sqq._]

[Footnote 60: Tylor, 'Method of Investigating the Development of Institutions,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xviii. 258.]

[Footnote 61: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 110.]

[Footnote 62: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, viii. 12. 7.]

A very different explanation of the social influence of kinship has been given by Mr. Hartland. He connects it with primitive superstition. A clan, he says, "is regarded as an unity, literally and not metaphorically one body, the individual members of which are as truly portions as the fingers or the legs are portions of the external, visible body of each of them." Now, a severed limb or lock of hair is believed by the savage to remain in some invisible but real union with the body whereof it once, in outward appearance also, formed a part, and any injury done to it is supposed to affect the organism to which it belonged. "The individual member of a clan was in exactly the same position as a lock of hair cut from the head, or an amputated limb. He had no separate significance, no value apart from his kin. . . . Injury inflicted on him was inflicted on, and was felt by, the whole kin, just as an injury inflicted on the severed lock or limb was felt by the bulk."[63] Mr. Hartland insists upon a literal interpretation of his words;[64] and this implies that the members of a clan are in their behaviour influenced by the idea that what happens to one of them reacts upon all.

[Footnote 63: Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 277.]

[Footnote 64: _Ibid._ ii. 236, 398, 444.]

In support of his theory Mr. Hartland makes reference to the belief of some savages, that charms may be made from dead bodies against the surviving relatives of the deceased,[65] and to certain rites of healing in which, besides the patient himself, "other members of his tribe, presumably kinsmen," take part.[66] But the former belief is a superstition connected with the wonder of death, from which no conclusion must be drawn as {205} to relations between the living; and in the ceremonies of healing the medicine-man plays a much more prominent part than the other bystanders--whose relationship to the patient, besides, is so little marked that Mr. Hartland only presumes them to be kindred. He further observes that in the wide-spread custom of the Couvade we meet with the idea that the child, being a part of the father, is liable to be affected by various acts committed by him.[67] And from Sir J. G. Frazer's 'Golden Bough' might be quoted many instances of a belief in some mysterious bond of sympathy knitting together absent friends and relations--especially at critical times of life--which has, in particular, led to rules regulating the conduct of persons left at home while a party of their friends is out fishing or hunting or on the war path.[68] But all these rules are taboo restrictions of a definite and altogether special kind, generally, it seems, referring to members of the same family, and frequently to wives in their husbands' absence. In order to make his hypothesis acceptable, Mr. Hartland ought to have produced a fair number of facts proving that the members of the same clan really are believed to be connected with each other in such a manner, that whatever affects one of them at the same time in a mysterious way affects the rest. But we look in vain for a single well-established instance of such a belief.

[Footnote 65: _Ibid._ ii. 437 _sq._]

[Footnote 66: _Ibid._ ii. 432 _sqq._]

[Footnote 67: Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 406.]

[Footnote 68: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 27 _sqq._ See also Haddon, _Magic and Fetishism_, p. 11 _sq._]

It seems that the importance which savages attach to a common blood has been much exaggerated. Clanship is based on a method of counting descent by means of names, either through the father or through the mother, but not through both at once. This, however, by no means implies that the other line is not recognised as a line of blood-relationship. The paternal system of descent is not necessarily associated with the idea that the mother has no share in parentage, nor is the maternal system necessarily associated with unconsciousness of the child's relation to its father;[69] even the Couvade, which assumes the recognition of a most intimate relationship between the child and its father, has been found to prevail among some peoples who regard the child as a member of the mother's clan.[70] Nay, there are instances in which the clan-bond is obviously {206} not regarded as a blood-bond at all, in the strict sense of the word. Of some tribes in New South Wales Mr. Cameron tells us that, although a daughter belongs not to her father's clan but to that of her mother's brother, they believe that she emanates from her father solely, being only nurtured by her mother;[71] and the Arunta of Central Australia, who have the paternal system of descent, maintain that a child really descends neither from its father nor from its mother, but is the reincarnation of a mythical totem-ancestor.[72] Their theory is "that the child is not the direct result of intercourse, that it may come without this, which merely, as it were, prepares the mother for the reception and birth also of an already-formed spirit child who inhabits one of the local totem centres";[73] and its totem-name, which is derived from the spot where it is supposed to have been conceived,[74] is different from its clan-name. It is useful to scrutinise Mr. Hartland's theory in the light of this class of facts. They evidently prove that clanship and what we are used to call the system of counting "descent," is not necessarily based on the notion of actual blood-relationship, but on kinship as a fact combined with a name; whereas Mr. Hartland's hypothesis presupposes, not that the members of a clan really are, but that they consider themselves to be all of one blood.

[Footnote 69: Mr. Swan informs me that the Waguha of West Tanganyika, among whom children are generally named after their father, recognise the part taken by both parents in generation; and Archdeacon Hodgson writes the same concerning certain other tribes of Eastern Central Africa, who trace descent through the mother.]

[Footnote 70: Ling Roth, 'Signification of Couvade,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxii. 227, 238.]

[Footnote 71: Cameron, 'Notes on some Tribes of New South Wales,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiv. 352.]

[Footnote 72: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. iv. especially pp. 121, 124.]

[Footnote 73: _Ibid._ p. 265.]

[Footnote 74: _Ibid._ p. 124 _sqq._]

Yet another practice has been adduced as evidence of the supreme importance which the primitive clan is supposed to attach to unity in blood--the so-called blood-covenant. The members of a clan, Mr. Hartland observes, may not be all descended from a common ancestry. Though descent is the normal, the typical cause of kinship and a common blood, kinship may also be acquired. "To acquire kinship, the blood of the candidate for admission into the kin must be mingled with that of the kin. In this way he enters into the brotherhood, is reckoned as of the same stock, obtains the full privileges of a kinsman."[75] As Professor Robertson Smith puts it, "he who has drunk a clansman's blood is no longer a stranger but a brother, and included in the mystic circle of those who have a share in the life-blood that is common to all the clan."[76] Mr. Hartland gives us a short account of the rite:--"It is sufficient that an incision be made in the neophyte's arm and the flowing blood sucked from it by one of the clansmen, upon whom the {207} operation is repeated in turn by the neophyte. Originally, perhaps, the clansmen all assembled and partook of the rite; but if so, the necessity has ceased to be recognised almost everywhere. The form, indeed, has undergone numberless variations. . . . But, whatever may be the exact form adopted, the essence of the rite is the same, and its range is world-wide." Then there follows a list of peoples from various quarters of the world among whom it is said to prevail.[77]

[Footnote 75: Hartland, _op. cit._ ii. 237.]

[Footnote 76: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 315.]

[Footnote 77: Hartland, _op. cit._ 237 _sqq._]

From this the reader undoubtedly gets the impression that the mingling of blood is a frequently practised ceremony of adoption, by which a person is admitted into a strange clan. But the facts stated by the chief authorities on the subject, to whom Mr. Hartland refers, prove nothing of the kind. In most cases with which we are acquainted the mingling of blood is a form of covenant between individuals, although an engagement with a chief or king naturally embraces his subjects also; and sometimes the covenanters are tribes or kingdoms. But of the "world-wide" adoption rite there is hardly a single instance which corresponds to Mr. Hartland's description. He admits himself that "in the same measure as the clan relaxed its hold upon the individual members, blood-brotherhood assumed a personal aspect, until, having no longer any social force, it came to be regarded as merely the most solemn and binding form of covenant between man and man."[78] His account of the blood-covenant is, in fact, only an inference based on the assumption that the existing rite is a survival from times when the clan was literally one body and the individual nothing but an amputated limb. But to regard the present blood-covenant as a survival of a previous rite of adoption into the clan is not justified by facts. So far as I know, there is no record of a blood-covenant among savages of the lowest type, unless the aborigines of Australia be included among them; and in Australia it is certainly not a ceremony of adoption. Among the Arunta it is intended to prevent treachery: "if, for example, an Alice Springs party wanted to go on an avenging expedition to the Burt country, and they had with them in camp a man of that locality, he would be forced to drink blood with them, and, having partaken of it, would be bound not to aid his friends by giving them warning of their danger."[79] This instance is instructive. The Australian native is obliged to help those with whom he has drunk blood against his own relatives, nay, against members of his own totem group. So also "the tie {208} of blood-covenanting is reckoned in the East even a closer tie than that of natural descent,"[80] and the same was the case among the ancient Scandinavians.[81] I do not see how Mr. Hartland's theory can account for this.

[Footnote 78: _Ibid._ ii. 240.]

[Footnote 79: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 461.]

[Footnote 80: Trumbull, _Blood Covenant_, p. 10.]

[Footnote 81: Maurer, _Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes_, ii. 171.]

Mingling of blood is sometimes supposed to be a direct cause of mutual sympathy and agreement, in accordance with the principle of transmission of properties by contact;[82] even in Europe there are traces of the belief that a few drops of blood transferred from one person to another inspire the recipient with friendly feelings towards him with whose blood he is inoculated.[83] But the genuine blood-covenant imposes duties on both parties, and also contains the potential punishment for their transgression. It involves a promise, and the transference of blood is vaguely or distinctly supposed to convey to the person who drinks it, or who is inoculated with it, a conditional curse which will injure or destroy him should he break his promise. That this is the main idea underlying the blood-covenant appears from the fact that it is regularly accompanied by curses or self-imprecations.[84] In Madagascar, for instance, when two or more persons have agreed on forming the bond of fraternity, a fowl is procured, its head is nearly cut off, and it is left in this state to continue bleeding during the ceremony. The parties then pronounce a long imprecation and mutual vow over the blood, saying, _inter alia_ "O this miserable fowl weltering in its blood! thy liver do we eat, thy liver do we eat; and should either of us retract from the terms of this oath, let him instantly become a fool, let him instantly become blind, let this covenant prove a curse to him." A small portion of blood is then drawn from each individual and drunk by the covenanting parties with execrations of vengeance on each other in case of either violating the sacred oath.[85] According to another description the parties, after they have drunk each other's blood, drink a mixture from the same bowl, praying that it may turn into {209} poison for him who fails to keep the oath.[86] As we have seen before, blood is commonly regarded as a particularly efficient conductor of curses, and what could in this respect be more excellent than the blood of the very person who utters the curse? But the blood of a victim sacrificed on the occasion may serve the same purpose, or some other suitable vehicle may be chosen to transfer the imprecation. The Masai in the old days "spat at a man with whom they swore eternal friendship";[87] and the meaning of this seems clear when we hear that they spit copiously when cursing, and that "if a man while cursing spits in his enemy's eyes, blindness is supposed to follow."[88] The ancient Arabs, besides swearing alliance and protection by dipping their hands in a pan of blood and tasting the contents, had a covenant known as the _[h.]ilf al-fo[d.]ûl_, which was made by taking Zemzem water and washing the corners of the Ka[(]ba with it, whereafter it was drunk by the parties concerned.[89] The blood-covenant is essentially based on the same idea as underlies the Moorish custom of sealing a compact of friendship by a common meal at the tomb of some saint, the meaning of which is obvious from the phrase that "the food will repay" him who breaks the compact.[90]

[Footnote 82: _Cf._ Crawley, _Mystic Rose_, p. 236 _sq._]

[Footnote 83: von Wlislocki, 'Menschenblut im Glauben der Zigeuner,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 64. Dörfler, 'Das Blut im magyarischen Volkglauben,' _ibid._ iii. 269 _sq._]

[Footnote 84: Forbes, _A Naturalist's Wanderings in the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 452 (natives of Timor). Burns, 'Kayans of the North-West of Borneo,' in _Jour. of the Indian Archipelago_, iii. 146 _sq._ New, _Life, Wanderings, and Labours in Eastern Africa_, p. 364 (Taveta). Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 494 (Wakamba). Trumbull, _op. cit._ pp. 9, 20, 31, 42, 45-47, 53, 61 _sq._ For the practice of sealing an agreement by transference of blood accompanied by an oath, see also Partridge, _Cross River Natives_, p. 191 (pagans of Obubura Hill district in Southern Nigeria).]

[Footnote 85: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, 187 _sqq._]

[Footnote 86: Dumont d'Urville, _Voyage pittoresque autour du monde_, i. 81.]

[Footnote 87: Hinde, _Last of the Masai_, p. 47. See also Johnston, _Uganda_, ii. 833.]

[Footnote 88: Hinde, _op. cit._ p. 48.]

[Footnote 89: Robertson Smith, _Marriage and Kinship in Early Arabia_, p. 56 _sqq._ _Cf._ Herodotus, iii. 8.]

[Footnote 90: See _supra_, i. 587. According to another theory the inoculated blood is regarded as a pledge or deposit, which compels the person from whom it was drawn to be faithful to the person to whom it was transferred. Suppose that two individuals, A and B, become "blood-brothers" by mutual inoculation. Each, then, Mr. Crawley argues (_Mystic Rose_, p. 236 _sq._), has a part of the other in his keeping, each has "given himself away" to the other in a very real sense; and the possibility of mutual treachery or wrong is prevented both by the fact that injury done to B by A is considered equivalent to injury done by A to himself, and also by the belief that if B is wronged he may work vengeance by injuring the part of A which he possesses. To this explanation, however, serious objections may be raised. The belief in sympathetic magic does not imply that injury done to B by A is _eo ipso_ supposed to affect A himself through that part of him which has been deposited in B; it does not imply that two things which have once been conjoined remain, when quite dissevered from each other, in such a relation that "whatever is done to the one must similarly affect the other" (Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 49), unless there is an intention to this effect in the agent. The severed part then serves as a medium by which magic influence is transferred to the whole. Again, it is difficult to see how B could injure A through the part of him which he possesses when that part has been absorbed into his own system, as must be the case with those few drops of A's blood with which he was inoculated.]

Besides marriage, local proximity, and a common descent, a common worship may tie people together into {210} social union. But among savages a religious community generally coincides with a community of some other kind. There are tutelary gods of families, clans, and tribes;[91] and a purely local group may also form a religious community by itself. Major Ellis observes that with some two or three exceptions all the gods worshipped by the Tshi-speaking tribes on the Gold Coast are exclusively local and have a limited area of worship. If they are nature-gods they are bound up with the natural objects they animate, if they are ghost-gods they are localised by the place of sepulture, and if they are tutelary deities whose origin has been forgotten their position is necessarily fixed by that of the town, village, or family they protect; in any case they are worshipped only by those who live in the neighbourhood, the only exceptions being the sky-god, the earthquake-god, and the goddess of the silkcotton trees, who are worshipped everywhere.[92]

[Footnote 91: See _infra_, ch. l.]

[Footnote 92: Ellis, _Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 284 _sq._ For various instances of village gods see Turner, _Samoa_, p. 18; Crozet, _Voyage to Tasmania, &c._ p. 45 (Maoris); Christian, _Caroline Islands_, p. 75 (natives of Ponape); Grierson, _Bih[=a]r Peasant Life_, p. 403 _sqq._]

When the religious community is thus at the same time a family, clan, village, or tribe, it is of course impossible exactly to distinguish the social influence of the common religion from that exercised by marriage, local proximity, or a common descent. It seems, however, that the importance of the religious bond, or at least of the totem bond, has been somewhat exaggerated by a certain school of anthropologists. We are told that in early society "each member of the kin testifies and renews his union with the rest" by taking part in a sacrificial meal in which the totem god is eaten by his worshippers.[93] But no satisfactory evidence has ever been given in support of this theory. Sir J. G. Frazer knows only one certain case of a totem sacrament, namely, that prevalent among the Arunta and some other tribes in Central Australia,[94] who at the time of Intichiuma are in the habit of killing and eating totem animals; and this practice has nothing whatever {211} to do with the mutual relations between kindred. Its object is only to multiply in a magic manner the animals of certain species for the purpose of increasing the food-supply for other totemic groups.[95] In his book on Totemism Frazer writes:--"The totem bond is stronger than the bond of blood or family in the modern sense. This is expressly stated of the clans of western Australia and of north-western America, and is probably true of all societies where totemism exists in full force. Hence in totem tribes every local group, being necessarily composed (owing to exogamy) of members of at least two totem clans, is liable to be dissolved at any moment into its totem elements by the outbreak of a blood feud, in which husband and wife must always (if the feud is between their clans) be arrayed on opposite sides, and in which the children will be arrayed against either their father or their mother, according as descent is traced through the mother, or through the father."[96] In the two or three cases which Frazer quotes in support of his statement[97] the totemic group is identical with the clan; hence it is impossible to decide whether the strength of the tie which unites its members is due to the totem relationship or to the common descent. But even the combined clan and totem systems seem at most only in exceptional cases to lead to such consequences as are indicated by Frazer's authorities. With reference to the Australian aborigines Mr. Curr observes:--"Of the children of one father being at war with him, or with each other, on the ground of maternal relationship, or any other ground, my inquiries and experience supply no instances. To Captain Grey's statements, indeed, there are several objections."[98]

[Footnote 93: Hartland, _op. cit._ ii. 236.]

[Footnote 94: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. p. xix. _Cf._ _Idem_, _Totemism and Exogamy_, iv. 230 _sqq._]

[Footnote 95: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. vi. _Iidem_, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. ix. _sq._]

[Footnote 96: Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 57.]

[Footnote 97: Grey, _Journals of Expeditions in North-West and Western Australia_, ii. 230. Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 165. Hardisty, 'Loucheux Indians,' in _Smithsonian Report_, 1866, p. 315.]

[Footnote 98: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 67. In Hardisty's statement, referring to the Loucheux Indians, there is a conspicuous lack of definiteness. He says:--"In war it was not tribe against tribe, but division against division, and as the children were never of the same caste (clan) as the father, the children would, of course, be against the father and the father against the children. . . . This, however, was not likely to occur very often, as the worst of parents would have naturally preferred peace to war with his own children." Petroff's passage concerning the Thlinkets, referred to by Sir J. G. Frazer, simply runs:--"The ties of the totem or clanship are considered far stronger than those of blood relationship."]

{212} Among the Arunta and some other Central Australian tribes we have fortunately an opportunity of studying the social influence of totemism apart from that of clanship, the division into totems being quite independent of the clan system. The whole district of a tribe may be mapped out into a large number of areas of various sizes, each of which centres in one or more spots where, in the dim past, certain mythical ancestors are said to have originated or camped during their wanderings, and where their spirits are still supposed to remain, associated with sacred stones, which the ancestors used to carry about with them. From these spirits have sprung, and still continue to spring, actual men and women, the members of the various totems being their reincarnations. At the spots where they remained, the ancestral spirits enter the bodies of women, and in consequence a child must belong to the totem of the spot at which the mother believes that it was conceived. A result of this is that no one totem is confined to the members of a particular clan or sub-clan,[99] and that though most members of a given horde or local group belong to the same totemic group, there is no absolute coincidence between these two kinds of organisation.[100] How, then, does the fact that two persons belong to the same totem influence their social relationships? "In these tribes," say Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, "there is no such thing as the members of one totem being bound together in such a way that they must combine to fight on behalf of a member of the totem to which they belong. . . . The men to assist a particular man in a quarrel are those of his locality, and not of necessity those of the same totem as himself, indeed the latter consideration does not enter into account and in this as in other matters we see the strong {213} development of what we have called the 'local influence.' . . . The men who assist him are his brothers, blood and tribal, the sons of his mother's brothers, blood and tribal. That is, if he be a Panunga man he will have the assistance of the Panunga and Ungalla men of his locality, while if it comes to a general fight he will have the help of the whole of his local group. . . . It is only indeed during the performance of certain ceremonies that the existence of a mutual relationship, consequent upon the possession of a common totemic name, stands out at all prominently. In fact, it is perfectly easy to spend a considerable time amongst the Arunta tribe without even being aware that each individual has a totemic name."[101]

[Footnote 99: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. iv.]

[Footnote 100: _Ibid._ pp. 9, 32, 34.]

[Footnote 101: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, pp. 34, 544.]

When from the savage and barbarous races of men we pass to peoples of a higher culture, as they first appear to us in the light of history, we meet among them social units similar in kind to those prevalent at lower stages of civilisation: the family, clan, village, tribe. We also find among them, side by side with the family consisting of parents and children, a larger family organisation, which, though not unknown among the lower races, assumes particular prominence in the archaic State.

In China the family generally remains undivided till the children of the younger sons are beginning to grow up. Then the younger branches of the family separate, and form their own households. But the new householders continue to take part in the ancestral worship of the old home; and mourning is worn in theory for four generations of ascendants and descendants in the direct line, and for contemporaries descended in the same fifth generation from the "honoured head" of the family.[102] At the same time we find in China at least traces of a clan organisation. Large bodies of persons bear the same surname, and a penalty is inflicted on anyone who marries a person with the same surname as his own, whilst a man is strictly forbidden to nominate as his heir {214} an individual of a different surname.[103] Moreover, there are whole villages composed of relatives all bearing the same ancestral name. "In many cases," says Mr. Doolittle, "for a long period of time no division of inherited property is made in rural districts, the descendants of a common ancestor living or working together, enjoying and sharing the profits of their labours under the general direction and supervision of the head of the clan and the heads of the family branches. . . . There may be only one head of the clan. Under him there are several heads of families."[104]

[Footnote 102: Simcox, _Primitive Civilizations_, ii. 303, 493, 69.]

[Footnote 103: Medhurst, 'Marriage, Affinity, and Inheritance in China,' in _Trans. Roy. Asiatic Soc. China Branch_, iv. 21, 22, 29.]

[Footnote 104: Doolittle, _Social Life of the Chinese_, ii. 225 _sqq._]

The "four generations" of the Chinese, comprising those who are regarded as near relatives, have their counterpart in the family organisation of most so-called Aryan peoples. The Roman Propinqui--that is, parents and children, brothers and sisters, uncles and aunts, nephews and nieces, first cousins (_consobrini_) and second cousins (_sobrini_)--exactly corresponded to the Anchisteis of the Greeks, the Sapindas of the Hindus,[105] and the "Syngeneis" of the Persians.[106] The persons belonging to these four generations stood in a particularly close relationship to each other. They had mutual rights and duties of various kinds. In early times, if one of them was killed, the survivors had to avenge his death. They were expected to assist each other whenever it was needed, especially before the court. They celebrated in common feasts of rejoicing and feasts for the dead. They had a common cult and common mourning. In short, they formed an enlarged family unit of which the individual families were merely sub-branches, even though {215} they did not necessarily live in the same house.[107] In India we still meet with a perishable survival of this organisation. "In the Joint Family of the Hindus," says Sir Henry Maine, ". . . . the agnatic group of the Romans absolutely survives--or rather, but for the English law and English courts, it would survive. Here there is a real, thoroughly ascertained common ancestor, a genuine consanguinity, a common fund of property, a common dwelling."[108] The Gwentian, Dimetian, and Venedotian codes likewise represent the homestead and land of the free Welshman as a family holding. "So long as the head of the family lived," says Mr. Seebohm, "all his descendants lived with him, apparently in the same homestead, unless new ones had already been built for them on the family land. In any case, they still formed part of the joint household of which he was the head. When a free tribesman, the head of a household, died, his holding was not broken up. It was held by his heirs for three generations as one joint holding."[109] So also among the subdivisions of ancient Irish society there was one which comprised the "near relatives," the Propinqui of the Romans.[110] Many of the South Slavonians to this day live in house communities each consisting of a body of from ten to sixty members or even more, who are blood-relations to the second or third degree on the male side, and who associate in a common dwelling or group of dwellings, having their land in common, following a common occupation, and being governed by a common chief.[111] Among the Russians, {216} too, there are households of this kind, containing the representatives of three generations; and previous to the emancipation of the serfs in 1861 such households were much more common than they are now.[112] The ancient Teutons are the only "Aryan" race among whom the joint family organisation cannot be proved to have prevailed.[113]

[Footnote 105: _Baudhâyana_, i. 5. 11. 9:--"The great-grandfather, the grandfather, the father, oneself, the uterine brothers, the son by a wife of equal caste, the grandson, and the great-grandson--these they call Sapindas, but not the great-grandson's son." _Laws of Manu_, ix. 186:--"To three ancestors water must be offered, to three the funeral cake is given, the fourth descendant is the giver of these oblations, the fifth has no connection with them." _Cf._ Jolly, 'Recht und Sitte,' in Bühler, _Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie_, ii. 85.]

[Footnote 106: Brissonius, _De regio Persarum principatu_, i. 207, p. 279. Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_, i. 47 _sqq._]

[Footnote 107: Klenze, 'Die Cognaten und Affinen nach Römischem Rechte in Vergleichung mit andern verwandten Rechten,' in _Zeitschr. f. geschichtliche Rechtswiss._ vi. 5 _sqq._ Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_, i. 231 _sqq._ Rivier, _Précis du droit de famille romain_, p. 34 _sqq._]

[Footnote 108: Maine, _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_, p. 240.]

[Footnote 109: Seebohm, _English Village Community_, p. 193. _Idem_, _Tribal System in Wales_, p. 89 _sqq._]

[Footnote 110: Maine, _Early History of Institutions_, p. 90 _sq._ Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_, i. Anhang i.]

[Footnote 111: Krauss, _Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven_, pp. 75, 79 _sqq._ Maine, _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_, p. 241 _sqq._ Utie[vs]enovi['c], _Die Hauskommunionen der Südslaven_, p. 20 _sqq._ Miler, 'Die Hauskommunion der Südslaven,' in _Jahrbuch d. internat. Vereinigung f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ iii. 199 _sqq._]

[Footnote 112: Mackenzie Wallace, _Russia_, i. 134. von Hellwald, _Die menschliche Familie_, p. 506 _sq._ Kovalewsky, _Modern Customs and Ancient Laws of Russia_, p. 53 _sq._]

[Footnote 113: See Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_, i. Anhang i.]

Among all these peoples a number of kindred families or joint families were united into a larger social group forming a village community or a cluster of households. The Vedic people called such a body of kindred _janman[=a]_ or simply _gr[=a]ma_, which means "village";[114] and the same organisation still survives in India, though in a modified form. The type of Indian village communities which has been described by Sir Henry Maine is at once an assemblage of co-proprietors and an organised patriarchal society, providing for the management of the common fund and generally also for internal government, police, the administration of justice, and the apportionment of taxes and public duties. Unlike the joint family, the related families of the village community no longer hold their land as an indistinguishable common fund: they have portioned it out, at most they redistribute it periodically, and are thus on the high road to modern landed proprietorship. And whilst the joint family is a narrow circle of persons actually related to each other, the village community has very generally been adulterated by the admission of strangers, especially purchasers of shares, who have from time to time been engrafted on the original stock of blood-relatives. Yet in all such cases there is the assumption of an original common parentage; hence the Hindu village community of the type indicated, whenever it is not actually an association of kinsmen, is always a body of co-proprietors formed on the model of such an association.[115]

[Footnote 114: Zimmer, _Altindisches Leben_, p. 159 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: Maine, _Ancient Law_, p. 260 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_, p. 240. Elphinstone, _History of India_, p. 68 _sqq._ Mr. Baden-Powell (_Indian Village Community_, p. 3 _sqq._) has shown that Sir Henry Maine's general description of Indian village communities holds true only of a certain class of villages in India.]

{217} Corresponding to the Vedic _gr[=a]ma_ there were the Iranian _viç_, the Greek _genos_, and the Roman _gens_; and as among the Vedic people several _gr[=a]mas_ formed a _viç_ and several _viçs_ a _jana_,[116] so the Iranian _viç_, the Greek _genos_, and the Roman _gens_ were, respectively, subdivisions of a _zantu_, _phratria_, and _curia_; and these again were subdivisions of a still more comprehensive unit, a _daqyu_, _phyle_, and _tribus_.[117] The Roman territory was in earliest times divided into a number of clan-districts, each inhabited by a particular _gens_, which was thus a group associated at once by locality and by a common descent. Whilst each household had its own portion of land, the clan-household or village had a clan-land belonging to it, and this clan-land was managed up to a comparatively late period after the analogy of household-land, that is, on the system of joint-possession, each clan tilling its own land and thereafter distributing the produce among the several households belonging to it. Even the traditions of Roman law furnish the information that wealth consisted at first in cattle and the usufruct of the soil, and that it was not till later that land came to be distributed among the burgesses as their own special property.[118] Still in historical times, if a person left no sons or agnates living at his death, the inheritance escheated to the _gentiles_, or entire body of Roman citizens bearing the same name with the deceased, whereas no part of it was given to any relative united, however closely, with the dead man through female descent.[119] But as the Hindu village community, so also the Roman _gens_, though originally a group of blood-relatives inhabiting a common district, was already in early times recruited from men of alien extraction who were assumed to be descended from a common ancestor. And it is difficult to believe {218} that either in Rome or Greece even the fiction of a common origin could be preserved for long when the organisation of the people into gentes, phratries, and tribes was adopted by the State as a system of political division and their numbers were fixed.[120] When the _genos_ and _gens_ first appear to us in history they were mere dwindling survivals, except in one respect: they remained, as they had been from the outset,[121] religious communities long after they had lost all other practical importance. This was especially the case at Athens, where certain reputed gentes for centuries continued to play a prominent part in the religious cult;[122] and the Romans seem to have preserved their _gentilicia sacra_ still in Cicero's time.[123]

[Footnote 116: Zimmer, _op. cit._ p. 159 _sq._]

[Footnote 117: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 104 _sq._]

[Footnote 118: Mommsen, _History of Rome_, i. 45, 46, 238.]

[Footnote 119: Maine, _Ancient Law_, p. 220 _sq._ Fustel de Coulanges, _La Cité antique_, p. 126.]

[Footnote 120: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 150 _sqq._ It is expressly said that at Athens the members of the same [Greek: ge/nos] were not necessarily regarded as blood-relations (see Bunsen, _De jure hereditario Atheniensium_, p. 104, n. 28).]

[Footnote 121: Schoemann, _Griechische Alterthümer_, ii. 548 _sqq._ Marquardt, _Römische Staatsverwaltung_, iii. 126, 130. Fustel de Coulanges, _op. cit._ p. 124 _sqq._]

[Footnote 122: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 159 _sq._]

[Footnote 123: Cicero, _Pro domo_, 13 (34).]

In ancient Wales districts were occupied by tribes under their petty kings or chiefs, and the tribe (_cenedl_) was a bundle of kindreds "bound together and interlocked by common interests and frequent intermarriages, as well as by the necessity of mutual protection against foreign foes."[124] A group of households, again, corresponding to the Roman _gens_ formed a _trev_, which was a cluster of scattered households, "not necessarily a village in the modern sense."[125] The same seems to have been the case with the Teutonic _vici_, spoken of by Tacitus;[126] but that among the Teutons, also, the people of the same neighbourhood were blood-relatives may be directly inferred from a statement made by Cæsar.[127] They were not much addicted to agriculture,[128] and "the dreary world" they inhabited, with its desert aspect, its harsh climate, its lack of cultivation, was not {219} favourable to the formation of permanent large social bodies of great cohesiveness. However, we meet among them social units which Cæsar calls _regiones_ or _pagi_[129] of which the _vici_ may be assumed to have been subdivisions. Among the highly agricultural Slavonians, on the other hand, we find even in the present time a social organisation very similar to that of the Hindus. The South Slavonians, as we have seen, live in house communities corresponding to the joint families in India. Now, when the members of a house community, or _zadruga_--as it is often called--become too numerous, a separation takes place, and the emigrants form new households by themselves. A _zadruga_ is thus gradually expanded into a _bratstvo_, or brotherhood--a group of related house communities which not only feel themselves as branches of the same stock, but still have certain practical interests in common and a common chief. Several _bratstva_, finally, form a _pleme_, or tribe.[130] Among the Russians, again, the family, or joint family, has developed into a _mir_, or village community, composed of an assemblage of separate houses each ruled by its own head, but with a common village chief elected by the heads of the various households. The Russian _mir_ is an institution very similar to the Hindu village community described above. The land belongs to the community, and in earlier days it was probably cultivated in common. At present it is divided between the component families, the lots shifting among them periodically, or perhaps vesting in them as their property, but always subject to a power in the collective body of villagers to veto its sale. Originally the _mir_ was also a group of kindred; but, as in the Hindu village community, the tie of blood has been greatly weakened by all sorts of fictions and the admission of so many strangers that the tradition of a common origin is dim or lost.[131]

[Footnote 124: Seebohm, _English Village Community_, p. 190. _Idem_, _Tribal System in Wales_, p. 61.]

[Footnote 125: _Idem_, _English Village Community_, p. 343.]

[Footnote 126: Tacitus, _Germania_, 16. _Cf._ Hildebrand, _op. cit._ p. 105 _sqq._]

[Footnote 127: Cæsar, _De bello Gallico_, vi. 22:--"Magistratus ac princeps in annos singulos gentibus cognationibusque hominum, qui una coierint, quantum, et quo loco visum est, agri attribuunt."]

[Footnote 128: _Ibid._ vi. 22.]

[Footnote 129: Cæsar, _De bello Gallico_, vi. 23.]

[Footnote 130: Krauss, _op. cit._ pp. 2, 32 _sqq._ von Hellwald, _op. cit._ p. 502 _sq._ Grosse, _op. cit._ p. 204 _sq._]

[Footnote 131: de Laveleye, _De la propriété_, p. 12 _sqq._ Maine, _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_, p. 261 _sq._]

In the social organisation of all these peoples there is {220} thus originally a general congruity between the principle of local proximity and the principle of descent. On the one hand, all freemen, all true members of the society, who belong to the same local group, are at the same time kinsmen; on the other hand, all persons who are united by the tie of a common descent belong to the same or neighbouring local groups. The cause of this congruity is the universal prevalence of the paternal system of descent. Whether the case was different in prehistoric times is an open question. That the ancient Chinese reckoned kinship through the mother, not through the father, has been conjectured on philological grounds,[132] as to the plausibility of which I can express no opinion. Several writers have also endeavoured to prove that the uterine line of descent prevailed among the primitive Aryans, but the evidence is far from being conclusive. I agree with Professor Leist that all so-called survivals of a system of maternal descent in the prehistoric antiquity of the "Aryan" races are doubtful, if not false.[133] As regards the Teutons, much importance has been attributed to the specially close connection which, according to Tacitus, existed between a sister's children and their mother's brothers;[134] but, as Professor Schrader remarks, in spite of the prominent position of the maternal uncle among Teutonic peoples, the _patruus_ distinctly came before the _avunculus_, the agnates before the cognates, in testamentary succession.[135] The existence of a custom which in some respect recognises uterine relationship does not prove the earlier prevalence of the full maternal system of descent, to the exclusion of the paternal.

[Footnote 132: Puini, quoted by Grosse, _op. cit._ p. 193.]

[Footnote 133: Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Gentium_, p. 58. _Idem_, _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_, i. 490.]

[Footnote 134: Tacitus, _Germania_, 20.]

[Footnote 135: Schrader, _Prehistoric Antiquities of the Aryan Peoples_, p. 395.]

Progress in civilisation is up to a certain point connected with social expansion. Among savages the largest permanent social unit is generally the tribe, and even the tribal bond is often very loose, if not entirely wanting. It is true that associations of tribes occur even among so {221} low a race as the Australian aborigines, but unaccompanied by any kind of political organisation.[136] At a somewhat higher stage we meet with the famous league of the Iroquois--a federation on republican principles of five distinct tribes, which could point to three centuries of uninterrupted domestic unity and peace[137]--and the kingdoms of various African potentates. Civilisation only thrives in states. From small beginnings round the lake of Mexico the Aztecs gradually succeeded, through conquest, in forming an empire which covered probably almost sixteen thousand square leagues. However, between the various tribes lay broad belts of uninhabited territory, which enabled them to keep up a shy and exclusive attitude towards each other; and at the time of the Spanish conquest the empire of Mexico was, in fact, little more than "a chain of intimidated Indian tribes, who, kept apart from each other under the influence of mutual timidity, were held down by dread of attacks from an unassailable robber-stronghold in their midst."[138] In South America, in a long course of ages, six nations inhabited the region which extends from the water-parting between the basins of the Huallaga and Ucayali to that between the basins of the Ucayali and Lake Titicaca. When increasing population brought them in contact with each other, a struggle for supremacy ended in the mastery of the fittest--the Incas; and the empire of the latter was subsequently extended by the subjugation of a variety of other nations or tribes.[139] The extent of territory claimed for ancient China by the earliest records is more than double the size of modern France, and, though it was often divided into different states, the great dynasties ruled over the whole of it.[140] The two crowns of Upper and Lower Egypt were united at a {222} very early date; and no less imposing was the great kingdom of Babylon and Assur. We may assume that all these empires were formed by an association, either voluntary or forcible, of different tribes, as was the case with those states with whose origin and early growth we are somewhat better acquainted. As late as the time of the Judges the tribes of Israel either stood each entirely alone or formed smaller groups, and there was no such thing as an Israelitish nation in a political sense until the unity of the people came into being under Samuel and the first kings.[141] The Vedic people consisted of a great number of independent tribes, between which only temporary alliances were made for the sake of defence or attack. But gradually the alliances grew more permanent; war-kings united several tribes, surrounded themselves with a military nobility, and founded great kingdoms.[142] In Greece and Italy the states grew out of forts which had been built on elevated places to serve as common strongholds or places of refuge in case of war. Several tribes united so as to be better able to resist dangerous enemies, and one of the fortified towns in time gained supremacy over all others in the neighbourhood, as Athens did in Attica and Alba Longa in Latium. Similar districts, ruled by a town, were called _poleis_ or _civitates_.[143] In historical times attempts were made to carry this process further by joining several of the small states under the rule of one. In this Sparta and Athens failed, whereas the efforts of Rome met with unequalled success.

[Footnote 136: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 62 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 138: Scheppig, 'Ancient Mexicans,' &c. p. 6, in Spencer's _Descriptive Sociology_. Prescott, _History of the Conquest of Mexico_, p. 4. Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, ii. 199, 202.]

[Footnote 139: Markham, 'Geographical Positions of the Tribes which formed the Empire of the Yncas,' in _Jour. Roy. Geo. Soc._ xli. 287 _sqq._]

[Footnote 140: Simcox, _op. cit._ ii. 10, 13.]

[Footnote 141: Kuenen, _Religion of Israel_, i. 133.]

[Footnote 142: Zimmer, _Altindisches Leben_, pp. 158, 192 _sq._]

[Footnote 143: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 109 _sqq._]

The development of the State tended to weaken or destroy the smaller units of which it was composed. The central power, hostile to separatism, naturally endeavoured to appropriate the authority invested in the latter, and in a well-governed state these on their part had little reason to resist. The main object of the clan, phratry, and tribe was to protect their respective members; hence they became superfluous in the presence of a powerful national {223} government which unselfishly and impartially looked after the interests of its various subjects. Adam Smith contrasts the strong clan-feeling which still in the eighteenth century prevailed among the Scotch Highlanders with the little regard felt for remote relatives by the English, and observes that in countries where the authority of the law is not sufficiently strong to give security to every member of the State the different branches of the same family choose to live in the neighbourhood of one another, their association being frequently necessary for their common defence; whereas in a country like England, where the authority of the law was well established, "the descendants of the same family, having no such motive for keeping together, naturally separate and disperse, as interest or inclination may direct."[144] It seems also probable that the persistency of the village community or the gentile system among the Hindus and Slavs has been largely due to the weakness of the State or to the badness of the government.

[Footnote 144: Smith, _Theory of Moral Sentiments_, p. 326 _sq._]

As the larger units, so the family also was influenced by the rise of the State, but originally in quite the opposite direction. Whilst the former dwindled away, the family grew in importance. Nowhere do we find the family-tie stronger, nowhere does the father or eldest male ascendant possess greater power than in the archaic State. In a previous chapter I have already tried to explain this singular fact. I pointed out that in early society there seems to be a certain antagonism between the family and the clan, that the family was strengthened because the clan was weakened, that the father became a patriarch only as the inheritor of the authority which formerly belonged to the clan. But we have also noticed that at a higher stage the family again lost in importance.[145]

[Footnote 145: _Supra_, i. 627 _sq._]

It seems that the tribes which united into one nation or state were normally, in the first instance, branches of the same stock, living in the same neighbourhood and speaking {224} the same language, though with dialectic differences. Like the smaller units, such a state was no doubt frequently adulterated by the amalgamation of aliens, but here again fictions were substituted for realities, and the foreign extraction was forgotten. The case was different, however, when the commonwealth was formed or aggrandised by the subjugation of a strange race. Instead of being adopted into the circle of the conquerors, the subdued people were treated as their inferiors in blood, civic rights were denied to them, and in many cases they were kept in servitude; thus even here the principle of a common origin as the base of citizenship was preserved, the conquerors being the only citizens in the full sense of the term. But however strong and durable similar barriers may be, they are not imperishable. The different races inhabiting the same country under the same government tend to draw nearer each other, the inferior race is incorporated with the nation, and local proximity instead of descent at last becomes the basis of community in political functions. This change, however, was neither so radical nor so startling as it has been represented to be;[146] fictions on a large scale still formed a bridge between ancient and modern ideas. Sir Henry Maine says that we cannot now hope to understand the good faith of the fiction by which in early times the incoming population were assumed to be descended from the same stock as the people on whom they were engrafted.[147] But is this good faith more astonishing than the readiness with which a common language, in spite of the most obvious facts to the contrary, is even now constantly taken as the sign of a common origin? Though identity of language, even in the case of whole peoples, proves nothing more than contact or neighbourhood, a person's mother-tongue popularly decides his race, and language and nationality are regarded almost as synonymous. Genealogical fictions, then, are not merely a thing of the past, nor have they ceased to influence political ideas. The modern theory of {225} nationalism vindicates the right of the strongest nationality to absorb the other nationalities living within the same state by a method of compulsory engraftment, and this can be effected only by their accepting its language. But this theory is not so much concerned with language as such, as with language as an emblem of nationality. At the bottom of it is the narrow feeling of racial intolerance, quite ready however to be appeased by a fiction. The doctrine of nationalism is the spectre of the same political principle--the principle of a common descent, either real or fictitious--on which states were founded and governed when civilisation was in its cradle.

[Footnote 146: Maine, _Ancient Law_, p. 129.]

[Footnote 147: _Ibid._ p. 131.]

Like the smaller units, the archaic State was not only a political but at the same time a religious community. Over and above all separate cults there was one religion common to all its citizens. In ancient Mexico and Peru it was the religion of the dominant people, the worship of the god of war or of the sun; and the sovereigns themselves were regarded as incarnations or children of this god.[148] In other cases the state religion arose by a fusion of different cults. The gods of the communities which united into a state not only continued to receive the worship of their old believers, but were elevated to the rank of national deities, and formed together a heavenly commonwealth to which the earthly commonwealth jointly paid its homage. In this way, it seems, the Roman,[149] Egyptian,[150] Assyrian, and Babylonian[151] pantheons were recruited; whilst the Greeks went a step further and, already in prehistoric times, constructed a Pan-Hellenic Olympus.[152] Sometimes also, as Professor Robertson Smith points out, different gods were themselves fused into one, as when the mass of the Israelites in their local worship of Yahveh identified him with the Baalim of the Canaanite high places, and carried {226} over into his worship the ritual of the Canaanite shrines, not deeming that in so doing they were less truly Yahveh-worshippers than before.[153]

[Footnote 148: Ratzel, _op. cit._ ii. 199 _sq._ Markham, _History of Peru_, p. 23.]

[Footnote 149: _Cf._ von Jhering, _Geist des römischen Rechts_, i. 269.]

[Footnote 150: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 148.]

[Footnote 151: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 24. Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 39.]

[Footnote 152: _Cf._ Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 36.]

[Footnote 153: Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ p. 38.]

Nobody will deny that the common religion added strength to the State, but it seems that its national importance has often been overrated. On the one hand, the political fusion between different communities took place before the religious fusion and was obviously the cause of it; on the other hand, the mere tie of a common religion has never proved sufficient to bind together neighbouring tribes or peoples so as to form one nation. The Greek states had both the same religion and the same language, but nevertheless remained distinct states. Professor Seeley's assertion that "in the East to this day nationality and religion are almost convertible terms,"[154] is very far from the truth. Wallin, who had exceptional opportunities to study the feelings of different Muhammedan nationalities, observes that "every Oriental people has a certain national aversion to every other, and even the inhabitants of one province to those of another. The Turk does not readily tolerate the Arab, nor the Persian, and these feel similarly towards the Turk; the Arab does not get on well with the Persian, nor the Persian with the Arab; the Syrian does not like the Egyptian, whom he calls inhuman, and the latter does not willingly associate with the Syrian, whom he calls simple-minded and stupid; and the son of the desert condemns both."[155] It sometimes seems as if the national spirit of a people rather influenced its religion than was influenced by it. Patriotism has even succeeded in nationalising the greatest enemy of nationalities, Christianity, and has well nigh revived the old notion of a national god, whose chief business is to look after his own people and, especially, to fight its battles.

[Footnote 154: Seeley, _Natural Religion_, p. 229.]

[Footnote 155: Wallin, _Anteckningar från Orienten_, iv. 181 _sq._]

It is obvious that the various aspects of social development {227} which we have now considered have exercised much influence upon the altruistic sentiment. The combination of local proximity and political unity, the notion of a common descent, and the fellowship of a common religion, tend to engender friendly feelings between the members of each respective group. Hence, when the political unit grew larger, when the idea of kinship developed into that of racial affinity, and when the same religion became common to all the citizens of the State, or, as happened in several cases, extended beyond the limits of any particular country or nation, the altruistic sentiment underwent a corresponding expansion--unless, of course, it was checked by some rival influence. The increasing coherence of the political aggregate, again, added to the strength of this sentiment; and so did the antagonism towards foreign communities and the natural antipathy or hatred to their members. As people like that to which they are used or which is their own, they dislike that which is strange or unfamiliar. Among ourselves we notice this particularly in children[156] and uneducated persons, whose anger may be aroused by the sight of a black skin or an oriental dress or the sounds of a strange language. Antipathies of this kind have directly influenced the moral valuation of conduct towards foreigners; but at the same time they have also strengthened the feelings of mutual goodwill between tribesmen or compatriots. For likes and dislikes are increased by the contrast; to hate a thing makes us better love its opposite. So also the competition and enmity which prevail between different communities tend within each community to intensify its members' devotion to the common goal and their friendly feelings towards one another.

[Footnote 156: Compayré, _op. cit._ p. 100:--"Tout ce qui est inattendu, imprévu, est insupportable à l'enfant, et provoque soit la peur, soit plus tard la colère. J'ai vu un de mes fils, à quatre ans et demi, entrer dans de véritables rages, toutes les fois que je lui parlais dans le patois de mon pays."]

But the altruistic sentiment has not necessarily reference only to individuals belonging to the same social unit. {228} Gregarious animals may be kindly disposed to any member of their species which is not an object of their anger or their fear.

Savages have shown themselves capable of tender feelings towards suffering and harmless strangers.[157] The sensibility of little children sometimes goes beyond the circle of the family; Madame Manacéine tells us of a girl two years old who, in the Zoological Gardens at St. Petersburg, began to cry bitterly when she saw an elephant walking over the keeper's body, although the other spectators were quietly watching the trick.[158] In mankind altruism has been narrowed by social isolation, by differences in race, language, habits, and customs, by enmity and suspicion. But increased intercourse has gradually led to conditions favourable to its expansion. As Buckle remarks, ignorance is the most powerful of all the causes of national hatred; "when you increase the contact, you remove the ignorance, and thus you diminish the hatred."[159] People of different nationalities feel that in spite of all dissimilarities between them there is much that they have in common; and frequent intercourse makes the differences less marked, or obliterates many of them altogether. There can be no doubt that this process will go on in the future. And equally certain it is that similar causes will produce similar effects--that altruism will continue to expand, and that the notion of a human brotherhood will receive more support from the actual feelings of mankind than it does at present.

[Footnote 157: See _supra_, i. 570-572, 581.]

[Footnote 158: Manacéine, _Le surmenage mental dans la civilisation moderne_, p. 248. See also Compayré, _op. cit._ p. 323.]

[Footnote 159: Buckle, _History of Civilization in England_, i. 222.]

CHAPTER XXXV

SUICIDE

IN previous chapters we have discussed the moral valuation of acts, forbearances, and omissions, which directly concern the interests of other men; we shall now proceed to consider moral ideas regarding such modes of conduct as chiefly concern a man's own welfare. Among these we notice, in the first place, acts affecting his existence.

Suicide, or intentional self-destruction, has often been represented as a fruit of a higher civilisation; Dr. Steinmetz, on the other hand, in his essay on 'Suicide among Primitive Peoples,' thinks it probable that "there is a greater propensity to suicide among savage than among civilised peoples."[1] The former view is obviously erroneous; the latter probably holds good of certain savages as compared with certain peoples of culture, but cannot claim general validity.

[Footnote 1: Steinmetz, 'Suicide among Primitive Peoples,' in _American Anthropologist_, vii. 60.]

Among several uncivilised races suicide is said to be unknown.[2] To these belong some of the lower savages--the Yahgans of Tierra del Fuego,[3] the Andaman Islanders,[4] {230} and various Australian tribes;[5] whilst as regards most other tribes at about the same stage of culture information seems to be wanting. Of the natives in Western and Central Australia Sir G. Grey writes, "Whenever I have interrogated them on this point, they have invariably laughed at me, and treated my question as a joke."[6] When a Caroline Islander was told of suicides committed by Europeans, he thought that he had not grasped what was said to him, as he never in his life had heard of anything so ridiculous.[7] The Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush, though they have no intense fear of death, cannot understand suicide; "the idea of a man killing himself strikes them as inexplicable."[8]

[Footnote 2: Paulitschke, _Ethnographie Nord-ost-Afrikas_, p. 205 (Danakil and Galla). Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 532 (Barea and Kunáma). New, _Life, Wanderings, and Labours in Eastern Africa_, p. 99 (Wanika). Felkin, 'Notes on the For Tribe of Central Africa,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 231. Lumholtz (_Unknown Mexico_, i. 243) thinks it is doubtful whether a pagan Tarahumare ever killed himself.]

[Footnote 3: Bridge, in _South American Missionary Magazine_, xiii. 211.]

[Footnote 4: Man, _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 111.]

[Footnote 5: Grey, _Expeditions of Discovery in North-West and Western Australia_, ii. 248. Curr, _Recollections of Squatting in Victoria_, p. 277 (Bangerang). Among the tribes of Western Victoria described by Mr. Dawson (_Australian Aborigines_, p. 62) suicide is not unknown, though it is uncommon; "if a native wishes to die, and cannot get any one to kill him, he will sometimes put himself in the way of a venomous snake, that he may be bitten by it."]

[Footnote 6: Grey, _op. cit._ ii. 248.]

[Footnote 7: von Kotzebue, _Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea_, iii. 195.]

[Footnote 8: Scott Robertson, _Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush_, p. 381.]

Among many savages and barbarians suicide is stated to be very rare,[9] or to occur only occasionally;[10] whereas {231} among others it is represented as either common or extremely prevalent.[11] Of the Kamchadales we are told that the least apprehension of danger drives them to despair, and that they fly to suicide as a relief, not only from present, but even from imaginary evil; "not only those who are confined for some offence, but such as are discontented with their lot, prefer a voluntary death to an uneasy life, and the pains of disease."[12] Among the Hos, an Indian hill tribe, suicide is reported to be so frightfully prevalent as to afford no parallel in any known country:--"If a girl appears mortified by anything that has been said, it is not safe to let her go away till she is soothed. A reflection on a man's honesty or veracity may be sufficient to send him to self-destruction. In a recent case, a young woman attempted to poison herself because her uncle would not partake of the food she had cooked for him."[13] Among the Karens of Burma suicide is likewise very common where Christianity has not been introduced. If a man has some incurable or painful disease, he says in a matter-of-fact way that he will hang himself, and he does as he says; if a girl's parents compel her to marry the man she does not love, she hangs herself; wives sometimes hang themselves through jealousy, sometimes because they quarrel with their husbands, and sometimes out of mere {232} chagrin, because they are subject to depreciating comparisons; and it is a favourite threat with a wife or daughter, when not allowed to have her own way, that she will hang herself.[14] Among some uncivilised peoples suicide is frequently practised by women, though rarely by men.[15]

[Footnote 9: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 267 (Greenlanders). Murdoch, 'Ethnol. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 41 (Point Barrow Eskimo), von Siebold, _Die Aino auf der Insel Yesso_, p. 35. von Stenin, 'Die Kirgisen des Kreises Saissansk im Gebiete von Ssemipalatinsk,' in _Globus_, lxix. 230. Beltrame, _Il Fiume Bianco_, p. 51 (Arabs). Felkin, 'Waganda Tribe of Central Africa,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 723. Schwarz, quoted by Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 24 (Bakwiri). _Ibid._ p. 52 (Banaka and Bapuku). Wandrer, _ibid._ p. 325 (Hottentots). Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 221 (Bantu race). Sorge, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 421 (Nissan Islanders in the Bismarck Archipelago). Kubary, 'Die Verbrechen und das Strafverfahren auf den Pelau-Inseln,' in _Original-Mittheilungen aus der ethnol. Abtheil. d. königl. Museen zu Berlin_, i. 78 (Pelew Islanders). Among the Malays suicide is reported to be extremely rare (Brooke, _Ten Years in Saráwak_, i. 56; Ellis, 'The Amok of the Malays,' in _Journal of Mental Science_, xxxix. 331); but Dr. Gilmore Ellis has been told by many Malays that they consider Amok a kind of suicide. If a man wishes to die, he "amoks" in the hope of being killed, rather than kills himself, suicide being a most heinous sin according to the ethics of Muhammedanism (_ibid._ p. 331). In Siam suicide is rare (Bowring, _Siam_, i. 106). Of the Western Islanders of Torres Straits Dr. Haddon says (in _Reports of the Cambridge Anthrop. Expedition to Torres Straits_, v. 278) that he does not remember to have heard of a case of suicide in real life, though there are some instances of it in their folk-tales.]

[Footnote 10: Comte, quoted by Mouhot, _Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China_, ii. 27 _sq._ (Bannavs in Cambodia). Kloss, _In the Andamans and Nicobars_, p. 316 (Nicobarese). Among the Bakongo cases of suicide occur, "although much less frequently than in civilised countries" (Ward, _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_, p. 45).]

[Footnote 11: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 158 (Atkha Aleuts). Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 293 _sq._, Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, pp. 176, 200. Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 133 _sq._ (Kamchadales), 184 (Chukchi), 205 (Aleuts). Brooke, _op. cit._ i. 55 (Sea Dyaks). Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 106. Turner, _Samoa_, p. 305; Tregear, 'Niue,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ ii. 14; Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 109; Hood, _Cruise in the Western Pacific_, p. 22 (Savage Islanders). Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 111 _sq._; Collins, _English Colony in New South Wales_, i. 524 (Maoris). Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 553 _sq._; _Idem_, quoted by Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 117, n. 33 (West African Negroes). Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 23. Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 74 (Barotse). In Tana, of the New Hebrides (Gray, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxviii. 132) and Nias (Rosenberg, _Der malayische Archipel_, p. 146) suicides are said to be not infrequent.]

[Footnote 12: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 133 _sq._ _Cf._ Krasheninnikoff, _op. cit._ p. 176.]

[Footnote 13: Tickell, 'Memoir on the Hodésum,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, ix. 807. Dalton, _Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 206.]

[Footnote 14: Mason, 'Dwellings, &c., of the Karens,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxvii. pt. ii. 141.]

[Footnote 15: Keating, _Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_, i. 394 (Dacotahs); ii. 171 _sq._ (Chippewas). Bradbury, _Travels in the Interior of America_, p. 87 (Dacotahs). Brooke Low, quoted by Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 117 (Sea Dyaks). Munzinger, _Die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_, p. 93.]

The causes which, among savages, lead to suicide are manifold:--disappointed love or jealousy;[16] illness[17] or old age;[18] grief over the death of a child,[19] a husband,[20] or a {233} wife;[21] fear of punishment;[22] slavery[23] or brutal treatment by a husband;[24] remorse,[25] shame or wounded pride, anger or revenge.[26] In various cases an offended person kills himself for the express purpose of taking revenge upon the offender.[27] Thus among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast, "should a person commit suicide, and before so doing attribute the act to the conduct of another person, that other person is required by native law to undergo a like fate. The practice is termed killing oneself upon the head of another, and the person whose conduct is supposed to have driven the suicide to commit the rash act is visited with a death of an exactly similar nature"--unless, indeed, the family of the suicide be pacified with a money compensation.[28] With reference to the Savage Islanders, who especially in heathen {234} times were much addicted to suicide, we are told that, "like angry children, they are tempted to avenge themselves by picturing the trouble that they will bring upon the friends who have offended them."[29] Among the Thlinkets an offended person who is unable to take revenge in any other way commits suicide in order to expose the person who gave the offence to the vengeance of his surviving relatives and friends.[30] Among the Chuvashes it was formerly the custom for enraged persons to hang themselves at the doors of their enemies.[31] A similar method of taking revenge is still not infrequently resorted to by the Votyaks, who believe that the ghost of the deceased will then persecute the offender.[32] Sometimes a suicide has the character of a human sacrifice.[33] In the times of epidemics or great calamities the Chukchi sacrifice their own lives in order to appease evil spirits and the souls of departed relatives.[34] Among some savages it is common for a woman, especially if married to a man of importance, to commit suicide on the death of her husband,[35] or to demand to be buried with him;[36] and many Brazilian Indians killed themselves on the graves of their chiefs.[37]

[Footnote 16: Lasch, 'Der Selbstmord aus erotischen Motiven bei den primitiven Völkern,' in _Zeitschrift für Socialwissenschaft_, ii. 579 _sqq._ Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 503. Keating, _op. cit._ ii. 172 (Chippewas). Eastman, _Dacotah_, pp. 89 _sqq._, 168 _sq._; Dodge, _Our Wild Indians_, p. 321 _sq._ (Dacotahs). Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District, Hudson Bay Territory,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 187 (Koksoagmyut). Mason, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxvii. pt. ii. 141 (Karens). Brooke Low, quoted by Ling Roth, _Natives of Sarawak_, i. 115 (Sea Dyaks). Kubary, 'Religion der Pelauer,' in Bastian, _Allerlei aus Volks- und Menschenkunde_, i. 3 (Pelew Islanders). Senfft, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 452 (Marshall Islanders). Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 243 _sq._ (natives of the Banks' Islands and Northern New Hebrides). Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, vi. 115; Malone, _Three Years' Cruise in the Australasian Colonies_, p. 72 _sq._ (Maoris). Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 554 (West African Negroes). Munzinger, _Die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_, p. 93 _sq._]

[Footnote 17: Dodge, _op. cit._ p. 321 _sq._ (North American Indians) Holm, 'Ethnologisk Skizze af Angmagsalikerne,' in _Meddelelser om Grönland_, x. 181 (Angmagsaliks of Eastern Greenland). Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 134 (Kamchadales). Mason, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxvii. pt. ii. 141 (Karens). Gray, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxviii. 132 (natives of Tana, New Hebrides). Sartori, 'Die Sitte der Alten- und Krankentötung,' in _Globus_, lxvii. 109 _sq._]

[Footnote 18: Perrin du Lac, _Voyage dans les deux Louisianes_, p. 346. Nansen, _First Crossing of Greenland_, ii. 331; _Idem_, _Eskimo Life_, pp. 170, 267 (Greenlanders). Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 294. Wilkes, _U.S. Exploring Expedition_, iii. 96; Hale, _U.S. Exploring Expedition. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, p. 65 (Fijians). Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, iii. 33.5 (Troglodytes). Pomponius Mela, _De situ orbis_, iii. 7 (Seres). Hartknoch, _Alt- und Neues Preussen_, i. 181 (ancient Prussians). Mareschalcus, _Annales Herulorum ac Vandalorum_, i. 8 (_Monumenta inedita rerum Germanicarum_, i. 191); Procopius, _De bello Gothico_, ii. 14 (Heruli). Maurer, _Die Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes zum Christenthume_, ii. 79, n. 48 (ancient Scandinavians).]

[Footnote 19: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 158 (Atkha Aleuts). Keating, _op. cit._ ii. 172 (Chippewas). Colenso, _Maori Races_, pp. 46, 57; Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 112 (Maoris).]

[Footnote 20: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 158 (Atkha Aleuts). Haddon, in _Rep. Cambridge Anthr. Exped. to Torres Straits_, v. 17 (Western Islanders, according to a Kauralaig folk-tale). Colenso, _op. cit._ pp. 46, 57; Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 112 (Maoris).]

[Footnote 21: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 158 (Atkha Aleuts). Fawcett, _Saoras_, p. 17. Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 112 (Maoris).]

[Footnote 22: Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 293. Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 112 (Maoris).]

[Footnote 23: Modigliani, _Viaggio a Nías_, p. 473. Decle, _op. cit._ p. 74 (Barotse). Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 25 (Negroes of Accra). Donne, _Biathanatos_, p. 56 (American Indians).]

[Footnote 24: Wied-Neuwied, _Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 349 (Mandans).]

[Footnote 25: Turner, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 187 (Koksoagmyut). Mr. Dawson (_Australian Aborigines_, p. 62 _sq._) tells us of a native of Western Victoria who decided to commit suicide because, being intoxicated, he had killed his wife, and was so sorry for it. He besought the tribe to kill him, and seeing his determination to starve himself to death, his friends at last sent for the tribal executioner, who pushed a spear through him.]

[Footnote 26: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 158 (Atkha Aleuts). Keating, _op. cit._ ii. 171 (Chippewas). Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 206; Jickell, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, ix. 807 (Hos). Colquhoun, _Amongst the Shans_, p. 76 _sq._ (Lethtas). Mac Mahon, _Far Cathay_, p. 241 (Tarus, one of the Chino-Burmese border tribes). Brooke, _op. cit._ i. 55 (Sea Dyaks). Chalmers, _Pioneer Life and Work in New Guinea_, p. 227 (a woman at Port Moresby; Mr. Abel [_Savage Life in New Guinea_, p. 102] speaks of a New Guinea woman who was so annoyed because her old village friends had not visited her during her illness that she attempted to commit suicide). Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 243 _sq._ (natives of the Banks' Islands and Northern New Hebrides). Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 106 (Fijians). Tregear, in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ ii. 14 (Savage Islanders). Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 111 _sq._; Collins, _op. cit._ i. 524; Angas, _Savage Life in Australia and New Zealand_, ii. 45; Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 56 _sq._ (Maoris). Ward, _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_, p. 45 (Bakongo). Lasch, 'Besitzen die Naturvölker ein persönliches Ehrgefühl?' in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissenschaft_, iii. 837 _sqq._]

[Footnote 27: See Lasch, 'Rache als Selbstmordmotiv,' in _Globus_, lxxiv. 37 _sqq._; Steinmetz, 'Gli antichi scongiuri giuridici contro i creditori,' in _Rivista italiana di sociologia_, ii. 49 _sqq._]

[Footnote 28: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 302. The same custom is mentioned by Monrad (_op. cit._ p. 23 _sq._), Bowdich (_Mission to Ashantee_, pp. 256, 257, 259 n. [double dagger]), and Reade (_Savage Africa_, p. 554).]

[Footnote 29: Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 109.]

[Footnote 30: Krause, _Die Tlinkit-Indianer_, p. 222.]

[Footnote 31: Lebedew, 'Die simbirskischen Tschuwaschen,' in Erman's _Archiv für wissenschaftliche Kunde von Russland_, ix. 586 n. **]

[Footnote 32: Buch, 'Die Wotjaken,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xii. 611 _sq._]

[Footnote 33: See Lasch, 'Religiöser Selbstmord und seine Beziehung zum Menschenopfer.' in _Globus_, lxxv. 69 _sqq._]

[Footnote 34: Skrzyncki, 'Der Selbstmord bei den Tschuktschen,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, v. 207 _sq._]

[Footnote 35: Ashe, _Two Kings of Uganda_, p. 342 (Wahuma). Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, ii. 610 (Bairo). Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 340 (natives of Bali and Lombok).]

[Footnote 36: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 125 (Fijians). Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 289 (natives of Aurora Island, New Hebrides).]

[Footnote 37: Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 211. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 209. Of the Niger Delta tribes M. le Comte de Cardi writes (in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxix. 55):--"On the deportation of a king or a chief by the British or other European government for some offence I have seen the wives of the deported man throw themselves into the river and fight like mad women with the people who went to their rescue; I have also seen some of the male retainers both free and slaves of a deported chief attempt their own lives at the moment when the vessel carrying away their chief disappeared from their sight."]

In various other cases, besides the voluntary sacrifices of widows or slaves, the suicides of savages are connected with their notions of a future life.[38] The belief in the new {235} human birth of the departed soul has led West African negroes to take their own lives when in distant slavery, that they may awaken in their native land.[39] Among the Chukchi there are persons who kill themselves for the purpose of effecting an earlier reunion with their deceased relatives.[40] Among the Samoyedes it happens that a young girl who is sold to an old man strangles herself in the hope of getting a more suitable bridegroom in the other world.[41] We are told that the Kamchadales inflict death on themselves with the utmost coolness because they maintain that "the future life is a continuation of the present, but much better and more perfect, where they expect to have all their desires more completely satisfied than here."[42] The suicides of old people, again, are in some cases due to the belief that a man enters into the other world in the same condition in which he left this one, and that it consequently is best for him to die before he grows too old and feeble.[43]

[Footnote 38: _Cf._ Steinmetz, in _American Anthropologist_, vii. 60; Vierkandt, _Naturvölker und Kulturvölker_, p. 284; Lasch, in _Zeitschrift für Socialwissenschaft_, ii. 585.]

[Footnote 39: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 5.]

[Footnote 40: Skrzyncki, in _Am Ur-Quell_, v. 207.]

[Footnote 41: von Struve, 'Die Samojeden im Norden von Sibirien,' in _Ausland_, 1880, p. 777.]

[Footnote 42: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 265. _Cf._ Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 294.]

[Footnote 43: Hale, _op. cit._ p. 65 (Fijians). _Cf._ _supra_, i. 390.]

The notions of savages concerning life after death also influence their moral valuation of suicide. Where men are supposed to require wives not only during their lifetime, but after their death, it may be a praiseworthy thing, or even a duty, for a widow to accompany her husband to the land of souls. According to Fijian beliefs, the woman who at the funeral of her husband met death with the greatest devotedness would become the favourite wife in the abode of spirits, whereas a widow who did not permit herself to be killed was considered an adulteress.[44] Among the Central African Bairo those women who refrained from destroying themselves over their husbands' graves were regarded as outcasts.[45] On the Gold Coast a man of low rank who has married one of the king's sisters is {236} expected to make away with himself when his wife dies, or upon the death of an only male child; and "should he outrage native custom and neglect to do so, a hint is conveyed to him that he will be put to death, which usually produces the desired effect."[46] The customary suicides of the Chukchi are solemnly performed in the presence and with the assistance of relatives and neighbours.[47] The Samoyedes maintain that suicide by strangulation "is pleasing to God, who looks upon it as a voluntary sacrifice, which deserves reward."[48] The opinion of the Kamchadales that it is "allowable and praiseworthy" for a man to take his own life,[49] was probably connected with their optimistic notions about their fate after death. And that the habitual suicides of old persons have the sanction of public opinion is particularly obvious where they may choose between killing themselves and being killed.[50]

[Footnote 44: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 125 _sq._]

[Footnote 45: Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, i. 610.]

[Footnote 46: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 287.]

[Footnote 47: Skrzyncki, in _Am Ur-Quell_, v. 208.]

[Footnote 48: von Struve, in _Ausland_, 1880, p. 777.]

[Footnote 49: Steller, _op. cit._ p. 269. _Cf._ Krasheninnikoff, _op. cit._ p. 204.]

[Footnote 50: _Supra_, i. 389 _sq._ (Fijians). Nansen, _First Crossing of Greenland_, ii. 331. Steller, _op. cit._ p. 294 (Kamchadales).]

Whilst in some cases suicide opens the door to a happy land beyond the grave, it in other cases entails consequences of a very different kind. The Omahas believe that a self-murderer ceases to exist.[51] According to the Thompson Indians in British Columbia, "the souls of people who commit suicide do not go to the land of souls. The shamans declare they never saw such people there; and some say that they have looked for the souls of such people, but could not find their tracks. Some shamans say they cannot locate the place where the souls of suicides go, but think they must be lost, because they seem to disappear altogether. Others say that these souls die, and cease to exist. Still others claim that the souls never leave the earth, but wander around aimlessly."[52] So also the Jakuts believe that the ghost of a self-murderer never {237} comes to rest.[53] Sometimes the fate of suicides after death is represented as a punishment which they suffer for their deed. Thus the Dacotahs, among whom women not infrequently put an end to their existence by hanging themselves, are of opinion that suicide is displeasing to the "Father of Life," and will be punished in the land of spirits by the ghost being doomed for ever to drag the tree on which the person hanged herself; hence the women always suspend themselves to as small a tree as can possibly sustain their weight.[54] The Paháriasof the Rájmahal Hills, in India, say that "suicide is a crime in God's eyes," and that "the soul of one who so offends shall not be admitted into heaven, but must hover eternally as a ghost between heaven and earth,"[55] The Kayans of Borneo maintain that self-murderers are sent to a place called _Tan Tekkan_, where they will be very poor and wretched, subsisting on leaves, roots, or anything they can pick up in the forests, and being easily distinguished by their miserable appearance.[56] According to Dyak beliefs, they go to a special place, where those who have drowned themselves must thenceforth live up to their waists in water, and those who have poisoned themselves must live in houses built of poisonous woods and surrounded by noxious plants, the exhalations of which are painful to the spirits.[57] In other instances we are simply told that the souls of suicides, together with those of persons who have been killed in war,[58] or who have died a violent death,[59] are not permitted to live with the rest of the souls, to whom their presence would cause uneasiness. Among the Hidatsa Indians some people say that the ghosts of men {238} who have made away with themselves occupy a separate part of the village of the dead, but that their condition in no other wise differs from that of the other ghosts.[60]

[Footnote 51: La Flesche, 'Death and Funeral Customs among the Omahas,' in _Jour. of American Folk-Lore_, ii. 11.]

[Footnote 52: Teit, 'Thompson Indians of British Columbia,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, Anthropology, i. 358 _sq._]

[Footnote 53: Sumner, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxi. 101.]

[Footnote 54: Bradbury, _Travels in the Interior of America_, p. 89. _Cf._ Keating, _op. cit._ i. 394.]

[Footnote 55: Dalton, _Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 268. _Cf._ Sherwill, 'Tour through the Rájmahal Hills,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xx. 556.]

[Footnote 56: Hose, 'Journey up the Baram River to Mount Dulit and the Highlands of Borneo,' in _Geographical Journal_, i. 199.]

[Footnote 57: Wilken, _Het animisme bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel_, i. 44.]

[Footnote 58: Brebeuf, 'Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans le pays des Hurons,' in _Relations des Jésuites_, 1636, p. 104 _sq._ Hewitt, 'The Iroquoian Concept of the Soul,' in _Jour. of American Folk-Lore_, viii. 109.]

[Footnote 59: Steinmetz, in _American Anthropologist_, vii. 58 (Niase).]

[Footnote 60: Matthews, _Ethnography and Philology of the Hidatsa Indians_, p. 49.]

It is, however, hard to believe that the fate of the self-murderer, whether it be annihilation, a vagrant existence on earth, or separation in the other world, was originally meant as a punishment; for a similar lot is assigned to the souls of persons who have been drowned,[61] or who have died by accident or violence.[62] It seems that the suicide's future state is in the first place supposed to depend upon the treatment of his corpse. Frequently he is denied burial, or at least the ordinary funeral rites,[63] and this may give rise to the notion that his soul never comes to rest or, possibly, even ceases to exist. Or he is buried by himself, apart from the other dead,[64] in which case his soul must naturally remain equally isolated. Among the Alabama Indians, for instance, "when a man kills himself, either in despair or in a sickness, he is deprived of burial, and thrown into the river."[65] In Dahomey "the body of any person committing suicide is not allowed to be buried, but thrown out into the fields to be devoured by wild beasts."[66] Among the Fantis of the Gold Coast "il y a des places réservées aux suicides et à ceux qui sont morts de la petite vérole. Ils sont enterrés à l'écart loin de toute {239} habitation et de tout chemin public."[67] In the Pelew Islands a self-murderer is buried not with his own deceased relatives, but in the place where he ended his life, as are also the corpses of those who fall in war.[68] Among the Bannavs of Cambodia "anyone who perishes by his own hand is buried in a corner of the forest far from the graves of his brethren."[69] Among the Sea Dyaks "those who commit suicide are buried in different places from others, as it is supposed that they will not be allowed to mix in the seven-storied heaven with such of their fellow-country men as come by their death in a natural manner or from the influence of the spirits."[70] The motive for thus treating self-murderers' bodies is superstitious fear. Their ghosts, as the ghosts of persons who have died by any other violent means or by accident, are supposed to be particularly malevolent,[71] owing to their unnatural mode of death[72] or to the desperate or angry state of mind in which they left this life. If they are not buried at all, or if they are buried in the spot where they died or in a separate place, that is either because nobody dares to interfere with them, or in order to prevent them from mixing with the other dead. So also murdered persons are sometimes left unburied,[73] and people who are supposed to have been killed by evil spirits are buried apart;[74] whilst those struck with lightning are either denied interment,[75] or buried where they fell and in the position in which they died.[76] We sometimes hear of a connection between the way in which a suicide's body is treated and the moral opinion as regards his deed. Among the Alabama Indians his corpse {240} is said to be thrown into the river "because he is looked upon as a coward";[77] and of the Ossetes M. Kovalewsky states that they bury suicides far away from other dead persons because they regard their act as sinful.[78] But we may be sure that moral condemnation is not the original cause of these practices.

[Footnote 61: Teit, _loc. cit._ p. 359 (Thompson Indians).]

[Footnote 62: Soppitt, _Kuki-Lushai Tribes_, p. 12. Anderson, _Mandalay to Momien_, p. 146 (Kakhyens). Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 287 (Brazilian Indians). _Supra_, ii. 237. The Central Eskimo believe that all who die by accident or by violence, and women who die in childbirth, are taken to the upper, happier world (Boas, 'Central Eskimo,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi. 590). According to the belief of the Behring Strait Eskimo, the shades of shamans, or persons who die by accident, violence, or starvation, go to a land of plenty in the sky, where there is light, food, and water in abundance, whereas the shades of people who die from natural causes go to the underground land of the dead (Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 423).]

[Footnote 63: See Lasch, 'Die Behandlung der Leiche des Selbstmorders,' in _Globus_, lxxvi. 63 _sqq._]

[Footnote 64: _Ibid._ p. 65.]

[Footnote 65: Bossu, _Travels through Louisiana_, i. 258.]

[Footnote 66: M'Leod, _Voyage to Africa_, p. 48 _sq._ I am indebted to Mr. N. W. Thomas for drawing my attention to this and a few other statements in the present chapter.]

[Footnote 67: Gallaud, 'A la Côte d'Or,' in _Les missions catholiques_, xxv. 347.]

[Footnote 68: Kubary, in _Original-Mittheil. aus der ethnol. Abtheil. d. königl. Museen zu Berlin_, i. 78.]

[Footnote 69: Comte, quoted by Mouhot, _op. cit._ ii. 28. See also 'Das Volk der Bannar,' in _Mittheil. d. Geogr. Ges. zu Jena_, iii. 9.]

[Footnote 70: St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 69.]

[Footnote 71: Lasch, in _Globus_, lxxvi. 65. _Cf._ Liebrecht, _Zur Volkskunde_, p. 414 _sq._]

[Footnote 72: Lippert, _Der Seelencult_, p. 11. Kubary, in _Original-Mittheil. aus der ethnol. Abtheil. d. königl. Museen zu Berlin_, i. 78.]

[Footnote 73: Rosenberg, _Der malayische Archipel_, p. 461 (Papuans of Dorey).]

[Footnote 74: Hodson, 'Native Tribes of Manipur,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxi. 305 _sq._]

[Footnote 75: Burton, _Mission to Gelele_, ii. 142 _sq._ (Dahomans).]

[Footnote 76: La Flesche, in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, ii. 11 (Omahas).]

[Footnote 77: Bossu, _op. cit._ i. 258.]

[Footnote 78: Kovalewsky, _Coutume contemporaine et loi ancienne_, p. 327.]

It is comparatively seldom that savages are reported to attach any stigma to suicide. To the instances mentioned above a few others may be added. The Waganda, we are told, greatly condemn the act.[79] Among the Bogos "a man never despairs, never gives himself up, and considers suicide as the greatest indignity."[80] The Karens of Burma deem it an act of cowardice; but at the same time they have no command against it, they "seem to see little or no guilt in it," and "we are nowhere told that it is displeasing to the God of heaven and earth."[81] The Dacotahs said of a girl who had destroyed herself because her parents had turned her beloved from the wigwam, and would force her to marry a man she hated, that her spirit did not watch over her earthly remains, being offended when she brought trouble upon her aged mother and father.[82] In Dahomey "it is criminal to attempt to commit suicide, because every man is the property of the king. The bodies of suicides are exposed to public execration, and the head is always struck off and sent to Agbomi; at the expense of the family if the suicide were a free man, at that of his master if he were a slave."[83] On the other hand, it is expressly stated of various savages that they do not punish attempts to commit suicide.[84] The negroes of Accra see nothing wrong in the act. "Why," they would ask, "should a person not be {241} allowed to die, when he no longer desires to live?" But they inflict cruel punishments upon slaves who try to put an end to themselves, in order to deter other slaves from doing the same.[85] Among the Pelew Islanders suicide "is neither praised nor blamed."[86] The Eskimo around Northumberland Inlet and Davis Strait believe that any one who has been killed by accident, or who has taken his own life, certainly goes to the happy place after death.[87] The Chippewas hold suicide "to be a foolish, not a reprehensible action," and do not believe it to entail any punishment in the other world.[88] In his sketches of the manners and customs of the North American Indians, Buchanan writes:--"Suicide is not considered by the Indians either as an act of heroism or of cowardice, nor is it with them a subject of praise or blame. They view this desperate act as the consequence of mental derangement, and the person who destroys himself is to them an object of pity."[89]

[Footnote 79: Felkin, in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 723.]

[Footnote 80: Munzinger, _Die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_, p. 93.]

[Footnote 81: Mason, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxvii. pt. ii. 141.]

[Footnote 82: Eastman, _op. cit._ p. 169.]

[Footnote 83: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 224.]

[Footnote 84: Leuschner, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 24 (Bakwiri). Nicole, _ibid._ p. 135 (Diakité-Sarracolese). Lang, _ibid._ p. 262 (Washambala). Rautanen, _ibid._ p. 343 (Ondonga). Sorge, _ibid._ p. 421 (Nissan Islanders). Senfft, _ibid._ p. 452 (Marshall Islanders).]

[Footnote 85: Monrad, _op. cit._ pp. 23, 25.]

[Footnote 86: Kubary, in _Original-Mittheil. aus der ethnol. Abtheil. d. königl. Museen zu Berlin_, i. 78.]

[Footnote 87: Hall, _Arctic Researches_, p. 572. _Cf._ _supra_, ii. 238, n. 3.]

[Footnote 88: Keating, _op. cit._ ii. 172.]

[Footnote 89: Buchanan, _Sketches of the History, &c. of the North American Indians_, p. 184.]

From the opinions on suicide held by uncivilised races we shall pass to those prevalent among peoples of a higher culture. In China suicide is extremely common among all classes and among persons of all ages.[90] For those who have been impelled to this course by a sense of honour the gates of heaven open wide, and tablets bearing their names are erected in the temples in honour of virtuous men or women. As honourable self-murderers are regarded servants or officers of state who choose not to survive a defeat in battle or an insult offered to the sovereign of their country; young men who, when an insult has been paid to their parents which they are unable to avenge, prefer not to survive it; and women who kill {242} themselves on the death of their husbands or _fiancés_.[91] In spite of imperial prohibitions, sutteeism of widowed wives and brides has continued to flourish in China down to this day, and meets with the same public applause as ever;[92] whilst those widowed wives and brides who have lost their lives in preserving their chastity, are entitled both to an honorary gate and to a place in a temple of the State as an object of worship.[93] Another common form of suicide which is admired as heroic in China is that committed for the purpose of taking revenge upon an enemy who is otherwise out of reach--according to Chinese ideas a most effective mode of revenge, not only because the law throws the responsibility of the deed on him who occasioned it, but also because the disembodied soul is supposed to be better able than the living man to persecute the enemy.[94] The Chinese have a firm belief in the wandering spirits of persons who have died by violence; thus self-murderers are supposed to haunt the places where they committed the fatal deed and endeavour to persuade others to follow their example, at times even attempting to play executioner by strangling those who reject their advances.[95] "Violent deaths," says Mr. Giles, "are regarded with horror by the Chinese";[96] and suicides committed from meaner motives are reprobated.[97] It is said in the Yü Li, or "Divine Panorama"--a Taouist work which is very popular all over the Chinese Empire--that whilst persons who kill themselves out of loyalty, filial piety, chastity, or friendship, will go to heaven, those who do so "in a trivial burst of rage, or fearing the consequences of a crime which would not amount to death, or in the hope of falsely injuring a {243} fellow-creature," will be severely punished in the infernal regions.[98] No pardon will be granted them; they are not, like other sinners, allowed to claim their good works as a set-off against evil, whereby they might partly escape the agonies of hell and receive some reward for their virtuous deeds.[99] Sometimes suicide is classified by the Chinese as an offence against religion, on the ground that a person owes his being to Heaven, and is therefore responsible to Heaven for due care of the gift.[100]

[Footnote 90: Gray, _China_, i. 329. Huc, _The Chinese Empire_, p. 181. Matignon, 'Le suicide en Chine,' in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xii. 367 _sqq._ Cathonay, 'Aux environs de Foutchéon,' in _Les missions catholiques_, xxxi. 341 _sq._ Ball, _Things Chinese_, p. 564 _sqq._]

[Footnote 91: Gray, _op. cit._ i. 337 _sqq._]

[Footnote 92: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 748. Ball, _op. cit._ p. 565. Cathonay, in _Les missions catholiques_, xxxi. 341.]

[Footnote 93: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 792.]

[Footnote 94: Huc, _op. cit._ p. 181. Matignon, in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xii. 371 _sqq._ de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. iv. book) ii. 450 _sq._ Cathonay, in _Les missions catholiques_, xxxi. 341 _sq._ Ball, _op. cit._ p. 566 _sq._]

[Footnote 95: Davis, _China_, ii. 94. Dennys, _Folk-Lore of China_, p. 74 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, ii. 363, n. 9.]

[Footnote 97: Gray, _op. cit._ i. 337.]

[Footnote 98: Giles, _op. cit._ ii. 365.]

[Footnote 99: _Ibid._ ii. 363.]

[Footnote 100: Alabaster, _Notes and Commentaries on Chinese Criminal Law_, p. 304.]

"The Japanese calendar of saints," says Mr. Griffis, "is not filled with reformers, alms-givers, and founders of hospitals or orphanages, but is overcrowded with canonised suicides and committers of _harakiri_. Even to-day, no man more . . . surely draws homage to his tomb, securing even apotheosis, than the suicide, though he may have committed a crime."[101] There were two kinds of _harakiri_, or "belly-cutting," one obligatory and the other voluntary. The former was a boon granted by government, who graciously permitted criminals of the Samurai, or military, class thus to destroy themselves instead of being handed over to the common executioner; but this custom is now quite extinct. Voluntary _harakiri_, again, was practised out of loyalty to a dead superior, or in order to protest, when other protests might be unavailing, against the erroneous conduct of a living superior, or to avoid beheading by the enemy in a lost battle, or to restore injured honour if revenge was impossible. Under any circumstances _harakiri_ cleansed from every stain, and ensured an honourable interment and a respected memory.[102] It is said in a Japanese manuscript, "To slay his enemy against whom he has cause of hatred, and then to kill himself, is the part of a noble Samurai, and it is sheer nonsense to look upon the place where he has disembowelled {244} himself as polluted."[103] In old days the ceremony used to be performed in a temple.[104]

[Footnote 101: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 112.]

[Footnote 102: Chamberlain, _Things Japanese_, p. 219 _sqq._ Rein, _Japan_, p. 328. Kühne, in _Globus_, lxxiv. 166 _sq._ A very full account of the ceremony of _harakiri_ is given in Mitford's _Tales of Old Japan_, ii. 193 _sqq._, from a rare Japanese manuscript.]

[Footnote 103: Mitford, _op. cit._ ii. 201.]

[Footnote 104: _Ibid._ ii. 196.]

Among the Hindus we meet with the practice of self-immolation of widows--until recently very prevalent in many parts of India[105]--and various forms of self-destruction for religious purposes. Suicide has always been considered by the Hindus to be one of the most acceptable rites that can be offered to their deities. According to the Ayen Akbery, there were five kinds of suicide held to be meritorious in the Hindu, namely:--starving; covering himself with cow-dung and setting it on fire and consuming himself therein; burying himself in snow; immersing himself in the water at the extremity of Bengal, where the Ganges discharges itself into the sea through a thousand channels, enumerating his sins, and praying till the alligators come and devour him; cutting his throat at Allahabad, at the confluence of the Ganges and Jumna.[106] To these might be added drowning at Hurdwar, Allahabad, and Saugor; perishing in the cold of the Himalayas; the practice of dying under the wheels of Juggurnath's car;[107] and the custom of men throwing themselves down from certain rocks to fulfil the vows of their mothers, or to receive forgiveness for sins, or to be re-born rajas in their next state of transmigration.[108] It is also common for persons who are afflicted with leprosy or any other incurable disease to bury or drown themselves with due ceremonies, by which they are considered acceptable sacrifices to the deity,[109] or to roll themselves into fires with the notion that thus purified they will receive a happy transmigration into a healthy body.[110] Suicide was further {245} resorted to by Brâhmans for the purpose of avenging an injury, as it was believed that the ghost of the deceased would persecute the offender, and, presumably, also because of the great efficacy which was attributed to the curse of a dying Brâhman.[111] When one of the Rajput rajas once levied a war-subsidy on the Brâhmans, some of the wealthiest, having expostulated in vain, poniarded themselves in his presence, pouring maledictions on his head with their last breath; and thus cursed, the raja laboured under a ban of excommunication even amongst his personal friends.[112] We are told of a Brâhman girl who, having been seduced by a certain raja, burned herself to death, and in dying imprecated the most fearful curses on the raja's kindred, after which they were visited with such a succession of disasters that they abandoned their family settlement at Baliya, where the woman's tomb is worshipped to this day.[113] Once when a raja ordered the house of a Brâhman to be demolished and resumed the lands which had been conferred upon him, the latter fasted till he died at the palace gate, and became thus a Brahm, or malignant Brâhman ghost, who avenged the injury he had suffered by destroying the raja and his house.[114] At Azimghur, in 1835, a Brâhman "threw himself down a well, that his ghost might haunt his neighbour."[115] The same idea undoubtedly underlies the custom of "sitting _dharna_" which was practised by creditors who sat down before the doors of their debtors threatening to starve themselves to death if their claims were not paid;[116] and the sin attached to causing the death of a Brâhman would further increase the efficacy of the creditor's threats.[117] At the same time religious suicide is said to be a crime in a Brâhman.[118] And in the sacred books we read that for him who destroys {246} himself by means of wood, water, clods of earth, stones, weapons, poison, or a rope, no funeral rites shall be performed by his relatives;[119] that he who resolves to die by his own hand shall fast for three days; and that he who attempts suicide, but remains alive, shall perform severe penance.[120] The Buddhists allow a man under certain circumstances to take his own life, but maintain that generally dire miseries are in store for the self-murderer, and look upon him as one who must have sinned deeply in a former state of existence.[121] It should be added that in India, as elsewhere, the souls of those who have killed themselves or met death by any other violent means are regarded as particularly malevolent and troublesome.[122]

[Footnote 105: Malcolm, _Memoir of Central India_, ii. 206 _sqq._ Chevers, _Manual of Medical Jurisprudence for India_, p. 665. _Cf._ _supra_, i. 473 _sq._ Sir John Malcolm observes (_op. cit._ ii. 206, n. [double dagger]) that the practice of suttee was not always confined to widows, but that sometimes mothers burned themselves on the death of their only sons.]

[Footnote 106: Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 664. _Cf._ _Laws of Manu_, vi. 31.]

[Footnote 107: _Ibid._ p. 664. Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 115 _sqq._ Rájendralála Mitra, _Indo-Aryans_, ii. 70.]

[Footnote 108: Sleeman, _Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official_, i. 132 _sq._ Malcolm, _Memoir of Central India_, ii. 209 _sqq._ Forsyth, _Highlands of Central India_, p. 172 _sq._]

[Footnote 109: Sleeman, _op. cit._ ii. 344 _sq._]

[Footnote 110: Ward, _op. cit._ ii. 119.]

[Footnote 111: Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 659 _sqq._ Crooke, _Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India_, i. 191 _sqq._ van Mökern, _Ostindien_, i. 319 _sqq._]

[Footnote 112: Tod, quoted by Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 659 _sq._]

[Footnote 113: Crooke, _op. cit._ i. 193.]

[Footnote 114: _Ibid._ i. 191 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 663.]

[Footnote 116: _Cf._ Steinmetz, 'Gli antichi scongiuri giuridici contro i creditori,' in _Rivista italiana di sociologia_, ii. 58. For the practice of _dharna_ see _ibid._ p. 37 _sqq._; Balfour, _Cyclopædia of India_, i. 934 _sq._; van Mökern, _op. cit._ i. 322 _sq._]

[Footnote 117: _Cf._ Jones, quoted by Balfour, _op. cit._ i. 935.]

[Footnote 118: Ward, _op. cit._ ii. 115. Forsyth, _op. cit._ p. 173.]

[Footnote 119: _Vasishtha_, xxiii. 14 _sq._]

[Footnote 120: _Ibid._ xxiii. 18 _sqq._]

[Footnote 121: Hardy, _Manual of Budhism_, p. 479.]

[Footnote 122: Crooke, _Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India_, i. 269. Fawcett, 'Nâyars of Malabar,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iii. 253.]

The Old Testament mentions a few cases of suicide.[123] In none of them is any censure passed on the perpetrator of the deed, nor is there any text which expressly forbids a man to die by his own hand; and of Ahithophel it is said that he was buried in the sepulchre of his father.[124] It seems, however, that according to Jewish custom persons who had killed themselves should be left unburied till sunset,[125] perhaps for fear lest the spirit of the deceased otherwise might find its way back to the old home.[126] Josephus, who mentions this custom, denounces suicide as an act of cowardice, as a crime most remote from the common nature of all animals, as impiety against the Creator; and he maintains that the souls of those who have thus acted madly against themselves will go to the darkest place in Hades.[127] The Talmud considers suicide justifiable, if not meritorious, in the case of the chief of a vanquished army who is sure of disgrace and death at the hands of the exulting conqueror,[128] or when a person has {247} reason to fear being forced to renounce his religion.[129] In all other circumstances the Rabbis consider it criminal for a person to shorten his own life, even when he is undergoing tortures which must soon end his earthly career;[130] and they forbid all marks of mourning for a self-murderer, such as wearing sombre apparel and eulogising him.[131] Islam prohibits suicide, as an act which interferes with the decrees of God.[132] Muhammedans say that it is a greater sin for a person to kill himself than to kill a fellow-man;[133] and, as a matter of fact, suicide is very rare in the Moslem world.[134]

[Footnote 123: _1 Samuel_, xxxi. 4 _sq._ _2 Samuel_, xvii. 23. _1 Kings_, xvi. 18. _2 Maccabees_, xiv. 4 _sqq._]

[Footnote 124: _2 Samuel_, xvii. 23.]

[Footnote 125: Josephus, _De bello Judaico_, iii. 8. 5.]

[Footnote 126: _Cf._ Frazer, 'Burial Customs as illustrative of the Primitive Theory of the Soul,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 72.]

[Footnote 127: Josephus, _op. cit._ iii. 8. 5.]

[Footnote 128: _Cf._ _1 Samuel_, xxxi. 4.]

[Footnote 129: _Guittin_, 57 B, quoted by Mendelsohn, _Criminal Jurisprudence of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 77, n. 163. _Cf._ _2 Maccabees_, xiv. 37 _sqq._]

[Footnote 130: _Ab Zara_, 18 A, quoted by Mendelsohn, _op. cit._ p. 78, n. 163.]

[Footnote 131: Mendelsohn, _op. cit._ p. 77.]

[Footnote 132: _Koran_, iv. 33.]

[Footnote 133: I have often heard this myself. _Cf._ Westcott, _Suicide_, p. 12.]

[Footnote 134: Lisle, _Du suicide_, pp. 305, 345 _sq._ Legoyt, _Le suicide ancien et moderne_, p. 7. Morselli, _Il suicidio_, p. 33. Westcott, _op. cit._ p. 12.]

Ancient Greece had its honourable suicides. The Milesian and Corinthian women, who by a voluntary death escaped from falling into the hands of the enemy, were praised in epigrams.[135] The story that Themistocles preferred death to bearing arms against his native country was circulated with a view to doing honour to his memory.[136] The tragedians frequently give expression to the idea that suicide is in certain circumstances becoming to a noble mind.[137] Hecuba blames Helena for not putting an end to her life by a rope or a sword.[138] Phaedra[139] and Leda[140] kill themselves out of shame, Haemon from violent remorse.[141] Ajax decides to die after having in vain attempted to kill the Atreidae, maintaining that "one of generous strain should nobly live, or forthwith nobly die."[142] Instances are, moreover, mentioned of women killing themselves on the death of their husbands;[143] and in Cheos it was the custom to prevent {248} the decrepitude of old age by a voluntary death.[144] At Athens the right hand of a person who had taken his own life was struck off and buried apart from the rest of the body,[145] evidently in order to make him harmless after death.[146] Plato says in his 'Laws,' probably in agreement with Attic custom, that those who inflict death upon themselves "from sloth or want of manliness," shall be buried alone in such places as are uncultivated and nameless, and that no column or inscription shall mark the spot where they are interred.[147] At Thebes self-murderers were deprived of the accustomed funeral ceremonies,[148] and in Cyprus they were left unburied.[149] The objections which philosophers raised against the commission of suicide were no doubt to some extent shared by popular sentiments. Pythagoras is represented as saying that we should not abandon our station in life without the orders of our commander, that is, God.[150] According to the Platonic Socrates, the gods are our guardians and we are a possession of theirs, hence "there may be reason in saying that a man should wait, and not take his own life until God summons him."[151] Aristotle, again, maintains that he who from rage kills himself commits a wrong against the State, and that therefore the State punishes him and civil infamy is attached to him.[152] The religious argument could not be foreign to a people who regarded it as impious interference in the order of nature to make a bridge over the Hellespont and to separate a landscape from the continent;[153] and the idea that suicide is a matter of public concern evidently prevailed in Massilia, where no man was allowed to make away with himself unless the magistrates had given him permission to do so.[154] But the {249} opinions of the philosophers were anything but unanimous.[155] Plato himself, in his 'Laws,' has no word of censure for him who deprives himself by violence of his appointed share of life under the compulsion of some painful and inevitable misfortune, or out of irremediable and intolerable shame.[156] Hegesias, surnamed the "death-persuader," who belonged to the Cyrenaic school, tried to prove the utter worthlessness and unprofitableness of life.[157] According to Epicurus we ought to consider "whether it be better that death should come to us, or we go to him."[158] The Stoics, especially, advocated suicide as a relief from all kinds of misery.[159] Seneca remarks that it is a man's own fault if he suffers, as, by putting an end to himself, he can put an end to his misery:--"As I would choose a ship to sail in, or a house to live in, so would I choose the most tolerable death when about to die. . . . Human affairs are in such a happy situation, that no one need be wretched but by choice. Do you like to be wretched? Live. Do you like it not? It is in your power to return from whence you came."[160] The Stoics did not deny that it is wrong to commit suicide in cases where the act would be an injury to society;[161] Seneca himself points out that Socrates lived thirty days in prison in expectation of death, so as to submit to the laws of his country, and to give his friends the enjoyment of his conversation to the last.[162] Epictetus opposes indiscriminate suicide on religious grounds:--"Friends, wait for God; when he shall give the signal and release you from this service, then go to him; but for the present endure to dwell in the place where he has put you."[163] Such a signal, however, is given often enough: it may consist in incurable disease, intolerable pain, or misery of any kind. "Remember this: the door is open; be not more timid {250} than little children, but as they say, when the thing does not please them, 'I will play no longer,' so do you, when things seem to you of such a kind, say I will no longer play, and be gone: but if you stay, do not complain."[164] Pliny says that the power of dying when you please is the best thing that God has given to man amidst all the sufferings of life.[165]

[Footnote 135: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 443.]

[Footnote 136: Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, xi. 58. 2 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: See Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 442 _sqq._]

[Footnote 138: Euripides, _Troades_, 1012 _sqq._]

[Footnote 139: _Idem_, _Hippolytus_, 715 _sqq._]

[Footnote 140: _Idem_, _Helena_, 134 _sqq._]

[Footnote 141: Sophocles, _Antigone_, 1234 _sqq._]

[Footnote 142: _Idem_, _Ajax_, 470 _sqq._ _Cf._ _ibid._ 654 _sqq._]

[Footnote 143: Euripides, _Supplices_, 1000 _sqq._ Pausanias, iv. 2. 7.]

[Footnote 144: Strabo, _Geographica_, x. 5. 6, p. 486. Aelian, _Varia historia_, iii. 37. _Cf._ Boeckh, _Gesammelte kleine Schriften_, vii. 345 _sqq._; Welcker, _Kleine Schriften_, ii. 502 _sq._]

[Footnote 145: Aeschines, _In Ctesiphontem_, 244.]

[Footnote 146: Some Australian natives cut off the thumb of the right hand of a dead foe in order to make his spirit unable to throw the spear efficiently (Oldfield, in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. iii. 287).]

[Footnote 147: Plato, _Leges_, ix. 873.]

[Footnote 148: Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 104.]

[Footnote 149: Dio Chrysostom, _Orationes_, lxiv. 3.]

[Footnote 150: Cicero, _Cato Major_, 20 (73).]

[Footnote 151: Plato, _Phædo_, p. 62.]

[Footnote 152: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, v. 11. 3.]

[Footnote 153: See Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 83, 441; Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 202, n. 1.]

[Footnote 154: Valerius Maximus, _Factorum dictorumque memorabilia_, ii. 6. 7.]

[Footnote 155: See Geiger, _Der Selbstmord im klassischen Altertum_, p. 5 _sqq._]

[Footnote 156: Plato, _Leges_, ix. 873.]

[Footnote 157: Cicero, _Tusculanæ quæstiones_, i. 34 (83 _sq._). Valerius Maximus, viii. 9. Externa 3.]

[Footnote 158: Epicurus, quoted by Seneca, _Epistulæ_, 26.]

[Footnote 159: See Geiger, _op. cit._ p. 15 _sqq._]

[Footnote 160: Seneca, _Epistulæ_, 70. See also _Idem_, _De ira_, iii. 15; _Idem_, _Consolatia ad Marciam_, 20.]

[Footnote 161: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 214, n. 1.]

[Footnote 162: Seneca, _Epistulæ_, 70.]

[Footnote 163: Epictetus, _Dissertationes_, i. 9. 16.]

[Footnote 164: _Ibid._ i. 24. 20; i. 25. 20 _sq._; ii. 16. 37 _sqq._; iii. 13. 14; iii. 24. 95 _sqq._]

[Footnote 165: Pliny, _Historia naturalis_, ii. 5 (7).]

It seems that the Roman people, before the influence of Christianity made itself felt, regarded suicide with considerable moral indifference. According to Servius, it was provided by the Pontifical laws that whoever hanged himself should be cast out unburied;[166] but from what has been said before it is probable that this practice only owed its origin to fear of the dead man's ghost. Vergil enumerates self-murderers not among the guilty, but among the unfortunate, confounding them with infants who have died prematurely and persons who have been condemned to die on a false charge.[167] Throughout the whole history of pagan Rome there was no statute declaring it to be a crime for an ordinary citizen to take his own life. The self-murderer's rights were in no way affected by his deed, his memory was no less honoured than if he had died a natural death, his will was recognised by law, and the regular order of succession was not interfered with.[168] In Roman law there are only two noteworthy exceptions to the rule that suicide is a matter with which the State has nothing to do: it was prohibited in the case of soldiers,[169] and the enactment was made that the suicide of an accused person should entail the same consequences as his condemnation; but in the latter instance the deed was admitted as a confession of guilt.[170] On the other {251} hand, it seems to have been the general opinion in Rome that suicide under certain circumstances is an heroic and praiseworthy act.[171] Even Cicero, who professed the doctrine of Pythagoras,[172] approved of the death of Cato.[173]

[Footnote 166: Servius, _Commentarii in Virgilii Æneidos_, xii. 603.]

[Footnote 167: Vergil, _Æneis_, vi. 426 _sqq._]

[Footnote 168: Bourquelot, 'Recherches sur les opinions et la législation en matière de mort volontaire pendant le moyen age,' in _Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes_, iii. 544. Geiger, _op. cit._ p. 64 _sqq._ Bynkershoek, _Observationes Juris Romani_, iv. 4, p. 350.]

[Footnote 169: _Digesta_, xlix. 16. 6. 7.]

[Footnote 170: _Ibid._ xlviii. 21. 3 pr. _Cf._ Bourquelot, _op. cit._ iii. 543 sq.; Gibbon, _Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, v. 326; Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 219.]

[Footnote 171: Stäudlin, _Geschichte der Vorstellungen und Lehren vom Selbstmorde_, p. 62 _sq._]

[Footnote 172: Cicero, _Cato Major_, 20 (72 _sq._).]

[Footnote 173: _Idem_, _De officiis_, i. 31 (112).]

In no question of morality was there a greater difference between classical and Christian doctrines than in regard to suicide. The earlier Fathers of the Church still allowed, or even approved of, suicide in certain cases, namely, when committed in order to procure martyrdom,[174] or to avoid apostacy, or to retain the crown of virginity. To bring death upon ourselves voluntarily, says Lactantius, is a wicked and impious deed; "but when urged to the alternative, either of forsaking God and relinquishing faith, or of expecting all torture and death, then it is that undaunted in spirit we defy that death with all its previous threats and terrors which others fear."[175] Eusebius and other ecclesiastical writers mention several instances of Christian women putting an end to their lives when their chastity was in danger, and their acts are spoken of with tenderness, if not approbation; indeed, some of them were admitted into the calendar of saints.[176] This admission was due to the extreme honour in which virginity was held by the Fathers; St. Jerome, who denied that it was lawful in times of persecution to die by one's own hands, made an exception for cases in which a person's chastity was at stake.[177] But even this exception was abolished by St. Augustine. He allows that the virgins who laid violent hands upon themselves are worthy of compassion, but declares that there was no necessity for their doing so, since chastity is a virtue of {252} the mind which is not lost by the body being in captivity to the will and superior force of another. He argues that there is no passage in the canonical Scriptures which permits us to destroy ourselves either with a view to obtaining immortality or to avoiding calamity. On the contrary, suicide is prohibited in the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill," namely, "neither thyself nor another"; for he who kills himself kills no other but a man.[178] This doctrine, which assimilates suicide with murder, was adopted by the Church.[179] Nay, self-murder was declared to be the worst form of murder, "the most grievous thing of all";[180] already St. Chrysostom had declared that "if it is base to destroy others, much more is it to destroy one's self."[181] The self-murderer was deprived of rights which were granted to all other criminals. In the sixth century a Council at Orleans enjoined that "the oblations of those who were killed in the commission of any crime may be received, except of such as laid violent hands on themselves";[182] and a subsequent Council denied self-murderers the usual rites of Christian burial.[183] It was even said that Judas committed a greater sin in killing himself than in betraying his master Christ to a certain death.[184]

[Footnote 174: See Barbeyrac, _Traité de la morale des Pères de l'Église_, pp. 18, 122 _sq._; Buonafede, _Istoria critica e filosofica del suicidio_, p. 135 _sqq._; Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 45 _sq._]

[Footnote 175: Lactantius, _Divines Institutiones_, vi. ('De vero cultu') 17 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vi. 697).]

[Footnote 176: Eusebius, _Historia ecclesiastica_, viii. 12 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, xx. 769 _sqq._), 14 (_ibid._ col. 785 _sqq._). St. Ambrose, _De virginibus_, xiii. 7 (Migne, _op. cit._ xvi. 229 _sqq._). St. Chrysostom, _Homilia encomiastica in S. Martyrem Pelagiam_ (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, l. 579 sqq.).]

[Footnote 177: St. Jerome, _Commentarii in Jonam_, i. 12 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxv. 1129).]

[Footnote 178: St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, i. 16 _sqq._]

[Footnote 179: Gratian, _Decretum_, ii. 23. 5. 9. 3.]

[Footnote 180: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 64. 5. 3.]

[Footnote 181: St. Chrysostom, _In Epistolam ad Galatas commentarius_, i. 4 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, lxi. 618 _sq._).]

[Footnote 182: _Concilium Aurelianense II._ A.D. 533, can. 15 (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, viii. 837). See also _Concilium Autisiodorense_, A.D. 578, can. 17 (Labbe-Mansi, ix. 913).]

[Footnote 183: _Concilium Bracarense II._ A.D. 563, cap. 16 (Labbe-Mansi, _op. cit._ ix. 779).]

[Footnote 184: Damhouder, _Praxis rerum criminalium_, lviii. 2 _sq._, p. 258. See Gratian, _op. cit._ ii. 33. 3. 3. 38. At the trial of the Marquise de Brinvilliers in 1676, the presiding judge said to the prisoner that "the greatest of all her crimes, horrible as they were, was, not the poisoning of her father and brothers, but her attempt to poison herself" (Ives, _Classification of Crimes_, p. 36).]

According to the Christian doctrine, as formulated by Thomas Aquinas, suicide is utterly unlawful for three reasons. First, everything naturally loves itself and preserves itself in being; suicide is against a natural inclination and contrary to the charity which a man ought to bear towards himself, and consequently a mortal sin. {253} Secondly, by killing himself a person does an injury to the community of which he is a part. Thirdly, "life is a gift divinely bestowed on man, and subject to His power who 'killeth and maketh alive'; and therefore he who takes his own life sins against God, as he who kills another man's slave sins against the master to whom the slave belongs, and as he sins who usurps the office of judge on a point not referred to him; for to God alone belongs judgment of life and death."[185] The second of these arguments is borrowed from Aristotle, and is entirely foreign to the spirit of early Christianity. The notion of patriotism being a moral duty was habitually discouraged by it, and, as Mr. Lecky observes, "it was impossible to urge the civic argument against suicide without at the same time condemning the hermit life, which in the third century became the ideal of the Church."[186] But the other arguments are deeply rooted in some of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity--in the sacredness of human life, in the duty of absolute submission to God's will, and in the extreme importance attached to the moment of death. The earthly life is a preparation for eternity; sufferings which are sent by God are not to be evaded, but to be endured.[187] The man who deliberately takes away the life which was given him by the Creator displays the utmost disregard for the will and authority of his Master; and, worst of all, he does so in the very last minute of his life, when his doom is sealed for ever. His deed, as Thomas Aquinas says, is "the most dangerous thing of all, because no time is left to expiate it by repentance."[188] He who kills a fellow-creature does not in the same degree renounce the protection of God; he kills only the body, whereas the self-murderer kills both the body and the soul.[189] By denying the latter the right of Christian {254} burial the Church recognises that he has placed himself outside her pale.

[Footnote 185: Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 64. 5.]

[Footnote 186: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 44.]

[Footnote 187: _Cf._ St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, i. 23.]

[Footnote 188: Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 64. 5. 3. _Cf._ St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, i. 25.]

[Footnote 189: Damhouder, _op. cit._ lxxxviii. 1 _sq._, p. 258.]

The condemnation of the Church influenced the secular legislation. The provisions of the Councils were introduced into the law-books. In France Louis IX. enforced the penalty of confiscating the self-murderer's property,[190] and laws to the same effect were passed in other European countries.[191] Louis XIV. assimilated the crime of suicide to that of _lèze majesté_.[192] According to the law of Scotland, "self-murder is as highly criminal as the killing our neighbour."[193] In England suicide is still regarded by the law as murder committed by a man on himself;[194] and, unless declared insane, the self-murderer forfeited his property as late as the year 1870, when forfeitures for felony were abolished.[195] In Russia, to this day, the testamentary dispositions of a suicide are deemed void by the law.[196]

[Footnote 190: _Les Établissements de Saint Louis_, i. 92, vol. ii. 150.]

[Footnote 191: Bourquelot, _op. cit._ iv. 263. Morselli, _op. cit._ p. 196 _sq._]

[Footnote 192: Louis XIV., 'Ordonnance criminelle,' A.D. 1670, xxii. 1, in Isambert, Decrusy, and Taillandier, _Recueil général des anciennes lois françaises_, xviii. 414.]

[Footnote 193: Erskine-Rankine, _Principles of the Law of Scotland_, p. 559.]

[Footnote 194: Stephen, _History of the Criminal Law of England_, iii. 104. For earlier times see Bracton, _De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ_, fol. 150, vol. ii. 504 _sq._]

[Footnote 195: Stephen, _op. cit._ iii. 105.]

[Footnote 196: Foinitzki, in von Liszt, _La législation pénale comparée_, p. 548.]

The horror of suicide also found a vent in outrages committed on the dead body. Of a woman who drowned herself in Edinburgh in 1598, we are told that her body was "harled through the town backwards, and thereafter hanged on the gallows."[197] In France, as late as the middle of the eighteenth century, self-murderers were dragged upon a hurdle through the streets with the face turned to the ground; they were then hanged up with the head downwards, and finally thrown into the common sewer.[198] However, in most cases the treatment to which suicides bodies were subject was not originally meant as a punishment, but was intended to prevent their spirits {255} from causing mischief. All over Europe wandering tendencies have been ascribed to their ghosts.[199] In some countries the corpse of a suicide is supposed to make barren the earth with which it comes in contact,[200] or to produce hailstorms or tempests[201] or drought.[202] At Lochbroom, in the North-West of Scotland, the people believe that if the remains of a self-murderer be taken to any burying-ground which is within sight of the sea or of cultivated land, this would prove disastrous both to fishing and agriculture, or, in the words of the people, would cause "famine (or dearth) on sea and land"; hence the custom has been to inter suicides in out-of-the-way places among the lonely solitudes of the mountains.[203] The practice of burying them apart from other dead has been very wide-spread in Europe, and in many cases there are obvious indications that it arose from fear.[204] In the North-East of Scotland a suicide was buried outside a churchyard, close beneath the wall, and the grave was marked by a single large stone, or by a small cairn, to which the passing traveller was bound to cast a stone; and afterwards, when the suicide's body was allowed to rest in the churchyard, it was laid below the wall in such a position that no one could walk over the grave, as the people believed that if a woman enceinte stepped over such a {256} grave, her child would quit this earth by its own act.[205] In England persons against whom a coroner's jury had found a verdict of _felo de se_ were buried at cross-roads, with a stake driven through the body so as to prevent their ghosts from walking.[206] For the same purpose the bodies of {257} suicides were in many cases burned.[207] And when removed from the house where the act had been committed, they were commonly carried out, not by the door, but by a window,[208] or through a perforation specially made for the occasion in the door,[209] or through a hole under the threshold,[210] in order that the ghost should not find its way back into the house, or perhaps with a view to keeping the entrance of the house free from dangerous infection.[211]

[Footnote 197: Ross, 'Superstitions as to burying Suicides in the Highlands,' in _Celtic Magazine_, xii. 354.]

[Footnote 198: Serpillon, _Code Criminel_, ii. 223. _Cf._ Louis XIV., 'Ordonnance criminelle,' A.D. 1670, xxii. 1, in Isambert, Decrusy, and Taillandier, _op. cit._ xviii. 414.]

[Footnote 199: Ross, in _Celtic Magazine_, xii. 352 (Highlanders of Scotland). Atkinson, _Forty Years in a Moorland Parish_, p. 217. Hyltén-Cavallius, _Wärend och Wirdarne_, i. 472 _sq._ (Swedes). Allardt, 'Nyländska folkseder och bruk,' in _Nyland_, iv. 114 (Swedish Finlanders). Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_, §756, p. 474 _sq._ Schiffer, 'Totenfetische bei den Polen,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 50 (Polanders), 52 (Lithuanians). Volkov, 'Der Selbstmörder in Lithauen,' _ibid._ v. 87. von Wlislocki, 'Tod und Totenfetische im Volkglauben der Siebenbürger Sachsen,' _ibid._ iv. 53. Lippert, _Christenthum, Volksglaube und Volksbrauch_, p. 391. Dyer, _The Ghost World_, pp. 53, 151. Gaidoz, 'Le suicide,' in _Mélusine_, iv. 12.]

[Footnote 200: Schiffer, in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 52 (Lithuanians).]

[Footnote 201: _Ibid._ pp. 50 (Polanders), 53 (Lithuanians). von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube und religiöser Brauch der Magyaren_, p. 61. Strausz, _Die Bulgaren_, p. 455. Prexl, 'Geburts- und Todtengebräuche der Rumänen in Siebenbürgen,' in _Globus_, lvii. 30.]

[Footnote 202: Strausz, _op. cit._ p. 455 (Bulgarians).]

[Footnote 203: Ross, in _Celtic Magazine_, xii. 350 _sq._]

[Footnote 204: Gaidoz, in _Mélusine_, iv. 12. Frank, _System einer vollständigen medicinischen Polizey_, iv. 499. Moore, _op. cit._ i. 310 (Danes). Schiffer, in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 50 (Polanders), 53 (Lithuanians). Volkov, _ibid._ v. 87 (Lithuanians). Strausz, _op. cit._ p. 455 (Bulgarians).]

[Footnote 205: Gregor, _Folk-Lore of the North-East of Scotland_, p. 213 _sq._]

[Footnote 206: Stephen, _History of the Criminal Law of England_, iii. 105. Atkinson, _op. cit._ p. 217. This custom was formally abolished in 1823 by 4 Geo. IV.

c. 52 (Stephen, _op. cit._ iii. 105). Why were suicides buried at cross-roads? Possibly because the cross was supposed to disperse the evil energy ascribed to their bodies. Both in Europe and India the cross-road has, since ancient times, been a favourite place to divest oneself of diseases or other influences (Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_, §§ 483, 484, 492, 508, 514, 522, 545, pp. 325, 326, 331, 341, 345, 349, 361. _Hymns of the Atharva-Veda_, pp. 272, 473, 519. Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, pp. 267, 268 n. 1). In the sacred books of India it is said that "a student who has broken the vow of chastity shall offer an ass to Nirriti on a cross-road" (_Gautama_, xxiii. 17), and that a person who has previously undergone certain other purification ceremonies "is freed from all crimes, even mortal sins, after looking on a cross-road at a pot filled with water, and reciting the text, 'Simhe me manyuh'" (_Baudhâyana_, iv. 7. 7). In the hills of Northern India and as far as Madras, an approved charm for getting rid of a disease of demoniacal origin is to plant a stake where four roads meet, and to bury grains underneath, which crows disinter and eat (_North Indian Notes and Queries_, i. § 652, p. 100; Madden, 'The Turaee and Outer Mountains of Kumaoon,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xvii. pt. i. 583; Crooke, _Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India_, i. 290). In the Province of Bih[=a]r, "in cases of sickness various articles are exposed in a saucer at a cross-road" (Grierson, _Bih[=a]r Peasant Life_, p. 407). According to a Bulgarian tale, Lot was enjoined by the priest to plant on a cross-road three charred twigs in order to free himself from his sin (Strausz, _op. cit._ p. 115). The Gypsies of Servia believe that a thief may divert from himself all suspicions by painting with blood a cross and a dot above it on the spot where he committed the theft (von Wlislocki, 'Menschenblut im Glauben der Zigeuner,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 64 _sq._). In Morocco the cross is used as a charm against the evil eye, and the chief reason for this is, I believe, that it is regarded as a conductor of the baneful energy emanating from the eye, dispersing it in all the quarters of the wind and thus preventing it from injuring the person or object looked at (Westermarck, 'Magic Origin of Moorish Designs,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxiv. 214). In Japan, if a criminal belonging to one of the lower classes commits suicide, his body is crucified (_Globus_, xviii. 197). When, under Tarquinius Priscus (or Tarquinius Superbus), many Romans preferred voluntary death to compulsory labour in the _cloaca_, or artificial canals by which the sewage was carried into the Tiber, the king ordered that their bodies should be crucified and abandoned to birds and beasts of prey (Pliny, _Historia naturalis_, xxxvi. 24; Servius, _Commentarii in Virgilii Æneidos_, xii. 603). The reason for thus crucifying the bodies of self-murderers is not stated; but it is interesting to notice, in this connection, the idea expressed by some Christian writers that the cross of the Saviour symbolised the distribution of his benign influence in all directions (d'Ancona, _Origini del teatro italiano_, i. 646; Tauler, quoted by Peltzer, _Deutsche Mystik und deutsche Kunst_, p. 191. I am indebted to my friend Dr. Yrjö Hirn for drawing my attention to this idea). With reference to persons who had killed a father, mother, brother, or child, Plato says in his 'Laws' (ix. 873):--"If he be convicted, the servants of the judges and the magistrates shall slay him at an appointed place without the city where three ways meet, and there expose his body naked, and each of the magistrates on behalf of the whole city shall take a stone and cast it upon the head of the dead man, and so deliver the city from pollution; after that, they shall bear him to the borders of the land, and cast him forth unburied, according to law." The duels by which the ancient Swedes were legally compelled to repair their wounded honour were to be fought on a place where three roads met (Leffler, _Om den fornsvenska hednalagen_, p. 40 _sq._; _supra_, i. 502). In various countries it has been the custom to bury the dead at cross-roads (Grimm, 'Ueber das Verbrennen der Leichen,' in _Kleinere Schriften_, ii. 288 (Bohemians). Lippert, _Die Religionen der europäischen Culturvölker_, p. 310 (Slavonians); Winternitz, _Das altindische Hochzeitsrituell_, p. 68; Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, pp. 267, 268, 562 n. 3)--a custom which may have given rise to the idea that cross-roads are haunted (Winternitz, _op. cit._ p. 68; Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 267 _sq._; _cf._ Wuttke, _op. cit._ § 108, p. 89 _sq._).]

[Footnote 207: Bourquelot, _loc. cit._ iv. 263. Hyltén-Cavallius, _op. cit._ i. 459; Nordström, _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_, ii. 331 (Swedes), von Wlislocki, 'Tod und Totenfetische im Volkglauben der Siebenbürger Sachsen,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, iv. 53.]

[Footnote 208: Wuttke, _op. cit._ § 756, p. 474; Frank, _op. cit._ iv. 498 _sq._; Lippert, _Der Seelencult_, p. 11 (people in various parts of Germany). Schiffer, in _Am Ur-Quell_, iii. 50 (Polanders).]

[Footnote 209: Bourquelot, _loc. cit._ iv. 264 (at Abbeville).]

[Footnote 210: Grimm, _Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer_, p. 726 _sqq._ Hyltén-Cavallius, _op. cit._ i. 472 _sq._ (Swedes).]

[Footnote 211: See _infra_, on Regard for the Dead. Contact with a self-murderer's body is considered polluting (Prexl, 'Geburts- und Todtengebräuche der Rumänen in Siebenbürgen,' in _Globus_, lvii. 30; Hyltén-Cavallius, _Wärend och Wirdarne_, i. 459, 460, and ii. 412). We are told that in the eighteenth century people did not dare to cut down a person who had hanged himself, though he was found still alive (Frank, _op. cit._ iv. 499). Among the Bannavs of Cambodia everybody who takes part in the burial of a self-murderer is obliged to undergo a certain ceremony of purification, whereas no such ceremony is prescribed in the case of other burials (_Mittheil. d. Geogr. Ges. zu Jena_, iii. 9).]

However, side by side with the extreme seventy with which suicide is viewed by the Christian Church, we find, even in the Middle Ages, instances of more humane feelings towards its perpetrator. In mediæval tales and ballads true lovers die together and are buried in the same grave; two roses spring through the turf and twine lovingly together.[212] In the later Middle Ages, says M. {258} Bourquelot, "on voit qu'à mesure qu'on avance, l'antagonisme devient plus prononcé entre l'esprit religieux et les idées mondaines relativement à la mort volontaire. Le clergé continue à suivre la route qui a été tracée par Saint Augustin et à déclarer le suicide criminel et impie; mais la tristesse et le désespoir n'entendent pas sa voix, ne se souviennent pas de ses prescriptions."[213] The revival of classical learning, accompanied as it was by admiration for antiquity and a desire to imitate its great men, not only increased the number of suicides, but influenced popular sentiments on the subject.[214] Even the Catholic casuists, and later on philosophers of the school of Grotius and others, began to distinguish certain cases of legitimate suicide, such as that committed to avoid dishonour or probable sin, or that of a condemned person saving himself from torture by anticipating an inevitable death, or that of a man offering himself to death for the sake of his friend.[215] Sir Thomas More, in his Utopia, permits a person who is suffering from an incurable and painful disease to take his own life, provided that he does so with the agreement of the priests and magistrates; nay, he even maintains that these should exhort such a man to put an end to a life which is only a burden to himself and others.[216] Donne, the well-known Dean of St. Paul's, wrote in his younger days a book in defence of suicide, "a Declaration," as he called it, "of that paradoxe, or thesis, that Self-homicide is not so naturally sin, that it may never be otherwise." He there pointed out the fact--which ought never to be overlooked by those who derive their arguments from "nature"--that some things may be natural to the species, and yet not natural to every individual member of it.[217] In one of his essays Montaigne pictures classical cases of suicide with colours of unmistakable sympathy. "La plus volontaire mort," he {259} observes, "c'est la plus belle. La vie despend de la volonté d'aultruy; la mort, de la nostre."[218] The rationalism of the eighteenth century led to numerous attacks both upon the views of the Church and upon the laws of the State concerning suicide. Montesquieu advocated its legitimacy:--"La société est fondée sur un avantage mutuel; mais lorsqu'elle me devient onéreuse, qui m'empêche d'y renoncer? La vie m'a été donnée comme une faveur; je puis donc la rendre lorsqu'elle ne l'est plus: la cause cesse, l'effet doit donc cesser aussi."[219] Voltaire strongly opposed the cruel laws which subjected a suicide's body to outrage and deprived his children of their heritage.[220] If his act is a wrong against society, what is to be said of the voluntary homicides committed in war, which are permitted by the laws of all countries? Are they not much more harmful to the human race than self-murder, which nature prevents from ever being practised by any large number of men?[221] Beccaria pointed out that the State is more wronged by the emigrant than by the suicide, since the former takes his property with him, whereas the latter leaves his behind.[222] According to Holbach, he who kills himself is guilty of no outrage on nature or its author; on the contrary, he follows an indication given by nature when he parts from his sufferings through the only door which has been left open. Nor has his country or his family any right to complain of a member whom it has no means of rendering happy, and from whom it consequently has nothing more to hope.[223] Others eulogised suicide when committed for a noble end,[224] or recommended it on certain occasions. "Suppose," says Hume, "that it is no longer in my {260} power to promote the interest of society; suppose that I am a burthen to it; suppose that my life hinders some person from being much more useful to society. In such cases my resignation of life must not only be innocent but laudable."[225] Hume also attacks the doctrine that suicide is a transgression of our duty to God. "If it would be no crime in me to divert the Nile from its course, were I able to do so, how could it be a crime to turn a few ounces of blood from their natural channel? Were the disposal of human life so much reserved as the peculiar province of the Almighty that it were an encroachment on his right for men to dispose of their own lives, would it not be equally wrong of them to lengthen out their lives beyond the period which by the general laws of nature he had assigned to it? My death, however voluntary, does not happen without the consent of Providence; when I fall upon my own sword, I receive my death equally from the hands of the Deity as if it had proceeded from a lion, a precipice, or a fever."[226]

[Footnote 212: See Bourquelot, _loc. cit._ iv. 248; Gummere, _Germanic Origins_, p. 322.]

[Footnote 213: Bourquelot, _loc. cit._ iv. 253.]

[Footnote 214: _Ibid._ iv. 464. Morselli, _op. cit._ p. 35.]

[Footnote 215: Buonafede, _op. cit._ p. 148 _sqq._ Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 55.]

[Footnote 216: More, _Utopia_, p. 122.]

[Footnote 217: Donne, _Biathanatos_, p. 45. Donne's book was first committed to the press in 1644, by his son.]

[Footnote 218: Montaigne, _Essais_, ii. 3 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 187).]

[Footnote 219: Montesquieu, _Lettres Persanes_, 76 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 53).]

[Footnote 220: Voltaire, _Commentaire sur le livre Des délits et des peines_, 19 (_[OE]uvres complètes_, v. 416). _Idem_, _Prix de la justice et de l'humanité_, 5 (_ibid._ v. 424).]

[Footnote 221: _Idem_, _Note to Olympie acte v. scène_ 7 (_[OE]uvres complètes_, i. 826, n. _b_). _Idem_, _Dictionnaire Philosophique_, art. Suicide (_ibid._ viii. 236).]

[Footnote 222: Beccaria, _Dei delitti e delle pene_, § 35 (_Opere_, i. 101).]

[Footnote 223: Holbach, _Système de la nature_, i. 369.]

[Footnote 224: In the early part of the nineteenth century this was done by Fries, _Neue oder anthropologische Kritik der Vernunft_, iii. 197.]

[Footnote 225: Hume, 'Suicide,'in _Philosophical Works_, iv. 413.]

[Footnote 226: _Ibid._ p. 407 _sqq._]

Thus the main arguments against suicide which had been set forth by pagan philosophers and Christian theologians were scrutinised and found unsatisfactory or at least insufficient to justify that severe and wholesale censure which was passed on it by the Church and the State. But a doctrine which has for ages been inculcated by the leading authorities on morals is not easily overthrown; and when the old arguments are found fault with new ones are invented. Kant maintained that a person who disposes of his own life degrades the humanity subsisting in his person and entrusted to him to the end that he might uphold it.[227] Fichte argued that it is our duty to preserve our life and to will to live, not for the sake of life, but because our life is the exclusive condition of the realisation of the moral law through us.[228] According to Hegel it is a contradiction to speak of a person's right over his life, since this would {261} imply a right of a person over himself, and no one can stand above and execute himself.[229] Paley, again, feared that if religion and morality allowed us to kill ourselves in any case, mankind would have to live in continual alarm for the fate of their friends and dearest relations[230]--just as if there were a very strong temptation for men to shorten their lives. But common sense is neither a metaphysician nor a sophist. When not restrained by the yoke of a narrow theology, it is inclined in most cases to regard the self-murderer as a proper object of compassion rather than of condemnation, and in some instances to admire him as a hero. The legislation on the subject therefore changed as soon as the religious influence was weakened. The laws against suicide were abolished in France by the Revolution,[231] and afterwards in various other continental countries;[232] whilst in England it became the custom of jurymen to presume absence of a sound mind in the self-murderer--perjury, as Bentham said, being the penance which prevented an outrage on humanity.[233] These measures undoubtedly indicate not only a greater regard for the innocent relatives of the self-murderer, but also a change in the moral ideas concerning the act itself.

[Footnote 227: Kant, _Metaphysische Anfangungsgründe der Tugendlehre_, p. 73.]

[Footnote 228: Fichte, _Das System der Sittenlehre_, p. 339 _sqq._ See also _ibid._ pp. 360, 391.]

[Footnote 229: Hegel, _Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts_, § 70, Zusatz, p. 72.]

[Footnote 230: Paley, _Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy_, iv. 3 (_Complete Works_, ii. 230).]

[Footnote 231: Legoyt, _op. cit._ p. 109.]

[Footnote 232: Bourquelot, _loc. cit._ iv. 475.]

[Footnote 233: Bentham, _Principles of Penal Law_, ii. 4. 4 (_Works_, i. 479 _sq._).]

As appears from this survey of facts, the moral valuation of suicide varies to an extreme degree. It depends partly on the circumstances in which the act is committed, partly on the point of view from which it is regarded and the notions held about the future life. When a person sacrifices his life for the benefit of a fellow-man or for the sake of his country or to gratify the supposed desire of a god, his deed may be an object of the highest praise. It may, further, call forth approval or admiration as indicating a keen sense of honour or as a test of courage; in Japan, says Professor Chamberlain, "the courage to take {262} life--be it one's own or that of others--ranks extraordinarily high in public esteem."[234] In other cases suicide is regarded with indifference as an act which concerns the agent alone. But for various reasons it is also apt to give rise to moral disapproval. The injury which the person committing it inflicts upon himself may excite sympathetic resentment towards him; he may be looked upon as injurer and injured at the same time. Plato asks in his 'Laws':--"What ought he to suffer who murders his nearest and so-called dearest friend? I mean, he who kills himself."[235] And the same point of view is conspicuous in St. Augustine's argument, that the more innocent the self-murderer was before he committed his deed the greater is his guilt in taking his life[236]--an argument of particular force in connection with a theology which condemns suicides to everlasting torments and which regards it as a man's first duty to save his soul. The condemnation of killing others may by an association of ideas lead to a condemnation of killing one's self,[237] as is suggested by the Christian doctrine that suicide is prohibited in the commandment, "Thou shalt not kill." The horror which the act inspires, the fear of the malignant ghost, and the defiling effect attributed to the shedding of blood, also tend to make suicide an object of moral reprobation or to increase the disapproval of it;[238] and the same is the case with the exceptional treatment to which the self-murderer's body is subject and his supposed annihilation or miserable existence after death, which easily come to be looked upon in the light of a punishment.[239] Suicide is, moreover, blamed as an act of moral cowardice,[240] and, especially, as an injury inflicted upon other persons, to whom the agent {263} owed duties from which he withdrew by shortening his life.[241] Even among savages we meet with the notion that a person is not entitled to treat himself just as he pleases. Among the Goajiro Indians of Colombia, if anybody accidentally cuts himself, say with his own knife, or breaks a limb, or otherwise does himself an injury, his family on the mother's side immediately demands blood-money, since, being of their blood, he is not allowed to spill it without paying for it; the father's relatives demand tear-money, and friends present claim compensation to repay their sorrow at seeing a friend in pain.[242] That a similar view is sometimes taken by savages with regard to suicide appears from a few statements quoted above.[243] The opinion that suicide is an offence against society at large is particularly likely to prevail in communities where the interests of the individual are considered entirely subordinate to the interests of the State. The religious argument, again, that suicide is a sin against the Creator, an illegitimate interference with his work and decrees, comes to prominence in proportion as the moral consciousness is influenced by theological considerations. In Europe this influence is certainly becoming less and less. And considering that the religious view of suicide has been the chief cause of the extreme severity with which it has been treated in Christian countries, I am unable to subscribe to the opinion expressed by Professor Durkheim, that the more lenient judgment passed on it by the public conscience of the present time is merely accidental and transient. The argument adduced in support of this opinion leaves out of account the real causes to which the valuation of suicide is due: it is said that the moral evolution is not likely to be retrogressive in this particular point after it has followed {264} a certain course for centuries.[244] It is true that moral progress has a tendency to increase our sense of duty towards our fellow-men. But at the same time it also makes us more considerate as regards the motives of conduct; and--not to speak of suicides committed for the benefit of others--the despair of the self-murderer will largely serve as a palliation of the wrong which he may possibly inflict upon his neighbour.

[Footnote 234: Chamberlain, _Things Japanese_, p. 221.]

[Footnote 235: Plato, _Leges_, ix. 873.]

[Footnote 236: St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, i. 17.]

[Footnote 237: See Simmel, _Einleitung in die Moralwissenschaft_, i. 187.]

[Footnote 238: _Cf._ _supra_, i. 377.]

[Footnote 239: See _supra_, ii. 237 _sqq._; Josephus, _De bello Judaico_, iii. 8. 5; Plato, _Leges_, ix. 873; Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, v. 11. 2 _sq._]

[Footnote 240: Hegel, _Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts_, § 70, Zusatz, p. 72; Fowler, _Progressive Morality_, p. 151; &c.]

[Footnote 241: English lawyers have represented suicide as an offence both against God and against the sovereign, who "has an interest in the preservation of all his subjects" (Plowden, _Commentaries_, i. 261; Blackstone, _Commentaries on the Laws of England_, iv. 190. _Cf._ Ives, _op. cit._ p. 40 _sq._).]

[Footnote 242: Simons, 'Exploration of the Goajira Peninsula,' in _Proceed. Roy. Geo. Soc._ N. Ser. vii. 790.]

[Footnote 243: _Supra_, ii. 240 _sq._]

[Footnote 244: Durkheim, _Le suicide_, p. 377.]

CHAPTER XXXVI

SELF-REGARDING DUTIES AND VIRTUES--INDUSTRY--REST

ACCORDING to current ideas men owe to themselves a variety of duties similar in kind to those which they owe to their fellow-creatures. They are not only forbidden to take their own lives, but are also in some measure considered to be under an obligation to support their existence, to take care of their bodies, to preserve a certain amount of personal freedom, not to waste their property, to exhibit self-respect, and, in general, to promote their own happiness. And closely related to these self-regarding duties there are self-regarding virtues, such as diligence, thrift, temperance. In all these cases, however, the moral judgment is greatly influenced by the question whether the act, forbearance, or omission, which increases the person's own welfare, conflicts or not with the interests of other people. If it does conflict, opinions vary as to the degree of selfishness which is recognised as allowable. But judgments containing moral praise or the inculcation of duty are most commonly passed upon conduct which involves some degree of self-sacrifice, not on such as involves self-indulgence.

Moreover, the duties which we owe to ourselves are generally much less emphasised than those which we owe to others. "Nature," says Butler, "has not given us so sensible a disapprobation of imprudence and folly, either in ourselves or others, as of falsehood, injustice, and {266} cruelty."[1] Nor does a prudential virtue receive the same praise as one springing from a desire to promote the happiness of a fellow-man. Many moralists even maintain that, properly speaking, there are no self-regarding duties and virtues at all; that useful action which is useful to ourselves alone is not matter for moral notice; that in every case duties towards one's self may be reduced into duties towards others; that intemperance and extravagant luxury, for instance, are blamable only because they tend to the public detriment, and that prudence is a virtue only in so far as it is employed in promoting public interest.[2] But this opinion is hardly in agreement with the ordinary moral consciousness.

[Footnote 1: Butler, 'Dissertation on the Nature of Virtue,' in _Analogy of Religion, &c._ p. 339.]

[Footnote 2: Hutcheson, _Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue_, pp. 133, 201. Grote, _Treatise on the Moral Ideals_, p. 77 _sqq._ Clifford, _Lectures and Essays_, pp. 298, 335. von Jhering, _Der Zweck im Recht_, ii. 225.]

It is undoubtedly true that no mode of conduct is exclusively self-regarding. No man is an entirely isolated being, hence anything which immediately affects a person's own welfare affects at the same time, in some degree, the welfare of other individuals. It is also true that the moral ideas concerning such conduct as is called self-regarding are more or less influenced by considerations as to its bearing upon others. But this is certainly not the only factor which determines the judgment passed on it. In the education of children various modes of self-regarding conduct are strenuously insisted upon by parents and teachers. What they censure or punish is regarded as wrong, what they praise or reward is regarded as good; for, as we have noticed above, men have a tendency to sympathise with the retributive emotions of persons for whom they feel regard.[3] Moreover, as in the case of suicide,[4] so also in other instances of self-inflicted harm, the injury committed may excite sympathetic resentment towards the agent, although the victim of it is his own self. Disinterested likes or dislikes often give rise to moral {267} approval or disapproval of conduct which is essentially self-regarding.[5] It has also been argued that no man has a right to trifle with his own well-being even where other persons interests are not visibly affected by it, for the reason that he is not entitled wantonly to waste "what is not at his unconditional disposal."[6] And in various other ways--as will be seen directly--religious, as well as magical, ideas have influenced moral opinions relating to self-regarding conduct. But at the same time it is not difficult to see why self-regarding duties and virtues only occupy a subordinate place in our moral consciousness. The influence they exercise upon other persons' welfare is generally too remote to attract much attention. In education there is no need to emphasise any other self-regarding duties and virtues but those which, for the sake of the individual's general welfare, require some sacrifice of his immediate comfort or happiness. The compassion which we are apt to feel for the victim of an injury is naturally lessened by the fact that it is self-inflicted. And, on the other hand, indignation against the offender is disarmed by pity, imprudence commonly carrying its own punishment along with it.[7]

[Footnote 3: _Supra_, i. 114 _sq._]

[Footnote 4: _Supra_, ii. 262.]

[Footnote 5: _Cf._ _supra_, i. 116 _sq._]

[Footnote 6: Martineau, _Types of Ethical Theory_, ii. 126.]

[Footnote 7: _Cf._ Butler, _op. cit._ p. 339 _sq._; Dugald Stewart, _Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers of Man_, ii. 346 _sq._]

Being so little noticed by custom and public opinion, and still less by law, most self-regarding duties hardly admit of a detailed treatment. In a general way it may be said that progress in intellectual culture has, in some respects, been favourable to their evolution; Darwin even maintains that, with a few exceptions, self-regarding virtues are not esteemed by savages.[8] The less developed the intellect, the less apt it is to recognise the remoter consequences of men's behaviour; hence more reflection than that exercised by the savage may be needed to see that modes of conduct which immediately concern a person's own welfare at the same time affect the well-being {268} of his neighbours or the whole community of which he is a member. So also, owing to his want of foresight, the savage would often fail to notice how important it may be to subject one's self to some temporary deprivation or discomfort in order to attain greater happiness in the future. We have noticed above that many savages hardly ever correct their children,[9] and this means that one of the chief sources from which the notions of self-regarding duties spring is almost absent among them. But on the other hand it must also be remembered that disinterested antipathies, another cause of such notions, exercise more influence upon the unreflecting than upon the reflecting moral consciousness, and that many magical and religious ideas which at the lower stages of civilisation give rise to duties of a self-regarding character are no longer held by people more advanced in culture.

[Footnote 8: Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 118 _sq._]

[Footnote 9: _Supra_, i. 513 _sq._]

These general statements referring to the nature and origin of self-regarding duties and virtues I shall now illustrate by a short survey of moral ideas concerning some representative modes of self-regarding conduct:--industry and rest; temperance, fasting, and abstinence from certain kinds of food and drink; cleanliness and uncleanliness; and ascetic practices generally.

* * * * *

Man is naturally inclined to idleness, not because he is averse from muscular activity as such, but because he dislikes the monotony of regular labour and the mental exertion it implies.[10] In general he is induced to work only by some special motive which makes him think the trouble worth his while. Among savages, who have little care for the morrow,[11] who have few comforts of life to provide for, and whose property is often of such a kind as to prevent any great accumulation of it, almost the sole inducement to industry is either necessity or compulsion. Men are lazy or industrious according as the necessaries of life are easy {269} or difficult to procure, and they prefer being idle if they can compel other persons to work for them as their servants or slaves.

[Footnote 10: _Cf._ Ferrero, 'Les formes primitives du travail,' in _Revue scientifique_, ser. iv. vol. v. 331 _sqq._]

[Footnote 11: Buecher, _Die Entstehung der Volkswirtschaft_, p. 21 _sqq._]

Australian natives "can exert themselves vigorously when hunting or fishing or fighting or dancing, or at any time when there is a prospect of an immediate reward; but prolonged labour with the object of securing ultimate gain is distasteful to them."[12] With reference to the Polynesians Mr. Hale observes that in those islands which are situated nearest the equator, where the heat with little or no aid from human labour calls into existence fruits serving to support human life, the inhabitants are an indolent and listless race; whilst "a severer clime and ruder soil are favourable to industry, foresight, and a hardy temperament. These opposite effects are manifested in the Samoans, Nukahivans, and Tahitians, on the one side, and the Sandwich Islanders and New Zealanders on the other."[13] Mr. Yate likewise contrasts the industry of the Maoris with the proverbial idleness of the Tonga Islanders: the former "are obliged to work, if they would eat," whereas "in the luxurious climate of the Friendly Islands, there is scarcely any need of labour, to obtain the necessaries, and even many of the luxuries, of life."[14] The Malays are described as fond of a life of slothful ease, because "persevering toil is unnecessary, or would bring them no additional enjoyments."[15] The natives of Sumatra, says Marsden, "are careless and improvident of the future, because their wants are few; for though poor {270} they are not necessitous, nature supplying, with extraordinary facility, whatever she has made requisite for their existence."[16] The Toda of the Neilgherry Hills will not "work one iota more than circumstances compel him to do";[17] and indolence seems to be a characteristic of most peoples of India,[18] though there are exceptions to the rule.[19] Burckhardt observes that it is not the southern sun, as Montesquieu imagined, but the luxuriance of the southern soil and the abundance of provisions that relax the exertions of the inhabitants and cause apathy:--"By the fertility of Egypt, Mesopotamia, and India, which yield their produce almost spontaneously, the people are lulled into indolence; while in neighbouring countries, of a temperature equally warm, as among the mountains of Yemen and Syria, where hard labour is necessary to ensure a good harvest, we find a race as superior in industry to the former as the inhabitants of Northern Europe are to those of Spain or Italy."[20] Indolence is a common,[21] though not universal,[22] trait of the African character. Of the Negroes on the Gold Coast Bosman says that "nothing {271} but the utmost necessity can force them to labour."[23] The Waganda are represented as excessively indolent, in consequence of the ease with which they can obtain all the necessaries of life.[24] Of the Namaquas we are told that "they may be seen basking in the sun for days together, in listless inactivity, frequently almost perishing from thirst or hunger, when with very little exertion they may have it in their power to satisfy the cravings of nature. If urged to work, they have been heard to say: 'Why should we resemble the worms of the ground?'"[25] Most of the American Indians are said to have a slothful disposition, because they can procure a livelihood with but little labour.[26] But the case is different with the Greenlanders and other Eskimo, who have to struggle hard for their existence.[27]

[Footnote 12: Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. 29 _sq._ See also _ibid._ ii. 248; Collins, _English Colony in New South Wales_, i. 601; Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, p. 259 _sq._]

[Footnote 13: Hale, _U.S. Exploring Expedition. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, p. 17. See also Williams, _Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands_, p. 534 (Samoans); Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 130 _sq._ (Tahitians); Brenchley, _Cruise of H.M.S. Curaçoa among the South Sea Islands_, p. 58 (natives of Tutuila); Melville, _Typee_, p. 287 (some Marquesas Islanders); Anderson, _Notes of Travel in Fiji and New Caledonia_, p. 236 (New Caledonians); Penny, _Ten Years in Melanesia_, p. 74 (Solomon Islanders).]

[Footnote 14: Yate, _Account of New Zealand_, p. 105 _sq._]

[Footnote 15: McNair, _Perak and the Malays_, p. 201. Bock, _Head-Hunters of Borneo_, p. 275. Raffles, _History of Java_, i. 251. St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, ii. 323.]

[Footnote 16: Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 209. See also _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, pp. 76, 87 (Bataks).]

[Footnote 17: Marshall, _A Phrenologist amongst the Todas_, p. 88. See also _ibid._ p. 86; Shortt, 'Hill Tribes of the Neilgherries,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. vii. 241; Mantegazza, 'Studii sull' etnologia dell' India,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xiii. 406.]

[Footnote 18: Cooper, _Mishmee Hills_, p. 100 (Assamese). Tickell, 'Memoir on the Hodésum,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, ix. 808 (Hos). Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, pp. 57 (Jyntias and Kasias), 101 (Lepchas). Burton, _Sindh_, p. 284. Moorcroft and Trebeck, _Travels in the Himalayan Provinces of Hindustan_, i. 321 (Ladakhis). Caldwell, _Tinnevelly Shanars_, p. 58.]

[Footnote 19: Man, _Sonthalia_, p. 19. Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 152 (Bódo and Dhimáls). Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 81 (Kandhs).]

[Footnote 20: Burckhardt, _Arabic Proverbs_, p. 219.]

[Footnote 21: Beltrame, _Il Sénnaar_, i. 166. Tuckey, _Expedition to Explore the River Zaire_, p. 369. Johnston, _The River Congo_, p. 402 (Bakongo). Casati, _Ten Years in Equatoria_, i. 85 (Abaka Negroes). Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, ii. 310 (Gowane people). Burton, _Zanzibar_, ii. 96 (Wanika). Bonfanti, 'L'incivilimento dei negri nell' Africa intertropicale,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xv. 133 (Bantu). Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 231 (Herero). Magyar, _Reisen in Süd-Afrika_, p. 290 (Kimbunda). Kropf, _Das Volk der Xosa-Kaffern_, p. 89. Tyler, _Forty Years among the Zulus_, p. 194. Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 140. Shaw, 'Betsileo Country and People,' in _Antananarivo Annual_, iii. 81.]

[Footnote 22: Baker, _Ismailïa_, p. 56 (Shilluk). Baumann, _Usambara_, p. 244 (Wapare). Bosman, _Description of the Coast of Guinea_, p. 318 (Negroes of Fida). Andersson, _Notes on Travel in South Africa_, p. 235 (Ovambo). See also _infra_, p. 272.]

[Footnote 23: Bosman, _op. cit._ p. 101.]

[Footnote 24: Wilson and Felkin, _op. cit._ i. 225.]

[Footnote 25: Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 335. See also Kolben, _Present State of the Cape of Good-Hope_, i. 46, 324; Barrow, _Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa_, i. 152; Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 324 (Hottentots).]

[Footnote 26: Bridges, 'Manners and Customs of the Firelanders,' in _A Voice for South America_, xiii. 203 (Fuegians). Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 151;

but he praises the Abiponian women for their unwearied industry (_ibid._ ii. 151 _sq._). Brett, _Indian Tribes of Guiana_, p. 343; Kirke, _Twenty-five Years in British Guiana_, p. 150. Domenech, _Seven Years' Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 190. Burton, _City of the Saints_, p. 126 (Sioux). Harmon, _Voyages and Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 285 (Tacullies). Meares, _Voyages to the North-West Coast of America_, p. 265 (Nootkas).]

[Footnote 27: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 126. Armstrong, _Narrative of the Discovery of the North-West Passage_, p. 196 (Western Eskimo).]

We have seen that savages consider it a duty for a married man to support his family,[28] and this in most cases implies that he is under an obligation to do a certain amount of work. We have also seen that the various occupations of life are divided between the sexes according to rules fixed by custom,[29] and this means that absolute idleness is not generally tolerated in either men or women, though the drudgeries of life are often imposed upon the latter. Of some uncivilised peoples we are directly told that they enjoin work as a duty or regard industry as a virtue. The Greenlanders esteem addiction to labour as the chief of virtues and believe that the industrious man {272} will have a very happy existence after death.[30] The Atkha Aleuts prohibited laziness.[31] Mr. Batchelor relates an Ainu fable which encourages diligence and discourages idleness in young people.[32] The Karens of Burma have a traditional precept which runs, "Be not idle, but labour diligently, that you may not become slaves."[33] The Maoris say, "Let industry be rewarded, lest idleness gets the advantage."[34] The Malagasy likewise inculcate industry in many of their proverbs.[35] The Basutos have a saying that "perseverance always triumphs."[36] Among the Bachapins, a Bechuana tribe conspicuous for its activity, "a man's merit is estimated principally by his industry, and the words _mún[)o]n[)a] usináach[)a]_ (an industrious man) are an expression of high approbation and praise; while he who is seldom seen to hunt, to prepare skins for clothing, or to sew koboes, is accounted a worthless and disgraceful member of society."[37] Among the Beni M'zab in the Sahara--an industrious people inhabiting a sterile country--boys are already at the age of six years compelled by law to begin to work, either in driving a camel or ass, or in drawing water for the gardens.[38] We may expect to find industry especially insisted upon by uncivilised peoples who are habitually addicted to it, partly because it is a necessity among them, partly owing to the influence of habit.

[Footnote 28: _Supra_, i. 526 _sqq._]

[Footnote 29: _Supra_, i. 634 _sqq._]

[Footnote 30: Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 186.]

[Footnote 31: Yakof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 158.]

[Footnote 32: Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 111.]

[Footnote 33: Smeaton, _Loyal Karens of Burma_, p. 255.]

[Footnote 34: Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, p. 293. See also Johnston, _Maoria_, p. 43.]

[Footnote 35: Clemes, 'Malagasy Proverbs,' in _Antananarivo Annual_, iv. 29.]

[Footnote 36: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 310.]

[Footnote 37: Burchell, _Travels in the Interior of Southern Africa_, ii. 557.]

[Footnote 38: Tristram, _The Great Sahara_, p. 207 _sq._]

But instead of being regarded as a duty, industrial activity is not infrequently looked down upon as disreputable for a free man. This is especially the case among warlike nations, nomadic tribes, and peoples who have many slaves. In Uganda, for instance, the prevalence of slavery "causes all manual labour to be looked upon as derogatory to the dignity of a free man."[39] The {273} Masai[40] and Matabele[41] consider that the only occupation which becomes a man is warfare. The Arabs of the desert hold labour humiliating to anybody but a slave.[42] Speaking of the Turkomans, Vámbéry observes that "in his domestic circle, the nomad presents us a picture of the most absolute indolence. In his eyes it is the greatest shame for a man to apply his hand to any domestic occupation."[43] The Chippewas "have ever looked upon agricultural and mechanical labours as degrading," and "have regarded the use of the bow and arrow, the war-club and spear, as the noblest employments of man."[44] Among the Iroquois "the warrior despised the toil of husbandry, and held all labour beneath him."[45] Though an industrious race, the Maoris considered it more honourable, as well as more desirable, to acquire property by war and plunder than by labour.[46] Among the Line Islanders it is undignified for a landholder to do work of any kind, except to make weapons, hence he employs persons of the lower class to work for him.[47] In Nukahiva the people of distinction "suffer the nails on the fingers to grow very long, that it may be evident they are not accustomed to hard labour."[48] This contempt for industrial activity is easy to explain. A man who earns his livelihood by labour is considered to be lacking in those qualities which are alone admired--courage and strength;--or work is associated with the idea of servile subjection. It is also universally held degrading for a man to engage in any occupation which belongs to the women.[49] Thus among hunting and pastoral peoples it would be quite out of place for him to supply the household with vegetable food.[50] On the other hand, when agriculture became an {274} indispensable means to maintenance of life it at the same time became respectable. But trade was scorned, probably, as Mr. Spencer suggests, because it was carried on chiefly by unsettled persons, who were detached, untrustworthy members of a community in which most men had fixed positions.[51] The Kandhs "consider it beneath their dignity to barter or traffic, and . . . . regard as base and plebeian all who are not either warriors or tillers of the soil."[52] The Javans "have a contempt for trade, and those of higher rank esteem it disgraceful to be engaged in it; but the common people are ever ready to engage in the labours of agriculture, and the chiefs to honour and encourage agricultural industry."[53]

[Footnote 39: Wilson and Felkin, _op. cit._ i. 186.]

[Footnote 40: Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 117.]

[Footnote 41: Holub, 'Die Ma-Atabele,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ xxv. 198.]

[Footnote 42: Burton, _Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah & Meccah_, ii. 10.]

[Footnote 43: Vámbéry, _Travels in Central Asia_, p. 320.]

[Footnote 44: Schoolcraft, _Archives of Aboriginal Knowledge_, v. 150.]

[Footnote 45: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 329.]

[Footnote 46: Travers, 'Life and Times of Te Rauparaha,' in _Trans. New Zealand Inst._ v. 29.]

[Footnote 47: Tutuila, 'Line Islanders,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 266.]

[Footnote 48: von Langsdorf, _Voyages and Travels_, i. 174.]

[Footnote 49: _Supra_, i. 636 _sq._]

[Footnote 50: _Supra_, i. 634.]

[Footnote 51: Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 429.]

[Footnote 52: Campbell, _Wild Tribes of Khondistan_, p. 50.]

[Footnote 53: Raffles, _op. cit._ i. 246 _sq._]

Progress in civilisation implies an increase of industry. Both the necessities and the comforts of life grow more numerous; hence more labour is required to provide for them, and at the same time there is more inducement to accumulate wealth. The advantages, both private and public, accruing from diligence are more clearly recognised, and the government, in particular, is anxious that the people should work so as to be able to pay their taxes. All this leads to condemnation of idleness and approbation of industry; and the influence of habit must operate in the same direction among a nation whose industrial propensities have been the cause of its civilisation. But in the archaic State war is still regarded as a nobler occupation than labour; and whilst agriculture is held in honour, trade and handicraft are frequently despised.

In the kingdom of the Peruvian Incas there was a law that no one should be idle. "Children of five years old were employed at very light work, suitable to their age. Even the blind and lame, if they had no other infirmity, were provided with certain kinds of work. The rest of the people, while they were healthy, were occupied each at his own labour, and it was a most infamous and degrading {275} thing among these people to be chastised in public for idleness."[54] If any of them was slothful, or slept in the day, he was whipped or had to carry the stone.[55] The reason for these measures was that the whole duty of defraying the expenses of the government belonged to the people, and that, without money and with little property, they paid their taxes in labour; hence to be idle was, in a manner, to rob the exchequer.[56]

[Footnote 54: Blas Valera, quoted by Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, ii. 34. See also _ibid._ ii. 14; Acosta, _Natural and Moral History of the Indies_, ii. 413.]

[Footnote 55: Herrera, _General History of the West Indies_, iv. 339.]

[Footnote 56: Prescott, _History of the Conquest of Peru_, i. 57.]

One of the characteristics of Zoroastrianism is its appreciation of labour.[57] The faithful man must be vigilant, alert, and active; sleep itself is merely a concession to the demons, and should therefore be kept within the limits of necessity.[58] The lazy man is the most unworthy of men, because he eats his food through impropriety and injustice.[59] And of all kinds of labour the most necessary is husbandry.[60] Man has been placed upon earth to preserve Ahura Mazda's good creation, and this can only be done by careful tilling of the soil, eradication of thorns and weeds, and reclamation of the tracks over which Angra Mainyu has spread the curse of barrenness. Zoroaster asked, "What is the food that fills the Religion of Mazda?" and Ahura Mazda answered, "It is sowing corn again and again, O Spitama Zarathustra! He who sows corn sows righteousness."[61] According to Xenophon, the king of the Persians considered the art of agriculture and that of war to be the most honourable and necessary occupations, and paid the greatest attention to both.[62] He appointed officers to overlook the tillers of the ground, as well as to collect tribute from them; for "those who {276} cultivate the ground inefficiently will neither maintain the garrisons, nor be able to pay their tribute."[63]

[Footnote 57: See Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxvii.; Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. 70; Rawlinson, _Religions of the Ancient World_, p. 108; _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, ii. 29, xxxvi. 15, xxxvii. 14, &c.]

[Footnote 58: _Vendîdâd_, xviii. 16.]

[Footnote 59: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxi. 27.]

[Footnote 60: See _Vendîdâd_, iii. 23 _sqq._]

[Footnote 61: _Ibid._ iii. 30 _sq._]

[Footnote 62: Xenophon, _[OE]conomicus_, iv. 4, 8 _sqq._]

[Footnote 63: Xenophon, _[OE]conomicus_, iv. 9, 11.]

In his description of ancient Egypt Herodotus tells us that one of its kings made a law to the effect that every Egyptian should annually declare to the governor of his district by what means he maintained himself, and that, if he failed to do this, or did not show that he lived by honest means, he should be punished with death.[64] Whether this statement be correct or not,[65] it seems certain that the Egyptians were anxious to encourage industry.[66] An ostracon which has often been quoted contains the maxim, "Do not spare thy body whilst thou art young, for food cometh by the arms and provisions by the legs."[67]

[Footnote 64: Herodotus, ii. 177. _Cf._ Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, i. 77. 5.]

[Footnote 65: _Cf._ Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 605.]

[Footnote 66: See Amélineau, _Essai sur l'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypte Ancienne_, p. 329.]

[Footnote 67: Gardiner, 'Egyptian Ethics,' in Hastings' _Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics_, v. 484.]

A law against idleness resembling that which is reported to have existed in Egypt was established at Athens, according to some writers by Draco or Pisistratus,[68]

according to others by Solon, who is said to have borrowed it from the Egyptians.[69] Plutarch states that, as the city was filled with persons who assembled from all parts on account of the great security which prevailed in Attica and the country withal was poor and barren, Solon turned the attention of the citizens to manufactures. For this purpose he ordered that trades should be accounted honourable, that the council of the Areopagus should examine into every man's means of subsisting and chastise the idle, and that no son should be obliged to maintain his father if the father had not taught him a trade.[70] Thucydides puts the following words in the mouth of Pericles:--"To avow poverty with us is no disgrace; the true disgrace is in doing nothing to avoid it. An Athenian citizen does not neglect the State because he takes care of his own household;{277} and even those of us who are engaged in business have a very fair idea of politics."[71] In Xenophon's 'Memorabilia' Socrates recommends industry as a means of supporting life, of maintaining the health and strength of the body, of promoting temperance and honesty.[72] According to Plato idleness is the mother of wantonness, whereas by labour the aliment of passion is diverted into other parts of the body.[73] Agriculture was highly praised. It is the best of all the occupations and arts by which men procure the means of living.[74] Where it flourishes all other pursuits are in full vigour, but when the ground is allowed to lie barren other occupations are almost stopped.[75] It is an exercise for the body, and strengthens it for discharging the duties that become a man of honourable birth.[76] It requires people to accustom themselves to endure the colds of winter and the heats of summer.[77] It renders them fit for running, throwing, leaping.[78] It gives them the greatest gratification for their labour, it is the most attractive of all employments.[79] It receives strangers with the richest hospitality.[80] It offers the most pleasing first-fruits to the gods, and the richest banquets on festival days.[81] It teaches men justice, for it is those who treat the earth best that she recompenses with the most numerous benefits.[82] It instructs people to assist one another, for it cannot be conducted without the aid of other men.[83] It does not give such constant occupation to a person's mind as to prevent him from attending to the interests of his friends or his native land.[84] The possession of an estate stimulates men to defend their country in arms.[85] In short, agriculture renders citizens most useful, most virtuous, and best affected towards the commonwealth.[86]

[Footnote 68: Pollux, _Onomasticum_, viii. 42. Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, i. 55. Plutarch, _Solon_, xxxi. 6.]

[Footnote 69: Herodotus, ii. 177. Diodorus Siculus, i. 77. 5.]

[Footnote 70: Plutarch, _Solon_, xxii. 1, 3 _sq._]

[Footnote 71: Thucydides, _Historia belli Peloponnesiaci_, ii. 40. 1 _sq._]

[Footnote 72: Xenophon, _Memorabilia_, ii. 7. 7 _sq._]

[Footnote 73: Plato, _Leges_, viii. 835, 841.]

[Footnote 74: Xenophon, _[OE]conomicus_, vi. 8.]

[Footnote 75: _Ibid._ v. 17.]

[Footnote 76: _Ibid._ v. 1; vi. 9.]

[Footnote 77: _Ibid._ v. 4.]

[Footnote 78: _Ibid._ v. 8.]

[Footnote 79: _Ibid._ v. 8, 11.]

[Footnote 80: _Ibid._ v. 8.]

[Footnote 81: _Ibid._ v. 10.]

[Footnote 82: _Ibid._ v. 12.]

[Footnote 83: _Ibid._ v. 14.]

[Footnote 84: _Ibid._ vi. 9.]

[Footnote 85: _Ibid._ v. 7.]

[Footnote 86: _Ibid._ vi. 10.]

{278} The argumentative manner in which these views were expressed by the philosophers indicates, however, that industrial occupations were deficient in public appreciation.[87] Herodotus says that not only among most barbarians but also throughout Greece those who are given wholly to war are honoured above others.[88] This was especially the case at Sparta, where a freeman was forbidden to engage in any industrial occupation.[89] Contrasting Lycurgus' legislation with that of Solon, Plutarch observes that in a state where the earth was sufficient to support twice the number of inhabitants and where there were a multitude of Helots to be worn out by servitude, it was right to set the citizens free from laborious and mechanic arts and to employ them in arms as the only art fit for them to learn and exercise.[90] At Thebes there was a law that no man could hold office who had not retired from business for ten years, because it was looked upon as a mean employment.[91] Even at Athens, in spite of its democratic institutions and its laws against idleness, trade and handicrafts were despised, both by the general public and by the philosophers. Xenophon's Socrates said that the industrial arts are objectionable and justly held in little repute in communities, because they weaken the bodies of those who work at them by compelling them to sit and to live indoors and in some cases to pass whole days by the fire; for when the body becomes effeminate the mind loses its strength.[92] Moreover, mechanical occupations leave those who practise them no leisure to attend to the interests of their friends or the commonwealth, hence men of that class seem unsuited alike to be of advantage to their connections and to be defenders of their country.[93] Plato maintains that manual arts are a reproach because they "imply a natural weakness of the higher principle";[94] by {279} their meanness they maim and disfigure the souls as well as the bodies of those who are employed in them.[95] When Hesiod said that "work is no disgrace,"[96] he could certainly not have meant that there was no disgrace for example in the manufacture of shoes or in selling pickles.[97] And in his 'Laws' Plato lays down the regulation that no citizen or servant of a citizen should be occupied in handicraft arts; "for he who is to secure and preserve the public order of the State has an art which requires much study and many kinds of knowledge, and does not admit of being made a secondary occupation."[98] Aristotle, again, observes that in a community which has an aristocratic form of government the mechanic and the labourer will not be citizens, because honours are there given according to virtue and merit, and "no man can practise virtue who is living the life of a mechanic or labourer."[99] Corinth was the place in Greece where the mechanic's occupation was least despised[100]--no doubt because its situation naturally led to extensive trade and thence to that splendour of living by which the useful and ornamental arts are most encouraged.[101]

[Footnote 87: _Cf._ Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 435 _sqq._]

[Footnote 88: Herodotus, ii. 167.]

[Footnote 89: _Ibid._ ii. 167. Xenophon, _Lacedæmoniorum respublica_, vii. 2. Plutarch, _Lycurgus_, xxiv. 2. _Idem_, _Agesilaus_, xxvi. 6. Aelian, _Varia historia_, vi. 6.]

[Footnote 90: Plutarch, _Solon_, xxii. 2.]

[Footnote 91: Aristotle, _Politica_, iii. 5. 7, p. 1278 a; vi. 7. 4, p. 1321 a.]

[Footnote 92: Xenophon, _[OE]conomicus_, iv. 2.]

[Footnote 93: _Ibid._ iv. 3.]

[Footnote 94: Plato, _Respublica_, ix. 590.]

[Footnote 95: _Ibid._ vi. 495.]

[Footnote 96: Hesiod, _Opera et dies_, 311.]

[Footnote 97: Plato, _Charmides_, p. 163.]

[Footnote 98: _Idem_, _Leges_, viii. 846.]

[Footnote 99: Aristotle, _Politica_, iii. 5. 5, p. 1278 a. See also _ibid._ vi. 4. 12, p. 1319 a; vii. 8. 3, p. 1328 b; viii. 2. 4 _sq._ p. 1337 b.]

[Footnote 100: Herodotus, ii. 167.]

[Footnote 101: See Rawlinson's note in his translation of Herodotus, ii. 252, n. 7.]

The Roman views on the subject were very similar to those of the Greeks. With regard to what arts and means of acquiring wealth are to be regarded as worthy and what disreputable, says Cicero, we have been taught as follows. In the first place, those sources of emolument which incur public hatred, such as those of tax-gatherers and usurers, are condemned. We are likewise to account as mean the gains of hired workmen, whose source of profit is not their art but their labour; for their very wages are the consideration of their servitude. We are further to despise all who retail from merchants goods for prompt sale; for they never can succeed unless they lie most abominably, {280} and nothing is more disgraceful than insincerity. All mechanical labourers are by their profession mean; for a workshop can contain nothing befitting a gentleman. Least of all are those trades to be approved that serve the purposes of sensuality, such as the occupations of butchers, cooks, and fishermen. But those professions that involve a higher degree of intelligence or a greater amount of utility, such as medicine, architecture, and the teaching of the liberal arts, are honourable in those to whose rank in life they are suited. As to merchandising, if on a small scale it is mean, but if it is extensive and rich, if it brings numerous commodities from all parts of the world, and gives bread to a multitude of people without fraud, it is not so despicable. However, if a merchant, satisfied with his profits, steps from the harbour into an estate, such a man seems most justly deserving of praise. For of all gainful professions nothing is better, nothing is more pleasing and more delightful, nothing is more befitting a well-bred man than agriculture.[102]

[Footnote 102: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 42. See also _Idem_, _Cato Major_, ch. 15 _sqq._]

The contempt in which manual labour was held by the ancient pagans could hardly be shared by early Christianity. Christ had been born in a carpenter's family, his apostles belonged to the working class, and so did originally most of his followers. Origen accepts with pride the reproach of Celsus, when he accuses Christians of worshipping the son of a poor workwoman, who had earned her bread by spinning,[103] and contrasts with the wisdom of Plato that of Paul, the tent-maker, of Peter, the fisherman, of John, who had abandoned his father's nets.[104] St. Paul presses on the Thessalonians the duty of personal industry; "if any one would not work, neither should he eat."[105] But at the same time the spirit of Christianity was not consistent with much anxiety about earthly matters. The aim of a true disciple of Christ was not to prosper in the world but {281} to seek the kingdom of God, not to lay up for himself treasures upon earth but to lay up for himself treasures in heaven.[106] Poverty became an ideal, in conformity with both the example and teachings of Christ. It was associated with godliness, whilst wealth was associated with godlessness.[107] "The love of money," says St. Paul, "is the root of all evil";[108] and the same idea was over and again expressed by Christian moralists.[109] In the original sinless state of mankind property was unknown, and so was labour. It was to punish man for his disobedience that God caused him to eat daily bread in the sweat of his face.[110] Since then work is a necessity; but the contemplative life is better than the active life.[111] Bonaventura points out that Jesus preferred the meditating Mary to the busy Martha,[112] and that he himself seems to have done no work till his thirtieth year.[113] Work is of no value by itself; its highest object is to further contemplation, to macerate the body, to curb concupiscence.[114] For this purpose, indeed, it was strongly insisted upon by several founders of religious orders. According to St. Benedict, "idleness is an enemy to the soul; and hence at certain seasons the brethren ought to occupy themselves in the labour of their hands, and at others in holy reading."[115] St. Bernard writes:--"The handmaid of Christ ought always to pray, to read, to work, lest haply the spirit of uncleanness should lead astray the slothful mind. The delight of the flesh is overcome by labour. . . . The body tired by work is less delighted with vice."[116] But the active life must not be pursued to such an extent as to hinder what it is intended to promote; {282} for it is impossible for any man to be at once occupied with exterior actions and at the same time apply himself to divine contemplation.[117] And whilst he who has nothing else to live upon is bound to work, it is a sin to try to acquire riches beyond the limit which necessity has fixed.[118]

[Footnote 103: Origen, _Contra Celsum_, i. 28 _sq._ (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, xi. 714 _sq._).]

[Footnote 104: _Ibid._ vi. 7 (Migne, Ser. Gr. xi. 1298 _sq_.).]

[Footnote 105: _1 Thessalonians_, iv. 11; _2 <Thessalonians_, iii. 10.]

[Footnote 106: _St. Luke_, xii. 22 _sqq._ _St. Matthew_, vi. 19 _sq._]

[Footnote 107: _St. Luke_, xvi. 19 _sqq._ _St. Matthew_, xix. 24.]

[Footnote 108: _1 Timothy_, vi. 10.]

[Footnote 109: von Eicken, _Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, p. 498 _sqq._ Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 186. 3.]

[Footnote 110: _Genesis_, iii. 19.]

[Footnote 111: Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 182. 1 _sq._ von Eicken, _op. cit._ p. 488 _sqq._]

[Footnote 112: Bonaventura, _Meditationes vitæ Christi_, ch. 45 (_Opera_, xii. 452).]

[Footnote 113: _Ibid._ ch. 15 (_Opera_, xii. 405).]

[Footnote 114: Guigo, _Epistola ad Fratres de Monte-Dei_, i. 8 (in St. Bernard, _Opera omnia_, ii. 214):--"Non spiritualia exercitia sunt propter corporalia, sed corporalia propter spiritualia." von Eicken, _op. cit._ p. 491 _sqq._]

[Footnote 115: St. Benedict, _Regula Monachorum_, 48.]

[Footnote 116: St. Bernard, _De modo bene vivendi_, ch. 51 (_Opera omnia_, ii. 883 _sq._).]

[Footnote 117: _Speculum Monachorum_, in St. Bernard, _Opera omnia_, ii. 818. von Eicken, _op. cit._ p. 494 _sq._ _Cf._ Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 182. 3.]

[Footnote 118: Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 187. 3; 118. 1.]

This doctrine was more or less realised in the monastic life, but was hardly held applicable to laymen. The mediæval baron and knight resembled the Teutonic warrior described by Tacitus, who regarded it as "a dull and stupid thing to accumulate painfully by the sweat of the brow what might be won by a little blood."[119] In England, after the Conquest, the aristocracy in general lived a life of idleness but indulged eagerly in hunting, and its members continually sallied forth in parties to plunder.[120] For a long time the lower classes, constituting the mass of society, existed only for the benefit of the upper class. It was considered honourable to live in sloth supported by the exertions of others, it was held degrading to depend on the gains of industry. The degradation really attached to the gains of labour rather than labour itself; for labour ceased to be degrading if not prosecuted for gain. "Louis XVI. may make locks, the ladies of his court may make butter and cheese, provided it is only for amusement. Lord Rosse may build a telescope as an amateur in the interest of science, and still be noble. But if the locks, the butter, or the telescope are sold, the makers are degraded to the level of the tradesman."[121] However, as Mr.

Spencer observes, trade, while at first relatively unessential (since essential things were mostly made at home) and consequently lacking the sanction of necessity and of ancestral custom, ceased to be despised when it grew in importance.[122] Among ourselves the respect in which a certain occupation is held is {283} largely determined by the degree of mental power implied in it; hence manual labour, and especially unskilled labour, is still in some degree looked down upon. But we do not regard as dishonourable any kind of work which is not opposed to the ordinary rules of morality. We distinguish more clearly than the ancients did between social and moral inferiority. Our moral judgments are less influenced by class antipathies. We recognise that a high standard of duty is compatible even with the humblest station in life. And when we duly reflect upon the matter, we admit that the moral value of industry depends, not on the occupation in which it is displayed, but on the purpose of the labourer.

[Footnote 119: Tacitus, _Germania_, 14.]

[Footnote 120: Wright, _Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages_, p. 102.]

[Footnote 121: Harris, 'The Christian Doctrine of Labor,' in _New Englander_, xxiv. 245.]

[Footnote 122: Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 429.]

* * * * *

But though industry is applauded or insisted on, rest is also in certain circumstances regarded as a duty. By doing too much work a person may injure himself and indirectly other persons as well. In early society there is little inducement to overwork, but the case is very different in modern civilisation. This accounts for the persistence and general popularity of an institution which originally sprang from quite different sources, namely, the Sunday rest.

Among various peoples it is the custom to abstain from work, or from some special kind of work, on certain occasions or days which are regarded as defiling or inauspicious. Work is often suspended after a death, partly perhaps because inactivity is a natural accompaniment of sorrow,[123] or because a mourner is supposed to be in a delicate state requiring rest,[124] but chiefly, I presume, from fear lest the work done should be contaminated by the pollution of death. Among the Arabs of Morocco no work must be performed in the village till the dead is buried. In Greenland everyone who had lived in the same house with the deceased was obliged to be idle for a certain period, according to the directions of the priests or wizards.[125] Among the Eskimo of Behring Strait none of the relatives of the dead must do any work during the time in which the shade is {284} believed to remain with the body, that is, for four or five days.[126] Among the Seminole Indians of Florida the relatives remained at home and refrained from work during the day of the burial and for three days thereafter, when the dead was supposed to stay in his grave.[127] The Kar Nicobarese abstain from work as a sign of mourning.[128] In Samoa all labour was suspended in the settlement on the death of a chief.[129] So also the Basutos do no work on the day when an influential person dies. They, moreover, refrain from going to their fields, or hasten to leave them, at the approach of clouds which give promise of rain, "in order quietly to await the desired benediction, fearing to disturb Nature in her operations. This idea is carried to such an extent, that most of the natives believe that, if they obstinately persist in their labour at such a moment, the clouds are irritated and retire, or send hail instead of rain. Days of sacrifice, or great purification, are also holidays. Hence it is that the law relative to the repose of the seventh day, so far from finding any objection in the minds of the natives, appears to them very natural, and perhaps even more fundamental, than it seems to certain Christians."[130]

[Footnote 123: _Cf._ _infra_, p. 308.]

[Footnote 124: _Cf._ _infra_, p. 307.]

[Footnote 125: Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 149 _sq._]

[Footnote 126: Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 319.]

[Footnote 127: Maccauley, 'Seminole Indians of Florida,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ v. 52.]

[Footnote 128: Kloss, _In the Andamans and Nicobars_, p. 305.]

[Footnote 129: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 229. _Idem_, _Samoa_, p. 146.]

[Footnote 130: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 260 _sq._]

Changes in the moon are frequently considered unfavourable for work. Among the Bechuanas, "when the new moon appears, all must cease from work, and keep what is called in England a holiday."[131] The people of Thermia, in the Cyclades, maintain that all work, so far as possible, should be suspended on the days immediately preceding the full moon.[132] In the Vishnu Purana it is said that one who attends to secular affairs on the days of the full or new moon goes to the Rudhirándha hell, whose wells are blood.[133] In Northern India it is considered bad to undertake any business of importance at the new moon {285} or at an eclipse.[134] According to the 'Laws of Manu,' a Brâhmana is not allowed to study "on the new-moon day, nor on the fourteenth and the eighth days of each half-month, nor on the full-moon day." It is said that "the new-moon day destroys the teacher, the fourteenth day the pupil, the eighth and the full-moon days destroy all remembrance of the Veda; let him therefore avoid reading on those days."[135] The Buddhists have their Sabbath, or _Uposatha_, which occurs four times in the month, namely, on the day of full moon, on the day when there is no moon, and on the two days which are eighth from the full and new moon. On these days selling and buying, work and business, hunting and fishing, are forbidden, and all schools and law-courts are closed.[136] In Ashantee and neighbouring districts, where the people reckon time by moons, there is a weekly "fetish-day" or sabbath, which seems to be of native origin. "In all the countries along the coast, the regular fetish-day is Tuesday, the day which is observed by the king of Ashantee. Other days in the week are held sacred in the bush. On this weekly sabbath, or fetish-day, the people generally dress themselves in white garments, and mark their faces, and sometimes their arms, with white clay. They also rest from labour. The fishermen would expect, that were they to go out on that day, the fetish would be angry, and spoil their fishing."[137] The natives of Coomassie, on the Gold Coast, have a law according to which no agricultural work may be done on a Thursday.[138] In Hawaii, where each month contained thirty nights and the different days and nights derived their names from the varying aspects of the moon according to her age, there were during every month four periods lasting from two to four nights in which the nights were consecrated or made taboo. So also there were tabooed seasons on certain other {286} occasions, as when a high chief was ill, or preparations were made for war, or on the approach of important religious ceremonies. These taboos were either "common" or "strict." In the case of the former men were only required to abstain from their common pursuits and to attend prayers morning and evening, whereas when the season of strict taboo was in force a general gloom and silence pervaded the whole district or island. "Not a fire or light was to be seen, or canoe launched; none bathed; the mouths of dogs were tied up, and fowls put under calabashes, or their heads enveloped in cloth; for no noise of man or animal must be heard. No persons, excepting those who officiated at the temple, were allowed to leave the shelter of their roofs. Were but one of these rules broken, the taboo would fail and the gods be displeased."[139]

[Footnote 131: Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, ii. 205.]

[Footnote 132: Bent, _Cyclades_, p. 438.]

[Footnote 133: _Vish['n]u Purá['n]a_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 134: Crooke, _Popular Religion of Northern India_, i. 23.]

[Footnote 135: _Laws of Manu_, iv. 113 _sq._]

[Footnote 136: Childers, _Dictionary of the Pali Language_, p. 535. Kern, _Der Buddhismus_, ii. 258.]

[Footnote 137: Beecham, _Ashantee_, p. 185 _sq._ _Cf._ Bosman, _op. cit._ p. 131 (Gold Coast natives).]

[Footnote 138: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 304.]

[Footnote 139: Jarves, _History of the Hawaiian Islands_, pp. 40, 28. The word _tapua'i_ means "to abstain from all work, games, &c." (Tregear, _Maori-Polynesian Dictionary_, p. 472).]

The peoples of Semitic stock or with Semitic culture also have their tabooed days. In Morocco work, or certain kinds of work, are avoided on holy days or in holy periods, as being unsuccessful or, in some cases, even dangerous to him who performs it; there is a saying that "work at a feast are like the stab of a dagger." Nobody likes to start on a journey on a Friday before the midday prayer has been said, and it is considered bad to commence any work on that day.[140] I was also told that clothes will not remain clean if they are washed on a Saturday. Among the modern Egyptians Saturday is held to be the most unfortunate of days, and particularly unfavourable for shaving, cutting the nails, and starting on a journey.[141] At Kheybar, in Arabia, again, Sunday is considered an unlucky day for beginning any kind of work.[142] There can be little doubt that the Jewish Sabbath originated in the belief that it was inauspicious or dangerous to work on the seventh day, and that the reason for this belief was the mystic connection which in {287} the opinion of the ancient Hebrews, as of so many other peoples, existed between human activity and the changes in the moon.[143] It has been sufficiently demonstrated that the Sabbath originally depended upon the new moon, and this carries with it the assumption that the Hebrews must at one time have observed a Sabbath at intervals of seven days corresponding with the moon's phases.[144] In the Old Testament the new moon and Sabbath are repeatedly mentioned side by side;[145] thus the oppressors of the poor are represented as saying, "When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the Sabbath, that we may set forth wheat?"[146] Among modern Jews, at the feast of the New Moon, which is held every month on the first or on the first and second days of the month, the women are obliged to suspend all servile work, though the men are not required to interrupt their secular employments.[147] That the superstitious fear of doing work on the seventh day developed into a religious prohibition, is only another instance of a tendency which we have noticed often before--the tendency of magic forces to be transformed into divine volitions.[148] Like the ancient Hebrews, the Assyrians and Babylonians looked upon the seventh day as an "evil day"; and though they do not seem generally to have abstained from work on that day, there were various royal taboos connected with it. The {288} King was not to show himself in his chariot, not to hold court, not to bring sacrifices, not to change his clothes, not to eat a good dinner, and not even to curse his enemies.[149]

[Footnote 140: See Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_, p. 140 _sqq._]

[Footnote 141: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 272.]

[Footnote 142: Doughty, _Arabia Deserta_, ii. 197 _sq._]

[Footnote 143: See Jastrow, 'Original Character of the Hebrew Sabbath,' in _American Journal of Theology_, ii. 321 _sqq._]

[Footnote 144: Wellhausen, _Prolegomena to the History of Israel_, p. 112 _sqq._ Jastrow, _loc. cit._ pp. 314, 327.]

[Footnote 145: _2 Kings_, iv. 23. _Isaiah_, i. 13. _Hosea_, ii. 11.]

[Footnote 146: _Amos_, viii. 5.]

[Footnote 147: Allen, _Modern Judaism_, p. 390 _sq._]

[Footnote 148: Prof. Jastrow seems to have failed to see this when he says (_loc. cit._ p. 323) that "if the Sabbath was originally an 'unfavourable' day on which one must avoid showing one's self before Yahwe, it would naturally be regarded as dangerous to provoke his anger by endeavouring to secure on that day personal benefits through the usual forms of activity." Wellhausen, again, suggests (_op. cit._ p. 114) that the rest on the Sabbath was originally the consequence of that day being the festal and sacrificial day of the week, and only gradually became its essential attribute on account of the regularity with which it every eighth day interrupted the round of everyday work. He argues that the Sabbath as a day of rest cannot be very primitive, because such a day "presupposes agriculture and a tolerably hard-pressed working-day life." But this argument appears very futile when we consider how commonly changes in the moon are believed to exercise an unfavourable influence upon work of any kind. See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

[Footnote 149: Schrader, _Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament_, p. 592 _sq._ Hirschfeld, 'Remarks on the Etymology of [vS]abb[)a]th,' in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc._ 1896, p. 358. Jastrow, _loc. cit._ pp. 320, 328.]

The Jewish Sabbath was abolished by Christ. "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath";[150] "My father worketh [on it] hitherto, and I work."[151] Jewish converts no doubt continued to observe the Sabbath, but this met with disapproval. In one of the Epistles of Ignatius we find the exhortation not to "sabbatise," which was expanded by the subsequent paraphraser of these compositions into a warning against keeping the Sabbath, after the manner of the Jews, "as if delighting in idleness."[152] And in the fourth century a Council of the Church enacted "that the Christians ought not to judaise, and rest on the Sabbath, but ought to work on that day."[153] On the other hand, it was from early times a recognised custom among the Christians to celebrate the first day of the week in memory of Christ's resurrection, by holding a form of religious service; but there was no sabbatic regard for it, and it was chiefly looked upon as a day of rejoicing.[154] Tertullian is the first writer who speaks of abstinence from secular care and labour on Sunday as a duty incumbent upon Christians, lest they should "give place to the devil."[155] But it is extremely doubtful whether the earliest Sunday law really had a Christian origin. In 321 the Emperor Constantine issued an edict to the effect that all judges and all city people and tradesmen should rest on "the venerable Day of the Sun," whereas those living in the country should have full liberty to attend to the culture of their fields, "since it frequently happens {289} that no other day is so fit for the sowing of grain or the planting of vines."[156] In this rescript nothing is said of any relation to Christianity, nor do we know that it in any way was due to Christian influence.[157] It seems that Constantine, in his capacity of Pontifex Maximus, only added the day of the sun--whose worship was the characteristic of the new paganism--to those inauspicious days, _religiosi dies_, which the Romans of old regarded as unsuitable for worldly business and especially for judicial proceedings.[158] But though the obligatory Sunday rest in no case was a continuance of the Jewish Sabbath, it gradually was confounded with it, owing to the recognition of the decalogue, with its injunction of a weekly day of rest, as the code of divine morality. From the sixth century upwards vexatious restrictions were made by civil rulers, councils, and ecclesiastical writers;[159] until in Puritanism the Christian Sunday became a perfect image of the pharisaic Sabbath, or even excelled it in the rigour with which abstinence from every kind of worldly activity was insisted upon. The theory that the keeping holy of one day out of seven is the essence of the Fourth Commandment reconciled people to the fact that the Jewish Sabbath was the seventh day and Sunday the first. In England, in the seventeenth century, persons were punished for carrying coal on Sunday, for hanging out clothes to dry, for travelling on horseback, for rural strolls and walking about.[160] And Scotch clergymen taught their congregations that on that day it was sinful to save a vessel in distress, and that it was proof of religion to leave ship and crew to perish.[161]

[Footnote 150: _St. Mark_, ii. 27.]

[Footnote 151: _St. John_, v. 17.]

[Footnote 152: Ignatius, _Epistola ad Magnesios_, 9 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, v. 768). Neale, _Feasts and Fasts_, p. 89.]

[Footnote 153: _Concilium Laodicenum_, can. 29 (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, ii. 580).]

[Footnote 154: Justin Martyr, _Apologia I. pro Christianis_, 67 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, vi. 429). Schaff, _History of the Christian Church_, 'Ante-Nicene Christianity,' p. 202 _sqq._ Hessey, _Sunday_, p. 29 _sqq._]

[Footnote 155: Tertullian, _De oratione_, 23 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 1191).]

[Footnote 156: _Codex Justinianus_, iii. 12. 2 (3).]

[Footnote 157: _Cf._ Lewis, _Critical History of Sunday Legislation_, p. 18 _sqq._; Milman, _History of Christianity_, ii. 291 _sq._]

[Footnote 158: Gellius, _Noctes Atticæ_, iv. 9. 5; vi. 9. 10. Varro, _De lingua Latina_, vi. 30. Neale, _op. cit._ pp. 5, 6, 86, 87, 206. Fowler, _Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic_, p. 8 _sq._ The Greeks, also, had "unblest and inauspicious" days, when no court or assembly was to be held, and work was to be abstained from (Plato, _Leges_, vii. 800; Karsten, _Studies in Primitive Greek Religion_, p. 90).]

[Footnote 159: Hessey, _op. cit._ p. 87 _sqq._]

[Footnote 160: Roberts, _Social History of the People of the Southern Counties of England_, p. 244 _sqq._]

[Footnote 161: Buckle, _History of Civilization in England_, iii. 76.]

CHAPTER XXXVII

RESTRICTIONS IN DIET

TRAVELLERS have often noticed with astonishment the immense quantities of food which uncivilised people are able to consume. Sir George Grey has described the orgies which follow the stranding of a whale in Australia, when the natives remain by the carcase for many days, fairly eating their way into it.[1] The Rocky Mountain Indians, though they often subsist for a great length of time on a very little food, will at their feasts "gorge down an incredible quantity."[2] A Mongol "will eat more than ten pounds of meat at one sitting, but some have been known to devour an average-sized sheep in the course of twenty-four hours."[3] The Waganda in Central Africa "sometimes gorge themselves to such an extent that they are unable to move, and appear just as if intoxicated."[4] It has been justly observed that what would among ourselves be condemned as disgusting gluttony is, under the conditions to which certain races of men are exposed, quite normal and in fact necessary. As Mr. Spencer observes, "where the habitat is such as at one time to supply very little food and at another time food in great abundance, survival depends on the ability to consume immense quantities when the opportunities occur."[5] When this is the case gluttony can hardly be {291} stigmatised as a vice; and I find no direct evidence that it is so even among savages who are described as generally moderate in their diet. The lack of foresight, which is a characteristic of uncivilised peoples, must prevent them from attaching much moral value to temperance. On the other hand, gluttony is sometimes said to be regarded with admiration. Mr. Torday informs me that the Bambala in South-Western Congo, when praising a man for his strength, are in the habit of saying, "He eats a whole goat with its skin."

[Footnote 1: Grey, _Journals of Expeditions in North-West and Western Australia_, ii. 277 _sqq._]

[Footnote 2: Harmon, _Journal of Voyages in the Interior of North America_, p. 329.]

[Footnote 3: Prejevalsky, _Mongolia_, i. 55.]

[Footnote 4: Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, i. 185.]

[Footnote 5: Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 436.]

At higher stages of culture intemperance is often subject to censure--because it is detrimental to health or prosperity, or because it calls forth an instinctive feeling of disgust, or because indulgence in sensual pleasures is considered degrading, or, generally, because it is inconsistent with an ascetic ideal of life. It is said in the Proverbs that "the glutton shall come to poverty."[6] According to the Laws of Manu, "excessive eating is prejudicial to health, to fame, and to bliss in heaven; it prevents the acquisition of spiritual merit, and is odious among men; one ought, for these reasons, to avoid it carefully."[7] Aristotle maintains that the pleasure with which intemperance is concerned is justly held in disgrace, "since it belongs to us in that we are animals, not in that we are men."[8] Cicero observes that, as mere corporeal pleasure is unworthy the excellency of man's nature, the nourishment of our bodies "should be with a view not to our pleasure, but to our health and our strength."[9] The same opinion is at least nominally shared by many among ourselves; whereas others, though denying that the gratification of appetite is to be sought for its own sake, admit as legitimate ends for it not only the maintenance of health and strength but also "cheerfulness and the cultivation of the social affections."[10] But most of us are undoubtedly less exacting, if not in theory at least in practice, and really find nothing blamable in pleasures of the {292} table which neither impair health, nor involve a perceptible loss of some greater gratification, nor interfere with duties towards neighbours.[11]

[Footnote 6: _Proverbs_, xxiii. 21.]

[Footnote 7: _Laws of Manu_, ii. 57.]

[Footnote 8: Aristotle, _Ethica Nicomachea_, iii. 10. 10.]

[Footnote 9: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 30.]

[Footnote 10: Whewell, _Elements of Morality_, p. 124 _sq._]

[Footnote 11: See Sidgwick, _Methods of Ethics_, p. 328 _sq._]

Sometimes temperance has been inculcated on grounds which in other cases lead to the duty of fasting, that is, abstinence from all food and drink, or at least (in a looser sense of the word) from certain kinds of food, for a determined period. The custom of fasting is wide-spread, and deserves special attention in a study of moral ideas.

Fasting is practised or enjoined for a variety of purposes. It is frequently adopted as a means of having supernatural converse, or acquiring supernatural powers.[12] He who fasts sees in dreams or visions things that no ordinary eye can see. The Hudson Bay Eskimo "discovered that a period of fasting and abstinence from contact with other people endowed a person with supernatural powers and enabled him to learn the secrets of Tung ak [the great spirit]. This is accomplished by repairing to some lonely spot, where, for a greater or less period, the hermit abstains from food or water until the imagination is so worked upon that he believes himself imbued with the power to heal the sick and control all the destinies of life. Tung ak is supposed to stand near and reveal those things while the person is undergoing the test."[13] The Naudowessies totally abstain from every kind of either victuals or drink before a hunting expedition, because they think that "it enables them freely to dream, in which dreams they are informed where they shall find the greatest plenty of game."[14] The Tsimshian of British Columbia, if a special object is to be attained, {293} believe they can compel the deity to grant it by a rigid fasting.[15] The Amazulu have a saying that "the continually stuffed body cannot see secret things," and, in accordance with this belief, put no faith in a fat diviner.[16] A Tungus shaman, who is summoned to treat a sick person, will for several days abstain from food and maintain silence till he becomes inspired.[17] Among the Santals the person or persons who have to offer sacrifices at their feasts prepare themselves for this duty by fasting and prayer and by placing themselves for some time in a position of apparent mental absorption.[18] The savage, as Sir E. B. Tylor remarks, has many a time, for days and weeks together, to try involuntarily the effects of fasting, accompanied with other privations and with prolonged solitary contemplation in the desert or the forest. Under these circumstances he soon comes to see and talk with phantoms, which are to him visible personal spirits, and, having thus learnt the secret of spiritual intercourse, he thenceforth reproduces the cause in order to renew the effects.[19] The Hindus believe that a fasting person will ascend to the heaven of that god in whose name he observes the fast.[20] The Hebrews associated fasting with divine revelations.[21] St. Chrysostom says that fasting "makes the soul brighter, and gives it wings to mount up and soar on high."[22]

[Footnote 12: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 410 _sqq._ Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 261. Avebury, _Origin of Civilisation_, p. 266 _sqq._ Landtman, _Origin of Priesthood_, pp. 118-123, 158 _sqq._ Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, pp. 285, 651. Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 390.

Mooney, 'Myths of the Cherokee,' _ibid._ xix. 480. Herrera, _General History of the West Indies_, 1. 165 (ancient natives of Hispaniola). Niebuhr, _Travels through Arabia_, ii. 282.]

[Footnote 13: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 195.]

[Footnote 14: Carver, _Travels through the Interior Parts of North America_, p. 285.]

[Footnote 15: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 50.]

[Footnote 16: Callaway, _Religious System of the Amazulu_, p. 387, n. 41.]

[Footnote 17: Krivoshapkin, quoted by Landtman, _op. cit._ p. 159.]

[Footnote 18: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 213. See also Rowney, _Wild Tribes of India_, p. 77.]

[Footnote 19: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 410.]

[Footnote 20: Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 77.]

[Footnote 21: _Exodus_, xxxiv. 28. _Deuteronomy_, ix. 9. _Daniel_, ix. 3.]

[Footnote 22: St. Chrysostom, _In Cap. I. Genes. Homil. X._ (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, liii. 83). _Cf._ Tertullian, _De jejuniis_, 6 _sqq._ (Migne, ii. 960, 961, 963); Haug, _Alterthümmer der Christen_, pp. 476, 482.]

Ideas of this kind partly underlie the common practice of abstaining from food before or in connection with the performance of a magical or religious ceremony;[23] but there {294} is yet another ground for this practice. The effect attributed to fasting is not merely psychical, but it also prevents pollution. Food may cause defilement, and, like other polluting matter, be detrimental to sanctity. Among the Maoris "no food is permitted to touch the head or hair of a chief, which is sacred; and if food is mentioned in connection with anything sacred (or 'tapu') it is considered as an insult, and revenged as such."[24] So also a full stomach may be polluting.[25] This is obviously the reason why in Morocco and elsewhere[26] certain magical practices, in order to be efficacious, have to be performed before breakfast. The Masai use strong purges before they venture to eat holy meat.[27] The Caribs purified their bodies by purging, bloodletting, and fasting; and the natives of the Antilles, at certain religious festivals, cleansed themselves by vomiting before they approached the sanctuary.[28] The true object of fasting often appears from the fact that it is practised hand in hand with other ceremonies of a purificatory character. A Lappish _noaide_, or wizard, prepares himself for the offering of a sacrifice by abstinence from food and ablutions.[29] Herodotus tells us that the ancient Egyptians fasted before making a sacrifice to Isis, and beat their bodies while the victims were burnt.[30] When a Hindu resolves to visit a sacred place, he has his head shaved two days preceding the commencement of his journey, and fasts the next day; on the last day of his journey he fasts again, and on his {295} arrival at the sacred spot he has his whole body shaved, after which he bathes.[31] In Christianity we likewise meet with fasting as a rite of purification. At least as early as the time of Tertullian it was usual for communicants to prepare themselves by fasting for receiving the Eucharist;[32] and to this day Roman Catholicism regards it as unlawful to consecrate or partake of it after food or drink.[33] The Lent fast itself was partly interpreted as a purifying preparation for the holy table.[34] And in the early Church catechumens were accustomed to fast before baptism.[35]

[Footnote 23: Bossu, _Travels through Louisiana_, i. 38 (Natchez). Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 285 _sq._; Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, iii. 440 _sq._ (ancient Mexicans). Landa, _Relacion de las cosas de Yucatan_, p. 156. Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 311 _sq._ (natives of Tjumba). Beauchamp, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 56 (Hindus of Southern India). Ward, _op. cit._ ii. 76 _sq._ (Hindus). Wassiljew, quoted by Haberland, 'Gebräuche und Aberglauben beim Essen,' in _Zeitschrift für Völkerpsychologie_, xviii. 30 (Buddhists). Porphyry, _De abstinentia ab esu animalium_, ii. 44; Wachsmuth, _Hellenische Alterthumskunde_, ii. 560, 576; Hermann-Stark, _Lehrbuch der gottesdienstlichen Alterthümer der Griechen_, p. 381; Anrich, _Das antike Mysterienwesen_, p. 25; Diels, 'Ein orphischer Demeterhymnus,' in _Festschrift Theodor Gomperz dargebracht_, p. 6 _sqq._ Chwolsohn, _Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus_, ii. 23, 74.]

[Footnote 24: Angas, _Polynesia_, p. 149.]

[Footnote 25: See Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 434 _sq._; Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness_, p. 127.]

[Footnote 26: Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der gegenwart_, § 219, p. 161.]

[Footnote 27: Thomson, _Masai Land_, p. 430.]

[Footnote 28: Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iv. 330; iii. 384.]

[Footnote 29: von Düben, _Lappland_, p. 256. Friis, _Lappisk Mythologi_, p. 145 _sq._]

[Footnote 30: Herodotus, ii. 40.]

[Footnote 31: Ward, _op. cit._ ii. 130 _sq._ _Cf._ _Institutes of Vishnu_, xlvi. 17, 24 _sq._]

[Footnote 32: Tertullian, _De oratione_, 19 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 1182).]

[Footnote 33: _Catechism of the Council of Trent_, ii. 4. 6.]

[Footnote 34: St. Jerome, _In Jonam_, 3 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxv. 1140).]

[Footnote 35: Justin Martyr, _Apologia I. pro Christianis_, 61 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, vi. 420). St. Augustine, _De fide et operibus_, vi. 8 (Migne, xl. 202).]

In the case of a sacrifice it is considered necessary not only that he who offers it, but that the victim also, should be free from pollution. In ancient Egypt a sacrificial animal had to be perfectly clean.[36] According to Hindu notions the gods enjoy pure sacrifices only.[37] In the Kalika-Purana, a work supposed to have been written under the direction of Siva, it is said that if a man is offered he must be free from corporal defect and unstained with great crimes, and that if an animal is offered it must have exceeded its third year and be without blemish or disease; and in no case must the victim be a woman or a she animal, because, as it seems, females are regarded as naturally unclean.[38] According to the religious law of the Hebrews, no leaven or honey should be used in connection with vegetable offerings, on the ground that these articles have the effect of producing fermentation and tend to acidify and spoil anything with which they are mixed;[39] and the animal which was intended for sacrifice should be absolutely free from blemish[40] and at least eight days old,[41] that is, untainted with the impurity of birth. Quite in harmony with these prescriptions is the notion that human or {296} animal victims have to abstain from food for some time before they are offered up. Among the Kandhs the man who was destined to be sacrificed was kept fasting from the preceding evening, but on the day of the sacrifice he was refreshed with a little milk and palm-sago; and before he was led forth from the village in solemn procession he was carefully washed and dressed in a new garment.[42] In Morocco it is not only considered meritorious for the people to fast on the day previous to the celebration of the yearly sacrificial feast, _l-[(][)a]îd l-kbîr_, but in several parts of the country the sheep which is going to be sacrificed has to fast on that day or at least on the following morning, till some food is given it immediately before it is slaughtered. The Jewish custom which compels the firstborn to fast on the eve of Passover[43] may also perhaps be a survival from a time when all the firstborn belonged to the Lord.[44]

[Footnote 36: Herodotus, ii. 38.]

[Footnote 37: _Baudhâyana_, i. 6. 13. 1 _sq._]

[Footnote 38: Dubois, _Description of the Character, &c. of the People of India_, p. 491.]

[Footnote 39: Keil, _Manual of Biblical Archæology_, i. 262.]

[Footnote 40: _Leviticus_, xxii. 19 _sqq._]

[Footnote 41: _Ibid._ xxii. 27.]

[Footnote 42: Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 118.]

[Footnote 43: Greenstone, 'Fasting,' in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, v. 348. Allen, _Modern Judaism_, p. 394.]

[Footnote 44: _Supra_, i. 459.]

In some cases the custom of fasting before the performance of a sacrifice may be due to the idea that it is dangerous or improper for the worshipper to partake of food before the god has had his share.[45] In India a regular performance of two half-monthly sacrifices is enjoined on the Brahmanical householder for a period of thirty years from the time when he has set up a fire of his own--according to some authorities even for the rest of his life. The ceremony usually occupies two consecutive days, the first of which is chiefly taken up with preparatory rites and the vow of abstinence (_vrata_) by the sacrificer and his wife, whilst the second day is reserved for the main performance of the sacrifice. The _vrata_ includes the abstention from certain kinds of food, especially meat, which will be offered to the gods on the following day, as also from other carnal pleasures. The Satapatha-Brâhmana gives the following explanation of it:--"The gods see through the mind of man; they know that, when {297} he enters on this vow, he means to sacrifice to them the next morning. Therefore all the gods betake themselves to his house, and abide by him or the fires (_upa-vas_) in his house; whence this day is called _upa-vasatha_. Now, as it would even be unbecoming for him to take food before men who are staying with him as his guests have eaten; how much more would it be so, if he were to take food before the gods who are staying with him have eaten: let him therefore take no food at all."[46] It is hardly probable, however, that this is the original meaning of the abstinence in question. It occurs about the time of new moon and full moon; according to some native authorities the abstinence and sacrifice take place on the last two days of each half of the lunar month, whilst the generality of ritualistic writers consider the first day of the half-month that is, the first and sixteenth days of the month to be the proper time for the sacrifice.[47] We shall presently see how frequently fasting is observed on these occasions, presumably for fear of eating food which is supposed to have been polluted by the moon; hence it seems to me by no means improbable that the _vrata_ has a similar origin, instead of being merely a rite preparatory to the sacrifice which follows it. But at the same time the idea that spirits or gods should have the first share of a meal is certainly very ancient, and may lead to actual fasting in case the offering for some reason or other is to be delayed. A Polynesian legend tells us that a man by name Maui once caught an immense fish. Then he left his brothers, saying to them:--"After I am gone, be courageous and patient; do not eat food until I return, and do not let our fish be cut up, but rather leave it until I have carried an offering to the gods from this great haul of fish, and until I have found a priest, that fitting prayers and sacrifices may be offered to the god, and the necessary rites be completed in order. We shall thus all be purified. I will then {298} return, and we can cut up this fish in safety, and it shall be fairly portioned out to this one, and to that one, and to that other." But as soon as Maui had gone, his brothers began at once to eat food, and to cut up the fish. Had Maui previously reached the sacred place, the heart of the deity would have been appeased with the offering of a portion of the fish which had been caught by his disciples, and all the male and female deities would have partaken of their portions of the sacrifice. But now the gods turned with wrath upon them, on account of the fish which they had thus cut up without having made a fitting sacrifice.[48]

[Footnote 45: _Cf._ Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 414.]

[Footnote 46: _Satapatha-Brâhmana_, i. 1. 1. 7 _sq._ Eggeling, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xii. 1 _sq._ Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 413, n. 1.]

[Footnote 47: Eggeling, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xii. 1.]

[Footnote 48: Grey, _Polynesian Mythology_, p. 26 _sq._]

Among many peoples custom prescribes fasting after a death. Lucian says that at the funeral feast the parents of the deceased are prevailed upon by their relatives to take food, being almost prostrated by a three days' fast.[49] We are told that among the Hindus children fast three days after the death of a parent, and a wife the same period after the death of her husband;[50] but according to a more recent statement, to be quoted presently, they do not altogether abstain from food. In one of the sacred books of India it is said that mourners shall fast during three days, and that, if they are unable to do so, they shall subsist on food bought in the market or given unasked.[51] Among the Nay[=a]dis of Malabar "from the time of death until the funeral is over, all the relations must fast."[52] Among the Irulas of the Neilgherries "the relatives of the deceased fast during the first day, that is, if . . . . the death occur after the morning meal, they refrain from the evening one, and eat nothing till the next morning. If it occur during the night, or before the morning meal, they refrain from all food till the evening. Similar fasting is observed on every return of the same day of the week, till the obsequies take place."[53] Among {299} the Bogos of Eastern Africa a son must fast three days after the death of his father.[54] On the Gold Coast it is the custom for the near relatives of the deceased to perform a long and painful fast, and sometimes they can only with difficulty be induced to have recourse to food again.[55] So also in Dahomey they must fast during the "corpse time," or mourning.[56] Among the Brazilian Paressí the relatives of a dead person remain for six days at his grave, carefully refraining from taking food.[57] Among the aborigines of the Antilles children used to fast after the death of a parent, a husband after the death of his wife, and a wife after the death of her husband.[58] In some Indian tribes of North America it is the custom for the relatives of the deceased to fast till the funeral is over.[59] Among the Snanaimuq, a tribe of the Coast Salish, after the death of a husband or wife the surviving partner must not eat anything for three or four days.[60] In one of the interior divisions of the Salish of British Columbia, the Stlatlumh, the next four days after a funeral feast are spent by the members of the household of the deceased person in fasting, lamenting and ceremonial ablutions.[61] Among the Upper Thompson Indians in British Columbia, again, those who handled the dead body and who dug the grave had to fast until the corpse was buried.[62]

[Footnote 49: Lucian, _De luctu_, 24.]

[Footnote 50: Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 76 _sq._]

[Footnote 51: _Vasishtha_, iv. 14 _sq._ _Cf._ _Institutes of Vishnu_, xix. 14.]

[Footnote 52: Thurston, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 76.]

[Footnote 53: Harkness, _Description of a Singular Race inhabiting the Neilgherry Hills_, p. 97.]

[Footnote 54: Munzinger, _Die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_, p. 29.]

[Footnote 55: Cruickshank, _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast_, ii. 218.]

[Footnote 56: Burton, _Mission to Gelele_, ii. 163.]

[Footnote 57: von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 435. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 339 (Bakaïri).]

[Footnote 58: Du Tertre, _Histoire générale des Antilles_, ii. 371.]

[Footnote 59: Charlevoix, _Voyage to North-America_, ii. 187.]

[Footnote 60: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 45.]

[Footnote 61: Tout, 'Ethnology of the Stlatlumh of British Columbia,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 138.]

[Footnote 62: Teit, 'Thompson Indians of British Columbia,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, Anthropology, i. 331.]

In several instances fasting after a death is observed only in the daytime.

David and his people fasted for Saul and Jonathan until even on the day when the news of their death arrived.[63] Among the Arabs of Morocco it is the custom that if a death takes place in the morning everyone in the village refrains from food until {300} the deceased is buried in the afternoon or evening; but if a person dies so late that he cannot be buried till the next morning the people eat at night. In the Pelew Islands, as long as the dead is unburied, fasting is observed in the daytime but not in the evening.[64] In Fiji after a burial the _kana-bogi_, or fasting till evening, is practised for ten or twenty days.[65] In Samoa it was common for those who attended the deceased to eat nothing during the day, but to have a meal at night.[66] In the Tuhoe tribe of the Maoris, "when a chief of distinction died his widow and children would remain for some time within the _whare potae_ [that is, mourning house], eating food during the night time only, never during the day."[67] The Sacs and Foxes in Nebraska formerly required that children should fast for three months after the death of a parent, except that they every day about sunset were allowed to partake of a meal made entirely of hominy.[68] Among the Kansas a man who loses his wife must fast from sunrise to sunset for a year and a half, and a woman who loses her husband must observe a similar fast for a year.[69] In some tribes of British Columbia and among the Thlinkets, until the dead body is buried the relatives of the deceased may eat a little at night but have to fast during the day.[70] Among the Upper Thompson Indians a different custom prevailed: "nobody was allowed to eat, drink, or smoke in the open air after sunset (others say after dusk) before the burial, else the ghost would harm them."[71]

[Footnote 63: _2 Samuel_, i. 12. _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 35.]

[Footnote 64: Waitz, _op. cit._ v. 153.]

[Footnote 65: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 169.]

[Footnote 66: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 228. _Idem_, _Samoa_, p. 145.]

[Footnote 67: Best, 'Tuhoe Land,' in _Trans. and Proceed. of the New Zealand Institute_, xxx. 38.]

[Footnote 68: Yarrow, 'Mortuary Customs of the North American Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ i. 95.]

[Footnote 69: Dorsey, 'Mourning and War Customs of the Kansas,' in _American Naturalist_, xix. 679 _sq._]

[Footnote 70: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 41.]

[Footnote 71: Teit, _loc. cit._ p. 328.]

Very frequently mourners have to abstain from certain victuals only, especially flesh or fish, or some other staple or favourite food.

In Greenland everybody who had lived in the same house with the dead, or who had touched his corpse, was for some time forbidden to partake of certain kinds of food.[72] Among the Upper Thompson Indians "parents bereft of a child did not eat fresh meat for several months."[73] Among the Stlatlumh of {301} British Columbia a widow might eat no fresh food for a whole year, whilst the other members of the deceased person's family abstained from such food for a period of from four days to as many months. A widower was likewise forbidden to eat fresh meats for a certain period, the length of which varied with the age of the person--the younger the man, the longer his abstention.[74] In some of the Goajiro clans of Colombia a person is prohibited from eating flesh during the mourning time, which lasts nine days.[75] Among the Abipones, when a chief died, the whole tribe abstained for a month from eating fish, their principal dainty.[76] While in mourning, the Northern Queensland aborigines carefully avoid certain victuals, believing that the forbidden food, if eaten, would burn up their bowels.[77] In Easter Island the nearest relatives of the dead are for a year or even longer obliged to abstain from eating potatoes, their chief article of food, or some other victuals of which they are particularly fond.[78] Certain Papuans and various tribes in the Malay Archipelago prohibit persons in mourning from eating rice or sago.[79] In the Andaman Islands mourners refuse to partake of their favourite viands.[80] After the death of a relative the Tipperahs abstain from flesh for a week.[81] The same is the case with the Arakh, a tribe in Oudh, during the fifteen days in the month of Kuâr which are sacred to the worship of the dead.[82] Among the Nay[=a]dis of Malabar the relatives of the deceased are not allowed to eat meat for ten days after his death.[83] According to Toda custom the near relatives must not eat rice, milk, honey, or gram until the funeral is over.[84] Among the Hindus described by Mr. Chunder Bose a widow is restricted to one scanty meal a day, and this is of the coarsest description and always devoid of fish, the most esteemed article of food in a Hindu lady's bill of fare. The son, again, from {302} the hour of his father's death to the conclusion of the funeral ceremony, is allowed to take only a meal consisting of _atab_ rice, a sort of inferior pulse, milk, ghee, sugar, and a few fruits, and at night a little milk, sugar, and fruits--a _régime_ which lasts ten days in the case of a Brahmin and thirty-one days in the case of a Sûdra.[85] In some of the sacred books of India it is said that, during the period of impurity, all the mourners shall abstain from eating meat.[86] In China "meat, must, and spirits were forbidden even in the last month of the deepest mourning, when other sorts of food had long been allowed already."[87]

[Footnote 72: Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 149 _sq._ Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 218.]

[Footnote 73: Teit, _loc. cit._ p. 332.]

[Footnote 74: Tout, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 138 _sq._]

[Footnote 75: Candelier, _Rio-Hacha_, p. 220.]

[Footnote 76: Charlevoix, _History of Paraguay_, i. 405.]

[Footnote 77: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 203.]

[Footnote 78: Geiseler, _Die Oster-Insel_, pp. 28, 30.]

[Footnote 79: Wilken, 'Ueber das Haaropfer, und einige andere Trauergebräuche bei den Völkern Indonesien's,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, iv. 348 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 142, 353.]

[Footnote 81: Browne, quoted by Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 110.]

[Footnote 82: Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_, i. 84.]

[Footnote 83: Thurston, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 76.]

[Footnote 84: _Idem_, _ibid._ i. 174. Dr. Rivers says (_Todas_, p. 370) that, among the Todas, a widower is not allowed to eat rice nor drink milk, and that on every return of the day of the week on which his wife died he takes no food in the morning but only has his evening meal. The same holds good for a widow.]

[Footnote 85: Bose, _The Hindoos as they are_, pp. 244, 254 _sq._]

[Footnote 86: _Gautama_, xiv. 39. _Institutes of Vishnu_, xix. 15.]

[Footnote 87: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 651.]

The custom of fasting after a death has been ascribed to different causes by different writers. Mr. Spencer believes that it has resulted from the habit of making excessive provision for the dead.[88] But although among some peoples the funeral offerings no doubt are so extensive as to reduce the survivors to poverty and starvation,[89] I have met with no statement to the effect that they are anxious to give to the deceased all the eatables which they possess, or that the mourning fast is a matter of actual necessity. It is always restricted to some fixed period, often to a few days only, and it prevails among many peoples who have never been known to be profuse in their sacrifices to the dead. With reference to the Chinese, Dr. de Groot maintains that the mourners originally fasted with a view to being able to sacrifice so much the more at the tomb; and he bases this conclusion on the fact that the articles of food which were forbidden till the end of the deepest mourning were the very same as those which in ancient China played the principal part at every burial sacrifice.[90] But this prohibition may also perhaps be due to a belief that the offering of certain victuals to the dead pollutes all food belonging to the same species.

[Footnote 88: Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 261 _sqq._]

[Footnote 89: _Ibid._ i. 262.]

[Footnote 90: de Groot, _op. cit._, (vol. ii. book) i. 652.]

Professor Wilken, again, suggests that the mourners abstain from food till they have given the dead his due, in {303} order to show that they do not wish to keep him waiting longer than is necessary and thus make him kindly disposed towards them.[91] This explanation presupposes that the fast is immediately followed by offerings or a feast for the dead. In some instances this is expressly said to be the case;[92] the ancient Chinese, for instance, observed a special fast as an introductory rite to the sacrifices which they offered to the manes at regular periods after the demise and even after the close of the mourning.[93] But generally there is no indication of the mourning fast being an essential preliminary to a sacrifice to the dead, and in an instance mentioned above the funeral feast regularly precedes it.[94]

[Footnote 91: Wilken, in _Revue colonials internationale_, iv. 347, 348, 350 _sq._ n. 32.]

[Footnote 92: Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 90 (Dyaks). Black, 'Fasting,' in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, ix. 44.]

[Footnote 93: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 656.]

[Footnote 94: _Supra_, ii. 299.]

It seems that Sir J. G. Frazer comes much nearer the truth when he observes that people originally fasted after a death "just in those circumstances in which they considered that they might possibly in eating devour a ghost."[95] Yet I think it would generally be more correct to say that they were afraid of swallowing, not the ghost, but food polluted with the contagion of death. The dead body is regarded as a seat of infection, which defiles anything in its immediate neighbourhood, and this infection is of course considered particularly dangerous if it is allowed to enter into the bowels. In certain cases the length of the mourning fast is obviously determined by the belief in the polluting presence of the ghost. The six days' fast of the Paressí coincides with the period after which the dead is supposed to have arrived in heaven no longer to return; and they say that anybody who should fail to observe this fast would "eat the mouth of the dead" and die himself.[96] Frequently the fasting lasts till the corpse is buried; and burial is a common safeguard against the return of the ghost.[97] The custom {304} of restricting the fast to the daytime probably springs from the idea that a ghost cannot see in the dark, and is consequently unable to come and pollute the food at night. That the object of the fast is to prevent pollution is also suggested by its resemblance to some other practices, which are evidently intended to serve this purpose. The Maoris were not allowed to eat on or near any spot where a dead body had been buried, or to take a meal in a canoe while passing opposite to such a place.[98] In Samoa, while a dead body is in the house, no food is eaten under the same roof; hence the family have their meals outside, or in another house.[99] The Todas, who fast on the day when a death has taken place, have on the following day their meals served in another hut.[100] In one of the sacred books of India it is said that a Brâhmana "shall not eat in the house of a relation within six degrees where a person has died, before the ten days of impurity have elapsed"; in a house "where a lying-in woman has not yet come out of the lying-in chamber"; nor in a house where a corpse lies;[101] and in connection with this last injunction we are told that, when a person who is not a relation has died, it is customary to place at the distance of "one hundred bows" a lamp and water-vessel, and to eat beyond that distance.[102] In one of the Zoroastrian books Ormuzd is represented as saying, "In a house when a person shall die, until three nights are completed . . . nothing whatever of meat is to be eaten by his relations";[103] and the obvious reason for this rule was the belief that the soul of the dead was hovering about the body for the first three nights after death.[104] Closely related to this custom is that of the modern Parsis, which forbids for three days all cooking under a roof where a death has occurred, but allows the inmates to obtain food from their neighbours {305} and friends.[105] Among the Agariya, a Dravidian tribe in the hilly parts of Mirzápur, no fire is lit and no cooking is done in the house of a dead person on the day when he is cremated, the food being cooked in the house of the brother-in-law of the deceased.[106] In Mykonos, one of the Cyclades, it is considered wrong to cook in the house of mourning; hence friends and relatives come laden with food, and lay the "bitter table."[107] Among the Albanians there is no cooking in the house for three days after a death, and the family are fed by friends.[108] So also the Maronites of Syria "dress no victuals for some time in the house of the deceased, but their relations and friends supply them."[109] When a Jew dies all the water in the same and adjoining houses is instantly thrown away;[110] nobody may eat in the same room with the corpse, unless there is only one room in the house, in which case the inhabitants may take food in it if they interpose a screen, so that in eating they do not see the corpse; they must abstain from flesh and wine so long as the dead body is in the house;[111] and on the evening of mourning the members of the family may not eat their own food, but are supplied with food by their friends.[112] Among the Arabs of Morocco, if a person has died in the morning, no fire is made in the whole village until he is buried, and in some parts of the country the inmates of a house or tent where a death has occurred, abstain from making fire for two or three days. In Algeria "dès que quelqu'un est mort, on ne doit pas allumer de feu dans la maison pendant trois jours, et il est défendu de toucher à de la viande rôtie, grillée ou bouillie, à moins qu'elle ne vienne de quelqu'un de dehors."[113] In China, for seven days after a death "no food is cooked in the house, and friends {306} and neighbours are trusted to supply the common necessaries of life."[114] There is no sufficient reason to assume that this practice of abstaining from cooking food after a death is a survival of a previous mourning fast, but the two customs seem partly to have a similar origin. The cooking may contaminate the food if done in a polluted house, or by a polluted individual. The relatives of the dead, or persons who have handled the corpse, are regarded as defiled; hence they have to abstain from cooking food, as they have to abstain from any kind of work,[115] and from sexual intercourse.[116] Hence, also, they are often prohibited from touching food; and this may in some cases have led to fasting, whilst in other instances they have to be fed by their neighbours.[117]

[Footnote 95: Frazer, 'Certain Burial Customs as illustrative of the Primitive Theory of the Soul,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 94. See also Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, pp. 270, 590.]

[Footnote 96: von den Steinen, _op. cit._ p. 434 _sq._]

[Footnote 97: _Infra_, on Regard for the Dead.]

[Footnote 98: Polack, _Manners ani Customs of the New Zealanders_, i. 239.]

[Footnote 99: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 228. _Idem_, _Samoa_, p. 145.]

[Footnote 100: Thurston, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, i. 174.]

[Footnote 101: _Âpastamba_, i. 5. 16. 18 _sqq._]

[Footnote 102: Haradatta, quoted by Bühler, in _Sacred Books of the East_, ii. 59, n. 20.]

[Footnote 103: _Shâyast Lâ-Shâyast_, xvii. 2.]

[Footnote 104: West, in _Sacred Books of the East_, v. 382, n. 3.]

[Footnote 105: West, _ibid._ v. 382, n. 2.]

[Footnote 106: Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, i. 7.]

[Footnote 107: Bent, _Cyclades_, p. 221.]

[Footnote 108: von Hahn, _Albanesische Studien_, p. 151.]

[Footnote 109: Dandini, 'Voyage to Mount Libanus,' in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages_, x. 290.]

[Footnote 110: Allen, _Modern Judaism_, p. 435.]

[Footnote 111: Bodenschatz, _Kirchliche Verfassung der heutigen Juden_, iv. 177.]

[Footnote 112: Buxtorf, _Synagoga Judaica_, p. 707.]

[Footnote 113: Certeux and Carnoy, _L'Algérie traditionelle_, p. 220.]

[Footnote 114: Gray, _China_, i. 287 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: _Supra_, ii. 283 _sq._]

[Footnote 116: Teit, _loc. cit._ p. 331 (Upper Thompson Indians). Tout, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 139 (Stlatlumh of British Columbia). Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, pp. 578, 590; Caland, _Die Altindischen Todten- und Bestattungsgebräuche_, p. 81. de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 609 (Chinese). Wilken, in _Revue internationale coloniale_, iv. 352, n. 41.]

[Footnote 117: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 145; _Idem_, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 228 (Samoans). Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 403 (Tahitians). Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 323 (Maoris). Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 169. Among the Upper Thompson Indians the persons who handled the dead body would not touch the food with their hands, but must put it into their mouths with sharp-pointed sticks (Teit, loc. cit. p. 331).]

However, an unclean individual may be supposed to pollute a piece of food not only by touching it with his hand, but in some cases by eating it; and, in accordance with the principle of _pars pro toto_, the pollution may then spread to all victuals belonging to the same species. Ideas of this kind are sometimes conspicuous in connection with the restrictions in diet after a death. Thus the Siciatl of British Columbia believe that a dead body, or anything connected with the dead, is inimical to the salmon, and therefore the relatives of a deceased person must abstain from eating salmon in the early stages of the run, as also from entering a creek where salmon are found.[118] Among the Stlatlumh, a neighbouring people, not even elderly widowers, for whom the period of abstention is comparatively {307} short, are allowed to eat fresh salmon till the first of the run is over and the fish have arrived in such numbers that there is no danger of their being driven away.[119] It is not unlikely that if the motives for the restrictions in diet after a death were sufficiently known in each case, a similar fear lest the unclean mourner should pollute the whole species by polluting some individual member of it would be found to be a common cause of those rules which prohibit the eating of staple or favourite food.[120] But it would seem that such rules also may spring from the idea that this kind of food is particularly sought for by the dead and therefore defiled.

[Footnote 118: Tout, 'Ethnology of the Siciatl of British Columbia,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxiv. 33.]

[Footnote 119: Tout, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 139.]

[Footnote 120: In the Arunta tribe, Central Australia, no menstruous woman is allowed to gather the Irriakura bulbs, which form a staple article of diet for both men and women, the idea being that any infringement of the restriction would result in the failure of the supply of the bulb (Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 615).]

Moreover, unclean individuals are not only a danger to others, but are themselves in danger. As Sir J. G. Frazer has shown, they are supposed to be in a delicate condition, which imposes upon them various precautions;[121] and one of these may be restrictions in their diet. Among the Thlinkets and some peoples in British Columbia the relatives of the deceased not only fast till the body is buried, but have their faces blackened, cover their heads with ragged mats, and must speak but little, confining themselves to answering questions, as it is believed that they would else become chatterboxes.[122] According to early ideas, mourners are in a state very similar to that of girls at puberty, who also, among various peoples, are obliged to fast or abstain from certain kinds of food on account of their uncleanness.[123] Among the Stlatlumh, for instance, {308} when a girl reaches puberty, she fasts for the first four days and abstains from fresh meats of any kind throughout the whole period of her seclusion. "There was a two-fold object in this abstention. First, the girl, it was thought, would be harmed by the fresh meat in her peculiar condition; and second, the game animals would take offence if she partook of their meat in these circumstances," and would not permit her father to kill them.[124]

[Footnote 121: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 343, &c.]

[Footnote 122: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 41.]

[Footnote 123: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 40 _sqq._ (various tribes in British Columbia). Tout, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxiv. 33 (Siciatl). Sproat, _Scenes and Studies of Savage Life_, p. 93 _sq._ (Ahts). Bourke, 'Medicine-Men of the Apache,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 501. Du Tertre, _Histoire générale des Antilles_, ii. 371. Schomburgk, 'Natives of Guiana,' in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, i. 269 _sq._ von Martius, _Beiträge zur Ethnographie Amerika's_, i. 644 (Macusis). Seligmann, in _Reports of the Cambridge Expedition to Torres Straits_, v. 200 _sqq._ (Western Islanders). Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 94. See Frazer, _op. cit._ iii. 205 _sqq._]

[Footnote 124: Tout, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 136.]

It should finally be noticed that, though the custom of fasting after a death in the main has a superstitious origin, there may at the same time be a physiological motive for it.[125] Even the rudest savage feels afflicted at the death of a friend, and grief is accompanied by a loss of appetite. This natural disinclination to partake of food may, combined with superstitious fear, have given rise to prohibitory rules, nay, may even in the first instance have suggested the idea that there is danger in taking food. The mourning observances so commonly coincide with the natural expressions of sorrow, that we are almost bound to assume the existence of some connection between them, even though in their developed forms the superstitious motive be the most prominent.

[Footnote 125: _Cf._ Mallery, 'Manners and Meals,' in _American Anthropologist_, i. 202; Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 213; Schurtz, _Urgeschichte der Kultur_, p. 587.]

An important survival of the mourning fast is the Lent fast. It originally lasted for forty hours only, that is, the time when Christ lay in the grave.[126] Irenaeus speaks of the fast of forty hours before Easter,[127] and Tertullian, when a Montanist disputing against the Catholics, says that the only legitimate days for Christian fasting were those in which the Bridegroom was taken away.[128] Subsequently, however, the forty hours were extended to forty {309} days, in imitation of the forty days' fasts of Moses, Elijah, and Christ.[129]

[Footnote 126: _Cf._ _St. Matthew_, ix. 15; _St. Mark_, ii. 20; _St. Luke_, v. 35.]

[Footnote 127: Irenaeus, quoted by Eusebius, _Historia ecclesiastica_, v. 24 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, xx. 501). _Cf._ Funk, 'Die Entwicklung des Osterfastens,' in _Theologische Quartalschrift_, lxxv. 181 _sqq._; Duchesne, _Christian Worship_, p. 241.]

[Footnote 128: Tertullian, _De jejuniis_, 2 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 956).]

[Footnote 129: St. Jerome, _Commentarii in Jonam_, 3 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxv. 1140). St. Augustine, _Epistola LV (alias CXIX)_, 'Ad inquisitiones Januarii,' 15 (Migne, xxxiii. 217 _sq._). Funk, _loc. cit._ p. 209.]

Not only on a death, but on certain other occasions, food is supposed to pollute or injure him who partakes of it, and is therefore to be avoided. In Pfalz the people maintain that no food should be taken at an eclipse of the sun;[130] and all over Germany there is a popular belief that anybody who eats during a thunderstorm will be struck by the lightning.[131] When the Todas know that there is going to be an eclipse of the sun or the moon, they abstain from food.[132] Among the Hindus, while an eclipse is going on, "drinking water, eating food, and all household business, as well as the worship of the gods, are all prohibited"; high-caste Hindus do not even eat food which has remained in the house during an eclipse, but give it away, and all earthen vessels in use in their houses at the time must be broken.[133] Among the rules laid down for Snâtakas, that is, Brâhmanas who have completed their studentship, there is one which forbids them to eat, travel, and sleep during the twilight;[134] and in one of the Zoroastrian Pahlavi texts it is said that "in the dark it is not allowable to eat food, for the demons and fiends seize upon one-third of the wisdom and glory of him who eats food in the dark."[135] Many Hindus who revere the sun do not break their fast in the morning till they catch a clear view of it, and do not eat at all on days when it is obscured by clouds[136]--a custom to which there is a parallel among some North American sun-worshippers, the Snanaimuq Indians belonging to the Coast Salish, who must not partake of any food until the sun is well up in the sky.[137] Brahmins {310} fast at the equinoxes, solstices, conjunctions of planets, and on the days of the new and full moon.[138] The Buddhist Sabbath, or _Uposatha_, which, as we have noticed above, occurs on the day of full moon, on the day when there is no moon, and on the two days which are eighth from the full and new moon, is not only a day of rest, but has also from ancient times been a fast-day. He who keeps the Sabbath rigorously abstains from all food between sunrise and sunset, and, as no cooking must be done during the _Uposatha_, he prepares his evening meal in the early morning before the rise of the sun.[139]

[Footnote 130: Schönwerth, _Aus der Oberpfalz_, iii. 55.]

[Footnote 131: Haberland, in _Zeitschr. f. Völkerpsychologie_, xviii. 258.]

[Footnote 132: Rivers, _op. cit._ p. 592 _sq._]

[Footnote 133: Crooke, _Popular Religion of Northern India_, i. 21 _sq._]

[Footnote 134: _Laws of Manu_, iv. 55.]

[Footnote 135: _Shâyast Lâ-Shâyast_, ix. 8.]

[Footnote 136: Wilson, _Works_, i. 266. Hunter, _Annals of Rural Bengal_, ii. 285. Crooke, _Things Indian_, p. 214.]

[Footnote 137: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 51.]

[Footnote 138: Dubois, _Description of the People of India_, p. 160. See also _supra_, ii. 297.]

[Footnote 139: Childers, _Dictionary of the Pali Language_, p. 535. Kern, _Der Buddhismus_, ii. 258.]

Among the Jews there are many who abstain from food on the day of an eclipse of the moon, which they regard as an evil omen.[140] We have also reason to believe that the Jews were once in the habit of observing the new moons and Sabbaths not only as days of rest, but as fast-days; and the Hebrew Sabbath, as we have seen, in all probability owes its origin to superstitious fear of the changes in the moon.[141] Or how shall we explain the curious rule which forbids fasting on a new moon and on the seventh day,[142] if not as a protest against a fast once in vogue among the Jews on these occasions, but afterwards regarded as an illegitimate rite?[143] This theory is not new, for Hooker in his 'Ecclesiastical Polity' observes that "it may be a question, whether in some sort they did not always fast on the Sabbath." He refers to a statement of Josephus, according to which the sixth hour "was wont on the Sabbath always to call them home unto meat," and to certain pagan writers who upbraided them with fasting on that day.[144] In Nehemiah there is an indication that it was a custom to fast on the first day of the seventh month,[145] {311} which is "holy unto the Lord";[146] and on the tenth day of the same month there was the great fast of atonement, combined with abstinence from every kind of work.[147] I venture to think that all these fasts may be ultimately traced to a belief that the changes in the moon not only are unfavourable for work, but also make it dangerous to partake of food. The fact of the seventh day being a day of rest established the number seven as a sabbatical number. In the seventh month there are several days, besides Saturdays, which are to be observed as days of rest,[148] and in the seventh year there shall be "a sabbath of rest unto the land."[149] In these Sabbatarian regulations the day of atonement plays a particularly prominent part. The severest punishment is prescribed for him who does not rest and fast on that day "from even unto even";[150] and it is on the same day that, after the lapse of seven times seven years, the trumpet of the jubilee shall be caused to sound throughout the land.[151] Most of the rules concerning the day of atonement are undoubtedly post-exilic. But the fact that no other regular days of fasting but those mentioned by Zechariah are referred to by the prophets or in earlier books, hardly justifies the conclusion drawn by many scholars that no such fast existed. It is extremely probable that the fast of the tenth day of the seventh month _as a fast of atonement_ is of a comparatively modern date; but it is perhaps not too bold to suggest that the idea of atonement is a later interpretation of a previously existing fast, which was originally observed for fear of the dangerous quality attributed to the number seven. Why this fast was enjoined on the tenth day of the seventh month remains obscure; but it seems that the order of the month was considered more important than that of the day. Nehemiah speaks of a fast which {312} was kept on the twenty-fourth day of the seventh month.[152]

[Footnote 140: Buxtorf, _op. cit._ p. 477.]

[Footnote 141: _Supra_, ii. 286 _sq._]

[Footnote 142: _Judith_, viii. 6. _Schulchan Aruch_, i. 91, 117.]

[Footnote 143: See Jastrow, 'Original Character of the Hebrew Sabbath,' in _American Journal of Theology_, ii. 325.]

[Footnote 144: Hooker, _Ecclesiastical Polity_, v. 72, vol. ii. 338.]

[Footnote 145: _Nehemiah_, viii. 2, 10:--"Then he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them _for whom nothing is prepared_."]

[Footnote 146: _Nehemiah_, viii. 9 _sqq._ See also _Leviticus_, xxiii. 24 _sq._; _Numbers_, xxix. 1. Among the Babylonians, too, the seventh month had a sacred character (]astrow, _Religion of Babylonia and Assyria_, pp. 681, 683, 686).]

[Footnote 147: _Leviticus_, xvi. 29, 31; xxiii. 27 _sqq._ _Numbers_, xxix. 7.]

[Footnote 148: _Leviticus_, xxiii. 24, 25, 35, 36, 39. _Numbers_, xxix. 1, 12, 35.]

[Footnote 149: _Leviticus_, xxv. 4. See also _Exodus_, xxiii. 10 _sq._]

[Footnote 150: _Leviticus_, xxiii. 29 _sq._]

[Footnote 151: _Ibid._ xxv. 9.]

[Footnote 152: _Nehemiah_, ix. 1.]

In other Semitic religions we meet with various fasts which are in some way or other connected with astronomical changes. According to En-Nedîm, the Harranians, or "Sabians," observed a thirty days' fast in honour of the moon, commencing on the eighth day after the new moon of Adsâr (March); a nine days' fast in honour of "the Lord of Good Luck" (probably Jupiter),[153] commencing on the ninth day before the new moon of the first Kânûn (December); and a seven days' fast in honour of the sun, commencing on the eighth or ninth day after the new moon of Shobâth (February).[154] The thirty days' fast seems to have implied abstinence from every kind of food and drink between sunrise and sunset,[155] whereas the seven days' fast is expressly said to have consisted in abstinence from fat and wine.[156] In Manichæism--which is essentially based upon the ancient nature religion of Babylonia, though modified by Christian and Persian elements and elevated into a gnosis[157]--we meet with a great number of fasts. There is a continuous fast for two days when the sun is in Sagittarius (which it enters about the 22nd November) and the moon has its full light; another fast when the sun has entered Capricornus (which it does about the 21st December) and the moon first becomes visible; and a thirty days' fast between sunrise and sunset commencing on the day "when the new moon begins to shine, the sun is in Aquarius (where it is from about the 20th January), and eight days of the month have passed," which seems to imply that the fast cannot begin until eight days after the sun has entered Aquarius and that consequently, if the new moon {313} appears during that period, the commencement of the fast has to be postponed till the following new moon. The Manichaeans also fasted for two days at every new moon; and our chief authority on the subject, En-Nedîm, states that they had seven fast-days in each month. They fasted on Sundays, and some of them, the _electi_ or "perfect ones," on Mondays also.[158] We are told by Leo the Great that they observed these weekly fasts in honour of the sun and the moon;[159] but according to the Armenian Bishop Ebedjesu their abstinence on Sunday was occasioned by their belief that the destruction of the world was going to take place on that day.[160] There can be little doubt that the Harranian and Manichæan fasts were originally due, not to reverence, but to fear of evil influences; reverence can never be the primitive motive for a customary rite of fasting. The thirty days' fast which the Harranians observed in the month of Adsâr finds perhaps its explanation in the fact that, according to Babylonian beliefs, the month Adar was presided over by the seven evil spirits, who knew neither compassion nor mercy, who heard no prayer or supplication, and to whose baneful influence the popular faith attributed the eclipse of the moon.[161] But it may also be worth noticing that the Harranian fast took place about the vernal equinox--a time at which, as we have seen, the Brahmins of India are wont to fast, though only for a day or two.

[Footnote 153: Chwolsohn, _Die Ssabier_, ii. 226, n. 247.]

[Footnote 154: En-Nedîm, _Fihrist_, (book ix. ch. i.) i. 4; v. 8, 11 _sq._ (Chwolsohn, _op. cit._ ii. 6, 7, 32, 35 _sq._). See also Chwolsohn, i. 533 _sqq._; ii. 75 _sq._]

[Footnote 155: Chwolsohn, _op. cit._ ii. 71 _sq._ _Cf._ Abûlfedâ, 6 (_ibid._ ii. 500).]

[Footnote 156: En-Nedîm, _op. cit._ v. 11 (Chwolsohn, _op. cit._ ii. 36).]

[Footnote 157: Kessler, 'Mani, Manichäer,' in Herzog-Hauck, _Realencyclopädie f. protestantische Theologie_, xii. 198 _sq._ Harnack, _History of Dogma_, iii. 330. _Idem_, 'Manichæism,' in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, xv. 485.]

[Footnote 158: En-Nedîm, _Fihrist_, in Flügel, _Mani_, pp. 95, 97. Flügel, p. 311 _sqq._ Kessler, _loc. cit._ p. 212 _sq._]

[Footnote 159: Leo the Great, _Sermo XLII. (al. XLI.)_ 5 (Migne, _op. cit._ liv. 279).]

[Footnote 160: Flügel, _op. cit._ p. 312 _sq._]

[Footnote 161: Jastrow, _Religion of Babylonia and Assyria_, pp. 263, 276, 463.]

It is highly probable that the thirty days' fast of the Harranians and Manichæans is the prototype of the Muhammedan fast of Rama[d.]ân. During the whole ninth month of the Muhammedan year the complete abstinence from food, drink and cohabitation from sunrise till sunset is enjoined upon every Moslem, with the exception of young children and idiots, as also sick persons and travellers, who are allowed to postpone the {314} fast to another time.[162] This fast is said to be a fourth part of Faith, the other cardinal duties of religious practice being prayer, almsgiving, and pilgrimage. But, as a matter of fact, modern Muhammedans regard the fast of Rama[d.]ân as of more importance than any other religious observance;[163] many of them neglect their prayers, but anybody who should openly disregard the rule of fasting would be subject to a very severe punishment.[164] Even the privilege granted to travellers and sick persons is not readily taken advantage of. During their marches in the middle of summer nothing but the apprehension of death can induce the Aeneze to interrupt the fast;[165] and when Burton, in the disguise of a Muhammedan doctor, was in Cairo making preparations for his pilgrimage to Mecca, he found among all those who suffered severely from such total abstinence only one patient who would eat even to save his life.[166] There is no evidence that the fast of Rama[d.]ân was an ancient, pre-Muhammedan custom.[167] On the other hand, its similarity with the Harranian and Manichæan fasts is so striking that we are almost compelled to regard them all as fundamentally the same institution; and if this assumption is correct, Muhammed must have borrowed his fast from the Harranians or Manichæans or both. {315} Indeed, Dr. Jacob has shown that in the year 623, when this fast seems to have been instituted, Rama[d.]ân exactly coincided with the Harranian fast-month.[168] In its Muhammedan form the fast extending over a whole month is looked upon as a means of expiation. It is said that by the observance of it a person will be pardoned all his past venial sins, and that only those who keep it will be allowed to enter through the gate of heaven called Rayyân.[169] But this is only another instance of the common fact that customs often for an incalculable period survive the motives from which they sprang.

[Footnote 162: _Koran_, ii. 180, 181, 183.]

[Footnote 163: _Cf._ Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 106.]

[Footnote 164: von Kremer, _Culturgeschichte des Orients_, i. 460.]

[Footnote 165: Burckhardt, _Bedouins and Wahábys_, p. 57.]

[Footnote 166: Burton, _Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah and Meccah_, i. 74.]

[Footnote 167: We can hardly regard as such the passage in the Koran (ii. 179) where it is said, "O ye who believe! There is prescribed for you the fast as it was prescribed for those before you; haply ye may fear." The traditionists say that Muhammed was in the habit of spending the month of Rama[d.]ân every year in the cave at Hirâ, meditating and feeding all the poor who resorted to him, and that he did so in accordance with a religious practice which the Koreish used to perform in the days of their heathenism. Others add that [(]Abd al-Mu[t.][t.]alib commenced the practice, saying "that it was the worship of God which that patriarch used to begin with the new moon of Rama[d.]ân, and continue during the whole of the month" (Muir, _Life of Mahomet_, ii. 56, n.* Sell, _Faith of Islám_, p. 316). But, as Muir remarks (_op. cit._ ii. 56, n.*), it is the tendency of the traditionists to foreshadow the customs and precepts of Islam as if some of them had existed prior to Muhammed, and constituted part of "the religion of Abraham." See Jacob, 'Der muslimische Fastenmonat Rama[d.]ân,' in _VI. Jahresbericht der Geographischen Gesellsch. zu Greifswald_, pt. i. 1893-96, p. 2, _sqq._]

[Footnote 168: Jacob, _loc. cit._ p. 5.]

[Footnote 169: Sell, _op. cit._ p. 317.]

In various religions we meet with fasting as a form of penance, as a means of appeasing an angry or indignant God, as an expiation for sin.[170] The voluntary suffering involved in it is regarded as an expression of sorrow and repentance pleasing to God, as a substitute for the punishment which He otherwise would inflict upon the sinner; and at the same time it may be thought to excite His compassion, an idea noticeable in many Jewish fasts.[171] Among the Jews individuals fasted in cases of private distress or danger: Ahab, for instance, when Elijah predicted his downfall,[172] Ezra and his companions before their journey to Palestine,[173] the pious Israelite when his friends were sick.[174] Moreover, fasts were instituted for the whole community when it believed itself to be under divine displeasure, when danger threatened, when a great calamity befell the land, when pestilence raged or drought set in, or there was a reverse in war.[175] Four {316} regular fast-days were established in commemoration of various sad events that had befallen Israel during the captivity;[176] and in the course of time many other fasts were added, in memory of certain national troubles, though they were not regarded as obligatory.[177] The law itself enjoined fasting for the great day of atonement only.

[Footnote 170: Wasserschleben, _Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche_, _passim_ (Christianity). _Koran_, ii. 192; iv. 94; v. 91, 96; lviii. 5. Jolly, 'Recht und Sitte,' in Bühler, _Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie_, p. 117; Dubois, _Description of the Character, &c. of the People of India_, p. 160 (Brahmanism). Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 285. On the occasion of any public calamity the Mexican high-priest retired to a wood, where he constructed a hut for himself, and shut up in this hut he passed nine or ten months in constant prayer and frequent effusions of blood, eating only raw maize and water (Torquemada, _Monarchia Indiana_, ix. 25, vol. ii. 212 _sq._).]

[Footnote 171: _Cf._ Benzinger, 'Fasting,' in _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1508; Schwally, _Das Leben nach dem Tode nach den Vorstellungen des alten Israel_, p. 26.]

[Footnote 172: _1 Kings_, xxi. 27.]

[Footnote 173: _Ezra_, viii. 21.]

[Footnote 174: _Psalms_, xxxv. 13.]

[Footnote 175: _Judges_, xx. 26. _1 Samuel_, vii. 6. _2 Chronicles_, xx. 3. _Nehemiah_, ix. 1. _Jeremiah_, xxxvi. 9. _Joel_, i. 14; ii. 12.]

[Footnote 176: _Zechariah_, viii. 19.]

[Footnote 177: Greenstone, in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, v. 347.]

It may be asked why this particular kind of self-mortification became such a frequent and popular form of penance as it did both in Judaism and in several other religions. One reason is, no doubt, that fasting is a natural expression of contrition, owing to the depressing effect which sorrow has upon the appetite. Another reason is that the idea of penitence, as we have just observed, may be a later interpretation put upon a fast which originally sprang from fear of contamination. Nay, even when fasting is resorted to as a cure in the case of distress or danger, as also when it is practised in commemoration of a calamity, there may be a vague belief that the food is polluted and should therefore be avoided. But in several cases fasting is distinctly a survival of an expiatory sacrifice. The sacrifice of food offered to the deity was changed into the "sacrifice" involved in the abstinence from food on the part of the worshipper. We find that among the Jews the decay of sacrifice was accompanied by a greater frequency of fasts. It was only in the period immediately before the exile that fasting began to acquire special importance; and the popular estimation of it went on increasing during and after the exile, partly at least from a feeling of the need of religious exercises to take the place of the suspended temple services.[178] Like sacrifice, fasting was a regular appendage to prayer, as a means of giving special efficacy to the supplication;[179] fasting and praying became in fact a constant combination of words.[180] And equally close is the {317} connection between fasting and almsgiving--a circumstance which deserves special notice where almsgiving is regarded as a form of sacrifice or has taken the place of it.[181] In the penitential regulations of Brahmanism we repeatedly meet with the combination "sacrifice, fasting, giving gifts";[182] or also fasting and giving gifts, without mention being made of sacrifice.[183] Among the Jews each fast-day was virtually an occasion for almsgiving,[184] in accordance with the rabbinic saying that "the reward of the fast-day is in the amount of charity distributed";[185] but fasting was sometimes declared to be even more meritorious than charity, because the former affects the body and the latter the purse only.[186] And from Judaism this combination of fasting and almsgiving passed over into Christianity and Muhammedanism. According to Islam, it is a religious duty to give alms after a fast;[187] if a person through the infirmity of old age is not able to keep the fast, he must feed a poor person;[188] and the violation of an inconsiderate oath may be expiated either by once feeding or clothing ten poor men, or liberating a Muhammedan slave or captive, or fasting three days.[189] In the Christian Church fasting was not only looked upon as a necessary accompaniment of prayer, but whatever a person saved by means of it was to be given to the poor.[190] St. Augustine says that man's righteousness in this life consists in fasting, alms, and prayer, that alms and fasting are the two wings which enable his prayer to fly upward to God.[191] But fasting without almsgiving "is not {318} so much as counted for fasting";[192] that which is gained by the fast at dinner ought not to be turned into a feast at supper, but should be expended on the bellies of the poor.[193] And if a person was too weak to fast without injuring his health he was admonished to give the more plentiful alms.[194] Tertullian expressly calls fastings "sacrifices which are acceptable to God."[195] They assumed the character of reverence offerings, they were said to be works of reverence towards God.[196] But fasting, as well as temperance, has also from early times been advocated by Christian writers on the ground that it is "the beginning of chastity,"[197] whereas "through love of eating love of impurity finds passage."[198]

[Footnote 178: Benzinger, in _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1508. Nowack, _Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie_, ii. 271.]

[Footnote 179: Löw, _Gesammelte Schriften_, i. 108. Nowack, _op. cit._ ii. 271. Benzinger, in _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1507.]

[Footnote 180: _Judith_, iv. 9, 11. _Tobit_, xii. 8. _Ecclesiasticus_, xxxiv. 26. _St. Luke_, ii. 37.]

[Footnote 181: _Supra_, i. 565 _sqq._]

[Footnote 182: _Gautama_, xix. 11. _Vasishtha_, xxii. 8. _Baudhâyana_, iii. 10. 9.]

[Footnote 183: _Vasishtha_, xx. 47.]

[Footnote 184: Kohler, 'Alms,' in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, i. 435. Löw, _op. cit._ i. 108. _Cf._ _Tobit_, xii. 8; Katz, _Der wahre Talmudjude_, p. 43.]

[Footnote 185: _Ibid._ fol. 6 b, quoted by Greenstone, in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, v. 349.]

[Footnote 186: _Berakhoth_, fol. 32 b, quoted by Hershon, _Treasures of the Talmud_, p. 124.]

[Footnote 187: Sell, _op. cit._ p. 251.]

[Footnote 188: _Ibid._ p. 281. This opinion is based on a sentence in the Koran (ii. 180) which has caused a great deal of dispute. It is said there that "those who are fit to fast may redeem it by feeding a poor man." But the expression "those who are fit to fast" has been understood to mean those who can do so only with great difficulty.]

[Footnote 189: _Koran_, v. 91. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 313 _sq._ See also _Koran_, ii. 192; iv. 94; v. 96; lviii. 5.]

[Footnote 190: Harnack, _History of Dogma_, i. 205, n. 5. Löw, _op. cit._ i. 108.]

[Footnote 191: St. Augustine, _Enarratio in Psalmum XLII._ 8 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, xxxvi. 482).]

[Footnote 192: St. Chrysostom, _In Matthæum Homil. LXXVII. (al. LXXVIII.)_ 6 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, lviii. 710). St. Augustine, _Sermones supposititii_, cxlii. 2, 6 (Migne, xxxix. 2023 _sq._).]

[Footnote 193: St. Augustine, _Sermones supposititii_, cxli. 4 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxxix. 2021). See also _Canons enacted under King Edgar_, 'Of Powerful Men,' 3 (_Ancient Laws of England_, p. 415); _Ecclesiastical Institutes_, 38 (_ibid._ p. 486).]

[Footnote 194: St. Chrysostom, _In Cap. I. Genes. Homil. X._ 2 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, liii. 83). St. Augustine, _Sermones supposititii_, cxlii. 1 (Migne, xxxix. 2022 _sq._).]

[Footnote 195: Tertullian, _De resurrectione carnis_, 8 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 806).]

[Footnote 196: Hooker, _Ecclesiastical Polity_, v. 72, vol. ii. 334.]

[Footnote 197: St. Chrysostom, _In Epist. II. ad Thessal. Cap. I. Homil. I._ 2 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Gr. lxii. 470).]

[Footnote 198: Tertullian, _De jejuniis_, 1 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 953). See also Manzoni, _Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica_, p. 175.]

CHAPTER XXXVIII

RESTRICTIONS IN DIET (_concluded_)

BESIDES the occasional abstinence from certain victuals, which was noticed in the last chapter, there are restrictions in diet of a more durable character.

Thus among the Australian aborigines the younger members of a tribe are, as it seems universally, subject to a variety of such restrictions, from which they are only gradually released as they grow older.[1] In the Wotjobaluk tribe in South-Eastern Australia, for instance, boys are forbidden to eat of the kangaroo and the padi-melon, being told that if they transgress these rules they will fall sick, break out all over with eruptions, and perhaps die. If a man under forty eats the tail part of the emu or bustard, he will turn grey, and if he eats the freshwater turtle he will be killed by lightning. If young men or women of the Wakelbura tribe eat emu, black-headed snake, or porcupine, they will become sick and probably die, uttering the sounds peculiar to the creature in question, the spirit of which is believed to have entered into their bodies.[2] In the Warramunga tribe in Central Australia a man is usually well in the middle age before he {320} is allowed to eat wild turkey, rabbit-bandicoot, and emu.[3] According to certain writers, the object of these restrictions is to reserve the best things for the use of the elders, and, more especially, of the older men;[4] but, on the other hand, it has been remarked that, in looking over the list of animals prohibited, one fails to see any good reasons for the selection, unless they may be assumed to have chiefly sprung from superstitious beliefs.[5] Among the Land Dyaks the young men and warriors are debarred from venison for fear it should render them as timid as the hind.[6] The Moors believe that if a young person before the age of puberty eats wolf's flesh he will have troubles afterwards.

[Footnote 1: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 81. Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 53. Howitt, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 769 _sq._ Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. p. xxxv. Taplin, 'Narrinyeri,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 137. Jung, 'Die Mündungsgegend des Murray und ihre Bewohner,' in _Mittheil. d. Vereins f. Erdkunde zu Halle_, 1877, p. 32. Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 470 _sqq._ _Iidem_, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 611 _sq._ Eyre, _Expeditions of Discovery into Central Australia_, ii. 293.]

[Footnote 2: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 769.]

[Footnote 3: Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 612.]

[Footnote 4: _Iidem_, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 470 _sq._ _Iidem_, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 613. Jung, in _Mittheil. d. Vereins f. Erdkunde zu Halle_, 1877, p. 32.]

[Footnote 5: Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ i. 234.]

[Footnote 6: St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 186.]

There are, further, numerous instances of certain kinds of food being permanently forbidden to certain individuals. In Unyamwezi, south of Victoria Nyanza, women are not permitted to eat fowl, a food which is reserved for the men.[7] Among the Mandingoes of Teesee no woman is allowed to eat an egg, and this prohibition is so rigidly adhered to that "nothing will more affront a woman of Teesee than to offer her an egg"; the men, on the other hand, eat eggs without scruple, even in the presence of their wives.[8] Among the Bayaka, a Bantu people in the Congo Free State, both fowls and eggs are forbidden to women; "if a woman eats an egg she is supposed to become mad, tear off her clothes and run away into the bush."[9] The Bahima of Enkole, in the Uganda Protectorate, allow men to eat beef and the meat of certain antelopes and of buffalo, whereas women are generally allowed to eat beef only.[10] The people of Darfur, in Central Africa, prohibit their women from eating an animal's liver, because they think {321} that a person may increase his soul by partaking of it, and women are believed to have no souls.[11] The Miris of Northern India prize tiger's flesh as food for men, but consider it unsuitable for women, as "it would make them too strong-minded."[12] In the Australian tribes some articles of food are entirely interdicted to females.[13] The natives inhabiting the neighbourhood of Cape York forbid women to eat various kinds of fish, including some of the best, "on the pretence of causing disease in women, although not injurious to the men."[14] In the Sandwich Islands, again, women were not allowed to eat hog's flesh, turtle, and certain kinds of fruit, as cocoa and banana.[15] Many of these prohibitions have been represented as signs of the low condition of the female sex; but a more intimate knowledge of the facts connected with them would perhaps show that they have some other foundation than the mere selfishness of the men. For sometimes the latter also are subject to very similar restrictions. Among the Bahuana, in the Congo Free State, "women are forbidden to eat owls or other birds of prey, but are permitted to eat frogs, from which men are obliged to abstain under penalty of becoming ill."[16] With reference to the natives of New Britain, Mr. Powell states that, whilst in one place the women are prohibited from eating pigs or tortoises, the men are, in another place, prohibited from eating anything but human flesh, fowls, or fish.[17] In the Caroline Islands the men are forbidden to eat a common blackbird, _Lamprothornis_--which is a favourite food of the women--because it is believed that anyone who did so, and afterwards climbed a cocoa-tree, would fall down and perish.[18] In some Dyak tribes on the Western branch {322} of the river of Sarawak, goats, fowls, and the fine kind of fern (_paku_), which forms an excellent vegetable, are forbidden food to the men, though the women and boys are allowed to partake of them.[19]

[Footnote 7: Reichard, 'Die Wanjamuesi,' in _Zeitschr. d. Gesellsch. f. Erdkunde zu Berlin_, xxiv. 321.]

[Footnote 8: Park, _Travels in the Interior of Africa_, i. 114.]

[Footnote 9: Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Yaka,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 41, 42, 51.]

[Footnote 10: Roscoe, 'Bahima,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvii. 101.]

[Footnote 11: Felkin, 'Notes on the For Tribe,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 218.]

[Footnote 12: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 33.]

[Footnote 13: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 81. Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ i. xxxv.]

[Footnote 14: Macgillivray, _Voyage of Rattlesnake_, ii. 10.]

[Footnote 15: von Kotzebue, _Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea_, iii. 249, note. Cook, quoted by Buckle, _Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works_, iii. 355.]

[Footnote 16: Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Huana,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 279.]

[Footnote 17: Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 173.]

[Footnote 18: von Kittlitz, _Reise nach dem russischen Amerika, &c._ ii. 103 _sq._]

[Footnote 19: Low, _Sarawak_, p. 266.]

Among various peoples certain foods are forbidden to priests or magicians. The priests of the ancient Egyptians were not allowed to eat fish,[20] nor to meddle with the esculent or potable substances which were produced out of Egypt;[21] and, according to Plutarch, they so greatly disliked the nature of excrementitious things that they not only rejected most kinds of pulse, but also the flesh of sheep and swine, because it produced much superfluity of nutriment.[22] The lamas of Mongolia will touch no meat of goats, horses, or camels.[23] Among the Semang of the Malay Peninsula the medicine-men will not eat goat or buffalo flesh and but rarely that of fowl.[24] The dairymen of the Todas may drink milk from certain buffaloes only, and are altogether forbidden to eat chillies.[25] These and similar restraints laid upon priests or wizards are probably connected with the idea that holiness is a delicate quality which calls for special precautions.[26] Schomburgk states that the conjurers of the British Guiana Indians partake but seldom of the native hog, because they consider the eating of it injurious to the efficacy of their skill.[27] And the Ulád Bu [(]Azîz in Morocco believe that if a scribe or a saint eats wolf's flesh the charms he writes will have no effect, and the saliva of the saint will lose its curative power.

[Footnote 20: Herodotus, ii. 37. Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 7. Porphyry, _De abstinentia ab esu animalium_, iv. 7.]

[Footnote 21: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 7.]

[Footnote 22: Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 5.]

[Footnote 23: Prejevalsky, _Mongolia_, i. 56.]

[Footnote 24: Skeat and Blagden, _Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula_, ii. 226.]

[Footnote 25: Rivers, _Todas_, p. 102 _sq._ For some other instances see Landtman, _Origin of Priesthood_, p. 161 _sq._]

[Footnote 26: _Cf._ Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 391.]

[Footnote 27: Schomburgk, 'Expedition to the Upper Corentyne,' in _Jour. Roy. Geograph. Soc. London_, xv. 30.]

There are still other cases in which certain persons are permanently required to abstain from certain kinds of food. Thus in the Andaman Islands every man and woman "is prohibited all through life from eating some {323} one (or more) fish or animal: in most cases the forbidden dainty is one which in childhood was observed (or imagined) by the mother to occasion some functional derangement; when of an age to understand it the circumstance is explained, and cause and effect being clearly demonstrated, the individual, in question thence forth considers that particular meat his _yât-t[=u]b_, and avoids it carefully. In cases where no evil consequences have resulted from partaking of any kind of food, the fortunate person is privileged to select his own _yât-t[=u]b_, and is, of course, shrewd enough to decide upon some fish, such as shark or skate, which is little relished, and to abstain from which consequently entails no exercise of self-denial." It is believed that the god P[=u]luga would punish severely any person who might be guilty of eating his _yât-t[=u]b_, either by causing his skin to peel off, or by turning his hair white, and flaying him alive.[28] In Samoa each man had generally his god in the shape of some species of animal; and if he ate one of these divine animals it was supposed that the god avenged the insult by taking up his abode in the eater's body and there generating an animal of the same kind until it caused his death.[29] The members of a totem clan are usually forbidden to eat the particular animal or plant whose name they bear.[30] Thus among the Omaha Indians men whose totem is the elk believe that if they ate the flesh of the male elk they would break out in boils and white spots in different parts of their bodies; and men whose totem is the red corn think that if they ate red corn they would have running sores all round their mouths.[31] Yet, however general, prohibitions of this kind cannot be said to be a universal characteristic of totemism.[32] Sir J. G. Frazer even suggests that the original custom was perhaps to eat the totem and the {324} latter custom to abstain from it.[33] But this is hardly more than a guess.

[Footnote 28: Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands.' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 354.]

[Footnote 29: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 17 _sq._]

[Footnote 30: Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 7 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Totemism and Exogamy_, iv. 6.]

[Footnote 31: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 225, 231. _Idem_, 'Siouan Folk-Lore,' in _American Antiquarian_, vii. 107.]

[Footnote 32: Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 19. _Idem_, _Totemism and Exogamy_, iv. 6. _sq._]

[Footnote 33: Frazer, _Totemism and Exogamy_, iv. 6 _sq._]

There are, finally, restrictions in eating which refer to the whole people or tribe. In early society certain things which might serve as food are often not only universally abstained from, but actually prohibited by custom or law. The majority of these prohibitions have reference to animals or animal products, which are naturally more apt to cause disgust than is vegetable food--probably because our ancestors in early days, by instinct, subsisted chiefly on a vegetable diet, and only subsequently acquired a more general taste for animal nourishment.[34] Certain animals excite a feeling of disgust by their very appearance, and are therefore abstained from. This I take to be a reason for the aversion to eating reptiles. It is said that snakes are avoided as food because their flesh is supposed to be as poisonous as their bite;[35] but this explanation is hardly relevant to harmless reptiles, which are likewise in some cases forbidden food.[36] The abstinence from fish seems generally to have a similar origin, though some peoples say that they refuse to eat certain species because the soul of a relative might be in the fish.[37] The Navahoes of New Mexico "must never touch fish, and nothing will induce them to taste one."[38] The Mongols consider them unclean animals.[39] The South Siberian Kachinzes are said to refrain from them because they believe that "the evil principle lives in the water and eats fish."[40] The Káfirs on the North-Western frontier of India "detest fish, though their rivers abound in them."[41] The same aversion is common in the South {325} African tribes[42] and among most Hamitic peoples of East Africa;[43] when asked for an explanation of it, they say that fish are akin to snakes. Fish, or at least certain species of fish, were forbidden to the ancient Syrians;[44] and the Hebrews were prohibited from eating all fish that have not fins and scales.[45] It is curious to note that various peoples who detest fish also abstain from fowl.[46] The Navahoes are strictly forbidden to eat the wild turkey with which their forests abound;[47] and the Mongols dislike of fowl is so great that one of Prejevalsky's guides nearly turned sick on seeing him eat boiled duck.[48] Some peoples have a great aversion to eggs,[49] which are said to be excrements, and therefore unfit for food.[50] There may be a similar reason for the abstinence from milk among peoples who have domesticated animals able to supply them with it.[51] The Dravidian aborigines of the hills of {326} Central India, who never use milk, are expressly said to regard it as an excrement.[52] The ancient Caribs had a horror of eggs and never drank milk.[53] The Ashantees are "forbidden eggs by the fetish, and cannot be persuaded to taste milk."[54] The Kimbunda in South-Western Africa detest milk, and consider it inconceivable how a grown-up person can enjoy it; they believe that the Kilulu, or spirit, would punish him who partook of it.[55] The Dyaks of Borneo, the Javanese, and the Malays abstain from milk.[56] To the Chinese milk and butter are insupportably odious.[57]

[Footnote 34: _Cf._ Schurtz, _Die Speiseverbote_, p. 17.]

[Footnote 35: Skeat and Blagden, _Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula_, i. 130 (Berembun). Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 22.]

[Footnote 36: _Leviticus_, xi. 29 _sq._ Sayce, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Babylonians_, p. 83.]

[Footnote 37: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 430, 432.]

[Footnote 38: Stephen, 'Navajo,' in _American Anthropologist_, vi. 357.]

[Footnote 39: Prejevalsky, _op. cit._ i. 56.]

[Footnote 40: von Strümpell, 'Der Volksstamm der Katschinzen,' in _Mittheil. d. Vereins f. Erdkunde zu Leipzig_, 1875, p. 23.]

[Footnote 41: Fosberry, 'Some of the Mountain Tribes of the N.W. Frontier of India,' in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, N.S. i. 192.]

[Footnote 42: Fritsch, _Drei Jahre in Süd-Afrika_, p. 338. Shooter, _Kafirs of Natal and the Zulu Country_, p. 215 (Zulus). Kropf, _Das Volk der Xosa-Kaffern_, p. 102. Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, ii. 203 (Bechuanas). The Hottentots, however, eat fish (Fritsch, p. 339).]

[Footnote 43: Hildebrandt, 'Wakamba und ihre Nachbarn,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ x. 378. Paulitschke, _Ethnographie Nordost-Afrikas_, i. 155 (Somals, Gallas). Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 23.]

[Footnote 44: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 15. Plutarch, _De superstitione_, 10.]

[Footnote 45: _Leviticus_, xi. 10 _sqq._]

[Footnote 46: Hildebrandt, in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ x. 378 (Gallas, Wadshagga, Waikuyu, &c.). Paulitschke, _op. cit._ i. 153 _sqq._ (Gallas, Somals). Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 95 (Somals). Meldon, 'Bahima of Ankole,' in _Jour. African Soc._ vi. 146; Ashe, _Two Kings of Uganda_, p. 303 (Bahima). Kropf, _Das Volk der Xosa-Kaffern_, p. 102. Among the Zulus domestic fowls are eaten by none except young persons and old (Shooter, _op. cit._ p. 215). For other peoples who abstain from fowl, see Bastian, _Die deutsche Expedition an der Loango-Küste_, i. 185; Casati, _Ten Years in Equatoria_, i. 165 (Monbuttu); Salt, _Voyage to Abyssinia_, p. 179 (Danakil); Skeat and Blagden, _Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula_, i. 135 (Sabimba), 136 (Orang Muka Kuning); _Globus_, l. 330 (inhabitants of Hainan); Ehrenreich, quoted by Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 20 (Karaya of Goyaz); von den Steinen, _Durch Central-Brasilien_, p. 262 (Yuruna); Cæsar, _De bello Gallico_, v. 12 (ancient Britons).]

[Footnote 47: Stephen, in _American Anthropologist_, vi. 357.]

[Footnote 48: Prejevalsky, _op. cit._ i. 56.]

[Footnote 49: The Kafirs formerly abstained from eggs (Kropf, _op. cit._ p. 102). Among the Zulus eggs are eaten by young and old persons only (Shooter, _op. cit._ p. 215). The Bahima refuse this kind of food (Ashe, _op. cit._ p. 303), and so do generally the Waganda, especially the women (Felkin, 'Notes on the Waganda Tribe,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 716; Ashe, p. 303). See also Andree, _Ethnographische Parallelen_, p. 126 _sq._; Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 23 _sq._]

[Footnote 50: Reichard, 'Die Wanjamuesi,' in _Zeitschr. d. Gesellsch. f. Erdkunde zu Berlin_, xxiv. 321. Hildebrandt, 'Wakamba und ihre Nachbarn,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ x. 378.]

[Footnote 51: See Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 484.]

[Footnote 52: Crooke, _Things Indian_, p. 92.]

[Footnote 53: Du Tertre, _Histoire générale des Antilles_, ii. 389.]

[Footnote 54: Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 319.]

[Footnote 55: Magyar, _Reisen in Süd-Afrika_, i. 303, 321.]

[Footnote 56: Low, _op. cit._ p. 267.]

[Footnote 57: Huc, _Travels in Tartary_, i. 281. Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 484.]

The meat of certain animals may also be regarded with disgust on account of their filthy habits or the nasty food on which they live. In the Warramunga tribe, in Central Australia, there is a general restriction applying to eagle-hawks, and the reason assigned for it is that this bird feeds on the bodies of dead natives.[58] It seems that the abstinence from swine's flesh, at least in part, belongs to the same group of facts. Various tribes in South Africa hold it in abomination.[59] In some districts of Madagascar, according to Drury, the eating of pork was accounted a very contemptible thing.[60] It is, or was, abstained from by the Jakuts of Siberia, the Votyaks of the Government of Vologda,[61] and the Lapps.[62] The disgust for pork has likewise been met with in many American tribes. The Koniagas will eat almost any digestible substance except pork.[63] The Navahoes of New Mexico abominate it "as if they were the devoutest of Hebrews";[64] it is not forbidden by their religion, but "they say they will not eat the flesh of the hog simply because the animal is filthy in {327} its habits, because it is the scavenger of the town."[65] In his description of the Indians of the South-Eastern States Adair writes:--"They reckon all those animals to be unclean that are either carnivorous, or live on nasty food, as hogs, wolves, panthers, foxes, cats, mice, rats. . . . When swine were first brought among them, they deemed it such a horrid abomination in any of their people to eat that filthy and impure food, that they excluded the criminal from all religious communion in their circular town-house. . . . They still affix vicious and contemptible ideas to the eating of swine's flesh; insomuch that _Shúkàpa_, 'swine eater,' is the most opprobrious epithet that they can use to brand us with; they commonly subjoin _Akang-gàpa_, 'eater of dunghill fowls.' Both together signify 'filthy, helpless animals.'"[66] So also those Indians in British Guiana who have kept aloof from intercourse with the colonists reject pork with the greatest loathing. Schomburgk tells us that an old Indian permitted his children to accompany him on a journey only on the condition that they were never to eat any viands prepared by his cook, for fear lest pork should have been used in their preparation. But this objection does not extend to the native hog, which, though generally abstained from by wizards, is eaten by the laity indiscriminately, with the exception of women who are pregnant or who have just given birth to a child.[67] This suggests that the aversion to the domestic pig partly springs from the fact that it is a foreign animal. Indeed, the Guiana Indians refuse to eat the flesh of all animals that are not indigenous to their country, but were introduced from abroad, such as oxen, sheep, and fowls, apparently on the principle "that any strange and abnormal object is especially likely to be possessed of a harmful spirit."[68] The Kafirs, also, abstain {328} from the domestic swine, though they eat the wild hog.[69] Some writers maintain that pork has been prohibited on the ground that it is prejudicial to health in hot countries;[70] but, as we have seen, this prohibition is found among various northern peoples as well, and it seems besides that the unwholesomeness of pork in good condition has been rather assumed than proved. Sir J. G. Frazer, again, believes that the ancient Egyptians, Semites, and some of the Greeks abstained from this food not because the pig was looked upon simply as a filthy and disgusting creature, but because it was considered to be endowed with high supernatural powers.[71] In Greece the pig was used in purificatory ceremonies.[72] Lucian says that the worshippers of the Syrian goddess abstained from eating pigs, some because they held them in abomination, others because they thought them holy.[73] The heathen Harranians sacrificed the swine and ate swine's flesh once a year.[74] According to Greek writers, the Egyptians abhorred the pig as a foul and loathsome animal, and to drink its milk was believed to cause leprosy and itchy eruptions;[75] but once a year they sacrificed pigs to the moon and to Osiris and ate of the flesh of the victims, though at any other time they would not so much as taste pork.[76]

[Footnote 58: Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 612.]

[Footnote 59: Fritsch, _Drei Jahre in Süd-Afrika_, p. 339. Kropf, _op. cit._ p. 102 (Kafirs).]

[Footnote 60: Drury, _Madagascar_, p. 143.]

[Footnote 61: Latham, _Descriptive Ethnology_, i. 363.]

[Footnote 62: Leem, _Beskrivelse over Finmarkens Lapper_, p. 501.]

[Footnote 63: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, i. 75.]

[Footnote 64: Stephen, in _American Anthropologist_, vi. 357.]

[Footnote 65: Matthews, 'Study of Ethics among the Lower Races,' in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, xii. 5.]

[Footnote 66: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 132 _sqq._]

[Footnote 67: Schomburgk, in _Jour. Roy. Geograph. Soc. London_, xv. 29 _sq._]

[Footnote 68: Im Thurn, _Indians of Guiana_, p. 368. Dr. Schurtz suggests (_op. cit._ p. 19 _sqq._) that some other peoples, as the Indians of Brazil, abstain from fowls because they are not indigenous to their country.]

[Footnote 69: Müller, _Allgemeine Ethnographie_, p. 189.]

[Footnote 70: Ramsay, _Historical Geography of Asia Minor_, p. 32. Wiener, 'Die alttestamentarischen Speiseverbote,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ viii. 103. See also Buckle, _Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works_, iii. 354 _sq._]

[Footnote 71: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 304 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Pausanias's Description of Greece_, iv. 137 _sq._]

[Footnote 72: Ramsay, _op. cit._ p. 31 _sq._ Frazer, _Pausanias's Description of Greece_, iii. 277, 593.]

[Footnote 73: Lucian, _De dea Syria_, 54.]

[Footnote 74: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 290. _Cf._ _Isaiah_, lxv. 4, and lxvi. 3, 17, where this sacrifice is alluded to as a heathen abomination.]

[Footnote 75: Herodotus, ii. 47. Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 8. Aelian, _De natura animalium_, x. 16.]

[Footnote 76: Herodotus, ii. 47. Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 8.]

Of the abhorrence of cannibalism I shall speak in a separate chapter, but in this connection it is worth noticing that the eating of certain animals is regarded with horror or disgust either because they are supposed to be metamorphosed ancestors[77] or on account of their resemblance to men. Various peoples refrain from {329} monkey's flesh;[78] and European travellers mention their own instinctive repugnance to it and their aversion to shooting monkeys.[79] The Indians of Lower California will eat any animal, except men and monkeys, "the latter because they so much resemble the former."[80] According to an ancient writer quoted by Porphyry, the Egyptian priests rejected those animals which "verged to a similitude to the human form."[81] The Kafirs say that elephants are forbidden food because their intelligence resembles that of men.[82]

[Footnote 77: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 430 _sqq._ St. John, _op. cit._ i. 186 (Land Dyaks).]

[Footnote 78: Shooter, _op. cit._ p. 215 (Zulus). Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 28 (Abyssinians). Skeat and Blagden, _op. cit._ i. 134 (Orang Sletar). In the _Institutes of Vishnu_ (li. 3) the eating of apes is particularly stigmatised.]

[Footnote 79: Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 28. _Infra_, on Regard for the Lower Animals.]

[Footnote 80: Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 560.]

[Footnote 81: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 7.]

[Footnote 82: Müller, _Ethnographie_, p. 189.]

Moreover, intimacy with an animal easily takes away the appetite for its flesh. Among ourselves, as Mandeville observes, "some people are not to be persuaded to taste of any creatures they have daily seen and been acquainted with, whilst they were alive; others extend their scruple no further than to their own poultry, and refuse to eat what they fed and took care of themselves; yet all of them will feed heartily and without remorse on beef, mutton, and fowls, when they are bought in the market."[83] Among other races we meet with feelings no less refined. Mencius, the Chinese moralist, said:--"So is the superior man affected towards animals, that, having seen them alive, he cannot bear to see them die; having heard their dying cries, he cannot bear to eat their flesh. Therefore he keeps away from his slaughter house and cook-room."[84] The abstinence from domestic fowls and their eggs, as also from the tame pig, may occasionally have sprung from sympathy. Dr. von den Steinen states that the Brazilian Yuruna cannot be induced to eat any animal which they have bred themselves, and that they apparently considered it very immoral when he and his party ate hen-eggs.[85] In the {330} sacred books of India it is represented as a particularly bad action to eat certain domestic animals, including village pigs and tame cocks; a twice-born man who does so knowingly will become an outcast.[86] Among the Bechuanas in South Africa dogs and tame cats are not eaten, though wild cats are.[87] The Arabs of Dukkâla in Morocco eat their neighbours' cats but not their own. Among the Dinka only such cows as die naturally or by an accident are used for food; but a dead cow is never eaten by the bereaved owner himself, who is too much afflicted at the loss to be able to touch a morsel of the carcase of his departed beast.[88] Herodotus says that the Libyans would not taste the flesh of the cow, though they ate oxen;[89] and the same rule prevailed among the Egyptians and Ph[oe]nicians, who would sooner have partaken of human flesh than of the meat of a cow.[90] The eating of cow's flesh is prohibited by the law of Brahmanism.[91] According to Dr. Rájendralála Mitra, the idea of beef as an article of food "is so shocking to the Hindus, that thousands over thousands of the more orthodox among them never repeat the counterpart of the word in their vernaculars, and many and dire have been the sanguinary conflicts which the shedding of the blood of cows has caused."[92] In China "the slaughter of buffaloes for food is unlawful, according to the assertions of the people, and the abstaining from the eating of beef is regarded as very meritorious."[93] It is said in the 'Divine Panorama' that he who partakes of beef or dog's flesh will be punished by the deity.[94] In Japan neither cattle nor sheep were in former days killed for food;[95] and in the rural districts many people still think it wrong to eat beef.[96] In Rome the slaughter of {331} a labouring ox was in olden days punished with excommunication;[97] and at Athens and in Peloponnesus it was prohibited even on penalty of death.[98] Indeed, the ancient idea has survived up to modern times in Greece, where it has been held as a maxim that the animal which tills the ground ought not to be used for food.[99] These prohibitions are no doubt to some extent expressions of kindly feelings towards the animals to which they refer.[100] A Dinka is said to be fonder of his cattle than of his wife and children;[101] and according to classical writers, the ploughing ox is not allowed to be slaughtered because he is himself an agriculturist, the servant of Ceres, and a companion to the labourer in his work.[102] But at the same time the restrictions in question are very largely due to prudential motives. Peoples who live chiefly on the products of their cattle show a strong disinclination to reduce their herds, especially by killing cows or calves;[103] and agricultural races are naturally anxious to preserve the animal which is used for work on the field. With reference to the Egyptian and Ph[oe]nician custom of eating bulls but abstaining from cows, Porphyry observes that "for the sake of utility in one and the same species of animals distinction is made between that which is pious and that which is impious," cows being spared on account of their progeny.[104] Until quite recently in Egypt no one was allowed to kill a calf, and permission from the government was required for the slaughter of a bull.[105] Moreover, domestic animals are frequently regarded as sacred in consequence of their utility, and for that reason also abstained from. The Dinka pay a {332} kind of reverence to their cattle.[106] In Egypt, according to Herodotus, the cow was sacred to Isis.[107] In India she has been the object of a special worship.[108]

[Footnote 83: Mandeville, _Fable of the Bees_, p. 188.]

[Footnote 84: Mencius, i. 1. 7. 8.]

[Footnote 85: von den Steinen, _Durch Central-Brasilien_, p. 262. See also Juan and Ulloa, _Voyage to South America_, i. 426 (Indians of Quito).]

[Footnote 86: _Institutes of Vishnu_, li. 3. _Laws of Manu_, v. 19.]

[Footnote 87: Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, ii. 203.]

[Footnote 88: Schweinfurth, _Heart of Africa_, i. 163 _sq._]

[Footnote 89: Herodotus, iv. 186.]

[Footnote 90: _Ibid._ ii. 41. Porphyry, _op. cit._ ii. 11.]

[Footnote 91: _Institutes of Vishnu_, li. 3.]

[Footnote 92: Rájendralála Mitra, _Indo-Aryans_, i. 354.]

[Footnote 93: Doolittle, _Social Life of the Chinese_, ii. 187.]

[Footnote 94: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, ii. 376.]

[Footnote 95: Reed, _Japan_, i. 61.]

[Footnote 96: Griffis, _Mikado's Empire_, p. 472.]

[Footnote 97: Pliny, _Historia naturalis_, viii. 70.]

[Footnote 98: Varro, _De re rustica_, ii. 5. 3. _sq._ Aelian, _Varia historia_, v. 14.]

[Footnote 99: Mariti, _Travels through Cyprus_, i. 35.]

[Footnote 100: See _infra_, on Regard for the Lower Animals.]

[Footnote 101: Schweinfurth, _op. cit._ i. 164.]

[Footnote 102: Aelian, _Varia historia_, v. 14. Varro, _De re rustica_, ii. 5. 3.]

[Footnote 103: Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 86; Kropf, _op. cit._ p. 102 (Kafirs). Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 169. Paulitschke, _Ethnographie Nordost-Afrikas_, i. 153. Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, ii. 411 (pastoral races of Africa). Erman, _Reise um die Erde_, i. 515 (Kirghiz). Andree, _Ethnographische Parallelen_, p. 122 _sq._ Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 297. Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 30 _sq._]

[Footnote 104: Porphyry, _op. cit._ ii. 11.]

[Footnote 105: Wilkinson, in Rawlinson's translation of Herodotus, ii. 72 _sq._ n. 7.]

[Footnote 106: Schweinfurth, _op. cit._ i. 163.]

[Footnote 107: Herodotus, ii. 41.]

[Footnote 108: Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 264.]

Certain foods, then, are generally abjured, not merely because they excite disgust, or as the case may be, because they have a disagreeable taste, but also from utilitarian considerations. To the instances just mentioned may be added the custom prevalent among the Tonga Islanders of setting a temporary prohibition or taboo on certain eatables in order to prevent them from growing scarce.[109] But the most important prudential motive underlying the general restrictions in diet is no doubt fear lest the food should have an injurious effect upon him who partakes of it. The harm caused by it may only be imaginary; indeed, forbidden food is commonly regarded as unwholesome, whatever be the original ground on which it was prohibited.[110] The Negroes of the Loango Coast say that they abstain from goat-flesh because otherwise their skin would scale off, and from fowl so as not to lose their hair.[111] Some tribes of the Malay Peninsula refuse to eat the flesh of elephants under the pretext that it would occasion sickness.[112] The tribes inhabiting the hills of Assam think that "the penalty for eating the flesh of a cat is loss of speech, while those who infringe a special rule forbidding the flesh of a dog are believed to die of boils."[113] The worshippers of the Syrian goddess maintained that the eating of sprats or anchovies would fill the body with ulcers and wither up the liver.[114] In Russia veal is considered by many to be very unwholesome food, and is entirely rejected by pious people.[115] It is not probable that these ideas are in the first instance derived from experience; but there can be no doubt that fear of evil consequences is in many cases a {333} primary motive for the abstinence from a certain kind of food. Mr. Im Thurn supposes that the Guiana Indian avoids eating the flesh of various animals because he thinks they are particularly malignant.[116] Animals that present some unusual or uncanny peculiarity are rejected because they are objects of superstitious fear. The Egyptian priests, we are told, did not eat oxen which were twins or which were speckled, nor animals that had only one eye.[117] The North American Indians of the South-Eastern States abstained from all birds of night, believing that if they ate them they would fall ill.[118] Another cause of rejecting the flesh of certain animals is the idea that anybody who partook of it would at the same time acquire some undesirable quality inherent in the animal.[119] The Záparo Indians of Ecuador "will, unless from necessity, in most cases not eat any heavy meats such as tapir and peccary, but confine themselves to birds, monkeys, deer, fish, &c., principally because they argue that the heavier meats make them also unwieldy, like the animals who supply the flesh, impeding their agility and unfitting them for the chase."[120] For a similar reason the ancient Caribs are said to have refrained from turtles;[121] and some North American Indians state that in former days their greatest chieftains "seldom ate of any animal of gross quality, or heavy motion of body, fancying it conveyed a dullness through the whole system, and disabled them from exerting themselves with proper vigour in their martial, civil, and religious duties."[122] The Namaquas of South Africa, again, pretend not to eat the flesh of the hare, because they think it would make them as faint-hearted as that animal.[123] Among the Kafirs only children may eat hares, whereas the men partake of the flesh of the {334} leopard in order to get its strength.[124] Among some other peoples the hare is forbidden food,[125] possibly owing to a similar superstition. The blood of an animal is avoided because it is believed to contain its life or soul. We meet with this custom in several North American tribes,[126] as well as in the Old Testament;[127] and from the Jews it passed into early Christianity.[128]

[Footnote 109: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 233.]

[Footnote 110: _Cf._ Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 23.]

[Footnote 111: Bastian, _Die deutsche Expedition an der Loango-Küste_, i. 185.]

[Footnote 112: Skeat and Blagden, _op. cit._ i. 132.]

[Footnote 113: Hodson, 'The "Genna" amongst the Tribes of Assam,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 98.]

[Footnote 114: Plutarch, _De superstitione_, 10.]

[Footnote 115: Erman, _Reise um die Erde_, i. 515.]

[Footnote 116: Im Thurn, _op. cit._ p. 368.]

[Footnote 117: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 7.]

[Footnote 118: Adair, _op. cit._ p. 130 _sq._]

[Footnote 119: See Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 353 _sqq._]

[Footnote 120: Simson, _Travels in the Wilds of Ecuador_, p. 168.]

[Footnote 121: Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iii. 384.]

[Footnote 122: Adair, _op. cit._ p. 133.]

[Footnote 123: Hahn, _Supreme Being of the Khoi-Khoi_, p. 106.]

[Footnote 124: Kropf, _op. cit._ p. 102.]

[Footnote 125: _Leviticus_, xi. 6, 8. Cæsar, _De bello Gallico_, v. 12 (ancient Britons). The Chinese have a deep-rooted prejudice against eating the flesh of the hare, which they have always regarded as an animal endowed with mysterious properties (Dennis, _Folk-Lore of China_, p. 64). With reference to the Biblical prohibition of eating camel's flesh, old exegetes observed that the camel is a very revengeful animal, and that its vindictiveness would be transferred to him who partook of its meat (Wiener, in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ viii. 104); but whether the prohibition in question originated in such a belief is open to doubt.]

[Footnote 126: Adair, _op. cit._ p. 134. Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 353.]

[Footnote 127: _Leviticus_, iii. 17; vii. 25 _sqq._; xvii. 10 _sqq._; xix. 26. _Deuteronomy_, xii. 16, 23 _sqq._; xv. 23.]

[Footnote 128: Haberland, 'Gebräuche und Aberglauben beim Essen,' in _Zeitschr. f. Völkerpsychologie_, xvii. 363 _sq._]

The general abstinence from certain kinds of food has thus sprung from a great variety of causes. Of these I have been able to point out only some of the more general and obvious. As Sir J. G. Frazer justly remarks, to explain the ultimate reason why any particular food is prohibited to a whole tribe or to certain of its members would commonly require a far more intimate knowledge of the history and beliefs of the tribe than we possess.[129] Even explanations given by the natives themselves may be misleading, since the original motive for a custom may have been forgotten, while the custom itself is still preserved. But I think that, broadly speaking, the general avoidance of a certain food may be traced to one or several of the following sources: its disagreeable taste; disgust caused, in the case of animal food, either by the external appearance of the animal, or by its unclean habits, or by sympathy, or by associations of some kind or other, or even by the mere fact that it is commonly abstained from; the disinclination to kill an animal for food, or, generally, to reduce the supply of a certain kind of victuals; the idea, whether correct or false, that the food would injure {335} him who partook of it. From what has been said in previous chapters it is obvious that any of these factors, if influencing the manners of a whole community and especially when supported by the force of habit, may lead not only to actual abstinence but to prohibitory rules the transgression of which is apt to call forth moral disapproval. This is particularly the case at the earlier stages of culture, where a people's tastes and habits are most uniform, where the sway of custom is most powerful, where instinctive aversion most readily develops into moral indignation, and where man in almost every branch of action thinks he has to be on his guard against supernatural dangers. And in this, as in other cases of moral concern, the prohibition may easily be sanctioned by religion, especially when the abstinence is due to fear of some mysterious force or quality in the thing avoided. The religious aspect assumed particular prominence in Hebrewism and Brahmanism. It is said in the 'Institutes of Vishnu' that the eating of pure food is more essential than all external means of purification; "he who eats pure food only is truly pure, not he who is only purified with earth and water."[130] The Koran forbids the eating of "what is dead, and blood, and flesh of swine, and whatsoever has been consecrated to other than God."[131] Mediæval Christianity prohibited the eating of various animals, especially horses, which were not used as food in the South of Europe, but which the pagan Teutons sacrificed and ate at their religious feasts.[132] The idea that it is "unchristian" to eat horseflesh has survived even to the present day, and has, together with the aversion to feeding on a pet animal, been responsible for the loss of enormous quantities of nourishing food. Among ourselves the only eatable thing the partaking of which is generally condemned as immoral is human flesh. But there are a considerable number of people who think {336} that we ought to abstain from all animal meat, not only for sanitary reasons, but because man is held to have no right to subject any living being to suffering and death for the purpose of gratifying his appetite.

[Footnote 129: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 391 _sq._]

[Footnote 130: _Institutes of Vishnu_, xxii. 89.]

[Footnote 131: _Koran_, ii. 168.]

[Footnote 132: Langkavel, 'Pferde und Naturvölker,' in _Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie_, i. 53. Schurtz, _op. cit._ p. 32 _sq._ Maurer, _Die Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes zum Christenthume_, ii. 198.]

On similar grounds vegetarianism has been advocated as a moral duty among Eastern races, as also in classical antiquity. The regard for life in general, which is characteristic of Taouism, Buddhism, Jainism, and Brahmanism,[133] led to the condemnation of the use of animals as food. It is a very common feeling among the Chinese of all classes that the eating of flesh is sensual and sinful, or at least quite incompatible with the highest degree of sincerity and purity.[134] In Japan many persons abstain from meat, owing to Buddhistic influence.[135] In India animal food was not avoided in early times; the epic characters shoot deer and eat cows.[136] Even in the sacred law-books the eating of meat is permitted in certain circumstances:--"On offering the honey-mixture to a guest, at a sacrifice and at the rites in honour of the manes, but on these occasions only, may an animal be slain."[137] Nay, some particular animals are expressly declared eatable.[138] The total abstinence from meat is in fact represented as something meritorious rather than as a strict duty;[139] it is said that "by avoiding the use of flesh one gains a greater reward than by subsisting on pure fruit and roots, and by eating food fit for ascetics in the forest."[140] But on the other hand we also read that "there is no greater sinner than that man who, though not worshipping the gods or the manes, seeks to increase the bulk of his own flesh by the flesh of other beings."[141] As a matter of fact, meat is nowadays commonly, though by no means universally, abstained from by high caste Hindus, whereas {337} most low caste natives are only vegetarian when flesh food is not within their reach;[142] and we are told that the views which many Hindus entertain of people who indulge in such food are not very unlike the opinions which Europeans have about cannibals.[143] The immediate origin of these restrictions seems obvious enough. They were not introduced--as has been supposed--either as mere sumptuary measures,[144] or because meat was found to be an aliment too rich and heavy in a warm climate,[145] but they were the natural outcome of a system which enjoins regard for life in general and kindness towards all living beings. In the 'Laws of Manu' it is expressly said that the use of meat should be shunned for the reason that "meat can never be obtained without injury to living creatures, and injury to sentient beings is detrimental to the attainment of heavenly bliss."[146] That the prohibition of eating animals resulted from the prohibition of killing them is also suggested by other facts. If Hindu Pariahs eat the flesh of animals which have died naturally, it "is not visited upon them as a crime, but they are considered to be wretches as filthy and disgusting as their food is revolting."[147] Buddhism allows the eating of fish and meat if it is pure in three respects, to wit--if one has not seen, nor heard, nor suspected that it has been procured for the purpose;[148] and among the Buddhists of Burma even the most strictly religious have no scruples in eating the flesh of an animal killed by another person, "as then, they consider, the sin of its destruction does not rest upon them, but on the person who actually caused it."[149]

[Footnote 133: See _infra_, on Regard for the Lower Animals.]

[Footnote 134: Doolittle, _op. cit._ ii. 183.]

[Footnote 135: Chamberlain, _Things Japanese_, p. 175 _sq._]

[Footnote 136: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 200.]

[Footnote 137: _Laws of Manu_, v. 41. See also _Vasishtha_, iv. 5.]

[Footnote 138: _Institutes of Vishnu_, li. 6. _Laws of Manu_, v. 18.]

[Footnote 139: See Jolly, 'Recht und Sitte,' in Bühler, _Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie_, ii. 157.]

[Footnote 140: _Laws of Manu_, v. 54. See also _ibid._ v. 53, 56.]

[Footnote 141: _Ibid._ v. 52.]

[Footnote 142: Kipling, _Beast and Man in India_, p. 6. Crooke, _Things Indian_, p. 228.]

[Footnote 143: Percival, _Land of the Veda_, p. 272.]

[Footnote 144: Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 200.]

[Footnote 145: Dubois, _Description of the Character, &c. of the People of India_, p. 120.]

[Footnote 146: _Laws of Manu_, v. 48. See also _ibid._ v. 45, 49.]

[Footnote 147: Dubois, _op. cit._ p. 121.]

[Footnote 148: Kern, _Manual of Indian Buddhism_, p. 71, n. 5.]

[Footnote 149: Fytche, _Burma Past and Present_, ii. 78.]

Vegetarianism is, further, said to have been practised by the first and most learned class of the Persian Magi, who, according to Eubulus, neither slew nor ate anything {338} animated;[150] and many of the Egyptian priests are reported to have abstained entirely from animal food.[151] In ancient legends we are told that the earliest men, who were pure and free from sin, killed no animal but lived exclusively on the fruits of the earth.[152] In Greece the Pythagoreans opposed the killing and eating of animals, "as having a right to live in common with mankind,"[153] or in consequence of their theory that the souls of men after death transmigrate into animals.[154] According to Porphyry, a fleshless diet not only contributes to the health of the body and to the preservation of the power and purity of the mind, but is required by justice. Animals, he said, are allied to men, and he must be considered an impious person who does not abstain from acting unjustly towards his kindred.[155]

[Footnote 150: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 16.]

[Footnote 151: _Ibid._ iv. 7.]

[Footnote 152: _Genesis_, i. 29. _Bundahis_, xv. 6 _sqq._; _cf._ Windischmann, _Zoroastrische Studien_, p. 212. Hesiod, _Opera et dies_, 109 _sqq._ Plato, _Politicus_, p. 272. Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 2.]

[Footnote 153: Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, viii. 1. 12 (13). Plutarch, _De carnium esu oratio I._ 1.]

[Footnote 154: Seneca, _Epistulæ_, cviii. 19.]

[Footnote 155: Porphyry, _op. cit._ i. 2; iii. 26 _sq._]

* * * * *

There still remains a group of restrictions in diet which call for our consideration, namely, such as refer to the use of intoxicating drinks, either only prohibiting immoderation or also demanding total abstinence.

Among a large number of peoples drunkenness is so common that it can hardly be looked upon as a vice by the community; on the contrary, it is sometimes an object of pride, or is regarded almost as a religious duty. An old traveller on the West African Gold Coast says that the natives teach their children drunkenness at the age of three or four years, "as if it were a virtue."[156] The Negroes of Accra, according to Monrad, take a pride in getting drunk, and praise the happiness of a person who is so intoxicated that he can hardly walk.[157] In ancient Yucatan he who dropped down senseless from drink in a banquet was allowed to remain where he fell, {339} and was regarded by his companions with feelings of envy.[158] Among the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico, who are otherwise a sober people, drunkenness forms a part of their religious festivals.[159] So also in the hill tribes of the Central Provinces of India a large quantity of liquor is an essential element in their religious rites, and their acts of worship invariably end in intoxication.[160] Of the Ainu in Japan we are told that "to drink for the god" is their chief act of worship; the more _saké_ they drink the more devout they are, whereas the gods will be angry with a person who abstains from the intoxicating drink.[161] The ancient Scandinavians regularly concluded their religious ceremonies with filling and emptying stoops in honour of their gods; and even after their conversion to Christianity they were allowed to continue this practice at the end of their services, with the difference that they were now required in their toast-drinking to substitute for the names of their false deities those of the true God and his saints.[162] Of the Germans Tacitus states that "to pass an entire day and night in drinking disgraces no one";[163] and this habit of intoxication the Anglo-Saxons brought with them to England, where it was nourished by a damp climate and a marshy soil. In the seventh and eighth centuries some efforts were made to check drunkenness on the initiative of Theodore, archbishop of Canterbury, and Egbert, archbishop of York, and these exertions were supported by the kings from a political desire to prevent riots and bloodshed.[164] The Penitentials tell us the tale of universal intemperance more effectively than any description of it could do. A bishop who was so drunk as to vomit while administering the holy sacrament was condemned to eighty or ninety days penance, a presbyter to {340} seventy, a deacon or monk to sixty, a clerk to forty;[165] and if a person was so intoxicated that, pending the rite, he dropped the sacred elements into the fire or into a river, he was required to chant a hundred psalms.[166] A bishop or priest who persevered in the habit of drunkenness was to be degraded from his office;[167] whilst single cases of intoxication, if accompanied by vomiting, incurred penance for a certain number of days--forty for a presbyter or deacon,[168] thirty for a monk,[169] fifteen for a layman.[170] However, these rules admitted of exceptions: if anybody in joy and glory of our Saviour's natal day, or of Easter, or in honour of any saint, vomited through being drunk, and in so doing had taken no more than he was ordered by his elders, it mattered nothing; and if a bishop had commanded him to be drunk he was likewise innocent, unless indeed the bishop was in the same state himself.[171] If these attempts to encourage soberness produced any change for the better, it could only have been temporary; for some time afterwards intemperance was carried to its greatest excess through the practice and example of the Danes.[172] Under the influence of the Normans, who were a more temperate race, drunkenness, for a time decreased in England; but after a few reigns the Saxons seem rather to have corrupted their conquerors than to have been benefited by their example.[173] As late as the eighteenth century drunkenness was universal among all classes in England. It was then as uncommon for a party to separate while any member of it remained sober {341} as it is now for any one in such a party to degrade himself through intoxication. No loss of character was incurred by habitual excess. Men in the position of gentlemen congratulated each other upon the number of bottles emptied; and it would have been considered a very frivolous objection to a citizen who aspired to the dignity of Alderman or Mayor that he was an habitual drunkard.[174]

[Footnote 156: Bosman, _Description of the Coast of Guinea_, p. 107.]

[Footnote 157: Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 242.]

[Footnote 158: Bancroft, _op. cit._ ii. 725.]

[Footnote 159: _Ibid._ i. 555.]

[Footnote 160: Hislop, _Aboriginal Tribes of the Central Provinces_, p. 1. Campbell, _Wild Tribes of Khondistan_, p. 164 _sq._ (Kandhs).]

[Footnote 161: Bird, _Unbeaten Tracks in Japan_, ii. 68, 96. _Cf._ Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 31.]

[Footnote 162: Maurer, _op. cit._ ii. 200. Bartholinus, _Antiquitates Danicæ_, i. 8, p. 128 _sqq._ Mallet, _Northern Antiquities_, p. 196.]

[Footnote 163: Tacitus, _Germania_, 22.]

[Footnote 164: _Laws of Hlothhære and Eadric_, 12 _sq._ Thrupp, _The Anglo-Saxon Home_, p. 297.]

[Footnote 165: _P[oe]nitentiale Pseudo-Theodori_, xxvi. 4 (Wasserschleben, _Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche_, p. 594). _P[oe]nitentiale Egberti_, xi. 7 (Wasserschleben, p. 242).]

[Footnote 166: _P[oe]nitentiale Pseudo-Theodori_, xxvi. 5 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 594). _P[oe]nitentiale Egberti_, xi. 9 (Wasserschleben, p. 242).]

[Footnote 167: _P[oe]nitentiale Theodori_, i. 1. 1 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 184). _P[oe]nitentiale Egberti_, xi. 1 (Wasserschleben, p. 242).]

[Footnote 168: _P[oe]nitentiale Theodori_, i. 1. 3 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 184). _P[oe]nitentiale Egberti_, xi. 3 (Wasserschleben, p. 242).]

[Footnote 169: _P[oe]nitentiale Theodori_, i. 1. 2 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 184). _P[oe]nitentiale Egberti_, xi. 2 (Wasserschleben, p. 242).]

[Footnote 170: _P[oe]nitentiale Theodori_, i. 1. 5 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 184).]

[Footnote 171: _P[oe]nitentiale Theodori_, i. 1. 4 (Wasserschleben, _op. cit._ p. 184).]

[Footnote 172: Thrupp, _op. cit._ p. 299 _sqq._]

[Footnote 173: _Ibid._ p. 301 _sq._]

[Footnote 174: Porter, _Progress of the Nation_, p. 239. Pike, _History of Crime in England_, ii. 587. Massey, _History of England during the Reign of George III._ ii. 60.]

Though of late years drunkenness has been decreasing among those European nations who have been most addicted to it, and is nowadays generally recognised as a vice, our civilisation is still, as it has always been, the great source from which the poison of intoxication is pouring over the earth in all directions, infecting or killing races who previously knew nothing of alcohol or looked upon it with abhorrence. Eastern religions have emphatically insisted upon sobriety or even total abstinence from intoxicating liquors. In the sacred law-books of Brahmanism thirteen different kinds of alcoholic drinks are mentioned, all of which are forbidden to Brâhmanas and three to Kshatriyas and Vaisyas;[175] yet, though there be no sin in drinking spirituous liquor, "abstention brings greater reward."[176] A twice-born man who drinks the liquor called Surâ commits a mortal sin, which will be punished both in this life and in the life to come;[177] the most proper penalty for such a person is to drink that liquor boiling-hot, and only when his body has been completely scalded by it is he freed from his guilt.[178] Among the modern Hindus drunkenness is said to be detested by all but the very lowest castes in the agricultural districts and some high caste people residing in the great towns, who have learned it from Europeans; it is supposed to be destructive of caste purity; hence a notorious drunkard is, or at least {342} used to be, expelled from his caste.[179] Buddhism interdicts altogether the use of alcohol;[180] "of the five crimes, the taking of life, theft, adultery, lying, and drinking, the last is the worst."[181] Taouism condemns the love of wine.[182] In Zoroastrianism the holy Sraosha is represented as fighting against the demon of drunkenness,[183] and it is said that the sacred beings are not pleased with him who drinks wine more than moderately;[184] but it seems that the ancient Persians nevertheless were much addicted to intoxication.[185] According to classical writers, some of the Egyptian priests abstained entirely from wine, whilst others drank very little of it;[186] and before the reign of Psammetichus the kings neither drank wine, nor made libation of it as a thing acceptable to the gods.[187] The use of wine and other inebriating drinks is forbidden by Islam,[188] and was punished by Muhammed with flogging.[189] It may also be said of his followers that they for the most part have obeyed this command, at least in country districts,[190] and that the exceptions to the rule are directly or indirectly attributable to the influence of Christians.

[Footnote 175: _Institutes of Vishnu_, xxii. 82, 84. _Gautama_, ii. 20. _Laws of Manu_, xi. 94 _sq._]

[Footnote 176: _Laws of Manu_, v. 56.]

[Footnote 177: _Ibid._ ix. 235, 237; xi. 49, 55; xii. 56.]

[Footnote 178: _Ibid._ xi. 91.]

[Footnote 179: Caldwell, _Tinnevelly Shanars_, p. 38. Dubois, _op. cit._ p. 116. Samuelson, _History of Drink_, p. 46.]

[Footnote 180: Oldenberg, _Buddha_, p. 290. Monier-Williams, _Buddhism_, p. 126.]

[Footnote 181: Hardy, _Manual of Budhism_, p. 491.]

[Footnote 182: Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, p. 266.]

[Footnote 183: _Vendîdâd_, xix. 41.]

[Footnote 184: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xvi. 62.]

[Footnote 185: Herodotus, i. 133.]

[Footnote 186: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 6. Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 6.]

[Footnote 187: Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 6.]

[Footnote 188: _Koran_, ii. 216.]

[Footnote 189: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 122.]

[Footnote 190: Burton, _Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah and Meccah_, ii. 118. Blunt, _Bedouin Tribes of the Euphrates_, ii. 213. Polak, _Persien_, ii. 268. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 298 _sq._ Pool, _Studies in Mohammedanism_, p. 283.]

The condemnation of drunkenness is, of course, in the first place due to its injurious consequences. The Basutos of South Africa say that "there is blood in the dregs"--that is, intoxication ends in bloody quarrels.[191] The Omaha Indians made drunkenness a crime punishable with flogging and loss of property, because it often led to murders.[192] Sahagun tells us of a Mexican king who severely admonished his people to abstain from intoxication, as being the cause of troubles and disorders in villages and {343} kingdoms, of misery, sorrow, and poverty.[193] Of him who drinks immoderately it is said in one of the Pahlavi texts that infamy comes to his body and wickedness to his soul.[194] According to Ecclesiasticus, "drunkenness increaseth the rage of a fool till he offend: it diminisheth strength and maketh wounds."[195] We read in the Talmud, "Drink not, and you will not sin."[196] Muhammed said that in wine there is both sin and profit, but that the sin is greater than the profit.[197] Buddhism stigmatises drinking as the worst of crimes because it leads to all other sins; from the continued use of intoxicating drink six evil consequences are said to follow--namely, the loss of wealth; the arising of disputes that lead to blows and battles; the production of various diseases, as soreness of the eyes and others; the bringing of disgrace, from the rebuke of parents and superiors; the exposure to shame, from going hither and thither unclothed; the loss of the judgment required for the carrying on of the affairs of the world.[198] That drunkenness, in spite of the evils resulting from it, nevertheless so frequently escapes censure, is due partly to the pleasures connected with it, partly to lack of foresight,[199] and in a large measure to the influence of intemperate habits. Why such habits should have grown up in one country and not in another we are often unable to tell. The climate has no doubt something to do with it, although it is impossible to agree with the statement made by Montesquieu that the prevalence of intoxication in different parts of the earth is proportionate to the coldness and humidity of the air.[200] A gloomy temperament and a cheerless life are apt to induce people to resort to the artificial pleasures produced by drink. The dreariness of the Puritan Sunday has much to answer for; the evidence given by a spirit merchant before the Commission on the Forbes Mackenzie Act was "that there is a great {344} demand for drink on Sunday," and that "this demand _must_ be supplied."[201] _Ennui_ was probably a cause of the prevailing inebriety in Europe in former days, when there was difficulty in passing the time not occupied in fighting or hunting;[202] and the monotony of life in the lower ranks of an industrial community still tends to produce a similar effect. Other causes of drunkenness are miserable homes and wretched cooking. Mr. Lecky is of opinion that if the wives of the poor in Great Britain and Ireland could cook as they can cook in France and in Holland, a much smaller proportion of the husbands would seek a refuge in the public-house.[203]

[Footnote 191: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 307.]

[Footnote 192: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 370.]

[Footnote 193: Sahagun, _Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España_, ii. 94 _sqq._]

[Footnote 194: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xvi. 63.]

[Footnote 195: _Ecclesiasticus_, xxxi. 30.]

[Footnote 196: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 58.]

[Footnote 197: _Koran_, ii. 216.]

[Footnote 198: Hardy, _op. cit._ p. 491 _sq._]

[Footnote 199: _Cf._ _supra_, i. 281, 309 _sq._]

[Footnote 200: Montesquieu, _De l'esprit des lois_, xiv. 10 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 303 _sq._).]

[Footnote 201: Hessey, _Sunday_, p. 378.]

[Footnote 202: _Cf._ Spencer, _Principles of Ethics_, i. 445.]

[Footnote 203: Lecky, _Democracy and Liberty_, ii. 138.]

The evil consequences of intoxication have led not only to the condemnation of an immoderate use of alcoholic drink, but also to the demand for total abstinence, in consideration of the difficulty many people have in avoiding excess. But this hardly accounts in full for the religious prohibition of drink which we meet with in the East. Wine or spirituous liquor inspires mysterious fear. The abnormal mental state which it produces suggests the idea that there is something supernatural in it, that it contains a spirit, or is perhaps itself a spirit.[204] Moreover, the juice of the grape is conceived as the blood of the vine[205]--in Ecclesiasticus the wine which was poured out at the foot of the altar is even called "the blood of the grape";[206] and in the blood is the soul. The law of Brahmanism not only prohibits the drinking of wine, but also commands that "one should carefully avoid red exudations from trees and juices flowing from incisions."[207] That spirituous liquor is believed to contain baneful mysterious energy is obvious from the statement that if the Brahman (the Veda) which dwells in the body of a Brâhmana is even once deluged with it, his Brahmanhood forsakes him, and he becomes a Sûdra;[208] holy persons are, of {345} course, most easily affected by the mysterious drink, owing to the delicate nature of holiness. Muhammedans likewise regard wine as "unclean" and polluting;[209] some of them dread it so much that if a single drop were to fall upon a clean garment it would be rendered unfit to wear until washed.[210] In Morocco it is said that by drinking alcohol a Muhammedan loses the _baraka_, or holiness, of "the faith" and a scribe the memory of the Koran, and that if a person who drinks alcohol has a charm on him, its _baraka_ is spoiled. The fact that wine was forbidden by the Prophet might perhaps by itself be a sufficient reason for the notion that it is unclean. But already in pre-Muhammedan times it seems to have been scrupulously avoided by some of the Arabs,[211] though among others it was much in use and was highly praised by their poets.[212]

[Footnote 204: See _supra_, i. 278, 281; _infra_, on the Belief in Supernatural Beings; Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 359.]

[Footnote 205: Frazer, _op. cit._ i. 358 _sq._]

[Footnote 206: _Ecclesiasticus_, l. 15.]

[Footnote 207: _Laws of Manu_, v. 6.]

[Footnote 208: _Ibid._ xi. 98.]

[Footnote 209: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 299.]

[Footnote 210: Winterbottom, _Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_, i. 72.]

[Footnote 211: Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, xix. 94. 3. Zöckler, _Askese und Mönchtum_, i. 93.]

[Footnote 212: Goldziher, _Muhammedanische Studien_, i. 21 _sqq._]

As for the Muhammedan prohibition of wine, the suggestion has been made by Palgrave that it mainly arose from the Prophet's antipathy to Christianity and his desire to broaden the line of demarcation between his followers and those of Christ. Wine was raised by the founder of Christianity to a dignity of the highest religious import. It became well-nigh typical of Christianity and in a manner its badge. To declare it "unclean," an "abomination," and "the work of the devil," was to set up for the Faithful a counter-badge.[213] This view derives much probability from the fact that there are several unequivocal indications of the same bent of policy in Muhammed's system, showing a distinct tendency to oppose Islam to other religions. But at the same time both a desire to prevent intoxication and the notion that wine is polluting may very well have been co-operating motives for the prohibition.

[Footnote 213: Palgrave, _Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia_, i. 428 _sqq._]

CHAPTER XXXIX

CLEANLINESS AND UNCLEANLINESS--ASCETICISM IN GENERAL

IT seems that man, like many other animals, is naturally endowed with a certain tendency to cleanliness or aversion to filth. Of Caspar Hauser--the boy who had been kept in a dungeon separated from all communication with the world from early childhood to about the age of seventeen--Feuerbach tells us that "uncleanliness, or whatever he considered as such, whether in his own person or in others, was an abomination to him."[1] And the savage boy of Aveyron, though filthy at first, soon became so scrupulously clean in his habits that "he constantly threw away, in a pet, the contents of his plate, if any particle of dirt or dust had fallen upon it; and, after he had broken his walnuts under his feet, he took pains to clean them in the nicest and most delicate manner."[2]

[Footnote 1: Feuerbach, _Caspar Hauser_, p. 62.]

[Footnote 2: Itard, _Account of the Discovery and Education of a Savage Man_, p. 58.]

Many savages are praised for their cleanliness.[3] The Veddahs of Ceylon wash their bodies every few days, as opportunity occurs.[4] Among the South Sea Islanders {347} bathing is a very common practice; the Tahitians bathe in fresh water once or twice a day,[5] and the natives of Ni-afu, in the Tonga Islands, are said to spend half their life in the water.[6] So, also, many Indian tribes both in North, Central, and South America are very fond of bathing.[7] The Omahas generally bathe every day in warm weather, early in the morning and at night, and some of them also at noon.[8] Among the Guiana Indians it is a custom for men and women to troop down together to the nearest water early in the morning and many times during the day.[9] The Tehuelches of Patagonia not only make morning ablutions and, when encamped near a river, enjoy bathing for hours, but are also scrupulously careful as to the cleanliness of their houses and utensils, and will, if they can obtain soap, wash up everything they may be possessed of.[10] The Moquis and Pueblos of New Mexico are remarkable both for their personal cleanliness and the neatness of their dwellings.[11] Cleanliness is a common characteristic of many natives of Africa.[12] The Negroes of the Gold Coast wash their whole persons once, if not oftener, during the day.[13] The Megé, a people subject to the Monbuttu, wash two or three times a day, and when engaged in work constantly adjourn to a neighbouring stream to cleanse themselves.[14] The Marutse-Mabundas, rather than lose their bath, are always ready {348} to run the risk of being snapped up by crocodiles, and they are in the habit of keeping their materials in well-washed wooden or earthenware bowls or in suitable baskets or calabashes.[15] The cleanliness of the Dinka in every thing that concerns the preparation of food is said to be absolutely exemplary.[16] Among the Bari tribes the dwellings "are the perfection of cleanliness."[17] So also the Bachapins, a Bechuana tribe, are remarkable for the cleanliness of their dwellings, showing the greatest carefulness to remove all rubbish and everything unsightly; but at the same time they are lacking in personal cleanliness.[18]

[Footnote 3: Colquhoun, _Amongst the Shans_, p. 298 _sq._ Man, _Sonthalia and the Sonthals_, p. 84. Foreman, _Philippine Islands_, p. 189 (domesticated natives). Boyle, _Dyaks of Borneo_, p. 242. Erskine, _Cruise among the Islands of the Western Pacific_, pp. 110 (Samoans; _cf._ Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 205), 262, 264 (Fijians). Percy Smith, 'Futuna,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 35. Markham, _Cruise of the "Rosario,"_ p. 136 (Polynesians).]

[Footnote 4: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 187.]

[Footnote 5: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_ (ed. 1829), ii. 113 _sq._]

[Footnote 6: Romilly, _Western Pacific_, p. 145.]

[Footnote 7: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, i. 83, 696, 722, 760. Domenech, _Seven Years Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 337. von Humboldt, _Personal Narrative of Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent_, iii. 237 (Chaymas). von Martius, _Beiträge zur Ethnographie Amerika's_,

i. 600 (Uaupés), 643 (Macusís). Molina, _History of Chili_, ii. 118; Smith, _Araucanians_, p. 184. Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 53.]

[Footnote 8: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 269.]

[Footnote 9: Im Thurn, _Among the Indians of Guiana_, p. 191.]

[Footnote 10: Musters, _At Home with the Patagonians_, p. 173.]

[Footnote 11: Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 540. See also _ibid._ i. 267 (some Inland Columbians).]

[Footnote 12: Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, ii. 86 (Negroes of Accra, Krus), 464 (Western Fulahs). Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Huana,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 292. Rowley, _Africa Unveiled_, p. 153. Ashe, _Two Kings of Uganda_, p. 305; Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, i. 184. Casati, _Ten Years in Equatoria_, i. 122 (Monbuttu). Holub, _Seven Years in South Africa_, ii. 208 (Manansas).]

[Footnote 13: Cruickshank, _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast_, ii. 283 _sq._]

[Footnote 14: Burrows, _Land of the Pigmies_, p. 119.]

[Footnote 15: Holub, _op. cit._ ii. 309.]

[Footnote 16: Casati, _op. cit._ i. 44.]

[Footnote 17: Baker, _Albert N'yanza_, i. 89.]

[Footnote 18: Burchell, _Travels in the Interior of Southern Africa_, ii. 521, 553.]

We commonly find that savages who are clean in certain respects are dirty in others. The Wanyoro bathe frequently and always wash their hands before and after eating, but their dwellings are very filthy and swarm with vermin.[19] The Nagas of India[20] and the natives of the interior of Sumatra,[21] though cleanly in their persons, are very dirty in their apparel. The Mayas of Central America make frequent use of cold water, but neither in their persons nor in their dwellings do they present an appearance of cleanliness.[22] So also the Californian Indians, whilst exceedingly fond of bathing, are unclean about their lodges and clothing.[23] The Aleuts, though they wash daily, allow dirt to be piled up close to their dwellings, prepare their food very carelessly, and never wash their household utensils.[24] The New Zealander, again, whilst not over-clean in his person, is very particular respecting his food and also keeps his dwelling in as much order as possible.[25] On the other hand there are very many uncivilised peoples who are described as generally filthy in their habits--for instance, the Fuegians,[26] many {349} Indian tribes in the Pacific States,[27] several Eskimo tribes,[28] various Siberian peoples,[29] the Ainu of Japan,[30] most hill tribes in India,[31] many Australian tribes,[32] the Bushmans,[33] and, generally, the dwarf races of Africa.[34] But although these peoples never or hardly ever wash their bodies, or do not change their dress until it is worn to pieces, or eat out of the same vessels as their dogs without cleaning them, or feed on disgusting substances, or regard vermin as a delicacy--we may assume that their toleration of filth is not absolutely boundless.

[Footnote 19: Wilson and Felkin, _op. cit._ ii. 46. Baker, _Albert N'yanza_, ii. 58.]

[Footnote 20: Stewart, 'Northern Cachar,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 616.]

[Footnote 21: Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 22: Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 654.]

[Footnote 23: Powers, _Tribes of California_, p. 403. Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 377, 407.]

[Footnote 24: Veniaminof, quoted by Dall, _Alaska_, p. 398. See also Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 267 (Flatheads).]

[Footnote 25: Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 58.]

[Footnote 26: Snow, _Two Years' Cruise off Tierra del Fuego_, i. 345.]

[Footnote 27: Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 83, 102, 184, 231, 492, 626.]

[Footnote 28: _Ibid._ i. 51. Seemann, _Voyage of "Herald,"_ ii. 61 _sq._ (Western Eskimo). Kane, _Arctic Explorations_, ii. 116 (Eskimo of Etah). Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 155.]

[Footnote 29: Sarytschew, 'Voyage of Discovery to the North-East of Siberia,' in _Collection of Modern and Contemporary Voyages_, v. 67 (Kamchadales). Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, pp. 176 (Kamchadales), 226 (Koriaks). Sauer, _Expedition to the Northern Parts of Russia performed by Billings_, p. 125 (Jakuts). Georgi, _Russia_, ii. 398 (Jakuts); iii. 59 (Kotoftzes), 112 (Tunguses); iv. 37 (Kalmucks), 134 (Burats). Liadov, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ i. 401; Bergmann, _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_, ii. 102, 123 _sq._; Pallas, quoted in Spencer's _Descriptive Sociology_, 'Asiatic Races,' p. 29 (Kalmucks).]

[Footnote 30: Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 24 _sqq._ Mac Ritchie, _Ainos_, p. 12 _sq._]

[Footnote 31: Spencer, _Descriptive Sociology_, 'Asiatic Races,' p. 29. Grange, 'Expedition into the Naga Hills,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, ix. 962. Stewart, _ibid._ xxiv. 637 (Kukis). Mason, 'Physical Character of the Karens,' _ibid._ xxxv. pt. ii. 25. Butler, _Travels in Assam_, p. 98. Anderson, _Mandalay to Momien_, p. 131 (Kakhyens). Moorcroft and Trebeck, _Travels in the Himalayan Provinces_, i. 321 (Ladakhis).]

[Footnote 32: Breton, _Excursions in New South Wales_, p. 197. Barrington, _History of New South Wales_, p. 19 (natives of Botany Bay). Angas, _Savage Life in Australia_, i. 80 (South Australian aborigines). Chauncy, in Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, ii. 284 (West Australian aborigines).]

[Footnote 33: Moffat, _Missionary Labours in Southern Africa_, p. 15. Barrow, _Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa_, i. 288.]

[Footnote 34: Stuhlmann, _Mit Emin Pascha ins Herz von Afrika_, p. 451. For other instances of uncleanliness in savages see Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, i. 39; St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 147 (some of the Land Dyaks); Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, pp. 50 (Herero), 470 (Bechuanas).]

The prevalence of cleanly or dirty habits among a certain people may depend on a variety of circumstances: the occupations of life, sufficiency or want of water, climatic conditions, industry or laziness, wealth or poverty, religious or superstitious beliefs. Castrén observes that filthiness is a characteristic of fishing peoples; among the Ostyaks only those who live by fishing are conspicuous for their uncleanliness, whereas the nomads and owners of {350} reindeer are not.[35] It has been observed that the inland negro is clean when he dwells in the neighbourhood of rivers.[36] In West Australia those tribes only which live by large rivers or near the sea are said to have an idea of cleanliness.[37] Concerning the filthy habits of the Kukis and other hill peoples in India, Major Butler remarks that they may probably be accounted for by the scarcity of water in the neighbourhood of the villages, as also by the coldness of the climate.[38] Dr. Kane believes that the indifference of many Eskimo to dirt or filth is largely due to the extreme cold, which by rapid freezing resists putrefaction and thus prevents the household, with its numerous dogs, from being intolerable.[39] Their well-known habit of washing themselves with freshly passed urine arises partly from scarcity of water and the difficulty of heating it, but partly also from the fact that the ammonia of the urine is an excellent substitute for soap in removing the grease with which the skin necessarily becomes soiled.[40] A cold climate, moreover, leads to uncleanliness because it makes garments necessary;[41] and among some savages the practice of greasing their bodies to protect the skin from the effects of a parching air produces a similar result.[42] Lord Kames maintains that the greatest promoter of cleanliness is industry, whereas its greatest antagonist is indolence. In Holland, he observes, the people were cleaner than all their neighbours because they were more industrious, at a time when in England industry was as great a stranger as cleanliness.[43] Kolben says that the general laziness of the Hottentots accounts for the fact that "they are in the matter of diet {351} the filthiest people in the world."[44] Of the Siberian Burats Georgi writes that "from their laziness they are as dirty as swine";[45] and the Kamchadales are described as a "dirty, lazy race."[46] Poverty, also, is for obvious reasons a cause of uncleanliness;[47] "a starving vulture neglects to polish his feathers, and a famished dog has a ragged coat."[48] Very commonly cleanliness is a class distinction.[49] Thus among the Point Barrow Eskimo the poorer people are often careless about their clothes and persons, whereas most of the wealthier individuals appear to take pride in being well clad, and, except when actually engaged in some dirty work, always have their faces and hands scrupulously clean and their hair neatly combed.[50] Dr. Schweinfurth maintains that domestic cleanliness and care in the preparation of food are everywhere signs of a higher grade of external culture and answer to a certain degree of intellectual superiority.[51] But already Lord Kames pointed out the fact indicated above, that "cleanness is remarkable in several nations which have made little progress in the arts of life."[52]

[Footnote 35: Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, i. 319 _sq._]

[Footnote 36: Bastian, _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_, iii. 75. Mr. Torday, who speaks from extensive experience, tells me the same.]

[Footnote 37: Chauncy, quoted by Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ ii. 284.]

[Footnote 38: Butler, _Travels in Assam_, p. 98 _sq._ _Cf._ Stewart, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 616.]

[Footnote 39: Kane, _Arctic Explorations_, ii. 116.]

[Footnote 40: Murdoch, 'Ethnol. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 421. Dall, _op. cit._ p. 20.]

[Footnote 41: _Cf._ von Humboldt, _op. cit._ iii. 237.]

[Footnote 42: Burchell, _op. cit._ ii. 553 (Bachapins of Litakun).]

[Footnote 43: Kames, _Sketches of the History of Man_, i. 323, 327 _sqq._]

[Footnote 44: Kolben, _Present State of the Cape of Good Hope_, i. 47.]

[Footnote 45: Georgi, _op. cit._ iv. 134.]

[Footnote 46: _Ibid._ iii. 152. See also Sarytschew, in _Collection of Modern and Contemporary Voyages_, v. 67.]

[Footnote 47: See Marshall, _A Phrenologist amongst the Todas_, p. 50; Veniaminof, quoted by Dall, _op. cit._ p. 398 (Aleuts).]

[Footnote 48: St. John, _Village Life in Egypt_, i. 187.]

[Footnote 49: Tickell, 'Memoir on the Hodésum,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, ix. 808 (Hos). Rowlatt, 'Expedition into the Mishmee Hills,' _ibid._ xiv. 489. Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 117. Waitz, _op. cit._ ii. 86 (Ashantees). Arnot, _Garenganze_, p. 76 (Barotse). Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 299.]

[Footnote 50: Murdoch, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 421.]

[Footnote 51: Schweinfurth, _Heart of Africa_, i. 156.]

[Footnote 52: Kames, _op. cit._ i. 321.]

The factors which determine the cleanliness of a people also naturally influence the moral valuation of it. Aversion to dirt not only leads to cleanly habits, but makes a filthy person an object of disgust and disapprobation; indeed, this aversion is generally stronger with reference to other individuals than with reference to one's own person. But where for some reason or other dirtiness becomes habitual, it at the same time ceases to be disgusting; and it is often astonishing how soon {352} people get used to filthy surroundings. Thus, when cleanliness is insisted upon it is so in the first instance because dirt is directly disagreeable to other persons, and when uncleanness is tolerated it is so because it gives no offence to the senses of the public. But at the higher stages of civilisation, at least, cleanliness is besides inculcated on hygienic grounds.

In many cases cleanliness, either temporary or habitual, is also practised and enjoined from religious or superstitious motives. A Lappish _noaide_, or wizard, had to wash all his body before he offered a sacrifice.[53] The Siberian shamans have compulsory water purifications once a year, sometimes every month, as also on special occasions when they feel themselves defiled by contact with unclean things.[54] The Shinto priests in Japan bathed and put on clean garments before making the sacred offerings or chanting the liturgies.[55] Herodotus speaks of the cleanliness observed by the Egyptian priests when engaged in the service of the gods.[56] As a preliminary to an act of worship the ancient Greeks washed their hands or bathed and put on clean clothes.[57] One of the legal maxims of the Romans required that men should approach the deity in a state of purity.[58] According to Zoroastrianism it is the great business of life to avoid impurity, and, when it is involuntarily contracted, to remove it in the correct manner as quickly as possible; and by impurity is then understood not an inward state of the soul, but mainly a physical state of the body, everything going out of the human body being considered polluting.[59] For a Brahmin bathing is the chief part of the minute ceremonial of daily worship, whilst further washings and aspersions enter into more solemn religious acts;[60] and not only Brahmins but most Hindus regard {353} it as a religious duty to bathe daily if this is at all convenient.[61] Lamaism enjoins personal ablution as a sacerdotal rite preparatory to worship, though the ceremony seldom extends to more than dipping the tips of the fingers in water.[62] Jewish Rabbis are compelled to wash their hands before they begin to pray.[63] Tertullian mentions that a similar ablution was practised by the Christians before prayer.[64] According to Islam, the clothes and person of the worshipper should be clean, and so also the ground, mat, carpet, or whatever else it be, upon which he prays; and every act of worship must be preceded by an ablution, though, where water cannot be got, sand may be used as a substitute.[65] But a polluting influence is not ascribed to everything which we regard as dirt. For instance, Muhammedans consider the excrements of men and dogs defiling, but not the dung of cows and sheep; cow-dung is even used as a means of purification.

[Footnote 53: Friis, _Lappisk Mythologie_, p. 145 _sq._ von Düben, _Lappland_, p. 256.]

[Footnote 54: _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 88.]

[Footnote 55: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 85.]

[Footnote 56: Herodotus, ii. 37. _Cf._ Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 154.]

[Footnote 57: _Iliad_, i. 449; iii. 270; vi. 266; ix. 171, 174; xvi. 229 _sq._; xxiii. 41; xxiv. 302 _sqq._ _Odyssey_, ii. 261; iv. 750; xvii. 58. Keller, _Homeric Society_, p. 141. Stengel, _Die griechischen Kultusaltertümer_, p. 106.]

[Footnote 58: Cicero, _De legibus_, ii. 10.]

[Footnote 59: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxxii. _sqq._]

[Footnote 60: Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 61 _sq._ Colebrooke, _Miscellaneous Essays_, ii. 142 _sqq._ Dubois, _People of India_, p. 113 _sq._]

[Footnote 61: Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 201.]

[Footnote 62: Waddell, _Buddhism of Tibet_, p. 423.]

[Footnote 63: Chwolsohn, _Die Ssabier_, ii. 71.]

[Footnote 64: Tertullian, _De Oratione_, 13 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, ii. 1167 _sq._).]

[Footnote 65: Sell, _Faith of Islam_, p. 252 _sqq._ Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, i. 84 _sqq._]

These practices and rules spring from the idea that the contact of a polluting substance with anything holy is followed by injurious consequences--an idea which will be more fully discussed in connection with sexual abstinences. Such contact is supposed to deprive a deity or holy being of its holiness, or otherwise be detrimental to it, and therefore to excite its anger against him who causes the defilement. So also a sacred act is believed to lose its sacredness by being performed by an unclean individual. Moreover, as a polluting substance is itself held to contain mysterious energy of a baneful kind, it is looked upon as a direct danger even to persons who are not engaged in religious worship. We have previously noticed the rites of purification which a manslayer has to undergo in order to get rid of the blood-pollution.[66] We have also seen that ablutions and other purificatory ceremonies {354} are performed for the purpose of removing sins and misfortunes.[67] And bathing or sprinkling with water is a common method of clearing mourners or persons who have come in contact with a corpse from the contagion of death.[68]

[Footnote 66: _Supra_, i. 375 _sqq._]

[Footnote 67: _Supra_, i. 54 _sqq._]

[Footnote 68: Teit, 'Thompson Indians of British Columbia,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, 'Anthropology,' i. 331. Cruickshank, _op. cit._ ii. 218 (Negroes of the Gold Coast). Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 160. Turner, _Samoa_, p. 145; _Idem_, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 228 (Samoans). Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 403 (Society Islanders). Kloss, _In the Andamans and Nicobars_, p. 305 (Kar Nicobarese). Joinville, 'Religion and Manners of the People of Ceylon,' in _Asiatick Researches_, vii. 437 (Sinhalese). Iyer, 'Nay[=a]dis of Malabar,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 71; Thurston, _ibid._ iv. 76 _sq._ (Nay[=a]dis). Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_, i. 83 (Arakh, a tribe in Oudh). Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 147, iii. 275; Dubois, _Manners and Customs of the People of India_, p. 108 _sq._; Bose, _Hindoos as they are_, p. 257. Caland, _Die Altindischen Todten- und Bestattungsgebräuche_, p. 79 _sq._]

But whilst religious or superstitious beliefs have thus led to ablutions and cleanliness, they have in other instances had the very opposite effect. Among Arabs young children are often left dirty and ill-dressed purposely, to preserve them from the evil eye.[69] The Obbo natives in Central Africa declare that if they do not wash their hands with cow's urine before milking, the cow will lose her milk; and with the same fluid they wash the milk-bowl, and even mix some of it with the milk.[70] The Jakuts "never wash any of their eating or drinking utensils; but, as soon as a dish is emptied, they clean it with the fore and middle finger; for they think it a great sin to wash away any part of their food, and apprehend that the consequence will be a scarcity."[71] A similar custom prevails among the Kirghiz[72] and Kalmucks. The latter "are forbidden by the laws of their faith" to wash their vessels in river-water, and therefore "do no more than wipe them with a piece of an old sheep-skin shube, which they use also for cleaning their hands upon when dirty."[73] They, moreover, abstain from washing their {355} clothes; and so did the Huns and Mongols.[74] The ancient Turks never washed themselves, because they believed that their gods punished ablutions with thunder and lightning; and the same belief still prevails among kindred peoples in Central Asia.[75] Among the Bahima of Enkole, in the Uganda Protectorate, a man may smear his body with butter or clay as often as he wishes, but "to wash with water is bad for him, and is a sure way of bringing sickness into his family and amongst his cattle."[76] The dread of water may be due partly to ill effects experienced after using it, partly to superstition. The Moors dare not wash their bodies with cold water in the afternoon and evening after the _[(]â[s.]ar_, because all such water is then supposed to be haunted by _jnûn_, or evil spirits. In various religions the odour of sanctity is associated with filth. Muhammedan dervishes are recognised by their appearance of untidiness and uncleanness. Among the rules laid down for Buddhist monks there is one which prescribes that their dress shall be made of rags taken from a dust or refuse heap.[77] In the early days of Christian monasticism "the cleanliness of the body was regarded as a pollution of the soul." The saints who were most admired were those who had become one hideous mass of clotted filth. St. Athanasius relates with enthusiasm how St. Antony, the patriarch of monachism, had never, to extreme old age, been guilty of washing his feet. A famous virgin, though bodily sickness was a consequence of her habits, resolutely refused, on religious principles, to wash any part of her body except her fingers. And St. Simeon Stylites, who was generally pronounced to be the highest model of a Christian saint, bound a rope round himself so that it became imbedded in his flesh and caused putrefaction; and it is said that "a horrible stench, intolerable {356} to the bystanders, exhaled from his body, and worms dropped from him whenever he moved, and they filled his bed."[78] In mediæval Christianity abstinence from every species of cleanliness was also enjoined as a penance, the penitent being required to go with foul mouth, filthy hands and neck, undressed hair and beard, unpared nails, and clothes as dirty as his person. In these cases uncleanliness is a form of asceticism, a subject which we have already touched upon in dealing with industry and fasting, but the principles of which still call for our consideration.

[Footnote 69: Blunt, _Bedouin Tribes of the Euphrates_, ii. 214. Klunzinger, _Upper Egypt_, p. 391.]

[Footnote 70: Baker, _Albert N'yanza_, i. 381.]

[Footnote 71: Sauer, _op. cit._ p. 125.]

[Footnote 72: Valikhanof, &c., _Russians in Central Asia_, p. 80.]

[Footnote 73: Georgi, _op. cit._ iv. 37. Bergmann, _op. cit._ ii. 123.]

[Footnote 74: Neumann, _Die Völker des südlichen Russlands_, p. 27. For the excessive dirtiness of the present Mongols, see Prejevalsky, _Mongolia_, i. 51 _sq._]

[Footnote 75: Castrén, _op. cit._ iv. 61.]

[Footnote 76: Roscoe, 'Bahima,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvii. 111.]

[Footnote 77: Kern, _Manual of Indian Buddhism_, p. 75.]

[Footnote 78: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 109 _sqq._]

* * * * *

In various religions we meet with the idea that a person appeases or gives pleasure to the deity by subjecting himself to suffering or deprivation. This belief finds expression in all sorts of ascetic practices. We read of Christian ascetics who lived in deserted dens of wild beasts, or in dried-up wells, or in tombs; who disdained all clothes, and crawled abroad like animals covered only by their matted hair; who ate nothing but corn which had become rotten by remaining for a month in water; who spent forty days and nights in the middle of thorn-bushes, and for forty years never lay down.[79] Hindu ascetics remain in immovable attitudes with their faces or their arms raised to heaven, until the sinews shrink and the posture assumed stiffens into rigidity; or they expose themselves to the inclemency of the weather in a state of absolute nudity, or tear their bodies with knives, or feed on carrion and excrement.[80] Among the Muhammedans of India there are fakirs who have been seen dragging heavy chains or cannon balls, or crawling upon their hands and knees for years; others have been found lying upon iron spikes for a bed; and others, again, have been swinging for months before a slow fire with a {357} tropical sun blazing overhead.[81] Among modern Jews some of the more sanctimonious members of the synagogue have been known to undergo the penance of voluntary flagellation before the commencement of the fast of atonement, two persons successively inflicting upon each other thirty-nine stripes or thirteen lashes with a triple scourge.[82] According to the Zoroastrian Yasts, thirty strokes with the Sraoshô-karana is an expiation which purges people from their sins, and makes them fit for offering a sacrifice.[83] Herodotus tells us that the ancient Egyptians beat themselves while the things offered by them as sacrifices were being burned, and that the Carian dwellers in Egypt on such occasions cut their faces with knives.[84] Among the ancient Mexicans blood-drawing was a favourite and most common mode of expiating sin and showing devotion. "It makes one shudder," says Clavigero, "to read the austerities which they exercised upon themselves, either in atonement of their transgressions or in preparation for their festivals. They mangled their flesh as if it had been insensible, and let their blood run in such profusion, that it appeared to be a superfluous fluid of the body."[85] Self-mortification also formed part of the religious cult in many uncivilised tribes in North America.[86] "The Indian," Colonel Dodge observes, "believes, with many Christians, that self-torture is an act most acceptable to God, and the extent of pleasure that he can give his god is exactly measured by the amount of suffering that he can bear without flinching."[87]

[Footnote 79: _Ibid._ ii. 108 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 214 _sq._ Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 352. Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 395.]

[Footnote 81: Pool, _Studies in Mohammedanism_, p. 305. For similar practices among the modern Egyptians, see Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 244.]

[Footnote 82: Allen, _Modern Judaism_, p. 407.]

[Footnote 83: _Yasts_, x. 122. Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, xxiii. 151, n. 3.]

[Footnote 84: Herodotus, ii. 40, 61.]

[Footnote 85: Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 284. See also Bancroft, _op. cit._ iii. 441 _sq._; Réville, _Hibbert Lectures on the Native Religions of Mexico and Peru_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 86: Domenech, _Seven Years Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 380. Catlin, _North American Indians_, ii. 243. James, _Expedition to the Rocky Mountains_, i. 276 _sqq._ (Omahas). McGee, 'Siouan Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xv. 184.]

[Footnote 87: Dodge, _Our Wild Indians_, p. 149.]

The idea underlying religious asceticism has no doubt {358} been derived from several different sources. It should first be noticed that certain ascetic practices have originally been performed for another purpose, and only afterwards come to be regarded as means of propitiating or pleasing the deity through the suffering involved in them. This, as we have seen, is the case with certain fasts, and also with sexual asceticism.[88] When an act is supposed to be connected with supernatural danger, the evil (real or imaginary) resulting from it is readily interpreted as a sign of divine anger and the act itself is regarded as being forbidden by a god. If then the abstinence from it implies suffering, as is in some degree the case with fasting and sexual continence, the conclusion is drawn that the god delights in such suffering. The same inference is, moreover, made from the fact that such abstinences are enjoined in connection with religious worship, though the primary motive for this injunction was fear of pollution. Beating or scourging, again, was in certain cases originally a mode of purification, intended to wipe off and drive away a dangerous contagion either personified as demoniacal or otherwise of a magical character. And although the pain inflicted on the person beaten was at first not the object of the act but only incidental to it, it became subsequently the chief purpose of the ceremony, which was now regarded as a mortification well pleasing to the god.[89] This change of ideas seems likewise to be due both to the tendency of the supernatural contagion to develop into a divine punishment in case it is not removed by the painful rite, and also to the circumstance that purification is held to be a necessary accompaniment of acts of religious worship. The Egyptian sacrifice described by Herodotus was combined with purificatory fasting as well as beating.[90] Among the Jews, before the commencement of the fast of atonement, whilst a few very religious persons undergo the penance of flagellation, "some purify themselves by {359} ablutions."[91] And that the original object of the scourging mentioned in the Yasts was to purify the worshipper is suggested by the fact that he on the same occasion had to wash his body three days and three nights.[92] But it should also be remembered that religious exaltation, when it has reached its highest stage, may express itself in self-laceration;[93] and the deity is naturally supposed to be pleased with the outward expression of such an emotion in his devotees.

[Footnote 88: See _infra_, p. 420 _sq._]

[Footnote 89: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, iii. 217 _sq._]

[Footnote 90: Herodotus, ii. 40.]

[Footnote 91: Allen, _op. cit._ p. 407.]

[Footnote 92: _Yasts_, x. 122.]

[Footnote 93: See Hirn, _Origins of Art_, p. 64.]

An ascetic practice may also be the survival of an earlier sacrifice. We have seen that this is frequently the case with fasting and almsgiving, and the same may hold true of other forms of asceticism.[94] The essence of the act then no longer lies in the benefit which the god derives from it, but in the self-denial or self-mortification which it costs the worshipper. In the sacred books of India "austerity" is mentioned as a means of expiation side by side with sacrifice, fasting, and giving gifts.[95]

[Footnote 94: _Cf._ Tertullian, _De resurrectione carnis_, 8 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 806).]

[Footnote 95: _Gautama_, xix. 11. _Vasishtha_, xx. 47; xxii. 8. _Baudháyana_, iii. 10. 9.]

When an ascetic practice develops out of a previous custom of a different origin, it may be combined with an idea which by itself has been a frequent source of self-inflicted pain, to wit, the belief that such pain is an expiation for sin, that it may serve as a substitute for a punishment which would otherwise be inflicted by the offended god; and almost inseparably connected with this belief there may be that desire to suffer which is so often, vaguely or distinctly, involved in genuine repentance.[96] The idea of expiation very largely underlies the penitential discipline of the Christian Church and the asceticism of its saints. From the days of Tertullian and Cyprian the Latins were familiar with the notion that the Christian has to propitiate God, that cries of pain, sufferings, and deprivations are means of appeasing his anger, that God takes strict account of the quantity of {360} the atonement, and that, where there is no guilt to have blotted out, those very means are regarded as merits.[97] According to the doctrine of the Church, penance should in all grave cases be preceded by sorrow for the sin and also by confession, either public or private; repentance, as we have noticed above, is the only ground on which pardon can be given by a scrupulous judge.[98] But the notion was only too often adopted that the penitential practice itself was a compensation for sin, that a man was at liberty to do whatever he pleased provided he was prepared to do penance afterwards, and that a person who, conscious of his frailty, had laid in a large stock of vicarious penance in anticipation of future necessity, had a right "to work it out," and spend it in sins.[99] The idea that sins may be expiated by certain acts of self-mortification is familiar both to Muhammedans[100] and Jews.[101] According to Zoroastrian beliefs, it is possible to wipe out by peculiarly severe atonements not only the special sin on account of which the atonement is performed, but also other offences committed in former times or unconsciously.[102] In the sacred books of the Hindus we meet with a strong conviction that pain suffered in this life will redeem the sufferer from punishment in a future existence. It is said that "men who have committed crimes and have been punished by the king go to heaven, being pure like those who performed meritorious deeds";[103] and the same idea is at the bottom of their penitential system.[104] But in Brahmanism, as in Catholicism, the effect of ascetic practices is supposed to go beyond mere expiation. They are regarded as means of accumulating religious merit or attaining superhuman powers. Brahmanical poems tell of marvellous self-mortifications {361} by which sages of the past obtained influence over the gods themselves; nay, even the power wielded by certain archdemons over men and gods is supposed to have been acquired by the practice of religious austerities.[105] How largely ascetic practices are due to the idea of expiation is indicated by the fact that they hardly occur among nations who have no vivid sense of sin, like the Chinese before the introduction of Taouism and Buddhism,[106] and the ancient Greeks, Romans, and Scandinavians. In Greece, however, people sometimes voluntarily sacrificed a part of their happiness in order to avoid the envy of the gods, who would not allow to man more than a moderate share of good fortune.[107]

[Footnote 96: See _supra_, i. 105 _sq._]

[Footnote 97: Tertullian, _De jejuniis_, 7 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 962). _Idem_, _De resurrectione carnis_, 8 (Migne, ii. 806 _sq._). Harnack, _History of Dogma_, ii. 110, 132; iii. 311.]

[Footnote 98: _Supra_, i. 85.]

[Footnote 99: See Thrupp, _The Anglo-Saxon Home_, p. 259.]

[Footnote 100: _Supra_, ii. 315, 317. Pool, _op. cit._ p. 264.]

[Footnote 101: _Supra_, ii. 315 _sqq._ Allen, _op. cit._ p. 130.]

[Footnote 102: Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. 163.]

[Footnote 103: _Laws of Manu_, viii. 318.]

[Footnote 104: _Ibid._ xi. 228.]

[Footnote 105: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, pp. 231, 427. Oldenberg, _Buddha_, p. 302.]

[Footnote 106: Réville, _La religion Chinoise_, p. 221.]

[Footnote 107: Aeschylus, _Agamemnon_, 1008 _sqq._ Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, i. 82.]

Self-mortification is also sometimes resorted to not so much to appease the anger of a god as rather to excite his compassion. In some of the Jewish fasts, as we have seen before, these two objects are closely interwoven.[108] The Jewish custom of fasting in the case of a drought is in a way parallel to the Moorish practice of tying holy men and throwing them into a pond in order that their pitiful condition may induce God to send rain. Mr. Williams tells us of a Fijian priest who, "after supplicating his god for rain in the usual way without success, slept for several successive nights exposed on the top of a rock, without mat or pillow, hoping thus to move the obdurate deity to send a shower."[109]

[Footnote 108: _Supra_, ii. 315.]

[Footnote 109: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 196.]

Not only is suffering voluntarily sought as a means of wiping off sins committed, but it is also endured with a view to preventing the commission of sin. This is the second or, in importance, the first great idea upon which Christian asceticism rests. The gratification of every worldly desire is sinful, the flesh should be the abject slave of the spirit intent upon unearthly things. Man was created for a life in spiritual communion with God, {362} but he yielded to the seduction of evil demons, who availed themselves of the sensuous side of his nature to draw him away from the contemplation of the divine and lead him to the earthly. Moral goodness, therefore, consists in renouncing all sensuous pleasures, in separating from the world, in living solely after the spirit, in imitating the perfection and purity of God. The contrast between good and evil is the contrast between God and the world, and the conception of the world includes not only the objects of bodily appetites but all human institutions, as well as science and art.[110] And still more than any theoretical doctrine, the personal example of Christ led to the glorification of spiritual joy and bodily suffering.

[Footnote 110: Harnack, _op. cit._ ii. 214 _sqq._, iii. 258 _sqq._ von Eicken, _Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, p. 313 _sqq._]

The antithesis of spirit and body was not peculiar to Christianity. It was an old Platonic conception, which was regarded by the Fathers of the Church as the contrast between that which was precious and that which was to be mortified. The doctrine that bodily enjoyments are low and degrading was taught by many pagan philosophers; even a man like Cicero says that all corporeal pleasure is opposed to virtue and ought to be rejected.[111] And in the Neo-Platonic and Neo-Pythagorean schools of Alexandria an ascetic ideal of life was the natural outcome of their theory that God alone is pure and good, and matter impure and evil. Renunciation of the world was taught and practised by the Jewish sects of the Essenes and Therapeutæ. In India, Professor Kern observes, "climate, institutions, the contemplative bent of the native mind, all tended to facilitate the growth of a persuasion that the highest aims of human life and real felicity cannot be obtained but by the seclusion from the busy world, by undisturbed pious exercises, and by a certain amount of mortification."[112] We read in the Hitopadesa, "Subjection to the senses has been called the road to ruin, and {363} their subjugation the path to fortune."[113] The Jain regards pleasure in itself as sinful:--"What is discontent, and what is pleasure? One should live subject to neither. Giving up all gaiety, circumspect, restrained, one should lead a religious life."[114] According to Buddhism, there are two causes of the misery with which life is inseparably bound up--lust and ignorance; and so there are two cures--the suppression of lust and desire and the removal of ignorance.[115] It is said in the Dhammapada, "There is no satisfying lusts, even by a shower of gold pieces; he who knows that lusts have a short taste and cause pain, he is wise."[116] Penances, as they were practised among the ascetics of India, were discarded by Buddha as vexatious, unworthy, unprofitable. "Not nakedness, not platted hair, not dirt, not fasting, or lying on the earth, not rubbing with dust, not sitting motionless, can purify a mortal who has not overcome desires."[117] Where all contact with the earthly ceases, there, and there only, are deliverance and freedom.

[Footnote 111: Cicero, _De officiis_, i. 30; iii. 33.]

[Footnote 112: Kern, _Manual of Indian Buddhism_, p. 73.]

[Footnote 113: Hitopadesa, quoted by Monier-Williams, _Indian Wisdom_, p. 538.]

[Footnote 114: Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 291.]

[Footnote 115: Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 212 _sq._ Monier-Williams, _Buddhism_, p. 99.]

[Footnote 116: _Dhammapada_, 186 _sq._]

[Footnote 117: _Ibid._ 141. See also Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 301 _sq._]

The idea that man ought to liberate himself from the bondage of earthly desires is the conclusion of a contemplative mind reflecting upon the short duration and emptiness of all bodily pleasures and the allurements by which they lead men into misery and sin. And separation from the material world is the ideal of the religious enthusiast whose highest aspiration is union with God conceived as an immaterial being, as pure spirit.

CHAPTER XL

MARRIAGE

MAN'S sexual nature gives rise to various modes of conduct on which moral judgments are passed. We shall first consider such relations between the sexes as are comprised under the heading Marriage.

In a previous work I have endeavoured to show that in all probability there has been no stage in the social history of mankind where marriage has not existed, human marriage apparently being an inheritance from some ape-like progenitor.[1] I then defined marriage as a more or less durable connection between male and female, lasting beyond the mere act of propagation till after the birth of the offspring. This is marriage in the natural history sense of the term. As a social institution, on the other hand, it has a somewhat different meaning: it is a union regulated by custom or law.[2] Society lays down rules relating to the selection of partners, to the mode of contracting marriage, to its form, and to its duration. These rules are essentially expressions of moral feelings.

[Footnote 1: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, ch. iii. _sqq._]

[Footnote 2: The best definition of marriage as a social institution which I have met with is the following one given by Dr. Friedrichs ('Einzeluntersuchungen zur vergleichenden Rechtswissenschaft,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ x. 255):--"Eine von der Rechtsordnung anerkannte und privilegirte Vereinigung geschlechtsdifferenter Personen, entweder zur Führung eines gemeinsamen Hausstandes und zum Geschlechtsverkehr, oder zum ausschliesslichen Geschlechtsverkehr."]

There is, first, a circle of persons within which marriage is prohibited. It seems that the horror of incest is well-nigh universal in the human race, and that the few cases in which this feeling is said to be absent can only be regarded {365} as abnormalities. But the degrees of kinship within which marriage is forbidden are by no means the same everywhere. It is most, and almost universally, abominated between parents and children. It is also held in general abhorrence between brothers and sisters who are children of the same mother as well as of the same father. Most of the exceptions to this rule refer to royal persons, for whom it is considered improper to contract marriage with individuals of less exalted birth; but among a few peoples incestuous unions are practised on a larger scale on account of extreme isolation or as a result of vitiated instincts.[3] It seems, however, that habitual marriages between brothers and sisters have been imputed to certain peoples without sufficient reason.[4] This is obviously true of the Veddahs of Ceylon, who have long been supposed to regard the marriage of a man with his younger sister as _the_ proper marriage.[5] "Such incest," says Mr. Nevill, "never was allowed, and never could be, while the Vaedda {366} customs lingered. Incest is regarded as worse than murder. So positive is this feeling, that the Tamils have based a legend upon the instant murder of his sister by a Vaedda to whom she had made undue advances. The mistake arose from gross ignorance of Vaedda usages. The title of a cousin with whom marriage ought to be contracted, that is, mother's brother's daughter, or father's sister's daughter, is _nagâ_ or _nangî_. This, in Sinhalese, is applied to a younger sister. Hence if you ask a Vaedda, 'Do you marry your sisters?' the Sinhalese interpreter is apt to say, 'Do you marry your nagâ?' The reply is (I have often tested it), 'Yes--we always did formerly, but now it is not always observed.' You say then, 'What? marry your own-sister-nagâ?' and the reply is an angry and insulted denial, the very question appearing a gross insult." The same writer adds:--"In no case did a person marry one of the same family, even though the relationship was lost in remote antiquity. Such a marriage is incest. The penalty for incest was death."[6]

[Footnote 3: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. xiv. _sq._]

[Footnote 4: This is apparently the case with various peoples mentioned by Sir J. G. Frazer (_Pausanias's Description of Greece_, ii. 84 _sq._) as being addicted to incestuous unions. Mr. Turner's short statement (_Samoa_, p. 341) that among the New Caledonians no laws of consanguinity were observed in their marriages, and that even the nearest relatives united, radically differs from M. de Rochas' description of the same people. "Les Néo-Calédoniens," he says (_Nouvelle Calédonie_, p. 232), "ne se marient pas entre proches parents du côté paternel; mais du côté maternel, ils se marient à tous les degrés de cousinage." Brothers and sisters, after they have reached years of maturity, are no longer permitted to entertain any social intercourse with each other; they are prohibited from keeping each other company even in the presence of a third person; and if they casually meet they must instantly go out of the way or, if that is impossible, the sister must throw herself on the ground with her face downwards. "Cet éloignement," M. de Rochas adds (_ibid._ p. 239), "qui n'est certes l'effet ni du mépris ni de l'inimitié, me parait né d'une exagération déraisonnable d'un sentiment naturel, l'horreur de l'inceste." Sir J. G. Frazer says that, according to Mr. Thomson, the marriage of brothers with sisters has been practised among the Masai; but a later and, as it seems, better informed authority tells us that "the Masai do not marry their near relations" and that "incest is unknown among them" (Hinde, _The Last of the Masai_, p. 76). Again, the statement that among the Obongos, a dwarf race in West Africa, sisters marry with brothers, is only based on information derived from another people, the Ashangos, who have a strong antipathy to them (Du Chaillu, _Journey to Ashango-Land_, p. 320). Liebich's assertion (_Die Zigeuner_, p. 49) that the Gypsies allow a brother to marry his sister is certainly not true of the Gypsies of Finland, who greatly abhor incest (Thesleff, 'Zigenarlif i Finland,' in _Nya Pressen_, 1897, no. 331 B).]

[Footnote 5: Bailey, 'Wild Tribes of the Veddahs of Ceylon,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. ii. 294 _sq._]

[Footnote 6: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 178.]

As a rule, the prohibited degrees are more numerous among peoples unaffected by modern civilisation than they are in more advanced communities, the prohibitions in a great many cases referring even to all the members of the tribe or clan; and the violation of these rules is regarded as a most heinous crime.[7]

[Footnote 7: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 297 _sqq._]

The Algonquins speak of cases where men have been put to death by their nearest kinsfolk for marrying women of their own clan.[8] Among the Asiniboin, a Siouan tribe, a chief can commit murder with impunity if the murdered person be without friends, but if he married within his _gens_ he would be dismissed, on account of the general disgust which such a union would arouse.[9] The Hottentots used to punish alliances between first or second cousins with death.[10] A Bantu of the coast region considers similar unions to be "something horrible, something unutterably disgraceful."[11] The Busoga of the Uganda {367} Protectorate held in great abhorrence anything like incest even amongst domestic animals.[12] Among the Kandhs of India "intermarriage between persons of the same tribe, however large or scattered, is considered incestuous and punishable with death."[13] In the Malay Archipelago submersion is a common punishment for incest,[14] but among certain tribes the guilty parties are killed and eaten[15] or buried alive.[16] In Efate, of the New Hebrides, it would be a crime punishable with death for a man or woman to marry a person belonging to his or her mother's clan;[17] and the Mortlock Islanders are said to inflict the same punishment upon anybody who has sexual intercourse with a relative belonging to his own "tribe."[18] Nowhere has marriage been bound by more severe laws than among the Australian aborigines. Their tribes are grouped in exogamous subdivisions, the number of which varies; and at least before the occupation of the country by the whites the regular punishment for marriage or sexual intercourse with a person belonging to a forbidden division was death.[19]

[Footnote 8: Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 59.]

[Footnote 9: Dorsey, 'Siouan Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xv. 224.]

[Footnote 10: Kolben, _Present State of the Cape of Good Hope_, i. 155 _sq._]

[Footnote 11: Theal, _History of the Boers in South Africa_, p. 16.]

[Footnote 12: Johnston, _Uganda Protectorate_, ii. 719.]

[Footnote 13: Macpherson, quoted by Percival, _Land of the Veda_, p. 345. _Cf._ Hunter, _Annals of Rural Bengal_, iii. 81.]

[Footnote 14: Wilken, _Huwelijken tusschen bloedverwanten_, p. 26 _sq._ Riedel, _De sluik- en kroesharige rassen tusschen Selebes en Papua_, p. 460.]

[Footnote 15: Wilken, _Over de verwantschap en het huwelijks- en erfrecht bij de volken van het maleische ras_, p. 18.]

[Footnote 16: _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 105.]

[Footnote 17: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 181 _sq._]

[Footnote 18: Kubary, 'Die Bewohner der Mortlock Inseln,' in _Mittheil. d. Geogr. Gesellsch. in Hamburg_, 1878-9, p. 251.]

[Footnote 19: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 299 _sq._ See, besides the authorities quoted there, Roth, _Ethnol. Studies among the North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, p. 182; Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 15.]

Not less intense is the horror of incest among nations that have passed beyond savagery and barbarism. Among the Chinese incest with a grand-uncle, a father's first cousin, a brother, or a nephew, is punishable by death, and a man who marries his mother's sister is strangled; nay, punishment is inflicted even on him who marries a person with the same surname as his own, sixty blows being the penalty.[20] So also incest was held in the utmost horror by the so-called Aryan peoples in ancient times.[21] In the 'Institutes of Vishnu' it is said that sexual intercourse {368} with one's mother or daughter or daughter-in-law is a crime of the highest degree, for which there is no other atonement than to proceed into the flames.[22]

[Footnote 20: Medhurst, 'Marriage, Affinity, and Inheritance in China,' in _Trans. Roy. Asiatic Soc. China Branch_, iv. 21 _sqq._]

[Footnote 21: Leist, _Alt-arisches Jus Gentium_, p. 394 _sq._]

[Footnote 22: _Institutes of Vishnu_, xxxiv. 1 _sq._]

Various theories have been set forth to account for the prohibition of marriage between near kin. I criticised some of them in my book on the 'History of Human Marriage,' and ventured at the same time on an explanation of my own.[23] I pointed out that there is an innate aversion to sexual intercourse between persons living very closely together from early youth, and that, as such persons are in most cases related by blood, this feeling would naturally display itself in custom and law as a horror of intercourse between near kin. Indeed, an abundance of ethnographical facts seem to indicate that it is not in the first place by the degree of consanguinity, but by the close living together, that prohibitory laws against intermarriage are determined. Thus many peoples have a rule of "exogamy" which does not depend on kinship at all, but on purely local considerations, all the members of a horde or village, though not related by blood, being forbidden to intermarry.[24] The prohibited degrees are very differently defined in the customs or laws of different nations, and it appears that the extent to which relatives are prohibited from intermarrying is nearly connected with their close living together. Very often the prohibitions against incest are more or less one-sided, applying more extensively either to the relatives on the father's side or to those on the mother's, according as descent is reckoned through men or women. Now, since {369} the line of descent is largely connected with local relationships, we may reasonably infer that the same local relationships exercise a considerable influence on the table of prohibited degrees. However, in a large number of cases prohibitions of intermarriage are only indirectly influenced by the close living together.[25] Aversion to the intermarriage of persons who live in intimate connection with one another has called forth prohibitions of the intermarriage of relations; and, as kinship is traced by means of a system of names, the name comes to be considered identical with relationship. This system is necessarily one-sided. Though it will keep up the record of descent either on the male or female side, it cannot do both at once;[26] and the line which has not been kept up by such means of record, even where it is recognised as a line of relationship, is naturally more or less neglected and soon forgotten. Hence the prohibited degrees frequently extend very far on the one side--to the whole clan--but not on the other. It should also be remembered that, according to primitive ideas, the name itself constitutes a mystic link between those who have it in common. "In Greenland, as everywhere else," says Dr. Nansen, "the name is of great importance; it is believed that there is a spiritual affinity between two people of the same name."[27] Generally speaking, the feeling that two persons are intimately connected in some way or other may, through an association of ideas, give rise to the notion that marriage or sexual intercourse between them is incestuous. Hence the prohibitions of marriage between relations by alliance and by adoption. Hence, too, the prohibitions of the Roman and Greek Churches on the ground of what is called "spiritual relationship."

[Footnote 23: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 310 _sqq._]

[Footnote 24: Herr Cunow (_Die Verwandtschafts-Organisationen der Australneger_, p. 187) finds this argument "rather peculiar," and offers himself a different explanation of the rule in question. He writes:--"In der Wirklichkeit erklärt sich das Verbot einfach daraus, dass sehr oft die Lokalgruppe mit dem Geschlechtsverband beziehungsweise dem Totemverband kongruirt, und demnach das was für die Gens gilt, zugleich auch für die Lokalgruppe Geltung hat." This, however, is only Herr Cunow's own inference. And it may be asked why it is more "peculiar" to suppose that the prohibition of marriage between near kin has sprung from aversion to sexual intercourse between persons living closely together, than to assume that the rule which forbids marriage between unrelated persons living in the same community has sprung from the prohibition of marriage between kindred.]

[Footnote 25: I do not understand how any reader of my book can, like Herr Cunow (_op. cit._ p. 186 _sqq._), attribute to me the statement that the group within which intermarriage is prohibited is identical with the group of people who live closely together. If he had read a little more carefully what I have said, he might have saved himself the trouble he has taken to prove my great ignorance of early social organisations.]

[Footnote 26: _Cf._ Tylor, _Early History of Mankind_, p. 285 _sq._]

[Footnote 27: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 230.]

{370} The question arises:--How has this instinctive aversion to marriage and sexual intercourse in general between persons living closely together from early youth originated? I have suggested that it may be the result of natural selection. Darwin's careful studies of the effects of cross- and self-fertilisation in the vegetable kingdom, the consensus of opinion among eminent breeders, and experiments made with rats, rabbits, and other animals, seem to have proved that self-fertilisation of plants and close inter-breeding of animals are more or less injurious to the species; and it is probable that the evil chiefly results from the fact that the uniting sexual elements were not sufficiently differentiated. Now it is impossible to believe that a physiological law which holds good of the rest of the animal kingdom, as also of plants, would not apply to man as well. But it is difficult to adduce direct evidence for the evil effects of consanguineous marriages. We cannot expect very conspicuous results from other alliances than those between the nearest relatives--between brothers and sisters, parents and children,--and the injurious results even of such unions would not necessarily appear at once. The closest kind of intermarriage which we have opportunities of studying is that between first cousins. Unfortunately, the observations hitherto made on the subject are far from decisive. Yet it is noteworthy that of all the writers who have discussed it the majority, and certainly not the least able of them, have expressed their belief in marriages between first cousins being more or less unfavourable to the offspring; and no evidence which can stand the test of scientific investigation has hitherto been adduced against this view. Moreover, we have reason to believe that consanguineous marriages are much more injurious in savage regions, where the struggle for existence is often very severe, than they have proved to be in civilised societies, especially as it is among the well-to-do classes that such marriages occur most frequently.

Taking all these facts into consideration, I am inclined to think that consanguineous marriages are in some way or {371} other detrimental to the species. And here I find a quite sufficient explanation of the horror of incest; not because man at an early stage recognised the injurious influence of close intermarriage, but because the law of natural selection must inevitably have operated. Among the ancestors of man, as among other animals, there was no doubt a time, when blood-relationship was no bar to sexual intercourse. But variations, here as elsewhere, would naturally present themselves--we know how extremely liable to variations the sexual instinct is; and those of our ancestors who avoided in-and-in breeding would survive, while the others would gradually decay and ultimately perish. Thus a sentiment would be developed which would be powerful enough, as a rule, to prevent injurious unions. Of course it would display itself, not as an innate aversion to sexual connections with near relatives as such, but as an aversion on the part of individuals to union with others with whom they lived; but these, as a matter of fact, would be blood-relations, so that the result would be the survival of the fittest. Whether man inherited this sentiment from the predecessors from whom he sprang, or whether it was developed after the evolution of distinctly human qualities, we cannot know. It must have arisen at a stage when family ties became comparatively strong, and children remained with their parents until the age of puberty or even longer. And exogamy, resulting from a natural extension of this sentiment to a larger group, would arise when single families united into hordes.

This attempt to explain the prohibition of marriage between kindred and exogamy has not lacked sympathetic support,[28] but more commonly, I think, it has been rejected. Yet after a careful consideration of the various objections raised against it I find no reason to alter my opinion. Some of my opponents have evidently failed to grasp the {372} argument on which the theory is based. Thus Professor Robertson Smith argued that it begins by presupposing the very custom which it professes to explain, the custom of exogamy; that "it postulates the existence of groups which through many generations (for the survival of the fittest implies this) avoided wiving within the group."[29] But what my theory postulates is not the existence of exogamous groups, but the spontaneous appearance of individual sentiments of aversion. And if, as Mr. Andrew Lang maintains, my whole argument is a "vicious circle,"[30] then the theory of natural selection itself is a vicious circle, since there never could be a selection of qualities that did not exist before.

[Footnote 28: A. R. Wallace, in his 'Introductory Note' to my _History of Human Marriage_, p. vi. Giddings, _Principles of Sociology_, p. 267. Howard, _History of Matrimonial Institutions_, i. 125 _sqq._ Sir E. B. Tylor (in _Academy_, xl. 289) says with regard to my theory that, at any rate, I am "well on the track." See also Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_, i. pp. clxxix, clxxx, ccii.]

[Footnote 29: Robertson Smith, in _Nature_, xliv. 271.]

[Footnote 30: Lang, _Social Origins_, p. 33.]

It has been argued that if close living together calls forth aversion to sexual intercourse, such aversion ought to display itself between husband and wife as well as between near relatives.[31] But these cases are certainly not identical. The feeling of which I have spoken is aversion associated with the idea of sexual intercourse between persons who have lived in a long-continued intimate relationship from a period of life when the action of sexual desire is naturally out of the question.[32] On the other hand, when a man marries a woman his feeling towards her is of a very different kind, and his love impulse may remain, nay increase, during the conjugal union; though even in this case long living together has undoubtedly a tendency to lead to sexual indifference and sometimes to positive aversion. The opinion that the home is kept free from incestuous intercourse only by law, custom, and education,[33]{373} shows lack of discrimination. Law may forbid a son to marry his mother, a brother to marry his sister, but it could not prevent him from _desiring_ such a union. Have the most draconic codes ever been able to suppress, say, homosexual love? As Plato observed, an unwritten law defends as sufficiently as possible parents from incestuous intercourse with their children, brothers from intercourse with their sisters; "nor does the thought of such a thing ever enter at all into the minds of most of them."[34] Considering the extreme variability to which the sexual impulse is subject, it is not astonishing that cases of what we consider incestuous intercourse sometimes do occur. It seems to me more remarkable that the abhorrence of incest should be so general, and the exceptions to the rule so few.

[Footnote 31: Durkheim, 'La prohibition de l'inceste et ses origines,' in _L'année sociologique_, i. 64. Professor Durkheim refers in this connection to an article by Dr. Simmel, 'Die Verwandtenehe,' in _Vossische Zeitung_, June 3rd and 10th, 1894. But I cannot find that Dr. Simmel is really opposed to my view. He only says, "Das intime Beisammenleben wirkt keineswegs nur abstumpfend, sondern in vielen Fällen gerade anreizend, sonst würde die alte Erfahrung nicht gelten, dass die Liebe, wo sie beim Eingehen der Ehe fehlte, oft im Laufe derselben entsteht."]

[Footnote 32: _Cf._ Bentham, _Theory of Legislation_, p. 220:--"Individuals accustomed to see each other and to know each other, from an age which is neither capable of conceiving the desire nor of inspiring it, will see each other with the same eyes to the end of life."]

[Footnote 33: For advocates of such a view see Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 310 _sqq._ More recently it has been expressed by Krauss, in _Am Ur-Quell_, iv. 151, and Finck, _Primitive Love_, p. 49.]

[Footnote 34: Plato, _Leges_, viii. 838. Among the Maoris of New Zealand, according to Mr. Colenso (_Maori Races_, p. 47 _sq._), adult brothers and sisters slept together, as they had always done from their birth, "not only without sin, but without thought of it."]

Dr. Havelock Ellis, again, objects that my theory assumes the existence of a kind of instinct which can with difficulty be accepted. "An innate tendency," he says, "at once so specific and so merely negative, involving at the same time deliberate intellectual processes, can only with a certain force be introduced into the accepted class of instincts. It is as awkward and artificial an instinct as would be, let us say, an instinct to avoid eating the apples that grew in one's own orchard. The explanation of the abhorrence of incest is really, however, exceedingly simple. . . . The normal failure of the pairing instinct to manifest itself in the case of brothers and sisters, or of boys and girls brought up together from infancy, is a merely negative phenomenon due to the inevitable absence under those circumstances of the conditions which evoke the pairing impulse. . . . Between those who have been brought up together from childhood all the sensory stimuli of vision, hearing, and touch have been dulled by use, trained to the calm level of affection, and deprived of their potency to {374} arouse the erethistic excitement which produces sexual tumescence."[35] I think that Dr. Ellis has considerably exaggerated the difference between my theory and his own. The "instinct" of which I have spoken is simply aversion to sexual intercourse with certain persons, and this is a no more complicated mental phenomenon than, for instance, an animal's aversion to eating certain kinds of substances. Indeed, Dr. Ellis himself, in his excellent 'Studies in the Psychology of Sex,' gives us many instances not only of sexual indifference, but of sexual aversion, quite instinctive in character.[36] Thus the largest proportion of male inverts described by him experience what is called _horror feminæ_, that is to say, "woman as an object of sexual desire is disgusting" (not merely indifferent) to them.[37] And Dr. Ellis also repeatedly speaks of the "abhorrence" of incest.

[Footnote 35: Havelock Ellis, _Studies in the Psychology of Sex_, 'Sexual Selection in Man,' p. 205 _sq._]

[Footnote 36: I have been blamed for making an illegitimate use of the word "instinct" (Crawley, _The Mystic Rose_ p. 446). But if, as Dr. Ellis says, "an instinct is fundamentally a more or less complicated series of reflexes set in action by a definite stimulus," or as Mr. Crawley puts it (_op. cit._ p. 446), instinct "has nothing in its content except response of function to environment," then the aversion I speak of may certainly be called an instinct.]

[Footnote 37: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 164.]

The objection has been raised that, if my explanation of the prohibition of incest were correct, connections between unrelated persons who have been brought up together should be as repulsive as connections between near kin; whereas, as a matter of fact, the two cases are regarded in a very different light, the latter, only, being held incestuous.[38] Much, of course, depends on the closeness of the union, and Dr. Steinmetz's argument that "the very sensual Frenchmen often seem to marry the lady friends of their earliest youth,"[39] is certainly not to the point. I believe that sexual love between a man and his foster-daughter is almost as great an abnormality as sexual love between a father and his daughter; and among some peoples marriages between persons who have been brought up together in the same family or who {375} belong to the same local group, without being related to each other by blood, are held blamable or are actually prohibited.[40] Even between lads and girls who have been educated in the same school there is a remarkable absence of erotic feelings, as appears from an interesting communication by a person who has for many years been the head-mistress of such a school in Finland. One youth assured her that neither he nor any of his friends would ever think of marrying a girl who had been their school fellow;[41] and I heard of a lad who made a great distinction between girls of his own school and other, "real," girls, as he called them. Yet however objectionable and unnatural unions between foster-parents and foster-children or between foster-brothers and foster-sisters may appear to us, I do not deny that unions between the nearest blood-relatives inspire a horror of their own; and it seems natural that they should do so considering that from earliest times the aversion to sexual intercourse between persons living closely together has been expressed in prohibitions against unions between kindred. Such unions have been stigmatised by custom, law, and religion, whilst much less notice has been taken of intercourse between unrelated persons who may occasionally have grown up in the same household. The belief in the supernatural, especially, has played a very important part in the ideas referring to incest, as in other points of sexual morality, owing to the mystery which surrounds everything connected with the function of reproduction.[42] The Aleuts in early times believed that incest, which they considered the gravest crime, was always followed by the birth of monsters with walrus tusks, beards, and other disfigurations.[43] The Kafirs {376} likewise maintain that the offspring of an incestuous union will be a monster, as "a punishment inflicted by the ancestral spirit."[44] The Bataks of Sumatra regard a long drought as a decisive proof that two cousins have had criminal intercourse with each other.[45] The Galelarese think that incest calls forth alarming natural phenomena, such as earthquakes, the eruption of a volcano, or torrents of rain.[46] So also the higher religions have branded incest as a heinous sin. As for Christianity's views on the subject, it is sufficient to notice that the prohibited degrees were extended by the Church,[47] and that the jurisdiction over incest, as over all sexual offences, was exercised by the ecclesiastical courts.[48]

[Footnote 38: Steinmetz, 'Die neueren Forschungen zur Geschichte der menschlichen Familie,' in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwiss._ ii. 818 _sq._]

[Footnote 39: _Ibid._ ii. 818.]

[Footnote 40: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 321 _sqq._ Among the Western Islanders of Torres Straits marriage was forbidden, "with a remarkable delicacy of feeling, to the sister of a man's particular friend" (Haddon, 'Ethnology of the Western Tribe of Torres Straits,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xix. 315).]

[Footnote 41: Lucina Hagman, 'Från samskolan,' in _Humanitas_, ii. 188 _sq._]

[Footnote 42: For the connection between religious feelings and the sexual impulse, see Vallon and Marie, 'Des psychoses religieuses,' in _Archives de Neurologie_, ser. ii. vol. iii. 184 _sq._; Gadelius, _Om tvångstankar_, p. 120 _sq._; Starbuck, _Psychology of Religion_, p. 401 _sqq._]

[Footnote 43: Veniammof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 155.]

[Footnote 44: Shooter, _Kafirs of Natal_, p. 45.]

[Footnote 45: von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 212.]

[Footnote 46: van Baarda, 'Fabelen, verhalen en overleveringen der Galelareezen,' in _Bijdragen tot de taal-, land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, xlv. (ser. vi. vol. 1.) p. 514. See also Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 212 _sq._]

[Footnote 47: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 308. Katz, _Grundriss des kanonischen Strafrechts_, p. 116 _sq._]

[Footnote 48: Stephen, _History of the Criminal Law of England_, ii. 411.]

It has, finally, been argued that my theory utterly fails to explain the fact that prohibitions of intermarriage frequently refer to all the members of a clan, even those who live in different localities.[49] In addition to what I have previously observed on this point, I desire to emphasise that every hypothesis pretending to give a full explanation of prohibitions of incest must assume the operation of the very same mental law--that of association--which in my opinion accounts for clan-exogamy. Thus Professor Durkheim, while maintaining that my theory as regards the horror of incest could not apply to exogamy because the members of the same totem do not live together, is himself quite ready to resort to analogy to explain prohibitions extending outside the totem clan. He tries to show that clan-exogamy is the source of all other prohibitions against incest, and that clan-exogamy itself springs from totemism.[50] According {377} to him the rule of clan-exogamy has been extended to near relatives belonging to different clans, because they are in no less intimate contact with each other than are the members of the same clan. According to my own theory, again, the prohibition of marriage between near relatives living closely together has been extended to all the members of the clan on account of the notion of intimacy connected with the idea of a common descent and with a common name. If I consider Professor Durkheim's hypothesis extremely unsatisfactory,[51] it is certainly not because he has called in the law of association to explain the rules against incest. How could anybody deny the operation of this law for instance in the Roman Catholic prohibition of marriage between co-sponsors, or in the rule prevalent in Eastern Europe according to which the groomsman at the wedding is forbidden to intermarry with the family of the bride,[52] or in laws prohibiting marriage between relatives by alliance? And why might not the {378} same law be applied to other relationships also, such as those constituted by a common descent or a common name?

[Footnote 49: Cunow, _op. cit._ p. 185. Durkheim, in _L'année sociologique_, i. 39, n. 2. Steinmetz, in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwiss._ ii. 819.]

[Footnote 50: Prof. Durkheim says (_L'année sociologique_, i. 50):--"Le sang est tabou d'une manière générale et il taboue tout ce qui entre en rapports avec lui. . . . La femme est, d'une manière chronique, le théâtre de manifestations sanglantes. . . . La femme est donc, elle aussi, et d'une manière également chronique, tabou pour les autres membres du clan." However, the taboo is not restricted to the members of the clan, but refers also to near relatives belonging to different clans, and this has to be explained. M. Durkheim writes (_ibid._ p. 19):--"Quand on a pris l'habitude de regarder comme incestueux et abominables les rapports conjugaux de sujets qui sont nominalement du même clan, les rapports similaires d'individus qui, tout en ressortissant verbalement à des clans différents, sont pourtant en contact aussi ou plus intime que les précédents, ne peuvent manquer de prendre le même caractère." And further (_ibid._ p. 58):--"Quand le totémisme disparaît, et avec lui la parenté spéciale au clan, l'exogamie devient solidaire des nouveaux types de famille qui se constituent et qui reposent sur d'autres bases, et comme ces families sont plus restreintes que n'était le clan, elle se circonscrit, elle aussi, dans un cercle moins étendu; le nombre des individus entre lesquels le mariage est prohibé diminue. C'est ainsi que, par une évolution graduelle, elle en est arrivée à l'état actuel où les mariages entre ascendants et descendants, entre frères et s[oe]urs, sont à peu près les seuls qui soient radicalement interdits."]

[Footnote 51: Professor Durkheim tries to explain a phenomenon of universal prevalence through an institution which has been proved to exist among certain peoples only. How does Professor Durkheim know that totem clans once prevailed among all peoples who now prohibit the intermarriage of near relatives? If the rules which prevent parents from marrying their children and brothers from marrying their sisters are survivals of ancient totemism, how shall we explain the normal aversion to such unions? Ancient totemism can certainly not account for this. But then the coincidence between these two facts--the legal prohibition of incest and the psychical aversion to it--is merely accidental; and this seems to me a preposterous supposition. See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

[Footnote 52: Maine, _Dissertations_, p. 257 _sq._]

* * * * *

There is not only an inner circle within which no marriage is allowed, but also an outer circle outside of which marriage is either prohibited or at least disapproved of. Like the inner circle, the outer one varies greatly in extent.[53] Probably every people considers it a disgrace, if not a crime, for its men, and even more so for its women, to marry within a race very different from its own, especially if it be an inferior race. The Romans were prohibited from marrying barbarians--the emperor Valentinian inflicted the penalty of death for such unions;[54] and a modern European girl who married an Australian native would no doubt be regarded as an outcast by her own society. Among many peoples marriage very seldom or never takes place outside the limits of the tribe or community. In India there are several instances of this. The Tipperahs and Abors view with abhorrence the idea of their girls marrying out of their clan;[55] and Colonel Dalton was gravely assured that, "when one of the daughters of Pádam so demeans herself, the sun and moon refuse to shine, and there is such a strife in the elements that all labour is necessarily suspended, till by sacrifice and oblation the stain is washed away."[56] In ancient Peru it was not lawful for the natives of one province or village to intermarry with those of another.[57] Marriage with foreign women was unlawful at Sparta and Athens.[58] At Rome any marriage of a citizen with a woman who was not herself a Roman citizen, or did not belong to a community possessing the privilege of _connubium_ with Rome, was invalid, and no legitimate children could be born of such a union.[59]

[Footnote 53: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 363 _sqq._]

[Footnote 54: Rossbach, _Römische Ehe_, p. 465.]

[Footnote 55: Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 201.]

[Footnote 56: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 28.]

[Footnote 57: Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, i. 308.]

[Footnote 58: Müller, _History of the Doric Race_, ii. 302. Hearn, _The Aryan Household_, p. 156 _sq._]

[Footnote 59: Gaius, _Institutiones_, i. 56.]

{379} Prohibitions of intermarriage also very often relate to persons belonging to different classes or castes of the same community.[60] To mention a few instances. The wild tribes of Brazil consider alliances between slaves and freemen highly disgraceful.[61] In Tahiti, if a woman of condition chose an inferior person as her husband, the children he had by her were killed.[62] In the Malay Archipelago marriages between persons of different rank are, as a rule, disapproved of, and in some places prohibited.[63] In India intermarriage between different castes, though formerly permissible, is now altogether prohibited.[64] In Rome plebeians and patricians could not intermarry till the year 445 B.C., nor were marriages allowed between patricians and clients; and Cicero himself disapproved of intermarriages of _ingenui_ and freedmen.[65] Among the Teutonic peoples in ancient times any freeman who married a slave became a slave himself.[66] As late as the thirteenth century a German woman who had intercourse with a serf lost her liberty;[67] and both in Germany and Scandinavia, when the nobility emerged as a distinct order from the class of freemen, marriages between persons of noble birth and persons who, although free, were not noble came to be considered misalliances.[68] Even in modern Europe there survive traces of the former class endogamy. According to German Civil Law, the marriage of a man belonging to the high nobility with a woman of inferior birth is still regarded as a _disparagium_, and the woman is not entitled to the rank of her husband, nor is the full right of inheritance possessed by her or her children.[69] Although in no way prevented by law, marriages out of {380} the class are generally avoided by custom. As Sir Henry Maine observes, "the outer or endogamous limit, within which a man or woman must marry, has been mostly taken under the shelter of fashion or prejudice. It is but faintly traced in England, though not wholly obscured. It is (or perhaps was) rather more distinctly marked in the United States, through prejudices against the blending of white and coloured blood. But in Germany certain hereditary dignities are still forfeited by a marriage beyond the forbidden limits; and in France, in spite of all formal institutions, marriages between a person belonging to the noblesse and a person belonging to the _bourgeoisie_ (distinguished roughly from one another by the particle 'de') are wonderfully rare, though they are not unknown."[70]

[Footnote 60: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 368 _sqq._]

[Footnote 61: von Martius, _Beiträge zur Ethnographie Amerika's_, i. 71. von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 74.]

[Footnote 62: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 256. Cook, _Voyage to the Pacific Ocean_, ii. 171 _sq._]

[Footnote 63: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 371.]

[Footnote 64: Monier-Williams, _Hinduism_, p. 155.]

[Footnote 65: Mommsen, _History of Rome_, i. 371. Rossbach, _op. cit._ pp. 249, 456 _sq._]

[Footnote 66: Winroth, _Äktenskapshindren_, p. 227.]

[Footnote 67: _Ibid._ p. 230 _sq._ Weinhold, _Deutsche Frauen in dem Mittelalter_, i. 349, 353 _sq._]

[Footnote 68: Weinhold, _op. cit._ i. 349 _sq._]

[Footnote 69: Behrend, in von Holtzendorff, _Encyclopädie der Rechtswissenschaft_, i. 478.]

[Footnote 70: Maine, _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_, p. 224 _sq._]

Religion, also, has formed a great bar to intermarriage. Among Muhammedans a marriage between a Christian man and a Muhammedan woman is not permitted under any circumstances, whereas it is held lawful for a Muhammedan to marry a Christian or a Jewish, but not a heathen, woman, if induced to do so by excessive love of her, or if he cannot obtain a wife of his own religion.[71] The Jewish law does not recognise marriage with a person of another belief;[72] and during the Middle Ages marriage between Jews and Christians was prohibited by the Christians also.[73] St. Paul indicates that a Christian was not allowed to marry a heathen.[74] Tertullian calls such an alliance fornication;[75] and in the fourth century the Council of Elvira forbade Christian parents to give their daughters in marriage to heathens.[76] Even the adherents of different Christian confessions have been prohibited from intermarrying. In {381} the Roman Catholic Church the prohibition of marriage with heathens and Jews was soon followed by the prohibition of "mixed marriages," and Protestants likewise forbade such unions.[77] Mixed marriages are not now contrary to the civil law either among Roman Catholic or Protestant nations, but in countries belonging to the Orthodox Greek Church ecclesiastical restrictions have been adopted, and are still recognised, by the State.[78]

[Footnote 71: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, i. 123. d'Escayrac de Lauture, _Die afrikanische Wüste_, p. 68.]

[Footnote 72: Frankel, _Grundlinien des mosaisch-talmudischen Eherechts_, p. xx. Ritter, _Philo und die Halacha_, p. 71.]

[Footnote 73: Andree, _Zur Volkskunde der Juden_, p. 48. Neubauer, 'Notes on the Race-Types of the Jews,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 19.]

[Footnote 74: _1 Corinthians_, vii. 39.]

[Footnote 75: Tertullian, _Ad uxorem_, ii. 3 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, i. 1292 _sq._).]

[Footnote 76: _Concilium Eliberitanum_, cap. 15 _sq._ (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, ii. 8). See also Müller, _Das sexuelle Leben der christlichen Kulturvölker_, p. 54.]

[Footnote 77: Winroth, _op. cit._ p. 213 _sqq._]

[Footnote 78: _Ibid._ p. 220 _sq._]

The endogamous rules are in the first place due to the proud antipathy people feel to races, nations, classes, or religions different from their own. He who breaks such a rule is regarded as an offender against the circle to which he belongs. He hurts its feelings, he disgraces it at the same time as he disgraces himself. Irregular connections outside the endogamous circle are often looked upon with less intolerance than marriage, which places the parties on a more equal footing. A traveller relates that at Djidda, where sexual morality is held in little respect, a Bedouin woman may yield herself for money to a Turk or European, but would think herself for ever dishonoured if she were joined to him in lawful wedlock.[79] In Rome _contubernium_, but not marriage, could take place between freemen and slaves.[80] And among ourselves public opinion regards it as a much more lenient offence if a royal person keeps a woman of inferior rank as his concubine than if he marries her.

[Footnote 79: de Gobineau, _Moral and Intellectual Diversity of Races_, p. 174, n. 1. _Cf._ d'Escayrac de Lauture, _op. cit._ p. 155.]

[Footnote 80: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 372.]

Modern civilisation tends more or less to pull down the barriers which separate races, nations, the various classes of society, and the adherents of different religions. The endogamous rules have thus become less stringent and less restricted. Whilst civilisation has narrowed the inner limit within which a man or woman must not marry, it has widened the outer limit within which a man or woman may marry, and generally marries. The latter of these processes has been one of vast importance in man's history. {382} Originating in race- or class-pride, or in religious intolerance, the endogamous rules have in their turn helped to keep up and to strengthen these feelings. Frequent intermarriages, on the other hand, must have the very opposite effect.

Like the rules referring to the choice of partners, so the modes of contracting marriage and the ideas as to what in this respect is right and proper have undergone successive changes. The practice of capturing wives prevails in certain parts of the world, and traces of it are met with in the marriage ceremonies of several peoples, indicating that it occurred more frequently in past ages.[81] This practice, as it seems to me, has chiefly sprung from the aversion to close intermarriage, together with the difficulty a savage man may have in procuring a wife in a friendly manner, without giving compensation for the loss he inflicts on her family. We may imagine that it chiefly occurred at a stage of social growth where family ties had become stronger, and man lived in small groups of nearly related persons, but where the idea of barter had scarcely presented itself to his mind. Yet there is no reason to think that capture was at any period the exclusive form of contracting marriage; its prevalence seems to have been much exaggerated by McLennan and his school.[82] It is impossible to believe that there ever was a time when friendly negotiations between families who could intermarry were altogether unknown. The custom prevalent among many savage tribes of a husband taking up his abode in his wife's family seems to have arisen very early in man's history.

[Footnote 81: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. xvii.]

[Footnote 82: Dr. Grosse (_Die Formen der Familie_, p. 105) goes so far as to believe that marriage by capture has never been a form of marriage recognised by custom or law, but only an occasional and punishable act of violence. But, as Dr. Havelock Ellis justly observes (_Studies in the Psychology of Sex_, 'Analysis of the Sexual Impulse,' p. 62, n. 2), this position is too extreme.]

Among most uncivilised peoples now existing a man has, in some way or other, to give compensation for his bride.[83] The simplest way of purchasing a wife is to give a kinswoman in exchange for her--a practice prevalent among {383} Australian tribes. Much more common is the custom of obtaining a wife by services rendered to her father, the man taking up his abode with the family of the girl for a certain time, during which he works as a servant. But the ordinary compensation for a girl is property paid to her father, or in some cases to her uncle, or to some other relatives as well as to the father. Marriage by exchange or purchase is not only general among existing lower races; it occurs, or formerly occurred, among semi-civilised nations of a higher culture as well--in Central America and Peru, in China and Japan, in the various branches of the Semitic race, in the past history of all so-called Aryan peoples. We have no evidence that it is a stage through which every race has passed; we notice its absence among some of the rudest races with whom we are acquainted. Yet with much more reason than marriage by capture, purchase of wives may be said to form a general stage in the social history of mankind. Although the two practices may occur simultaneously, the former seems more often to have succeeded the latter, as barter in general has followed upon robbery. It has been suggested that the transition from marriage by capture to marriage by purchase was brought about in the following way: abduction, in spite of parents, was the primary form; then there came the offering of compensation to escape vengeance; and this grew eventually into the making of presents or paying a sum beforehand.[84] The price was a compensation for the loss sustained in the giving up of the girl and a remuneration for the expenses incurred in her maintenance till the time of her marriage. The girl was regarded more or less in the light of property, to take her away from her owner without his consent was theft. To claim a compensation for her was his right, or even his duty. The Indians in Columbia consider it in the highest degree disgraceful to the girl's family if she is given away without a price;[85] and in certain tribes of California {384}"the children of a woman for whom no money was paid are accounted no better than bastards, and the whole family are condemned."[86]

[Footnote 83: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 390 _sqq._]

[Footnote 84: Koenigswarter, _Études historiques sur le developpement de la société humaine_, p. 53. Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 625.]

[Footnote 85: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, i. 277. _Cf._ von Weber, _Vier Jahre in Afrika_, ii. 215 _sq._ (Kafirs).]

[Footnote 86: Powers, _Tribes of California_, pp. 22, 56.]

With progressing civilisation, however, the practice of purchasing wives has been gradually abandoned, and come to be looked upon as infamous. The wealthier classes took the first step, and poorer and ruder persons subsequently followed their examples. Thus in India, in ancient times, the Âsura form, or marriage by purchase, was lawful for all the four castes. Afterwards it fell into disrepute, and was prohibited among the Brâhmanas and Kshatriyas, whereas it was still approved of in the case of a Vaisya and a Sûdra. But in the 'Laws of Manu' it is forbidden altogether.[87] It is said there, "No father who knows the law must take even the smallest gratuity for his daughter; for a man who, through avarice, takes a gratuity, is a seller of his offspring."[88] The Greeks of the historical age had ceased to buy their wives. In Rome _confarreatio_, which suggested no idea of purchase, was in the very earliest known time the form of marriage in force among the patricians; and among clients and plebeians, also, the purchase of wives came to an end in remote antiquity, surviving as a mere symbol in their _coëmptio_.[89] Among the Germans marriage by purchase was abolished only after their conversion to Christianity.[90] In the Talmudic law the purchase of wives appears as merely symbolical, the bride-price being fixed at a nominal amount.[91] In China, although marriage presents correspond exactly to purchase-money in a contract of sale, the people will not hear of their being called a "price";[92] which shows that here, too, some feeling of shame is attached to the idea of selling a daughter.

[Footnote 87: _Laws of Manu_, iii. 23 _sqq._]

[Footnote 88: _Ibid._ iii. 51. _Cf._ _ibid._ ix. 93, 98.]

[Footnote 89: Rossbach, _op. cit._ pp. 92, 146, 248, 250, &c.]

[Footnote 90: Grimm, _Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer_, p. 424.]

[Footnote 91: Gans, _Erbrecht_, i. 138.]

[Footnote 92: Jamieson, 'Marriage Laws,' in _China Review_, x. 78 n.*]

We may discern two different ways in which this {385} gradual disappearance of marriage by purchase has taken place. On the one hand, the purchase became a symbol, appearing as a sham sale in the marriage ceremonies or as an exchange of presents; on the other hand, the purchase sum was transformed into the morning gift and the dotal portion, a part--afterwards the whole--being given to the bride either directly by the bridegroom or by her father. These transformations of marriage by purchase have taken place not only in the history of the civilised nations, but among several peoples who are still in a savage or semi-civilised state; and of a few of them it is expressly stated that they consider marriage by purchase a disgraceful practice.[93]

[Footnote 93: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 405 _sqq._]

From marriage by purchase we have thus come to the practice of dower, which is apparently the very reverse of it. But whilst the marriage portion partly derives its origin from the purchase of wives, it does not do so in every case. It serves different ends, often indissolubly mixed up together. It may have the meaning of a return gift. It may imply that the wife as well as the husband is expected to contribute to the expenses of the joint household. It is also very often intended to be a settlement for the wife in case the marriage be dissolved through the husband's death or otherwise.[94] In the social history of the civilised races the marriage portion has played so prominent a part, that, as we have spoken of a stage of marriage by purchase, we may speak of another and later stage where fathers are bound by custom or law to portion their daughters. The Jews[95] and Muhammedans[96] consider it a religious duty for a man to give a dower to his daughter. In Greece the dowry came to be thought almost necessary to make the distinction between a wife and a concubine.[97] Isaeus says that no decent man would give his legitimate daughter less than a tenth of his {386} property;[98] indeed, so great were the dowers given that in the time of Aristotle nearly two fifths of the whole territory of Sparta were supposed to belong to women.[99] In Rome, even more than in Greece, the marriage portion became a mark of distinction for a legitimate wife;[100] and though later on Justinian in several of his constitutions declares that _dos_ is obligatory for persons of high rank only,[101] the old custom did not fall into desuetude.[102] The Prussian 'Landrecht' still prescribes that the father, or eventually the mother, shall arrange about the wedding and fit up the house of the newly-married couple.[103] According to the 'Code Napoléon,' on the other hand, parents are not bound to give a dower to their daughters,[104] and the same principle is generally adopted by modern legislation. It is true that especially in the so-called Latin countries there is still a strong tendency to dotation,[105] but another feeling, in some measure opposed to it, is gaining ground everywhere. In a society where monogamy is prescribed by law, where the adult women outnumber the adult men, where many men never marry, and where married women too often lead an indolent life--in such a society the marriage portion in many cases becomes a purchase-sum by means of which a father buys a husband for his daughter, as formerly a man bought a wife from her father. But, as Mr. Sutherland observes, "that pecuniary interests, either on one side or on the other, should conspicuously enter into the motives which lead to marriage, becomes repulsive to the increasing delicacy of feeling; and so we find that in cultured communities the dowry dies out, just as the purchase-money declined in the civilised stages."[106]

[Footnote 94: _Ibid._ p. 411 _sqq._]

[Footnote 95: Mayer, _Rechte der Israeliten_, ii. 344.]

[Footnote 96: _Koran_, iv. 3.]

[Footnote 97: Cauvet, 'L'organisation de la famille à Athènes,' in _Revue de législation et de jurisprudence_, xxiv. 152. Potter, _Archæologia Græca_, ii. 268. _Cf._ Meier and Schömann, _Der attische Process_, p. 513 _sq._]

[Footnote 98: Isaeus, _Oratio de Pyrrhi hereditate_, 51, p. 43.]

[Footnote 99: Aristotle, _Politica_, ii. 9, p. 1270 a.]

[Footnote 100: Laboulaye, _Recherches sur la condition civile et politique des femmes_, p. 38 _sq._ Ginoulhiac, _Histoire du régime dotal_, p. 66. Meier and Schömann, _op. cit._ p. 513 _sq._]

[Footnote 101: Ginoulhiac, _op. cit._ p. 103.]

[Footnote 102: For _dos necessaria_ in Germany during the Middle Ages, see Mittermaier, _Grundsätze des gemeinen deutschen Privatrechts_, ii. 3.]

[Footnote 103: Eccius, in von Holtzendorff, _Encyclopädie der Rechtswissenschaft_, ii. 414.]

[Footnote 104: _Code Napoléon_, art. 204.]

[Footnote 105: See Maine, _Early History of Institutions_, p. 339.]

[Footnote 106: Sutherland, _Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct_, i. 243.]

{387} Whilst most of the lower animal species are by instinct either monogamous or polygynous, with man every possible form of marriage occurs. There are marriages of one man with one woman (monogamy), of one man with many women (polygyny), of many men with one woman (polyandry), and, in a few exceptional cases, of many men with many women.[107]

[Footnote 107: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. xx.]

Among the causes by which the forms of marriage are influenced the numerical proportion between the sexes plays an important part. Polyandry seems to be due chiefly to a surplus of men, though it prevails only where the circumstances are otherwise in favour of it.[108] It presupposes an abnormally feeble disposition to jealousy, and has probably at all times been exceptional in the human race. There is no solid evidence for the theory set forth by McLennan that it was the rule in early times.[109] On the contrary, this form of marriage seems to require a certain degree of civilisation; we have no trustworthy account of its occurrence among the lowest savages. In polyandrous families the husbands are most frequently brothers, and the eldest brother, at least in many cases, has the superiority. It seems a fair conclusion that in such instances polyandry was originally an expression of fraternal benevolence on the part of the eldest brother, or of urgent demands on the part of the younger ones, who otherwise, on account of the scarcity of women, would have to live unmarried. If additional wives were afterwards acquired, they would naturally be considered the common property of all the brothers; and in this way the group marriage of the Toda type seems to have evolved.[110] Polygyny, also, is to some extent dependent upon the proportion between the sexes. It has been observed in India that polyandry occurs in those parts of the country where the males outnumber the females, polygyny in those {388} where the reverse is the case.[111] Indeed, in countries unaffected by European civilisation polygyny is likely to prevail wherever there is a majority of women. But the proportion between the sexes is only one cause out of many to which polygyny is due.

[Footnote 108: _Ibid._ p. 482.]

[Footnote 109: McLennan, 'The Levirate and Polyandry,' in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xxi. 703 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Studies in Ancient History_, p. 112 _sq._]

[Footnote 110: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 510 _sqq._ See also Rivers, _Todas_, pp. 515, 519, 521.]

[Footnote 111: Goehlert, 'Die Geschlechtsverschiedenheit der Kinder in den Ehen,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnologie_, xiii. 127.]

There are several reasons why a man may desire to possess more than one wife.[112] Monogamy requires from him periodical continence, not only for a certain time every month, but among many peoples during the pregnancy of his wife, and as long as she suckles her child. One of the chief causes of polygyny is the attraction which female youth and beauty exercise upon a man; and at the lower stages of civilisation women generally become old much sooner than in more advanced communities. The liking of men for variety is also a potent factor; the Negroes of Angola asserted that they "were not able to eat always of the same dish."[113] We must further take into account men's desire for offspring, wealth, and authority. The barrenness of a wife is a very common reason for the choice of a new partner; the polygyny of the ancient Hindus seems to have been due chiefly to the fact that men dreaded the idea of dying childless, and even now in the East the desire for offspring is one of the principal causes of polygyny.[114] The more wives, the more children; and the more children, the greater power. In early civilisation a man's relations and connections are often his only friends; and where slavery does not prevail, next to a man's wives the real servant, the only to be counted upon, is the child. Moreover, a man's fortune is increased by a multitude of wives not only through their children, but through their work. Manual labour among savages is undertaken largely by women; and when neither slaves nor persons who will work for hire can be procured, {389} it becomes necessary for any man who requires many servants to have many wives.

[Footnote 112: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 483 _sqq._]

[Footnote 113: Merolla da Sorrento, 'Voyage to Congo,' in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages_, xvi. 299.]

[Footnote 114: Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iii. 267. Le Bon, _La civilisation des Arabes_, p. 424. Gray, _China_, i. 184.]

Nevertheless, however desirable polygyny may be from the man's point of view, it is altogether prohibited among many peoples, and in countries where it is an established institution it is practised--as a rule to which there are few exceptions--only by a comparatively small class.[115] The proportion between the sexes partly accounts for this, but there are other causes of no less importance.[116] Where the amount of female labour is limited and no accumulated property exists, it may be very difficult for a man to keep a plurality of wives. Again, where female labour is of considerable value, the necessity of paying the purchase-sum for a wife is a hindrance to polygyny which can be overcome only by the wealthier men. There are, moreover, certain factors of a psychical character which are unfavourable to polygyny. When love depends on external attractions only, it is necessarily fickle; but when it implies sympathy arising from mental qualities, there is a tie between husband and wife which lasts long after youth and beauty are gone. As another obstacle to polygyny we have to note the true monogamous sentiment, the absorbing passion for one, which is not unknown even among savage races. Polygyny is finally checked by the respect in which women are held by men. Jealousy is not exclusively a masculine passion, and it is the ambition of every wife to be the mistress of her husband's house. Hence where women have succeeded in obtaining some power over their husbands, or where the altruistic feelings of men have become refined enough to lead them to respect the feelings of those weaker than themselves, monogamy is frequently the result.

[Footnote 115: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 435 _sqq._]

[Footnote 116: _Ibid._ p. 493 _sqq._]

It is certain that polygyny has been less prevalent at the lowest stages of civilisation--where wars do not seriously disturb the proportion of the sexes, where life is chiefly supported by hunting and female labour is consequently of slight value, and where there is no accumulation of wealth {390} and no distinction of class--than it is at somewhat higher stages.[117] The more advanced savages and barbarians seem to indulge in this practice to a greater extent than the lower ones, many, or most, of whom are either little addicted to polygyny or strictly monogamous. Various forest tribes in Brazil are monogamous,[118] and so are several of the Californian tribes--"a humble and a lowly race, . . . one of the lowest on earth."[119] Thus the Karok do not allow bigamy even to a chief; and though a man may own as many women for slaves as he can purchase, he brings obloquy on himself if he cohabits with more than one.[120] Among the Veddahs[121] and Andaman Islanders[122] monogamy is as rigidly insisted upon as any where in Europe. The natives of Kar Nicobar "have but one wife, and look upon unchastity as a very deadly sin."[123] Among the Koch and Old Kukis polygyny and concubinage are forbidden;[124] whilst among some other aboriginal tribes in India a man, though not expressly forbidden to have many wives, is blamed if he has more than one.[125] Among the Karens of Burma[126] and certain tribes of Indo-China, the Malay Peninsula, and the Indian Archipelago, polygyny is said either to be prohibited or unknown.[127] The Hill Dyaks marry but one wife, and a chief who once broke through this custom lost all his influence.[128] In Australia there are said to be some truly monogamous tribes;[129] in the Birria tribe, for instance, "the possession of more than one wife is absolutely forbidden, or was so before the coming of the whites."[130] {391} Monogamy is all the more likely to have been the general rule among our earliest human ancestors as it seems to be so among the man-like apes. Darwin certainly mentions the gorilla as a polygamist;[131] but the majority of statements we have regarding this animal are to the opposite effect. Relying on the most trustworthy authorities, Professor Hartmann says, "The gorilla lives in a society consisting of male and female and their young of varying ages."[132]

[Footnote 117: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 505 _sqq._]

[Footnote 118: von Martius, _op. cit._ i. 274, 298. Wallace, _Travels on the Amazon_, pp. 509, 515 _sqq._ Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iii. 472.]

[Footnote 119: Powers, _op. cit._ pp. 5, 56, 406. Wilkes, _U. S. Exploring Expedition_, v. 188.]

[Footnote 120: Powers, _op. cit._ p. 22.]

[Footnote 121: Bailey, in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. ii. 291 _sq._ Hartshorne, in _Indian Antiquary_, viii. 320.]

[Footnote 122: Man, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 135.]

[Footnote 123: Distant, _ibid._ iii. 4.]

[Footnote 124: Dalton, _op. cit._ p. 91. Stewart, 'Notes on Northern Cachar,' in _Jour. As. Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 621.]

[Footnote 125: Dalton, _op. cit._ pp. 28, 54. Jellinghaus, 'Munda-Kolhs in Chota Nagpore,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ iii. 370.]

[Footnote 126: Smeaton, _Loyal Karens of Burma_, p. 81.]

[Footnote 127: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 436 _sq._]

[Footnote 128: Low, _Sarawak_, p. 300.]

[Footnote 129: Curr, _Australian Race_, i. 402; ii. 371.]

[Footnote 130: _Ibid._ ii. 378.]

[Footnote 131: Darwin, _Descent of Man_, pp. 217, 590 _sq._]

[Footnote 132: Hartmann, _Die menschenähnlichen Affen_, p. 214.]

Whilst civilisation is thus up to a certain point favourable to polygyny, it leads in its higher forms to monogamy. Owing to the decrease of wars, the death-rate of the men becomes less, and the considerable disproportion between the sexes which among many warlike peoples makes polygyny almost a law of nature no longer exists among the most advanced nations. No superstitious belief keeps the civilised man apart from his wife during her pregnancy and while she suckles her child; and the suckling time has become much shorter since the introduction of domesticated animals and the use of milk. To a cultivated mind youth and beauty are by no means the only attractions of a woman; and civilisation has made female beauty more durable. The desire for offspring becomes less intense. A large family, instead of being a help in the struggle for existence, is often considered an insufferable burden. A man's kinsfolk are no longer his only friends, and his wealth and power do not depend upon the number of his wives and children. A wife ceases to be a mere labourer, and manual labour is to a large extent replaced by the work of domesticated animals and the use of implements and machines. Moreover, the sentiment of love becomes more refined, the passion for one more absorbing. The feelings of the weaker sex are frequently held in higher regard. And the better education bestowed on women enables them to live comfortably without the support of a husband.

{392} As for the moral valuation of the various forms of marriage, it should be noticed that even among polygynous and polyandrous peoples monogamy is permitted by custom or law, although in some instances it is associated with poverty and considered mean, whereas polygyny, as associated with greatness, is thought praiseworthy.[133] Again, the notion that monogamy is the only proper form of marriage, and that any other form is immoral, is due either to the mere force of habit; or, possibly, to the notion that it is wrong of some men to appropriate a plurality of wives when others in consequence can get none; or to the feeling that polygyny is an offence against the female sex; or to the condemnation of lust. As regards the obligatory monogamy of Christian nations, we have to remember that monogamy was the only recognised form of marriage in the societies on which Christianity was first engrafted, and that it was the only form that could be tolerated by a religion which regarded every gratification of the sexual impulse with suspicion and incontinence as the gravest sin. In its early days the Church showed little respect for women but its horror of sensuality was immense.

[Footnote 133: Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 657.]

A few words still remain to be said of a form of marriage which has of late been the subject of much discussion in connection with Australian ethnology. Many years ago attention was drawn to the fact that the Kamilaroi tribes in South Australia are divided into four classes, in which brothers and sisters are respectively Ipai and Ip[=a]tha, K[)u]bi and Kub[)i]tha, M[)u]ri and M[=a]tha, Kumbu and B[=u]tha; and that the members of one class are forbidden to marry among themselves, but bound to marry into a certain other class. Thus Ipai may only marry Kub[)i]tha; K[)u]bi, Ip[=a]tha; Kumbu, M[=a]tha; and M[)u]ri, B[=u]tha. In a certain sense, we were told, every Ipai is regarded as married, not by any individual contract, but by organic law, to every Kub[)i]tha; every K[)u]bi to every Ip[=a]tha, and so forth. If, for instance, a K[)u]bi meet a stranger Ip[=a]tha, they address {393} each other as "spouse"; and "a K[)u]bi thus meeting an Ip[=a]tha, though she were of another tribe, would treat her as his wife, and his right to do so would be recognised by her tribe."[134] The institution according to which the men of one division have as wives the women of another division, the Rev. L. Fison called "group marriage." He contends that among the natives of South Australia it has given way in later times, in some measure, to individual marriage. But theoretically, he says, marriage is still communal: "it is based upon the marriage of all the males in one division of a tribe to all the females of the same generation in another division." The chief argument advanced by Mr. Fison in support of his theory is grounded on the terms of relationship in use in the tribes. These terms belong to the "classificatory system" of Mr. Morgan;[135] but he admits that he is not aware of any tribe in which the actual practice is to its full extent what the terms of relationship imply. "Present usage," he says, "is everywhere in advance of the system so implied, and the terms are survivals of an ancient right, not precise indications of custom as it is."[136] The same is granted by Mr. Howitt.[137] Yet I have pointed out, in my criticism of the classificatory system, to what absurd results we must be led if, guided by such terms, we begin to speculate upon early marriage.[138] Moreover, as I have said, "if a K[)u]bi and an Ip[=a]tha address each other as spouse, this does not imply that in former times every K[)u]bi was married to every Ip[=a]tha indiscriminately. On the contrary, the application of such a familiar term might be explained from the fact that the women who may be a man's wives, and those who cannot possibly be so, stand in a widely different relation to him."[139] This suggestion derives support from the following statement made by Dr. Codrington with reference to the Melanesians:--"Speaking {394} generally, it may be said that to a Melanesian man all women, of his own generation at least, are either sisters or wives, to the Melanesian woman all men are either brothers or husbands. . .

. It must not be understood that a Melanesian regards all women who are not of his own division as, in fact, his wives, or conceives himself to have rights which he may exercise in regard to those women of them who are unmarried; but the women who may be his wives by marriage and those who cannot possibly be so, stand in a widely different relation to him."[140]

[Footnote 134: Ridley, _Kámilarói_, p. 161 _sq._ (edit. 1866, p. 35 _sqq._). Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, pp. 36, 51, 53.]

[Footnote 135: Fison and Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 60.]

[Footnote 136: _Ibid._ p. 159 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: Howitt, 'Australian Group Relations,' in _Smithsonian Report_, 1883, p. 817.]

[Footnote 138: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. v.]

[Footnote 139: _Ibid._ p. 56.]

[Footnote 140: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 22 _sq._]

More recently Messrs. Spencer and Gillen have shown that a marriage system essentially similar to that of the South Australian natives prevails in Central Australia; and they, also, regard it as a later modification of genuine group marriage. Nowadays, they say, the system of individual wives prevails--"modified, however, by the practice of customs according to which, at certain times, much wider marital relations are allowed." But to this rule there is one exception:--"In the Urabunna tribe group marriage actually exists at the present day, a group of men of a certain designation having, not merely nominally but in actual reality, and under normal conditions, marital relations with a group of women of another special designation"; here "individual marriage does not exist either in name or in practice."[141] But, after all, it appears that even among the Urabunna every woman is the special _Nupa_ of one man, and that certain other men, her _Piraungaru_ only have a secondary right to her. Thus, if the Nupa man (the real, or at all events the chief, husband) be present, the Piraungaru (accessory husbands) are allowed to have intercourse with her only in case the Nupa man consents.[142] Is this modification of the Urabunna group marriage a later development from a previous system according to which all the men of a certain group had an equal right to all the {395} women of another group? Here we are on dangerous ground; nothing is more difficult than to decide whether certain customs are survivals or not. We find modifications resembling those connected with the group marriage of the Urabunna both in polyandry and in polygyny; the first husband in a polyandrous family is usually the chief husband, and the first wife in a polygynous family is very frequently the chief wife. We must certainly not conclude that these restrictions have been preceded by an earlier custom which gave equal rights to all the husbands or all the wives; on the contrary, it is more likely that the higher position granted to the first husband or to the first wife is due to the fact that monogamy was the usual form of marriage.[143] Similarly the Urabunna custom may very well have developed out of ordinary individual marriage,[144] and the cause of it may perhaps be, as Mr. N. W. Thomas has suggested,[145] the difficulties which an Australian native often experiences in getting a wife.[146] As for other facts which have been adduced as evidence of Australian group marriage in the past, such as the _jus primæ noctis_, &c., I only desire to emphasise the circumstance that extra-matrimonial intercourse is practised by the Australian natives in a variety of cases the real meaning of which seems obscure. In some instances at least, a magic significance appears to be attributed to it;[147] and that it is a survival of group marriage, in the strict sense of the term, is again only a conjecture.

[Footnote 141: Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 140. _Iidem_, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 62 _sq._]

[Footnote 142: _Iidem_, _Native Tribes_, p. 110.]

[Footnote 143: Westermarck, _op. cit._ pp. 443-448, 457, 458, 508.]

[Footnote 144: _Cf._ Crawley, _op. cit._ p. 482; Lang, _Social Origins_, p. 105 _sq._]

[Footnote 145: Thomas, in a paper read before the Anthropological Institute in 1905. _Cf._ _Idem_, _Kinship and Marriage in Australia_, p. 138.]

[Footnote 146: See Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 132 _sq._; _infra_, p. 460.]

[Footnote 147: See, _e.g._, Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes_, p. 137 _sq._]

I must admit, therefore, that the facts produced by Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, and the severe criticism which they have passed on my sceptical attitude towards Mr. Fison's group marriage theory have not been able to convince me that among the Australian aborigines individual marriage has evolved out of a previous system of marriage between groups of men and women. Nor has Mr. Howitt, {396} in his recent work on the 'Native Tribes of South-East Australia,' in my opinion, sufficiently proved that such an evolution has taken place.[148] He blames certain "ethnologists of the study" for not being willing "to take the opinion of men who have first-hand knowledge of the natives";[149] but I think we do well in distinguishing between statements based on direct observation and the observer's interpretation of the stated facts. Even suppose, however, that group marriage really was once common in Australia, would that prove that it was once common among mankind at large? Mr. Hewitt's supposition that the practice of group marriage "will be ultimately accepted as one of the primitive conditions of mankind"[150] is no doubt shared by a host of anthropologists. The group marriage theory will probably for some time to come remain the residuary legatee of the old theory of promiscuity; the important works which have lately been published on the Australian aborigines have made people inclined to view the early history of mankind through Australian spectacles. But even the most ardent advocate of Australian group marriage should remember that the existence of kangurus in Australia does not prove that there were once kangurus in England.

[Footnote 148: Mr. Thomas has come to the same result in his book on 'Kinship and Marriage in Australia,' which appeared when the present chapter was already in type. A detailed examination of the facts which have been adduced as evidence of Australian group marriage (p. 127 _sqq._) has led him to the conclusion (p. 147) that prevailing customs in Australia, far from proving the present or former existence of group marriage in that continent, do not even render it probable, and that on the terms of relationship no argument of any sort can be founded which assumes them to refer to consanguinity, kinship, or affinity. "It is therefore not rash to say that the case for group marriage, so far as Australia is concerned, falls to the ground." See _infra_, Addit. Notes.]

[Footnote 149: Howitt, 'Native Tribes of South-East Australia,' in _Folk-Lore_, xvii. 185.]

[Footnote 150: _Idem_, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 281.]

* * * * *

The time during which marriage lasts varies extremely in the human race.[151] There are unions which, though legally recognised as marriages, do not endure long enough to deserve to be so called in the natural history sense of the term; there are others which are dissolved only by {397} death. As has already been pointed out, it is probable that among primitive men the union of the sexes lasted till after the birth of the offspring, and we have perhaps some reason to believe that the connection lasted for years. On the whole, progress in civilisation has tended to make marriage more durable. It is evident that at the early stage of development at which women first became valuable as labourers, a wife was united with her husband by a new bond more lasting than youth and beauty. The tie was strengthened by the bride-price and the marriage portion. And a higher development of the paternal feeling, better forethought for the children's welfare, in some instances greater consideration for women, and a more refined love passion have gradually made it stronger, until it has become in many cases indissoluble. Yet we must not conclude that divorce will in the future be less frequent and more restricted by law than it is now in European countries. It should be remembered that the laws of divorce in Christian Europe owe their origin to an idealistic religious commandment which, interpreted in its literal sense, gave rise to legal prescriptions far from harmonising with the mental and social life of the mass of the people. The powerful authority of the Roman Church was necessary to enforce the dogma that marriage is indissoluble. The Reformation introduced somewhat greater liberty in this respect, and modern legislation has gone further in the same direction. In those Christian states of Europe where absolute divorce is permitted the grounds on which it may be sued for are nearly the same for the man and the woman, except in England, where the husband must be accused of one or other of several offences besides adultery. In Italy, Spain, and Portugal, a judicial separation may always be decreed on the ground of the adultery of the wife, but, on the ground of the adultery of the husband, only if it has been committed under certain aggravating circumstances.[152] These laws imply that marriage is not yet a contract on the footing of perfect equality between the sexes; but there is {398} a growing opinion that, where it is not, it ought to be so. Again, when both husband and wife desire to separate, it seems to many enlightened minds that the State has no right to prevent them from dissolving the marriage contract, provided the children are properly cared for; and that for the children, also, it is better to have the supervision of one parent only than of two who cannot agree.

[Footnote 151: Westermarck, _op. cit._ ch. xxiii.]

[Footnote 152: Glasson, _Le mariage civil et le divorce_, pp. 291, 298, 304.]

CHAPTER XLI

CELIBACY

AMONG savage and barbarous races of men nearly every individual endeavours to marry as soon as he, or she, reaches the age of puberty.[1] Marriage seems to them indispensable, and a person who abstains from it is looked upon as an unnatural being and is disdained. Among the Santals a man who remains single "is at once despised by both sexes, and is classed next to a thief, or a witch: they term the unhappy wretch 'No man.'"[2] Among the Kafirs a bachelor has no voice in the kraal.[3] In the Tupi tribes of Brazil no man was suffered to partake in the drinking-feast while he remained single.[4] The natives of Futuna in the Western Pacific maintained that it was necessary to be married in order to hold a part in the happy future life, and that the celibates, both men and women, had to submit to a chastisement of their own before entering the _fale-mate_, or "home of the dead."[5] According to Fijian beliefs, he who died wifeless was stopped by the god Nangganangga on the road to Paradise, and smashed to atoms.[6]

[Footnote 1: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 134 _sqq._]

[Footnote 2: Man, _Sonthalia_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 3: von Weber, _Vier Jahre in Afrika_, ii. 215.]

[Footnote 4: Southey, _History of Brazil_, i. 240.]

[Footnote 5: Percy Smith, 'Futuna.' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 39 _sq._]

[Footnote 6: Pritchard, _Polynesian Reminiscences_, pp. 368, 372. Seemann, _Viti_, p. 399 _sq._ Fison, 'Fijian Burial Customs,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ x. 139. Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 206. For other instances see Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 136, n. 10.]

Among peoples of archaic culture celibacy is likewise a great exception and marriage regarded as a duty. In {400} ancient Peru marriage was compulsory at a certain age.[7] Among the Aztecs no young man lived single till his twenty-second year, unless he intended to become a priest, and for girls the customary marrying-age was from eleven to eighteen. In Tlascala, we are told, the unmarried state was so despised that a grown-up man who would not marry had his hair cut off for shame.[8]

[Footnote 7: Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, i. 306 _sq._]

[Footnote 8: Klemm, _Allgemeine Cultur-Geschichte der Menschheit_, v. 46 _sq._ Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, ii. 251 _sq._]

"Almost all Chinese," says Dr. Gray, "robust or infirm, well-formed or deformed, are called upon by their parents to marry as soon as they have attained the age of puberty. Were a grown-up son or daughter to die unmarried, the parents would regard it as most deplorable." Hence a young man of marriageable age, whom consumption or any other lingering disease had marked for its own, would be compelled by his parents or guardians to marry at once.[9] So indispensable is marriage considered by the Chinese, that even the dead are married, the spirits of all males who die in infancy or in boyhood being in due time married to the spirits of females who have been cut off at a like early age.[10] There is a maxim by Mencius, re-echoed by the whole nation, that it is a heavy sin to have no sons, as this would doom father, mother, and the whole ancestry in the Nether-world to a pitiable existence without descendants enough to serve them properly, to worship at the ancestral tombs, to take care of the ancestral tablets, and duly to perform all rites and ceremonies connected with the departed dead. For a man whose wife has reached her fortieth year without bringing him a son, it is an imperative duty to take a concubine.[11] In Corea "the male human being who is unmarried is never called a man, whatever his age, but goes by the name of 'yatow,' a name given by the Chinese to unmarriageable young girls; and the man of thirteen or fourteen has a {401} perfect right to strike, abuse, order about the 'yatow' of thirty, who dares not as much as open his lips to complain."[12]

[Footnote 9: Gray, _China_, i. 186.]

[Footnote 10: _Ibid._ i. 216 _sq._]

[Footnote 11: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, i. 64, n. 10. de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 617. _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 58.]

[Footnote 12: Ross, _History of Corea_, p. 313.]

Among the Semites, also, we meet with the idea that a dead man who has no children will miss something in Sh[)e]ol through not receiving that kind of worship which ancestors in early times appear to have received.[13] The Hebrews looked upon marriage as a religious duty.[14] According to the Shulchan Aruch, he who abstains from marrying is guilty of bloodshed, diminishes the image of God, and causes the divine presence to withdraw from Israel; hence a single man past twenty may be compelled by the court to take a wife.[15] Muhammedanism likewise regards marriage as a duty for men and women; to neglect it without a sufficient excuse subjects a man to severe reproach.[16] "When a servant [of God] marries," said the Prophet, "verily he perfects half his religion."[17]

[Footnote 13: Cheyne, 'Harlot,' in Cheyne and Black, _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1964.]

[Footnote 14: Mayer, _Rechte der Israeliten_, pp. 286, 353. Lichtschein, _Ehe nach mosaisch-talmudischer Auffassung_, p. 5 _sqq._ Klugmann, _Die Frau im Talmud_, p. 39 _sq._]

[Footnote 15: _Schulchan Aruch_, iv. ('Eben haezer') i. 1, 3. See also _Yebamoth_, fol. 63 b _sq._, quoted by Margolis, 'Celibacy,' in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, iii. 636.]

[Footnote 16: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, i. 197.]

[Footnote 17: _Idem_, _Arabian Society in the Middle Ages_, p. 221.]

The so-called Aryan nations in ancient times, as M. Fustel de Coulanges and others have pointed out, regarded celibacy as an impiety and a misfortune: "an impiety, because one who did not marry put the happiness of the manes of the family in peril; a misfortune, because he himself would receive no worship after his death." A man's happiness in the next world depended upon his having a continuous line of male descendants, whose duty it would be to make the periodical offerings for the repose of his soul.[18] According to the 'Laws of Manu,' marriage is the twelfth Sansk[=a]ra, and as such a religious duty incumbent upon all.[19] Among the Hindus of the present day a {402} man who is not married is generally considered to be almost a useless member of the community, and is indeed looked upon as beyond the pale of nature;[20] and the spirits of young men who have died without becoming fathers are believed to wander about in a restless miserable manner, like people burdened with an enormous debt which they are quite unable to discharge.[21] Similar views are expressed in Zoroastrianism. Ahura Mazda said to Zoroaster:--"The man who has a wife is far above him who lives in continence; he who keeps a house is far above him who has none; he who has children is far above the childless man."[22] The greatest misfortune which could befall an ancient Persian was to be childless.[23] To him who has no child the bridge of Paradise shall be barred; the first question the angels there will ask him is, whether he has left in this world a substitute for himself, and if the answer be "No" they will pass by and he will stay at the head of the bridge, full of grief. The primitive meaning of this is plain: the man without a son cannot enter Paradise because there is nobody to pay him the family worship.[24] Ashi Vanguhi, a feminine impersonification of piety, and the source of all the good and riches that are connected with piety, rejects the offerings of barren people--old men, courtesans, and children.[25] It is said in the Yasts, "This is the worst deed that men and tyrants do, namely, when they deprive maids that have been barren for a long time of marrying and bringing forth children."[26] And in the eyes of all good Parsis of the present day, as in the time of king Darius and the contemporaries of Herodotus, the two greatest merits of a citizen are the begetting and rearing of a numerous family, and the fruitful tilling of the soil.[27]

[Footnote 18: Fustel de Coulanges, _La cité antique_, p. 54 _sq._ Hearn, _The Aryan Household_, pp. 69, 71. Mayne, _Treatise on Hindu Law and Usage_, p. 68 _sq._]

[Footnote 19: _Laws of Manu_, ii. 66 _sq._ Monier-Williams, _Indian Wisdom_, p. 246. _Cf._ Mayne, _op. cit._ p. 69.]

[Footnote 20: Dubois, _Description of the Character, &c. of the People of India_, p. 132.]

[Footnote 21: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 243 _sq._]

[Footnote 22: _Vendîdâd_, iv. 47.]

[Footnote 23: Rawlinson, in his translation of Herodotus, i. 262, n. 1. _Cf._ Herodotus, i. 133, 136; _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxxv. 19.]

[Footnote 24: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. 47. _Cf._ _Idem_, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 294.]

[Footnote 25: _Yasts_, xvii. 54.]

[Footnote 26: _Ibid._ xvii. 59.]

[Footnote 27: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxii. _Cf._ Ploss-Bartels, _Das Weib_, i. 173.]

{403} The ancient Greeks regarded marriage as a matter both of public and private importance.[28] In various places criminal proceedings might be taken against celibates.[29] Plato remarks that every individual is bound to provide for a continuance of representatives to succeed himself as ministers of the Divinity;[30] and Isaeus says, "All those who think their end approaching look forward with a prudent care that their houses may not become desolate, but that there may be some person to attend to their funeral rites and to perform the legal ceremonies at their tombs."[31] So also the conviction that the founding of a house and the begetting of children constituted a moral necessity and a public duty had a deep hold of the Roman mind in early times.[32] Cicero's treatise 'De Legibus'--which generally reproduces in a philosophical form the ancient laws of Rome--contains a law according to which the Censors had to impose a tax upon unmarried men.[33] But in later periods, when sexual morality reached a very low ebb in Rome, celibacy--as to which grave complaints were made as early as 520 B.C.--naturally increased in proportion, especially among the upper classes. Among these marriage came to be regarded as a burden which people took upon themselves at the best in the public interest. Indeed, how it fared with marriage and the rearing of children is shown by the Gracchan agrarian laws, which first placed a premium thereon;[34] and later the Lex Julia et Papia Poppaea imposed various penalties on those who lived in a state of celibacy after a certain age,[35] though with little or no result.[36]

[Footnote 28: Müller, _History and Antiquities of the Doric Race_, ii. 300 _sq._ Fustel de Coulanges, _op. cit._ p. 55. Hearn, _op. cit._ p. 72. Döllinger, _The Gentile and the Jew_, ii. 234 _sq._]

[Footnote 29: Pollux, _Onomasticum_, iii. 48.]

[Footnote 30: Plato, _Leges_, vi. 773.]

[Footnote 31: Isaeus, _Oratio de Apollodori hereditate_, 30, p. 66. Rohde observes (_Psyche_, p. 228), however, that such a belief did not exist in the Homeric age, when the departed souls in Hades were supposed to be in no way dependent upon the survivors.]

[Footnote 32: Mommsen, _History of Rome_, i. 74.]

[Footnote 33: Cicero, _De legibus_, iii. 3. Fustel de Coulanges, _op. cit._ p. 55.]

[Footnote 34: Mommsen, _op. cit._ iii. 121; iv. 186 _sq._]

[Footnote 35: Rossbach, _Römische Ehe_, p. 418.]

[Footnote 36: Mackenzie, _Studies in Roman Law_, p. 104.]

Celibacy is thus disapproved of for various reasons. It {404} appears unnatural. It is taken as an indication of licentious habits. Where ancestors are worshipped after their death it inspires religious horror: the man who leaves himself without offspring shows reckless indifference to the religion of his people, to his own fate after death, and to the duties he owes the dead, whose spirits depend upon the offerings of their descendants for their comfort. The last point of view, as we have seen, is particularly prominent among peoples of archaic culture, but it is not unknown at a lower stage of civilisation. Thus the Eskimo about Behring Strait "appear to have great dread of dying without being assured that their shades will be remembered during the festivals, fearing if neglected that they would thereby suffer destitution in the future life"; hence a pair of childless Eskimo frequently adopt a child, so that when they die there will be some one left whose duty it will be to make the customary feast and offerings to their shades at the festival of the dead.[37] Finally, in communities with a keen public spirit, especially in ambitious states frequently engaged in war, celibacy is regarded as a wrong committed against the State.

[Footnote 37: Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 290.]

Modern civilisation looks upon celibacy in a different light. The religious motive for marriage has ceased to exist, the lot of the dead being no longer supposed to depend upon the devotion of the living. It is said, in a general way, that marriage is a duty to the nation or the race, but this argument is hardly applied to individual cases. According to modern ideas the union between man and woman is too much a matter of sentiment to be properly classified among civic duties. Nor does the unmarried state strike us as particularly unnatural. The proportion of unmarried people is gradually growing larger and the age at which people marry is rising.[38] The chief causes of this increasing celibacy are the difficulty of supporting a family under present conditions of life, and the luxurious {405} habits of living in the upper classes of society. Another reason is that the domestic circle does not fill so large a place in life as it did formerly; the married state has in some measure lost its advantage over the single state, and there are many more pleasures now that can be enjoyed as well or even better in celibacy. Moreover, by the diffusion of a finer culture throughout the community, men and women can less easily find any one whom they are willing to take as a partner for life; their requirements are more exacting, they have a livelier sense of the serious character of the marriage union, and they are less willing to contract it from any lower motives.[39]

[Footnote 38: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 146.]

[Footnote 39: _Ibid._ p. 147 _sqq._ 'Why is Single Life becoming more General?' in _The Nation_, vi. 190 _sq._]

Nay, far from enjoining marriage as a duty incumbent upon all, enlightened opinion seems to agree that it is a duty for many people never to marry. In some European countries the marriages of persons in receipt of poor-law relief have been legally prohibited, and in certain cases the legislators have gone further still and prohibited all marriages until the contracting parties can prove that they possess the means of supporting a family.[40] The opinion has also been expressed that the State ought to forbid the unions of persons suffering from certain kinds of disease, which in all probability would be transmitted to the offspring. People are beginning to feel that it entails a heavy responsibility to bring a new being into existence, and that many persons are wholly unfit for such a task.[41] Future generations will probably with a kind of horror look back at a period when the most important, and in its consequences the most far-reaching, function which has fallen to the lot of man was entirely left to individual caprice and lust.

[Footnote 40: Lecky, _Democracy and Liberty_, ii. 181.]

[Footnote 41: See Mr. Galton's papers on "Eugenics" and the discussions of the subject in _Sociological Papers_, vols. i. and ii.]

* * * * *

Side by side with the opinion that marriage is a duty for all ordinary men and women we find among many peoples {406} the notion that persons whose function it is to perform religious or magical rites must be celibates.[42] The Thlinkets believe that if a shaman does not observe continuous chastity his own guardian spirits will kill him.[43] In Patagonia the male wizards were not allowed to marry.[44] In some tribes of the Guaranies of Paraguay "the female Payes were bound to chastity, or they no longer obtained credit."[45] Celibacy was compulsory on the priests of the Chibchas in Bogota.[46] The Tohil priests in Guatemala were vowed to perpetual continence.[47] In Ichcatlan the high-priest was obliged to live constantly within the temple, and to abstain from commerce with any woman whatsoever; and if he failed in this duty he was cut in pieces, and the bloody limbs were given as a warning to his successor.[48] Of the women who held positions in the temples of ancient Mexico we are told that their chastity was most zealously guarded; during the performance of their duties they were required to keep at a proper distance from the male assistants, at whom they did not even dare to glance. The punishment to be inflicted upon those who violated their vow of chastity was death; whilst, if their trespass remained entirely secret, they endeavoured to appease the anger of the gods by fasting and austerity of life, dreading that in punishment of their crime their flesh would rot.[49] In Yucatan there was, connected with the worship of the sun, an order of vestals the members of which generally enrolled themselves for a certain time, but were afterwards allowed to leave and enter the married state. Some of them, however, remained for ever in the service of the temple and were apotheosised. Their duty was to attend to the sacred fire, and to keep strictly chaste, {407} those who broke their vows being shot to death with arrows.[50] In Peru there were likewise virgins dedicated to the sun, who lived in perpetual seclusion to the end of their lives, who preserved their virginity and were forbidden to converse or have sexual intercourse with or to see any man, or even any woman who was not one of themselves.[51] And besides the virgins who thus professed perpetual virginity in the monasteries, there were other women, of the blood royal, who led the same life in their own houses, having taken a vow of continence. These women "were held in great veneration for their chastity and purity, and, as a mark of worship and respect, they were called _Ocllo_, which was a name held sacred in their idolatry"; but if they lost their virtue, they were burnt alive or cast into "the lake of lions."[52]

[Footnote 42: Some instances of this are stated by Landtman, _Origin of Priesthood_, p. 156 _sq._]

[Footnote 43: Veniaminof, quoted by Landtman, _op. cit._ p. 156.]

[Footnote 44: Falkner, _Description of Patagonia_, p. 117.]

[Footnote 45: Southey, _History of Brazil_, ii. 371.]

[Footnote 46: Simon, quoted by Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 384.]

[Footnote 47: Bancroft, _op. cit._ iii. 489.]

[Footnote 48: Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 274.]

[Footnote 49: _Ibid._ i. 275 _sq._ Torquemada, _Monarchia Indiana_, ii. 188 _sqq._ Bancroft, _op. cit._ iii. 435 _sq._ _Cf._ Acosta, _History of the Indies_, ii. 333 _sq._]

[Footnote 50: Bancroft, _op. cit._ iii. 473. Lopez Cogolludo, _Historia de Yucathan_, p. 198.]

[Footnote 51: Garcilasso de la Vega, _op. cit._ i. 291 _sqq._]

[Footnote 52: _Ibid._ i. 305.]

Among the Guanches of the Canary Islands there were virgins, called Magades or Harimagades, who presided over the cult under the direction of the high-priest, and there were other virgins, highly respected, whose function was to pour water over the heads of newborn children, and who could abandon their office and marry whenever they pleased.[53] The priestesses of the Tshi- and E[(w]e-speaking peoples on the West Coast of Africa are forbidden to marry.[54] In a wood near Cape Padron, in Lower Guinea, lives a priestly king who is allowed neither to leave his house nor to touch a woman.[55]

[Footnote 53: Bory de St. Vincent, _Essais sur les Isles Fortunées_, p. 96 _sq._]

[Footnote 54: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, p. 121. _Idem_, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 142.]

[Footnote 55: Bastian, _Die deutsche Expedition an der Loango-Küste_, i. 287 _sq._]

In ancient Persia there were sun priestesses who were obliged to refrain from intercourse with men.[56] The nine priestesses of the oracle of a Gallic deity in Sena were devoted to perpetual virginity.[57] The Romans had their Vestal virgins, whose office, according to tradition, was instituted by Numa. They were compelled to continue {408} unmarried during thirty years, which time they employed in offering sacrifices and performing other rites ordained by the law; and if they suffered themselves to be debauched they were delivered up to the most miserable death, being placed in a subterraneous cell, in their funeral attire, without any sepulchral column, funeral rites, or other customary solemnities.[58] After the expiration of the term of thirty years they might marry on quitting the ensigns of their priesthood; but we are told that very few did this, as those who did suffered calamities which were regarded as ominous by the rest, and induced them to remain virgins in the temple of the goddess till their death.[59] In Greece priestesses were not infrequently required to be virgins, if not for their whole life, at any rate for the duration of their priesthood.[60] Tertullian writes:--"To the Achaean Juno, at the town Aegium, a virgin is allotted; and the priestesses who rave at Delphi know not marriage. We know that widows minister to the African Ceres; they not only withdraw from their still living husbands, but they even introduce other wives to them in their own room, all contact with males, even as far as the kiss of their sons, being forbidden them. . . . We have heard, too, of continent men, and among others the priests of the famous Egyptian bull."[61] There were eunuch priests connected with the cults of the Ephesian Artemis,[62] the Phrygian Cybele,[63] and the Syrian Astarte.[64]

[Footnote 56: Justin, quoted by Justi, 'Die Weltgeschichte des Tabari,' in _Das Ausland_, 1875, p. 307.]

[Footnote 57: Pomponius Mela, _De situ orbis_, iii. 6.]

[Footnote 58: Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitates Romanæ_, ii. 64 _sqq._ Plutarch, _Numa_, x. 7 _sqq._]

[Footnote 59: Dionysius of Halicarnassus, ii. 67.]

[Footnote 60: Strabo, xiv. i. 23. Müller, _Das sexuelle Leben der alten Kulturvölker_, p. 44 _sqq._ Blümner, _Home Life of the Ancient Greeks_, p. 325. Götte, _Das Delphische Orakel_, p. 78 _sq._]

[Footnote 61: Tertullian, _Ad uxorem_, i. 6 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, i. 1284). _Idem_, _De exhortatione castitatis_, 13 (Migne, ii. 928 _sq._). _Cf._ _Idem_, _De monogamia_, 17 (Migne, ii. 953).]

[Footnote 62: Strabo, xiv. 1. 23.]

[Footnote 63: Arnobius, _Adversus gentes_, v. 7 (Migne, _op. cit._ v. 1095 _sqq._). Farnell, 'Sociological Hypotheses concerning the Position of Women in Ancient Religion,' in _Archiv f. Religionswiss._ vii. 78.]

[Footnote 64: Lucian, _De dea Syria_, 15, 27, 50 _sqq._]

Among the Todas of the Neilgherry Hills the "dairy man" or priest is bound to a celibate existence;[65] and {409} among the Hindus, in spite of the great honour in which marriage is held, celibacy has always commanded respect in instances of extraordinary sanctity.[66] Those of the Sanny[=a]sis who are known to lead their lives in perfect celibacy receive on that account marks of distinguished honour and respect.[67] Already the time-honoured Indian institution of the four [=A]['s]ramas contained the germ of monastic celibacy, the Brahmac[=a]rin, or student, being obliged to observe absolute chastity during the whole course of his study.[68] The idea was further developed in Jainism and Buddhism. The Jain monk was to renounce all sexual pleasures, "either with gods, or men, or animals"; not to give way to sensuality; not to discuss topics relating to women; not to contemplate the forms of women.[69] Buddhism regards sensuality as altogether incompatible with wisdom and holiness; it is said that "a wise man should avoid married life as if it were a burning pit of live coals."[70] According to the legend, Buddha's mother, who was the best and purest of the daughters of men, had no other sons, and her conception was due to supernatural causes.[71] One of the fundamental duties of monastic life, by an infringement of which the guilty person brings about his inevitable expulsion from Buddha's order, is that "an ordained monk may not have sexual intercourse, not even with an animal."[72] In Tibet some sects of the Lamas are allowed to marry, but those who do not are considered more holy; and in every sect the nuns must take a vow of absolute continence.[73] The Buddhist priests of Ceylon are totally debarred from women.[74] Chinese law enjoins celibacy on all priests, Buddhist or Taouist.[75] And among the immortals of {410} Taouism there are some women also, who have led an extraordinarily ascetic life.[76]

[Footnote 65: Thurston, 'Anthropology of the Todas and Kotas,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, i. 169, 170, 193. Rivers, _Todas_, pp. 80, 99, 236.]

[Footnote 66: Monier-Williams, _Buddhism_, p. 88.]

[Footnote 67: Dubois, _op. cit._ p. 133. _Cf._ Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 261.]

[Footnote 68: Kern, _Manual of Indian Buddhism_, p. 73.]

[Footnote 69: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 294.]

[Footnote 70: Dhammika-Sutta, 21, quoted by Monier-Williams, _Buddhism_, p. 88.]

[Footnote 71: Rhys Davids, _Hibbert Lectures on Buddhism_, p. 148.]

[Footnote 72: Oldenberg, _Buddha_, p. 350 _sq._]

[Footnote 73: Wilson, _Abode of Snow_, p. 213.]

[Footnote 74: Percival, _Account of the Island of Ceylon_, p. 202.]

[Footnote 75: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. cxiv. p. 118. Medhurst, 'Marriage in China,' in _Trans. Roy. Asiatic Soc. China Branch_, iv. 18. Davis, _China_, ii. 53.]

[Footnote 76: Réville, _La Religion Chinoise_, p. 451 _sq._]

A small class of Hebrews held the idea that marriage is impure. The Essenes, says Josephus, "reject pleasure as an evil, but esteem continence and the conquest over our passions to be virtue. They neglect wedlock."[77] This doctrine exercised no influence on Judaism, but probably much upon Christianity. St. Paul considered celibacy to be preferable to marriage. "He that giveth her (his virgin) in marriage doeth well; but he that giveth her not in marriage doeth better."[78] "It is good for a man not to touch a woman. Nevertheless, to avoid fornication, let each man have his own wife, and let each woman have her own husband."[79] If the unmarried and widows cannot contain let them marry, "for it is better to marry than to burn."[80] These and other passages[81] in the New Testament inspired a general enthusiasm for virginity. Commenting on the words of the Apostle, Tertullian points out that what is better is not necessarily good. It is better to lose one eye than two, but neither is good; so also, though it is better to marry than to burn, it is far better neither to marry nor to burn.[82] Marriage "consists of that which is the essence of fornication";[83] whereas continence "is a means whereby a man will traffic in a mighty substance of sanctity."[84] The body which our Lord wore and in which He carried on the conflict of life in this world He put on from a holy virgin; and John the Baptist, Paul, and all the others "whose names are in the book of life"[85] cherished and loved virginity.[86] Virginity works miracles: Mary, the sister of Moses, leading the female band, passed on {411} foot over the straits of the sea, and by the same grace Thecla was reverenced even by lions, so that the unfed beasts, lying at the feet of their prey, underwent a holy fast, neither with wanton look nor sharp claw venturing to harm the virgin.[87] Virginity is like a spring flower, always softly exhaling immortality from its white petals.[88] The Lord himself opens the kingdoms of the heavens to eunuchs.[89] If Adam had preserved his obedience to the Creator he would have lived for ever in a state of virgin purity, and some harmless mode of vegetation would have peopled paradise with a race of innocent and immortal beings.[90] It is true that, though virginity is the shortest way to the camp of the faithful, the way of matrimony also arrives there, by a longer circuit.[91] Tertullian himself opposed the Marcionites, who prohibited marriage among themselves and compelled those who were married to separate before they were received by baptism into the community.[92] And in the earlier part of the fourth century the Council of Gangra expressly condemned anyone who maintained that marriage prevented a Christian from entering the kingdom of God.[93] But, at the end of the same century, a council also excommunicated the monk Jovinian because he denied that virginity was more meritorious than marriage.[94] The use of marriage was permitted to man only as a necessary expedient for the continuance of the human species, and as a restraint, {412} however imperfect, on the natural licentiousness of desire.[95] The procreation of children is the measure of a Christian's indulgence in appetite, just as the husbandman throwing the seed into the ground awaits the harvest, not sowing more upon it.[96]

[Footnote 77: Josephus, _De bello Judaico_, ii. 8. 2. See also Solinus, _Collectanea rerum memorabilium_, xxxv. 9 _sq._]

[Footnote 78: _1 Corinthians_, vii. 38.]

[Footnote 79: _Ibid._ vii. 1 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: _Ibid._ vii. 9.]

[Footnote 81: _St. Matthew_, xix. 12. _Revelation_, xiv. 4; &c.]

[Footnote 82: Tertullian, _Ad uxorem_, i. 3 (Migne, _op. cit._ i. 1278 _sq._). _Idem_, _De monogamia_, 3 (Migne, ii. 932 _sq._).]

[Footnote 83: _Idem_, _De exhortatione castitatis_, 9 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 925).]

[Footnote 84: _Idem_, _De exhortatione castitatis_, 10 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 925).]

[Footnote 85: _Philippians_, iv. 3.]

[Footnote 86: St. Clement of Rome, _Epistola I. ad virgines_, 6 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, i. 392).]

[Footnote 87: St. Ambrose, _Epistola LXIII._ 34 (Migne, _op. cit._ xvi. 1198 _sq._).]

[Footnote 88: Methodius, _Convivium decem virginum_, vii. 1 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, xviii. 125).]

[Footnote 89: Tertullian, _De monogamia_, 3 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 932).]

[Footnote 90: This opinion was held by Gregory of Nyssa and, in a later time, by John of Damascus. It was opposed by Thomas Aquinas, who maintained that the human race was from the beginning propagated by means of sexual intercourse, but that such intercourse was originally free from all carnal desire (von Eicken, _Geschichte der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_, p. 437 _sq._; see also Gibbon, _History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, ii. 186).]

[Footnote 91: St. Ambrose, _Epistola LXIII._ 40 (Migne, _op. cit._ xvi. 1200).]

[Footnote 92: Tertullian, _Adversus Marcionem_, i. 1, 29; iv. 11; &c. (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 247, 280 _sqq._, 382). _Idem_, _De monogamia_, 1, 15 (Migne, ii. 931, 950). _Cf._ Irenaeus, _Contra Hæreses_, i. 28. 1 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, vii. 690 _sq._); Clement of Alexandria, _Stromata_, iii. 3 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, viii. 1113 _sqq._).]

[Footnote 93: _Concilium Gangrense_, can. 1 (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, ii. 1106).]

[Footnote 94: _Concilium Mediolanense_, A.D. 390 (Labbe-Mansi, _op. cit._ iii. 689 _sq._).]

[Footnote 95: St. Justin, _Apologia I. pro Christianis_, 29 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, vi. 373). Clement of Alexandria, _Stromata_, ii. 23 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, viii. 1089). Gibbon, _op. cit._ ii. 186.]

[Footnote 96: Athenagoras, _Legatio pro Christianis_, 33 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, vi. 966).]

These opinions led by degrees to the obligatory celibacy of the secular and regular clergy. The conviction that a second marriage of a priest, or the marriage of a priest with a widow, is unlawful, seems to have existed from the earliest period of the Church;[97] and as early as the beginning of the fourth century a synod held in Elvira in Spain insisted on the absolute continence of the higher ecclesiastics.[98] The celibacy of the clergy in general was prescribed by Gregory VII., who "looked with abhorrence on the contamination of the holy sacerdotal character, even in its lowest degree, by any sexual connection." But in many countries this prescription was so strenuously resisted, that it could not be carried through till late in the thirteenth century.[99]

[Footnote 97: Lea, _Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church_, p. 37. Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 328 _sq._]

[Footnote 98: _Concilium Eliberitanum_, A.D. 305, ch. 33 (Labbe-Mansi, _op. cit._ ii. 11):--"Placuit in totum prohiberi episcopis, presbyteris, et diaconibus, vel omnibus clericis positis in ministerio, abstinere se a conjugibus suis, et non generare filios: quicumque vero fecerit, ab honore clericatus exterminetur."]

[Footnote 99: Gieseler, _Text-Book of Ecclesiastical History_, ii. 275. Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, ii. 150.]

The practice of religious celibacy may be traced to several sources. In many cases the priestess is obviously regarded as married to the god whom she is serving, and is therefore forbidden to marry anybody else. In ancient Peru the Sun was the husband of the virgins dedicated to him.[100] They were obliged to be of the same blood as their consort, that is to say, daughters of the Incas. "For though they imagined that the Sun had children, they considered that they ought not to be bastards, with mixed divine and human blood. So the {413} virgins were of necessity legitimate and of the blood royal, which was the same as being of the family of the Sun."[101] And the crime of violating the virgins dedicated to the Sun was the same and punished in the same severe manner as the crime of violating the women of the Inca.[102] Concerning the priestesses of the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast, Major Ellis remarks that the reason for their celibacy appears to be that "a priestess belongs to the god she serves, and therefore cannot become the property of a man, as would be the case if she married one."[103] So also the E[(w]e-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast regard the women dedicated to a god as his wives.[104] In the great temple of Jupiter Belus, we are told, a single woman used to sleep, whom the god had chosen for himself out of all the women of the land; and it was believed that he came down in person to sleep with her. "This," Herodotus says, "is like the story told by the Egyptians of what takes place in their city of Thebes, where a woman always passes the night in the temple of the Theban Jupiter. In each case the woman is said to be debarred all intercourse with men."[105] In the Egyptian texts there are frequent references to "the divine consort," _neter [h.]emt_, a position which was generally occupied by the ruling queen, and the king was believed to be the offspring of such a union.[106] As Plutarch states, the Egyptians thought it quite possible for a woman to be impregnated by the approach of some divine spirit, though they denied that a man could have corporeal intercourse with a goddess.[107] Nor was the idea of a nuptial relation between a woman and the deity foreign to the early Christians. St. Cyprian speaks of women who had no husband and lord but Christ, with whom they lived in a spiritual matrimony--who had "dedicated themselves to Christ, and, retiring from carnal {414} lust, vowed themselves to God in flesh and spirit."[108] In the following words he condemns the cohabitation of such virgins with unmarried ecclesiastics, under the pretence of a purely spiritual connection:--"If a husband come and see his wife lying with another man, is he not indignant and maddened, and does he not in the violence of his jealousy perhaps even seize the sword? What? How indignant and angered then must Christ our Lord and Judge be, when He sees a virgin, dedicated to Himself, and consecrated to His holiness, lying with a man! and what punishments does He threaten against such impure connections. . . . She who has been guilty of this crime is an adulteress, not against a husband, but Christ."[109] According to the gospel of Pseudo-Matthew, the Virgin Mary had in a similar manner dedicated herself as a virgin to God.[110] The idea that the deity is jealous of the chastity of his or her servants may also perhaps be at the bottom of the Greek custom according to which the hierophant and the other priests of Demeter were restrained from conjugal intercourse and washed their bodies with hemlock-juice in order to kill their passions,[111] as also of the rule which required the priests of certain goddesses to be eunuchs.[112]

[Footnote 100: Garcilasso de la Vega, _op. cit._ i. 297.]

[Footnote 101: _Ibid._ i. 292.]

[Footnote 102: _Ibid._ i. 300.]

[Footnote 103: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, p. 121.]

[Footnote 104: _Idem_, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, pp. 140, 142.]

[Footnote 105: Herodotus, i. 181 _sq._]

[Footnote 106: Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 268. _Cf._ Erman, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 295 _sq._]

[Footnote 107: Plutarch, _Numa_, iv. 5. _Idem_, _Symposiaca problemata_, viii. 1. 6 _sq._]

[Footnote 108: St. Cyprian, _De habitu virginum_, 4, 22 (Migne, _op. cit._ iv. 443, 462). _Cf._ Methodius, _Convivium decent virginum_, vii. 1 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, xviii. 125).]

[Footnote 109: St. Cyprian, _Epistola LXII., ad Pomponium de virginibus_, 3 _sq._ (Migne, _op. cit._ iv. 368 _sqq._). See also Neander, _General History of the Christian Religion and Church_, i. 378. The Council of Elvira decreed that such fallen virgins, if they refused to return back to their former condition, should be denied communion even at the moment of death (_Concilium Eliberitanum_, A.D. 305, ch. 13 [Labbe-Mansi, _op. cit._ ii. 8]).]

[Footnote 110: _Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew_, 8 (_Ante-Nicene Christian Library_, xvi. 25). See also _Gospel of the Nativity of Mary_, 7 (_ibid._ xvi. 57 _sq._).]

[Footnote 111: Wachsmuth, _Hellenische Alterthumskunde_, ii. 560.]

[Footnote 112: _Cf._ Lactantius, _Divinæ Institutiones_, i. 17 (Migne, _op. cit._ vi. 206):--"Deum mater et amavit formosum adolescentem, et eumdem cum pellice deprehensum exsectis virilibus semivirum reddidit; et ideo nunc sacra ejus a Gallis sacerdotibus celebrantur."]

Religious celibacy is further connected with the idea that sexual intercourse is defiling. In Efate, of the New Hebrides, it is regarded as something unclean.[113] The Tahitians believed that if a man refrained from all connections with women some months before death, he passed {415} immediately into his eternal mansion without any purification.[114] Herodotus writes:--"As often as a Babylonian has had intercourse with his wife, he sits down before a censer of burning incense, and the woman sits opposite to him. At dawn of day they wash; for till they are washed they will not touch any of their common vessels. This practice is also observed by the Arabs."[115] Among the Hebrews both the man and woman had to bathe themselves in water, and were "unclean until the even."[116] The idea that sexual intercourse is unclean implies that some degree of supernatural danger is connected with it;[117] and, as Mr. Crawley has pointed out, the notion of danger may develop into that of sinfulness.[118] Where woman is regarded as an unclean being[119] it is obvious that intercourse with her should be considered polluting, but this is not a sufficient explanation of the idea of sexual uncleanness. A polluting effect is ascribed to any discharge of sexual matter[120]--originally no doubt on account of its mysterious propensities and the veil of mystery which surrounds the whole sexual nature of man.

[Footnote 113: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 181.]

[Footnote 114: Cook, _Voyage to the Pacific Ocean_, ii. 164.]

[Footnote 115: Herodotus, i. 198.]

[Footnote 116: _Leviticus_, xv. 18.]

[Footnote 117: The danger attributed to sexual intercourse has been much emphasised by Mr. Crawley in _The Mystic Rose_. See also Westermarck, _Marriage Ceremonies in Morocco_.]

[Footnote 118: Crawley, _op. cit._ p. 214.]

[Footnote 119: See _supra_, i. 663 _sqq._]

[Footnote 120: Gregory III., _Judicia congrua p[oe]nitentibus_, ch. 24 (Labbe-Mansi, _op. cit._ xii. 293):--"In somno peccans, si ex cogitatione pollutus, viginti duos psalmos cantet: si in somno peccans sine cogitatione, duodecim psalmos cantet." _P[oe]nitentiale Pseudo-Theodori_, xxviii. 25 (Wasserschleben, _Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche_, p. 600):--"Qui in somno, non voluntate, pollutus sit, surgat, cantetque vii. psalmos p[oe]nitentiales." _Cf._ _ibid._ xxviii. 6, 33 (Wasserschleben, p. 559 _sq._).]

The idea of sexual defilement is particularly conspicuous in connection with religious observances. It is a common rule that he who performs a sacred act or enters a holy place must be ceremonially clean,[121] and no kind of uncleanness is to be avoided more carefully than sexual pollution. Among the Chippewyans, "if a chief is anxious to know the disposition of his people towards him, or if he wishes to settle any difference between them, he announces his intention of opening his medicine-bag and smoking in his {416} sacred stem. . . . No one can avoid attending on these occasions; but a person may attend and be excused from assisting at the ceremonies, by acknowledging that he has not undergone the necessary purification. The having cohabited with his wife, or any other woman, within twenty-four hours preceding the ceremony, renders him unclean, and, consequently, disqualifies him from performing any part of it."[122] Herodotus tells us that the Egyptians, like the Greeks, "made it a point of religion to have no converse with women in the sacred places, and not to enter them without washing, after such converse."[123] This statement is corroborated by a passage in the 'Book of the Dead.'[124] In Greece[125] and India[126] those who took part in certain religious festivals were obliged to be continent for some time previously. Before entering the sanctuary of Mên Tyrannos, whose worship was extended over the whole of Asia Minor, the worshipper had to abstain from garlic, pork, and women, and had to wash his head.[127] Among the Hebrews it was a duty incumbent upon all to be ritually clean before entering the temple--to be free from sexual defilement,[128] leprosy,[129] and the pollution produced by the association with corpses of human beings, of all animals not permitted for food, and of those permitted animals which had died a natural death or been killed by wild beasts;[130] and eating of the consecrated bread was interdicted to persons who had not been continent for some time previously.[131] A Muhammedan would remove any defiled garment before he commences his prayer, or otherwise abstain from praying altogether; he would not dare to approach the sanctuary of a saint in a state of sexual uncleanness; and sexual intercourse is forbidden for those who make the pilgrimage to Mecca.[132] {417} The Christians prescribed strict continence as a preparation for baptism[133] and the partaking of the Eucharist.[134] They further enjoined that no married persons should participate in any of the great festivals of the Church if the night before they had lain together;[135] and in the 'Vision' of Alberic, dating from the twelfth century, a special place of torture, consisting of a lake of mingled lead, pitch, and resin, is represented as existing in hell for the punishment of married people who have had intercourse on Sundays, church festivals, or fast-days.[136] They abstained from the marriage-bed at other times also, when they were disposed more freely to give themselves to prayer.[137] Newly married couples were admonished to practise continence during the wedding day and the night following, out of reverence for the sacrament; and in some instances their abstinence lasted even for two or three days.[138]

[Footnote 121: See _supra_, ii. 294, 295, 352 _sq._]

[Footnote 122: Mackenzie, _Voyages to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans_, p. cii. _sq._]

[Footnote 123: Herodotus, ii. 64.]

[Footnote 124: Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 269 _sq._]

[Footnote 125: Wachsmuth, _op. cit._ ii. 560.]

[Footnote 126: Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 411.]

[Footnote 127: Foucart, _Des associations religieuses chez les Grecs_, pp. 119, 123 _sq._]

[Footnote 128: _Leviticus_, chs. xii., xv.]

[Footnote 129: _Ibid._ ch. xiii. _sq._]

[Footnote 130: _Ibid._ xi. 24 _sqq._; xvii. 15. _Numbers_, xix. 14 _sqq._ Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 476.]

[Footnote 131: _1 Samuel_, xxi. 4 _sq._]

[Footnote 132: _Koran_, ii. 193.]

[Footnote 133: St. Augustine, _De fide et operibus_, vi. 8 (Migne, _op. cit._ xl. 202).]

[Footnote 134: St. Jerome, _Epistola XLVIII._ 15 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxii. 505 _sq._).]

[Footnote 135: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 324. St. Gregory the Great, _Dialogi_, i. 10 (Migne, _op. cit._ lxxvii. 200 _sq._).]

[Footnote 136: Albericus, _Visio_, ch. 5, p. 17. Delepierre, _L'enfer décrit par ceux qui l'ont vu_, p. 57 _sq._ On this subject see also Müller, _Das sexuelle Leben der christlichen Kulturvölker_, pp. 52, 53, 120 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: St. Jerome, _Epistola XLVIII._ 15 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxii. 505). Fleury, _Manners and Behaviour of the Christians_, p. 75.]

[Footnote 138: Muratori, _Dissertazioni sopra le antichità italiane_, 20, vol. i. 347.]

Holiness is a delicate quality which is easily destroyed if anything polluting is brought into contact with the holy object or person. The Moors believe that if anybody who is sexually unclean enters a granary the grain will lose its _baraka_, or holiness. A similar idea probably underlies the belief prevalent among various peoples that incontinence, and especially illicit love, injures the harvest.[139] In Efate, _namim_, or uncleanness, supposed to be contracted in various emergencies, was especially avoided {418} by the sacred men, because it was believed to destroy their sacredness.[140] The priestly taboos, of which Sir J. G. Frazer has given such an exhaustive account in 'The Golden Bough,' have undoubtedly in a large measure a similar origin. Nay, it seems that pollution not only deprives the holy person of his holiness, but is also supposed to injure him in a more positive way. When the supreme pontiff in the kingdom of Congo left his residence to visit other places within his jurisdiction, all married people had to observe strict continence the whole time he was out, as it was believed that any act of incontinence would prove fatal to him.[141] In self-defence, therefore, gods and holy persons try to prevent polluted individuals from approaching them, and their worshippers are naturally anxious to do the same. But apart from the resentment which the sacred being would feel against the defiler, it appears that holiness is supposed to react quite mechanically against pollution, to the destruction or discomfort of the polluted individual. All Moors are convinced that anyone who in a state of sexual uncleanness dared to visit a saint's tomb would be struck by the saint; but the Arabs of Dukkâla, in Southern Morocco, also believe that if an unclean person rides a horse some accident will happen to him on account of the _baraka_ with which the horse is endowed. It should further be noticed that, owing to the injurious effect of pollution upon holiness, an act generally regarded as sacred would, if performed by an unclean individual, lack that magic efficacy which otherwise would be ascribed to it. Muhammed represented ceremonial cleanliness as "one-half of the faith and the key of prayer."[142] The Moors say that a scribe is afraid of evil spirits only when he is sexually unclean, because then his reciting of passages of the Koran--the most powerful weapon against such spirits--would be of no avail. The Syrian philosopher Jamblichus {419} speaks of the belief that "the gods do not hear him who invokes them, if he is impure from venereal connections."[143] A similar notion prevailed among the early Christians; with reference to a passage in the First Epistle of the Corinthians,[144] Tertullian remarks that the Apostle added the recommendation of a temporary abstinence for the sake of adding an efficacy to prayers.[145] To the same class of beliefs belongs the notion that a sacrificial victim should be clean and without blemish.[146] The Chibchas of Bogota considered that the most valuable sacrifice they could offer was that of a youth who had never had intercourse with a woman.[147]

[Footnote 139: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 209 _sqq._ This is in my opinion a more natural explanation than the one suggested by Sir J. G. Frazer, namely, that uncivilised man imagines "that the vigour which he refuses to expend in reproducing his own kind, will form as it were a store of energy whereby other creatures, whether vegetable or animal, will somehow benefit in propagating their species." This theory entirely fails to account for the fact that illicit love, by preference, is supposed to mar the fertility of the earth and to blight the crops--a belief which is in full accordance with my own explanation, in so far as such love is considered particularly polluting.]

[Footnote 140: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 181.]

[Footnote 141: Labat, _Relation historique de l'Ethiopie occidentale_, i. 259 _sq._]

[Footnote 142: Pool, _Studies in Mohammedanism_, p. 27.]

[Footnote 143: Jamblichus, _De mysteriis_, iv. 11.]

[Footnote 144: _1 Corinthians_, vii. 5.]

[Footnote 145: Tertullian, _De exhortatione castitatis_, 10 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 926).]

[Footnote 146: See _supra_, ii. 295 _sq._]

[Footnote 147: Simon, quoted by Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iv. 363. See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

If ceremonial cleanliness is required even of the ordinary worshipper it is all the more indispensable in the case of a priest;[148] and of all kinds of uncleanness none is to be more carefully avoided than sexual pollution. Sometimes admission into the priesthood is to be preceded by a period of continence.[149] In the Marquesas Islands no one could become a priest without having lived chastely for several years previously.[150] Among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast men and women, in order to become members of the priesthood, have to pass through a long novitiate, generally from two to three years, during which they live in retirement and are instructed by the priests in the secrets of the craft; and "the people believe that, during this period of retirement and study, the novices must keep their bodies pure, and refrain from all commerce with the other sex."[151] The Huichols of Mexico, again, are of opinion that a man who wishes to become a shaman must be faithful to his wife for five years, and that, if he violates this rule, he is sure to be taken ill and will lose the power of healing.[152] In ancient Mexico the priests, all {420} the time that they were employed in the service of the temple, abstained from all other women but their wives, and "even affected so much modesty and reserve, that when they met a woman they fixed their eyes on the ground that they might not see her. Any incontinence amongst the priests was severely punished. The priest who, at Teohuacan, was convicted of having violated his chastity, was delivered up by the priests to the people, who at night killed him by the bastinado."[153] Among the Kotas of the Neilgherry Hills the priests--who, unlike the "dairymen" of their Toda neighbours are not celibates--are at the great festival in honour of K[=a]matar[=a]ya forbidden to live or hold intercourse with their wives for fear of pollution, and are then even obliged to cook their meals themselves.[154] It seems that, according to the Anatolian religion, married _hieroi_ had to separate from their wives during the period they were serving at the temple.[155] The Hebrew priest should avoid all unchastity; he was not allowed to marry a harlot, or a profane, or a divorced wife,[156] and the high-priest was also forbidden to marry a widow.[157] Nay, even in a priest's daughter unchastity was punished with excessive severity, because she had profaned her father; she was to be burned.[158]

[Footnote 148: _Cf._ _supra_, ii. 352 _sq._]

[Footnote 149: _Cf._ Landtman, _op. cit._ p. 118 _sqq._]

[Footnote 150: Waitz-Gerland, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, vi. 387.]

[Footnote 151: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, p. 120.]

[Footnote 152: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, ii. 236.]

[Footnote 153: Clavigero, _op. cit._ i. 274.]

[Footnote 154: Thurston, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, i. 193.]

[Footnote 155: Ramsay, _Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia_, i. 136, 137, 150 _sq._]

[Footnote 156: _Leviticus_, xxi. 7.]

[Footnote 157: _Ibid._ xxi. 14.]

[Footnote 158: _Ibid._ xxi. 9.]

Carried further, the idea underlying all these rules and practices led to the notions that celibacy is more pleasing to God than marriage,[159] and that it is a religious duty for those members of the community whose special office is to attend to the sacred cult. For a nation like the Jews, whose ambition was to live and to multiply, celibacy could never become an ideal; whereas the Christians, who professed the most perfect indifference to all earthly matters, found no difficulty in glorifying a state which, however opposed it was to the interests of the race and the nation, made men pre-eminently fit to approach their god. Indeed, {421} far from being a benefit to the kingdom of God by propagating the species, sexual intercourse was on the contrary detrimental to it by being the great transmitter of the sin of our first parents. This argument, however, was of a comparatively late origin. Pelagius himself almost rivalled St. Augustine in his praise of virginity, which he considered the great test of that strength of free-will which he asserted to be at most only weakened by the fall of Adam.[160]

[Footnote 159: _Cf._ _supra_, ii. 358.]

[Footnote 160: Milman, _op. cit._ i. 151, 153.]

Religious celibacy is, moreover, enjoined or commended as a means of self-mortification supposed to appease an angry god, or with a view to raising the spiritual nature of man by suppressing one of the strongest of all sensual appetites. Thus we find in various religions celibacy side by side with other ascetic observances practised for similar purposes. Among the early Christians those young women who took a vow of chastity "did not look upon virginity as any thing if it were not attended with great mortification, with silence, retirement, poverty, labour, fastings, watchings, and continual praying. They were not esteemed as virgins who would not deny themselves the common diversions of the world, even the most innocent."[161] Tertullian enumerates virginity, widowhood, and the modest restraint in secret on the marriage-bed among those fragrant offerings acceptable to God which the flesh performs to its own especial suffering.[162] Finally, it was argued that marriage prevents a person from serving God perfectly, because it induces him to occupy himself too much with worldly things.[163] Though not contrary to the act of charity or the love of God, says Thomas Aquinas, it is nevertheless an obstacle to it.[164] This was one, but certainly not the only, cause of the obligatory celibacy which the Christian Church imposed upon her clergy.

[Footnote 161: Fleury, _op. cit._ p. 128 _sq._]

[Footnote 162: Tertullian, _De resurrectione carnis_, 8 (Migne, _op. cit._ ii. 806).]

[Footnote 163: Vincentius Bellovacensis, _Speculum naturale_, xxx. 43. See also von Eicken, _op. cit._ p. 445.]

[Footnote 164: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 184. 3.]

CHAPTER XLII

FREE LOVE--ADULTERY

HARDLY less variable than the moral ideas relating to marriage are those concerning sexual relations of a non-matrimonial character.

Among many uncivilised peoples both sexes enjoy perfect freedom previous to marriage, and in some cases it is considered almost dishonourable for a girl to have no lover.

The East African Barea and Kunáma do not regard it as in the least disreputable for a girl to become pregnant, nor do they punish nor censure the seducer.[1] Among the Wanyoro "it constantly happens that young girls spend the night with their lovers, only returning to their father's house in the morning, and this is not considered scandalous."[2] The Wadigo regard it as disgraceful, or at least as ridiculous, for a girl to enter into marriage as a virgin.[3] Among the Bakongo, "womanly chastity is unknown, and a woman's honour is measured by the price she costs."[4] Over nearly the whole of British Central Africa, says Sir H. Johnston, "before a girl is become a woman (that is to say before she is able to conceive) it is a matter of absolute indifference what she does, and scarcely any girl remains a virgin after about five years of age."[5] Among the Baronga "l'opinion publique se moque des gens continents plus qu'elle ne les admire."[6] According to Mr. Warner, "seduction of virgins, and cohabiting with unmarried women and {423} widows, are not punishable by Kafir law, neither does any disgrace attach to either sex by committing such acts."[7] In Madagascar "continence is not supposed to exist in either sex before marriage, . . . and its absence is not regarded as a vice."[8] Among the Maoris of New Zealand "girls were at perfect liberty to act as they pleased until married," and chastity in single women was held of little account.[9] In the Tonga Islands unmarried women might bestow their favours upon whomsoever they pleased without any opprobrium, although it was thought shameful for a woman frequently to change her lover.[10] In the Solomon Islands "female chastity is a virtue that would sound strangely in the ear of the native"; and in St. Christoval and the adjacent islands, "for two or three years after a girl has become eligible for marriage she distributes her favours amongst all the young men of the village."[11] In the Malay Archipelago intercourse between unmarried people is very commonly considered neither a crime nor a disgrace;[12] and the same is perhaps even more generally the case among the uncivilised races of India and Indo-China.[13] Among the Angami Nagas, for instance, "girls consider short hair, the symbol of virginity, a disgrace, and are anxious to become entitled to wear it long; men are desirous before marriage to have proof that their wives will not be barren. . . . Chastity begins with marriage."[14] The Jakuts see nothing immoral in free love, provided only that nobody suffers material loss by it.[15] Among the Votyaks it is disgraceful for a girl to be little sought after by the young men, and it is honourable for her to have children; she then gets a wealthier husband, and a higher price is paid for her to her father.[16] The Kamchadales set no great value on the virginity of their brides.[17] Of the Point Barrow Eskimo Mr. Murdoch writes:--"As to the relations between the sexes there seems to be the most complete absence of what we consider moral feelings. Promiscuous sexual {424} intercourse between married or unmarried people, or even among children, appears to be looked upon simply as a matter for amusement. As far as we could learn, unchastity in a girl was considered nothing against her. The immorality of these people among themselves, as we witnessed it, seems too purely animal and natural to be of recent growth or the result of foreign influence. Moreover, a similar state of affairs has been observed among Eskimo elsewhere."[18]

[Footnote 1: Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 524.]

[Footnote 2: _Emin Pasha in Central Africa_, p. 82. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 208 (Monbuttu).]

[Footnote 3: Baumann, _Usambara_, p. 152.]

[Footnote 4: Johnston, _British Central Africa_, p. 405.]

[Footnote 5: _Ibid._ p. 409, note.]

[Footnote 6: Junod, _Les Ba-Ronga_, p. 29.]

[Footnote 7: Warner, in Maclean, _Compendium of Kafir Laws_, p. 63.]

[Footnote 8: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 137 _sq._]

[Footnote 9: Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, p. 33. Gisborne, _Colony of New Zealand_, p. 27.]

[Footnote 10: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 174.]

[Footnote 11: Guppy, _Solomon Islands_, p. 43.]

[Footnote 12: Wilken, 'Plechtigheden en gebruiken bij verlovingen en huwelijken bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel,' in _Bijdragen tot de taal- land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, ser. v. vol. iv. 434 _sqq._]

[Footnote 13: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 71. Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_, i. p. clxxxiv.]

[Footnote 14: Prain, 'Angami Nagas,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, v. 491 _sq._]

[Footnote 15: Sumner, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxi. 96.]

[Footnote 16: Buch, 'Die Wotjäken,' in _Acta Soc. Scientiarum Fennicæ_, xii. 509.]

[Footnote 17: Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 156.]

[Footnote 18: Murdoch, 'Ethnological Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 419 _sq._ See also Turner, 'Ethnology of the the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 189 (Koksoagmyut); Parry, _Second Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage_, p. 529 (Eskimo of Igloolik and Winter Island).]

Yet however commonly chastity is disregarded in the savage world, we must not suppose that such disregard is anything like a universal characteristic of the lower races. In a previous work I have given a list of numerous savage and barbarous peoples among whom unchastity before marriage is looked upon as a disgrace or a crime for a woman, sometimes punishable with banishment from the community or even with death;[19] and it is noteworthy that to this group of peoples belong savages of so low a type as the Veddahs of Ceylon,[20] the Igorrotes of Luzon,[21] and certain Australian tribes.[22] I have also called attention to facts which seem to prove that in several cases the wantonness of savages is largely due to foreign influence. The pioneers of a "higher civilisation" are very frequently unmarried men who go out to make their living in uncivilised lands, and, though unwilling to contract regular marriages with native women, they have no objection to corrupting their morals.[23] Moreover, in many tribes the {425} free intercourse which prevails between unmarried people is not of a promiscuous nature, and leads necessarily to marriage should the girl prove with child.[24] Nay, among various uncivilised races not only the girl, but the man who seduces her is subject to punishment or censure.

[Footnote 19: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 61 _sqq._]

[Footnote 20: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 178.]

[Footnote 21: Meyer, 'Igorrotes von Luzon,' in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. f. Anthrop._ 1883, p. 384 _sq._ Blumentritt, _Ethnographie der Philippinen_, p. 27.]

[Footnote 22: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 64 _sq._ Holden, in Taplin, _Folklore of the South Australian Aborigines_, p. 19.]

[Footnote 23: It is strange to hear from a modern student of anthropology, and especially from an Australian writer, that in sexual licence the savage has never anything to learn and that "all that the lower fringe of civilised men can do to harm the uncivilised is to stoop to the level of the latter instead of teaching them a better way" (Sutherland, _Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct_, i. 186). Mr. Edward Stephens ('Aborigines of Australia,' in _Jour. & Proceed. Royal Soc. N. S. Wales_, xxiii. 480) has a very different story to tell with reference to the tribes which once inhabited the Adelaide Plains in South Australia and whose acquaintance he made more than half a century ago.]

[Footnote 24: Westermarck, _op. cit._ pp. 23, 24, 71.]

Among the East African Takue a seducer may have to pay the same sum as if he had killed the girl, although the fine is generally reduced to fifty cows.[25] Among the Beni Amer and Marea he is killed, together with the girl and the child.[26] In Tessaua a fine of 100,000 kurdi is imposed on the father of a bastard child.[27] Among the Beni Mzab a man who seduces a girl has to pay two hundred francs and is banished for four years.[28] Among the Tedâ he is exposed to the revenge of her father.[29] The Baziba look upon illegitimate intercourse between the sexes as the most serious offence, though no action is taken until the birth of a child; "then the man and woman are bound hand and foot and thrown into Lake Victoria."[30] Among the Bakoki, whilst the girl was driven from home and remained for ever after an outcast, the man was fined three cows to her father and one to the chief.[31] Certain West African savages described by Mr. Winwood Reade, who banish from the clan a girl guilty of wantonness, inflict severe flogging on the seducer.[32] In Dahomey a man who seduces a girl is compelled by law to marry her and to pay eighty cowries to the parent or master.[33] Among some Kafir tribes the father or guardian of a woman who becomes pregnant can demand a fine of one head of cattle from the father of the child;[34] whilst in the Gaika tribe the mere seduction of a virgin incurs the fine of three or four head of cattle.[35] Casalis mentions an interesting custom prevalent among the Basutos, which on the one hand illustrates the belief that sexual intercourse in certain circumstances exposes a person to supernatural danger, and on the other hand indicates that unchastity in unmarried men is not looked upon with perfect indifference:--Immediately after the birth of a child the fire of the dwelling was kindled afresh. "For this purpose it was necessary that a young man of chaste habits should rub two {426} pieces of wood quickly one against another, until a flame sprung up, pure as himself. It was firmly believed that a premature death awaited him who should dare to take upon himself this office, after having lost his innocence. As soon, therefore, as a birth was proclaimed in the village, the fathers took their sons to undergo the ordeal. Those who felt themselves guilty confessed their crime, and submitted to be scourged rather than expose themselves to the consequences of a fatal temerity."[36] Livingstone, speaking of the good name which was given to him by the Bakwains, observes:--"No one ever gains much influence in this country without purity and uprightness. The acts of a stranger are keenly scrutinised by both young and old, and seldom is the judgment pronounced, even by the heathen, unfair or uncharitable. I have heard women speaking in admiration of a white man, because he was pure, and never was guilty of any secret immorality. Had he been, they would have known it, and, untutored heathen though they be, would have despised him in consequence."[37]

[Footnote 25: Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 208.]

[Footnote 26: _Ibid._ p. 322.]

[Footnote 27: Barth, _Reisen in Nord- und Central-Afrika_, ii. 18.]

[Footnote 28: Chavanne, _Die Sahara_, p. 315.]

[Footnote 29: Nachtigal, _Sahara und Sudan_, i. 449.]

[Footnote 30: Cunningham, _Uganda_, p. 290.]

[Footnote 31: _Ibid._ p. 102.]

[Footnote 32: Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 261.]

[Footnote 33: Forbes, _Dahomey_, i. 26.]

[Footnote 34: Warner, in Maclean, _op. cit._ p. 64.]

[Footnote 35: Brownlee, _ibid._ p. 112.]

[Footnote 36: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 267 _sq._]

[Footnote 37: Livingstone, _Missionary Travels_, p. 513.]

Of the Australian Maroura tribe, Lower Darling, we are told that before the advent of the whites "their laws were strict, especially those regarding young men and young women. It was almost death to a young lad or man who had sexual intercourse till married."[38] Among various tribes in Western Victoria "illegitimacy is rare, and is looked upon with such abhorrence that the mother is always severely beaten by her relatives, and sometimes put to death and burned. Her child is occasionally killed and burned with her. The father of the child is also punished with the greatest severity, and occasionally killed."[39]

[Footnote 38: Holden, in Taplin, _Folklore of the South Australian Aborigines_, p. 19.]

[Footnote 39: Dawson, _Australian Aborigines_, p. 28.]

In Nias the pregnancy of an unmarried girl is punished with death, inflicted not only upon her but upon the seducer as well.[40] Among the Bódo and Dhimáls of India chastity is prized in man and woman, married and unmarried.[41] Among the Tunguses "in irregular amours only the men are punished," the seducer being obliged either to purchase the girl at a certain price or, if he refuses, to submit to corporal punishment.[42] Among the Thlinkets, "if unmarried women prove frail the partner of their guilt, if discovered, is bound to make reparation to the parents, soothing their wounded honour with handsome {427} presents."[43] In certain North American tribes the seducer is said to be viewed with even more contempt than the girl whom he has dishonoured.[44]

[Footnote 40: Wilken, in _Bijdragen tot de taal- land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, ser. v. vol. iv. 444.]

[Footnote 41: Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 123.]

[Footnote 42: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 84.]

[Footnote 43: Douglas, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 177.]

[Footnote 44: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 66.]

Passing to more advanced races, we find that chastity is regarded as a duty for unmarried women, whilst a different standard of morality is generally applied to men. "Confucianism," says Mr. Griffis, "virtually admits two standards of morality, one for man, another for woman. . . . Chastity is a female virtue, it is a part of womanly duty, it has little or no relation to man personally."[45] Yet it is held up as an ideal even to men. It is said that in youth, when the physical powers are not yet settled, the superior man guards against lust.[46] Though licentious in their habits, the Chinese exalt and dignify chastity as a means of bringing the soul and body nearer to the highest excellence;[47] one of their proverbs even maintains that "of the myriad vices, lust is the worst."[48] Chastity for its own sake, when defended by a woman at the expense of her life, meets with a reward at the hands of the Government. "If a woman"--so the Ordinances run--"be compelled by her husband to prostitute herself for money, and takes her own life in order to preserve her chastity, or if an unmarried virgin loses her life in defending herself against violation, an honorary gate shall be erected in each case near the door of the paternal dwelling."[49] According to the Chinese Penal Code, "criminal intercourse by mutual consent with an unmarried woman shall be punished with seventy blows," whilst the punishment for such intercourse with a married woman is eighty blows.[50]

[Footnote 45: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 149.]

[Footnote 46: _Lun Yü_, xvi. 7.]

[Footnote 47: Wells Williams, _Middle Kingdom_, ii. 193.]

[Footnote 48: Smith, _Proverbs of the Chinese_, p. 256.]

[Footnote 49: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 752 _sq._]

[Footnote 50: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. ccclxvi. p. 404.]

Among the ancient Hebrews fornication was forbidden to women[51] but not to men. The action of Judah towards the supposed harlot on the way to Timnath is mentioned {428} as the most natural thing in the world,[52] even though the perpetrator was a man of wealth and position, a man whom his brethren "shall praise" and before whom his "father's children shall bow down."[53] Throughout the Muhammedan world chastity is regarded as an essential duty for a woman.[54] In Persia an unmarried girl who gave birth to a child would surely be killed.[55] Among the Fellaheen of Egypt a father or brother in most instances punishes an unmarried daughter or sister who has been guilty of incontinence by throwing her into the Nile with a stone tied to her neck, or cutting her to pieces, and then throwing her remains into the river.[56] Among the Jbâla and Rif Berbers of Morocco she is also frequently killed. For unmarried men, on the other hand, chastity is by Muhammedans at most looked upon as an ideal, almost out of reach. The Caliph Ali said that "with a man who is modest and chaste nobody should find fault."[57] We are told that the Muhammedans of India consider it inconceivable that a Moslem should have illicit intercourse with a free Muhammedan woman;[58] but connections with slave girls are regarded in a different light.

[Footnote 51: _Leviticus_, xix. 29. _Deuteronomy_, xxiii. 18.]

[Footnote 52: _Genesis_, xxxviii. 15 _sqq._]

[Footnote 53: _Ibid._ xlix. 8.]

[Footnote 54: Burton, _Sindh_, p. 295.]

[Footnote 55: Polak, _Persien_, i. 217.]

[Footnote 56: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 57: Ameer Ali, _Ethics of Islâm_, p. 30.]

[Footnote 58: Lane-Poole, _Studies in a Mosque_, p. 106.]

Among the Hindus sexual impurity is scarcely considered a sin in the men, but "in females nothing is held more execrable or abominable. The unhappy inhabitants of houses of ill fame are looked upon as the most degraded of the human species."[59] In one of the Pahlavi texts continence is recommended from the point of view of prudence:--"Commit no lustfulness, so that harm and regret may not reach thee from thine own actions."[60] But in Zoroastrianism, also, chastity is chiefly a female duty. It is written in the Avesta, "Any woman that has given up her body to two men in one day is sooner to be killed than a wolf, a lion, or a snake."[61]

[Footnote 59: _Calcutta Review_, ii. 23. Dubois, _Description of the Character, &c. of the People of India_, p. 193. _Cf._ _Laws of Manu_, ix. 51 _sq._]

[Footnote 60: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, ii. 23 _sq._]

[Footnote 61: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. 206, n. 1.]

{429} Among the ancient Teutons an unmarried woman who belonged to an honourable family was severely punished for going wrong, and the seducer was exposed to the revenge of her family, or had to pay compensation for his deed.[62] The yet un-Romanised Saxons, down to the days of St. Boniface, compelled a maiden who had dishonoured her father's house, as well as an adulteress, to hang herself, after which her body was burned and her paramour hung over the blazing pile; or she was scourged or cut with knives by all the women of the village till she was dead.[63]

[Footnote 62: Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 659 _sqq._ Wilda, _Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 799 _sqq._ Nordström, _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_, ii. 67. Maurer, _Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes_, ii. 154.]

[Footnote 63: Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, ii. 54.]

In Greece the chastity of an unmarried girl was anxiously guarded.[64] According to Athenian law, the relatives of a maiden who had lost her virtue could with impunity kill the seducer on the spot.[65] Virginity was an object of worship. Chastity was the pre-eminent attribute of sanctity ascribed to Athene and Artemis, and the Parthenon, or virgin's temple, was the noblest religious edifice of Athens.[66] It is true that a certain class of courtesans occupied a remarkably high position in the social life of Greece, being admired and sought after even by the principal men. But they did so on account of their extraordinary beauty or their intellectual superiority; to the Greek mind the moral standard was by no means the only standard of excellence. The Romans, on the other hand, regarded the courtesan class with much contempt.[67] In A.D. 19 the profligacy of women was checked by stringent enactments, and it was provided that no woman whose grandfather, father, or husband had been a Roman knight should get money by prostitution. [68] The names of prostitutes had to be published on the aedile's list, as Tacitus says, "according to a recognised custom {430} of our ancestors, who considered it a sufficient punishment on unchaste women to have to profess their shame."[69] But both in Rome and Greece pre-nuptial unchastity in men, when it was not excessive[70] or did not take some especially offensive form, was hardly censured by public opinion.[71] The elder Cato expressly justified it.[72] Cicero says:--"If there be any one who thinks that youth is to be wholly interdicted from amours with courtesans, he certainly is very strict indeed. I cannot deny what he says; but still he is at variance not only with the licence of the present age, but even with the habits of our ancestors, and with what they used to consider allowable. For when was the time that men were not used to act in this manner? When was such conduct found fault with? When was it not permitted? When, in short, was the time when that which is lawful was not lawful?"[73] Epictetus only went a little step further. He said to his disciples:--"Concerning sexual pleasures, it is right to be pure before marriage, as much as in you lies. But if you indulge in them, let it be according to what is lawful. But do not in any case make yourself disagreeable to those who use such pleasures, nor be fond of reproving them, nor of putting yourself forward as not using them."[74] Here chastity in men is at all events recognised as an ideal. But even in pagan antiquity there were a few who enjoined it as a duty.[75] Musonius Rufus emphatically asserted that no union of the sexes other than marriage was permissible,[76] and Dio Chrysostom desired prostitution to be suppressed by law.[77] Similar opinions grew up in connection with the Neo-Platonic and Neo-Pythagorean philosophies, and may be traced back to the ancient masters themselves. We are told that Pythagoras inculcated the virtue of {431} chastity so successfully that when ten of his disciples, being attacked, might have escaped by crossing a bean-field, they died to a man rather than tread down the beans, which were supposed to have a mystic affinity with the seat of impure desires.[78] Plato, again, is in favour of a law to the effect that "no one shall venture to touch any person of the freeborn or noble class except his wedded wife, or sow the unconsecrated and bastard seed among harlots, or in barren and unnatural lusts." Our citizens, he says, ought not to be worse than birds and beasts, which live without intercourse, pure and chaste, until the age for procreation, and afterwards, when they have arrived at that period and the male has paired with the female and the female with the male, "live the rest of their lives in holiness and innocence, abiding firmly in their original compact."[79]

[Footnote 64: See Denis, _Histoire des théories et des idées morales dans l'antiquité_, i. 69 _sq._]

[Footnote 65: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 193.]

[Footnote 66: See Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 105.]

[Footnote 67: _Ibid._ ii. 300.]

[Footnote 68: Tacitus, _Annales_, ii. 85.]

[Footnote 69: Tacitus, _Annales_, ii. 85.]

[Footnote 70: Valerius Maximus (_Facta dictaque memorabilia_, ii. 5. 6) praises "frugalitas" as "immoderato Veneris usu aversa."]

[Footnote 71: Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 314.]

[Footnote 72: Horace, _Satiræ_, i. 2. 31 _sq._]

[Footnote 73: Cicero, _Pro C[oe]lio_, 20 (48).]

[Footnote 74: Epictetus, _Enchiridion_, xxxiii. 8.]

[Footnote 75: Denis, _op. cit._ ii. 133 _sqq._]

[Footnote 76: Musonius Rufus, quoted by Stobæus, _Florilegium_, vi. 61.]

[Footnote 77: Denis, _op. cit._ ii. 149 _sqq._]

[Footnote 78: Jamblichus, _De Pythagorica vita_, 31 (191). _Cf._ Jevons, in Plutarch's _Romane Questions_, p. lxxxviii. _sq._]

[Footnote 79: Plato, _Leges_, viii. 840 _sq._ _Cf._ Xenophon, _Memorabilia_, i. 3. 8.]

Much stronger was the censure which Christianity passed on pre-nuptial connections. While looking with suspicion even on the life-long union of one man with one woman, the Church pronounced all other forms of sexual intercourse to be mortal sins. In its Penitentials sins of unchastity were the favourite topic; and its horror of them finds an echo in the secular legislation of the first Christian emperors. Panders were condemned to have molten lead poured down their throats.[80] In the case of forcible seduction both the man and woman, if she consented to the act, were put to death.[81] Even the innocent offspring of illicit intercourse were punished for their parents' sins with ignominy and loss of certain rights which belonged to other, more respectable, members of the Church and the State.[82] Persons of different sex {432} who were not united in wedlock were forbidden by the Church to kiss each other; nay, the sexual desire itself, though unaccompanied by any external act, was regarded as sinful in the unmarried.[83] In this standard of purity no difference of sex was recognised, the same obligations being imposed upon man and woman.[84]

[Footnote 80: Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 316.]

[Footnote 81: _Codex Theodosianus_, ix. 24. 1.]

[Footnote 82: _Concilium Claromontanum_, A.D. 1095, can. 11 (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, xx. 817):--"Ut nulli filii concubinarum ad ordines vel aliquos honores ecclesiasticos promoveantur, nisi monchaliter vel canonice vixerint in ecclesia." See also _supra_, i. 47.]

[Footnote 83: "Perit ergo et ipsa mente virginitas." Katz, _Grundriss des kanonischen Strafrechts_, p. 114 _sq._ For the subject of kissing see also Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 154. 4.]

[Footnote 84: Laurent, _Études sur l'histoire de l'Humanité_, iv. 114.]

In this, as in so many other points of morals, however, there is a considerable discrepancy between Christian doctrine and public opinion in Christian countries. The gross and open immorality of the Middle Ages indicates how little the idea of sexual purity entered into the manners and opinions of the people. The influence of the ascetic doctrine of the Church was in fact quite contrary to its aspirations. The institution of clerical celibacy lowered the estimation of virtue by promoting vice. During the Middle Ages unchastity was regarded as an object of ridicule rather than censure, and in the comic literature of that period the clergy are universally represented as the great corrupters of domestic virtue.[85] Whether the tenet of chastity laid down by the code of Chivalry was taken more seriously may be fairly doubted. A knight, it was said, should be abstinent and chaste;[86] he should love only the virtues, talents, and graces of his lady;[87] and love was defined as the "chaste union of two hearts by virtue wrought."[88] But whilst the knight had certain claims as regards the virtue of his lady, whilst he probably was inclined to draw his sword only for a woman of fair reputation, and whilst he himself professed to aspire only to her lip or hand, we have reason to believe that the amours in which he indulged with her were of a far less delicate kind. Sainte-Palaye observes, "Jamais {433} on ne vit les m[oe]urs plus corrompues que du temps de nos Chevaliers, et jamais le règne de la débauche ne fut plus universel."[89] For a mediæval knight the chief object of life was love. He who did not understand how to win a lady was but half a man; and the difference between a lover and a seducer was apparently slight. The character of the seducer, as Mr. Lecky remarks, and especially of the passionless seducer who pursues his career simply as a kind of sport, and under the influence of no stronger motive than vanity or a spirit of adventure, has for many centuries been glorified and idealised in the popular literature of Christendom in a manner to which there is no parallel in antiquity.[90]

[Footnote 85: Wright, _Essays on Archæological Subjects_, ii. 238. _Cf._ _Idem_, _History of Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages_, pp. 54, 281, 420.]

[Footnote 86: _Book of the Ordre of Chyualry_, fol. 40.]

[Footnote 87: Sainte-Palaye, _Mémoires sur l'ancienne Chevalerie_, ii. 17.]

[Footnote 88: Mills, _History of Chivalry_, i. 214 _sq._]

[Footnote 89: Sainte-Palaye, _op. cit._ ii. 19. _Cf._ Walter Scott, 'Essay on Chivalry,' in _Miscellaneous Prose Works_, vi. 48 _sq._]

[Footnote 90: Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 346. _Cf._ Delécluze, _Roland ou la Chevalerie_, i. 356.]

The Reformation brought about some change for the better, if in no other respect at least by making marriage lawful for a large class of people to whom illicit love had previously been the only means of gratifying a natural desire, and by abolishing the monasteries. In fits of religious enthusiasm even the secular legislators busied themselves with acts of incontinence in which two unmarried adults of different sex were consenting parties. In the days of the Commonwealth, according to an act of 1650, in cases of less serious breach of chastity than adultery and incest, each man or woman was for each offence to be committed to the common gaol for three months, and to find sureties for good behaviour during a whole year afterwards.[91] In Scotland, after the Reformation, fornication was punished with a severity nearly equal to that which attended the infraction of the marriage vow.[92] But the fate of these and similar laws has been either to be repealed or to become inactive.[93] For ordinary acts of incontinence public opinion is, practically at least, the only judge. In the case of female unchastity its sentence is {434} severe enough among the upper ranks of society, whilst, so far as the lower classes are concerned, it varies considerably even in different parts of the same country, and is in many cases regarded as venial. As to similar acts committed by unmarried men, the words which Cicero uttered on behalf of C[oe]lius might be repeated by any modern advocate who, in defending his client, ventured frankly to express the popular opinion on the subject. It seems to me that with regard to sexual relations between unmarried men and women Christianity has done little more than establish a standard which, though accepted perhaps in theory, is hardly recognised by the feelings of the large majority of people--or at least of men--in Christian communities, and has introduced the vice of hypocrisy, which apparently was little known in sexual matters by pagan antiquity.

[Footnote 91: Pike, _History of Crime in England_, ii. 182.]

[Footnote 92: Rogers, _Social Life in Scotland_, ii. 242.]

[Footnote 93: See Pike, _op. cit._ ii. 582; Hume, _Commentaries on the Law of Scotland_, ii. 333.]

Why has sexual intercourse between unmarried people, if both parties consent, come to be regarded as wrong? Why are the moral opinions relating to it subject to so great variations? Why is the standard commonly so different for man and woman? We shall now try to find an answer to these questions.

If marriage, as I am inclined to suppose, is based on an instinct derived from some ape-like progenitor, it would from the beginning be regarded as the natural form of sexual intercourse in the human race, whilst other more transitory connections would appear abnormal and consequently be disapproved of. I am not certain whether some feeling of this sort, however vague, is not still very general in the race. But it has been more or less or almost totally suppressed by social conditions which make it in most cases impossible for men to marry at the first outbreak of the sexual passion.

We have thus to seek for some other explanation of the severe censure passed on pre-nuptial connections.

It seems to me obvious that this censure is chiefly due to the preference which a man gives to a virgin bride. As I have shown in another place, such a preference is a {435} fact of very common occurrence.[94] It partly springs from a feeling akin to jealousy towards women who have had previous connections with other men, partly from the warm response a man expects from a woman whose appetites he is the first to gratify, and largely from an instinctive appreciation of female coyness. Each sex is attracted by the distinctive characteristics of the opposite sex, and coyness is a female quality. In mankind, as among other mammals, the female requires to be courted, often endeavouring for a long time to escape from the male. Not only in civilised countries may courtship mean a prolonged making of love to the woman. Mariner's words with reference to the women of Tonga hold true of a great many, if not all, savage and barbarous races of men. "It must not be supposed," he says, "that these women are always easily won; the greatest attentions and most fervent solicitations are sometimes requisite, even though there be no other lover in the way."[95] The marriage ceremonies of many peoples bear testimony to the same fact. One origin of the form of capture is the resistance of the pursued woman, due to coyness, partly real and partly assumed.[96] On the East Coast of Greenland, for instance, the only method of contracting a marriage is for a man to go to the girl's tent, catch her by her hair or anything else which offers a hold, and drag her off to his dwelling without further ado; violent scenes are often the result, as single women always affect the utmost bashfulness and aversion to any proposal of marriage, lest they should lose their reputation for modesty.[97] It is certainly not the woman who most readily yields to the desires of a man that is most attractive to him; as an ancient writer puts it, all men love seasoned dishes, not plain meats, or plainly dressed {436} fish, and it is modesty that gives the bloom to beauty.[98] Conspicuous eagerness in a woman appears to a man unwomanly, repulsive, contemptible. His ideal is the virgin; the libertine he despises.

[Footnote 94: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 123 _sq._]

[Footnote 95: Mariner, _op. cit._ ii. 174. _Cf._ Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 445 (Bushmans).]

[Footnote 96: _Cf._ Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 623 _sq._; _Idem_, in _Fortnightly Review_, xxi. 897 _sq._; Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 388; Grosse, _Die Formen der Familie_, p. 107; Crawley, _The Mystic Rose_, p. 305 _sq._]

[Footnote 97: Nansen, _First Crossing of Greenland_, i. 316 _sqq._]

[Footnote 98: Athenæus, _Deipnosophistæ_, xiii. 16.]

Where marriage is the customary form of sexual intercourse pre-nuptial incontinence in a woman, as suggesting lack of coyness and modesty, is therefore apt to disgrace her. At the same time it is a disgrace to, and consequently an offence against, her family, especially where the ties of kinship are strong. Moreover, where wives are purchased the unchaste girl, by lowering her market value, deprives her father or parents of part of their property. Among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast, says Major Ellis, "chastity _per se_ is not understood. An unmarried girl is expected to be chaste because virginity possesses a marketable value, and were she to be unchaste her parents would receive little and perhaps no head-money for her."[99] Among the Rendile of Eastern Africa, we are told, the unchastity of unmarried girls meets with severe retribution, the girl invariably being driven out from her home, for the sole and simple reason that her market value to her parents has been decreased.[100] The same commercial point of view is expressed in the Mosaic rule:--"If a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife. If her father utterly refuse to give her unto him, he shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins."[101] But the girl is not the only offender. Whilst the disgrace of incontinence falls on her alone, the offence against her relatives is divided between her and the seducer. Speaking of the presents which, among the Thlinkets, a man is bound to give to the parents of the girl whom he has seduced, Sir James Douglas observes, "The offender is simply regarded as a robber, who has committed depredation on their merchandise, their only anxiety being to make the {437} damages exacted as heavy as possible."[102] Marriage by purchase has thus raised the standard of female chastity, and also, to some extent, checked the incontinence of the men. But it can certainly not be regarded as the sole cause of the duty of chastity where such a duty is recognised by savages. Among the Veddahs, who do not make their daughters objects of traffic,[103] the unmarried girls are nevertheless protected by their natural guardians "with the keenest sense of honour."[104] In many of the instances quoted above where a seduction is followed by more or less serious consequences for the seducer, the penalty he has to pay is evidently something else than the mere market value of the girl.

[Footnote 99: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, p. 286.]

[Footnote 100: Chanler, _Through Jungle and Desert_, p. 317.]

[Footnote 101: _Exodus_, xxii. 16 _sq._]

[Footnote 102: Douglas, quoted by Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 177.]

[Footnote 103: Le Mesurier, 'Veddás of Ceylon,' in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc. Ceylon Branch_, ix. 340. Hartshorne, 'Weddas,' in _Indian Antiquary_, viii. 320.]

[Footnote 104: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 178.]

Thus the men, by demanding that the women whom they marry shall be virgins, indirectly give rise to the demand that they themselves shall abstain from certain forms of incontinence. From my collection of facts relating to savages I find that in the majority of cases where chastity is required of unmarried girls the seducer also is considered guilty of a crime. But, as was just pointed out, his act is judged from a more limited point of view. It is chiefly, if not exclusively, regarded as an offence against the parents or family of the girl; chastity _per se_ is hardly required of savage men. Where prostitution exists they may without censure gratify their passions among its victims. Now, to anybody who duly reflects upon the matter it is clear that the seducer does a wrong to the woman also; but I find no indication that this idea occurs at all to the savage mind. Where the seducer is censured the girl also is censured, being regarded not as the injured party but as an injurer. Even in the case of rape the harm done to the girl herself is little thought of. Among the Tonga Islanders "rape, providing it be not upon a married woman or one to whom respect is due on the score of {438} superior rank from the perpetrator, is considered not as a crime but as a matter of indifference."[105] The same is the case in the Pelew Islands.[106] In the laws of the Rejangs of Sumatra referring to this offence, "there is hardly anything considered but the value of the girl's person to her relations, as a mere vendible commodity."[107] Among the Asiniboin, a Siouan tribe, the punishment for rape is based on the principle that the price of the woman has been depreciated, that the chances of marriage have been lessened, and that the act is an insult to her kindred, as implying contempt of their feelings and their power of protection.[108] Even the Teutons in early days hardly severed rape from abduction, the kinsmen of the woman feeling themselves equally wronged in either case.[109] If the girl's feelings are thus disregarded when she is an unwilling victim of violence, it can hardly be expected that she should be an object of pity when she is a consenting partner. Does not public opinion in the midst of civilisation turn against the dishonoured rather than the dishonourer?

[Footnote 105: Mariner, _op. cit._ ii. 107.]

[Footnote 106: Kubary, 'Die Verbrechen und das Strafverfahren auf den Pelau-Inseln,' in _Original-Mittheil. aus der ethnol. Abtheil. der königl. Museen Berlin_, i. 78.]

[Footnote 107: Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, iii. 130.]

[Footnote 108: Dorsey, 'Siouan Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xv. 226.]

[Footnote 109: Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_ ii. 666. Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 490. According to Salic law, the fine for the rape of an _ingenua puella_ was 62½ solidi, or only a little higher than the fine for a connection with her to which she herself consented (_Lex Salica_, Herold's text, xiv. 4; xv. 3); whereas the fine for adultery with a free woman was 200 solidi (_ibid._ xv. 1).]

There is yet another party to be considered, namely, the offspring. One would imagine that to every thinking mind, not altogether destitute of sympathetic feelings, the question what is likely to happen to the child if the woman becomes pregnant should present itself as one of the greatest gravity. But in judging of matters relating to sexual morality men have generally made little use of their reason and been guilty of much thoughtless cruelty. Although marriage has come into existence solely for the sake of the offspring, it rarely happens that in sexual relations much unselfish thought is bestowed upon unborn {439} individuals. Legal provisions in favour of illegitimate children have made men somewhat more careful, for their own sake, but they have also nourished the idea that the responsibility of fatherhood may be bought off by the small sum the man has to pay for the support of his natural child. Custom or law may exempt him even from this duty. We are told that in Tahiti the father might kill a bastard child, but that, if he suffered it to live, he was _eo ipso_ considered to be married to its mother.[110] This custom, it would seem, is hardly more inhuman than the famous law according to which "la recherche de la paternité est interdite."[111]

[Footnote 110: Cook, _Voyage to the Pacific Ocean_, ii. 157.]

[Footnote 111: _Code Napoléon_, § 340.]

The great authority on the ethics of Roman Catholicism tries to prove that simple fornication is a mortal sin chiefly because it "tends to the hurt of the life of the child who is to be born of such intercourse," or more generally, because "it is contrary to the good of the offspring."[112] But this tender care for the welfare of illegitimate children seems strange when we consider the manner in which such children have been treated by the Roman Catholic Church herself. It is obvious that the extreme horror of fornication which is expressed in the Christian doctrine is in the main a result of the same ascetic principle which declared celibacy superior to marriage and tolerated marriage only because it could not be suppressed.

[Footnote 112: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 154. 2.]

Moral ideas concerning unchastity have also been influenced by the close association which exists in a refined mind between the sexual impulse and a sentiment of affection which lasts long after the gratification of the bodily desire. We find the germ of this feeling in the abhorrence with which prostitution is regarded by savage tribes who have no objection to ordinary sexual intercourse previous to marriage,[113] and in the distinction which among ourselves is drawn between the prostitute and the woman {440} who yields to temptation because she loves. To indulge in mere sexual pleasure, unaccompanied by higher feelings, appears brutal and disgusting in the case of a man, and still more so in the case of a woman. After all, love is generally only an episode in a man's life, whereas for a woman it is the whole of her life.[114] The Greek orator said that in the moment when a woman loses her chastity her mind is changed.[115] On the other hand, when a man and a woman, tied to each other by deep and genuine affection, decide to live together as husband and wife, though not joined in legal wedlock, the censure which public opinion passes upon their conduct seems to an unprejudiced mind justifiable at most only in so far as it may be considered to have been their duty to comply with the laws of their country and to submit to a rule of some social importance.

[Footnote 113: _E.g._, the Chittagong Hill tribes (Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 348). _Cf._ Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 70 _sq._]

[Footnote 114: _Cf._ Simmel, _Einleitung in die Moralwissenschaft_, i. 201; Paulsen, _System der Ethik_, ii. 274.]

[Footnote 115: Lysias, quoted by Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, i. 273.]

Sexual intercourse between unmarried persons of opposite sex is thus regarded as wrong from different points of view under different conditions, social or psychical, and all of these conditions are not in any considerable degree combined at any special stage of civilisation. Sometimes the opinions on the subject are greatly influenced by the institution of marriage by purchase, sometimes they are influenced by the refinement of love; and between such causes there can be no co-operation. This is one reason for the singular complexity which characterises the evolution of the duty of chastity; but there is another reason perhaps even more important. The causes to which this duty may be traced are frequently checked by circumstances operating in an opposite direction. Thus the preference which a man is naturally disposed to give to a virgin bride may be overcome by his desire for offspring, inducing him to marry a woman who has proved capable of gratifying this desire.[116] It may also be ineffective for the simple reason that no virgin bride is to be found. Nothing has more generally prevented chastity {441} from being recognised as a duty than social conditions promoting licentious habits. Even in savage society, where almost every man and every woman marry and most of them marry early in life, there are always a great number of unmarried people of both sexes above the age of puberty; and, generally speaking, the number of the unmarried increases along with the progress of civilisation. This state of things easily leads to incontinence in men and women, and where such incontinence becomes habitual it can hardly incur much censure. Again, where the general standard of female chastity is high, the standard of male chastity may nevertheless be the lowest possible. This is the case where there is a class of women who can no longer be dishonoured, because they have already been dishonoured, whose virtue is of no value either to themselves or their families because they have lost their virtue, and who make incontinence their livelihood. Prostitution, being a safeguard of female chastity, has facilitated the enforcement of the rule which enjoins it as a duty, but at the same time it has increased the inequality of obligations imposed on men and women. It has begun to exercise this influence already at the lower stages of culture. Prostitution is by no means unknown in the savage world.[117] It is a recognised institution in many of the Melanesian islands; "at Santa Cruz," says Dr. Codrington, "where the separation of the sexes is so carefully maintained, there are certainly public courtesans."[118] Prostitution prevails in many or most Negro countries;[119] and so favourably, we are told, is this institution sometimes regarded, that rich Negro ladies on their death-beds buy female slaves and present them to the public, "in the same manner as in England they would have left a legacy to some public charity."[120] The Wanyoro even have a {442} definite system of prostitution, governed by stringent laws which seem to be very old.[121] In Greenland, where it was "reckoned the greatest of infamies" for an unmarried woman to become pregnant,[122] there were professional harlots already in early times;[123] and the same was the case among many of the North American Indians.[124] Thus among the Omahas extra-matrimonial intercourse is, as a rule, practised only with public women, called _minckeda_; and "so strict are the Omahas about these matters, that a young girl or even a married woman walking or riding alone, would be ruined in character, being liable to be taken for a _minckeda_, and addressed as such."[125] Public prostitution was tolerated, if not encouraged, among all the Maya nations, whilst intercourse with other unmarried women was punished with a fine or, if the affronted relatives insisted, with death.[126] "In order to avoid greater evils," the Incas of Peru permitted public prostitutes, who were treated with extreme contempt;[127] but, with this exception, "to be lewd with single women was capital."[128] Among all the civilised nations of the Old World prostitution has existed, and still exists, as a tolerated institution, even where legislators have endeavoured to suppress it.[129] Its prevalence in our modern society greatly increases the perplexity of public opinion in regard to sexual morality. Its victims are degraded and despised beyond description. At the same time their male customers {443} are tacitly allowed to support the trade. That the demand for a merchandise increases the production of it is in this case seldom thought of. But secrecy must be observed. In sexual matters openness is indecent, and the chief crime is to be found out.

[Footnote 116: See _supra_, ii. 423.]

[Footnote 117: See, _e.g._, Tutuila, 'Line Islanders,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 270; Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 261 (natives of New Britain); Davis, _El Gringo_, p. 221 (Indians of New Mexico); Ploss-Bartels, _Das Weib_, i. 536, 540 _sqq._]

[Footnote 118: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 234 _sqq._]

[Footnote 119: _Emin Pasha in Central Africa_, p. 88.]

[Footnote 120: Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 547 _sq._]

[Footnote 121: _Emin Pasha in Central Africa_, p. 87. Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, ii. 49.]

[Footnote 122: Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 123: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 176.]

[Footnote 124: Carver, _Travels through the Interior Parts of North America_, p. 375.]

[Footnote 125: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 365.]

[Footnote 126: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, ii. 676, 659.]

[Footnote 127: Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, i. 321 _sq._]

[Footnote 128: Herrera, _General History of the West Indies_, iv. 340.]

[Footnote 129: Dufour, _Histoire de la prostitution_, _passim_. Doolittle, _Social Life of the Chinese_, i. 348. Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 412. Polak, 'Die Prostitution in Persien,' in _Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift_, xi. 516, 517, 563 _sqq._ Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, i. 150. Weinhold, _Altnordisches Leben_, p. 259 (ancient Scandinavians). Desmaze, _Les pénalités anciennes_, p. 61 _sq._ n. 4; Mackintosh, _History of Civilisation in Scotland_, i. 428 (Middle Ages); &c. Since the thirteenth century even the Church tolerated the establishment of brothels in the larger cities (Müller, _Das sexuelle Leben der christlichen Kulturvölker_, p. 149).]

There is, moreover, a form of religious prostitution, just as there is religious celibacy. In fact, the two customs are sometimes very closely connected with one another. Among the E[(w]e-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast the chief business of the female _kosi_, or wife of the god to whom she is dedicated, is prostitution. "In every town there is at least one institution in which the best-looking girls, between ten and twelve years of age, are received. Here they remain for three years, learning the chants and dances peculiar to the worship of the gods, and prostituting themselves to the priests and the inmates of the male seminaries; and at the termination of their novitiate they become public prostitutes. This condition, however, is not regarded as one for reproach; they are considered to be married to the god, and their excesses are supposed to be caused and directed by him. Properly speaking, their libertinage should be confined to the male worshippers at the temple of the god, but practically it is indiscriminate. Children who are born from such unions belong to the god."[130] So also the priestesses on the Gold Coast, though not allowed to marry, are by no means debarred from sexual intercourse. They "are ordinarily most licentious, and custom allows them to gratify their passions with any man who may chance to take their fancy. A priestess who is favourably impressed by a man sends for him to her house, and this command he is sure to obey, through fear of the consequences of exciting her anger. She then tells him that the god she serves has directed her to love him, and the man thereupon lives with her until she grows tired of him, or a new object takes her fancy. Some priestesses have as many as half a dozen men in their train at one time, and may on great occasions be seen walking {444} in state, followed by them. Their life is one continual record of debauchery and sensuality, and when excited by the dance they frequently abandon themselves to the wildest excesses."[131] It seems that the "wife" of the Egyptian god at Thebes also in time became a libertine; Strabo tells us that the beautiful woman who was dedicated to him had sexual intercourse with any man she chose "till the natural purification of her body took place," after which she was given to a man.[132] In India every Hindu temple of any importance has its dancing girls, whose position is inferior only to that of the sacrificers.[133] Thus at J[)u]g[)u]nnat'h[)u]-ksh[)u]tr[)u] in Orissa a number of women of infamous character are employed to dance and sing before the god. They live in separate houses, not at the temple. The Brahmins who officiate there continually have adulterous connections with them, and these women also prostitute themselves to visitors.[134] In the Canaanitish cults there were women, called _[k.]ed[=e]sh[=o]th_, who were consecrated to the deity with whose temple they were associated, and who at the same time acted as prostitutes.[135] At the local shrines of North Israel the worship of Yahveh itself was deeply affected by these practices;[136] but they were forbidden in the Deuteronomic code.[137] Perhaps this temple prostitution may be accounted for by a belief that it bestowed blessings upon the worshippers. According to notions which prevail to this day in countries with Semitic culture, sexual intercourse with a holy person is regarded as beneficial to him or her who indulges in it.[138]

[Footnote 130: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 131: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, p. 121 _sq._]

[Footnote 132: Strabo, _Geographica_, xvii. i. 46. _Cf._ Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 269.]

[Footnote 133: Warneck, quoted by Ploss-Bartels, _op. cit._ i. 534.]

[Footnote 134: Ward, _View of the History, &c. of the Hindoos_, ii. 134.]

[Footnote 135: Driver, _Commentary on Deuteronomy_, p. 264. Cheyne, 'Harlot,' in Cheyne and Black, _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1965.]

[Footnote 136: _Hosea_, iv. 14. _Cf._ Cheyne, in _Encyclopædia Biblica_, ii. 1965.]

[Footnote 137: _Deuteronomy_, xxiii. 17 _sq._]

[Footnote 138: See Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_, p. 85.]

Of a somewhat different character was the religious prostitution which prevailed in ancient Babylonia, in connection with the worship of Ishtar. Herodotus says that every woman born in that country was obliged once in her {445} life to go and sit down in the precinct of Aphrodite, and there consort with a stranger. A woman who had once taken her seat was not allowed to return home till one of the strangers threw a silver coin into her lap, and took her with him beyond the holy ground. The silver coin could not be refused because, since once thrown, it was sacred. The woman went with the first man who threw her money, rejecting no one. When she had gone with him, and so satisfied the goddess, she returned home, and from that time forth no gift, however great, would prevail with her.[139] Several allusions in cuneiform literature to the sacred prostitution carried on at Babylonian temples confirm Herodotus' statement in general.[140] A cult very similar to this was also found in certain parts of the island of Cyprus,[141] at Heliopolis in Syria,[142] and at Byblus.[143] In the worship of Anaitis the Armenians even of the highest families prostituted their own daughters at least once in their lives, nor was this regarded as any bar to an honourable marriage afterwards.[144] Although such practices were generally excluded from the ordinary Greek worships of Aphrodite, unchastity in the temple cult of that goddess is reported to have occurred at Corinth[145] and in the city of the Locri Epizephyrii, who, according to the story, vowed to consecrate their daughters to this service in order to gain the goddess's aid in a war.[146]

[Footnote 139: Herodotus, i. 199.]

[Footnote 140: Jeremias, _Izdubar-Nimrod_, p. 59 _sq._ Jastrow, _Religion of Babylonia and Assyria_, p. 475 _sq._ Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens_, p. 41.]

[Footnote 141: Herodotus, i. 199. Athenæus, _Deipnosophistæ_, xii. 11, p. 516 a.]

[Footnote 142: Socrates, _Historia ecclesiastica_, 18 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Græca, lxvii. 123). Sozomen, _Historia ecclesiastica_, v. 10 (Migne, Ser. Græca, lxvii. 1243). Eusebius, _Vita Constantini_, iii. 58 (Migne, Ser. Græca, xx. 1124).]

[Footnote 143: Lucian, _De Syria Dea_, 6.]

[Footnote 144: Strabo, xi. 14. 16.]

[Footnote 145: _Ibid._ viii. 6. 20.]

[Footnote 146: Farnell, _Cults of the Greek States_, ii. 636. Athenæus, xii. 11, p. 516 a.]

Various theories have been set forth to explain the religious prostitution of the Babylonian type. It has been interpreted as an expiation for individual marriage, as a temporary recognition of pre-existing communal rights at a time when "communal marriage" in the full sense of the term had already ceased to exist.[147] It {446} has been supposed to be nothing but ordinary immorality practised under the cloak of religion.[148] It has been represented as a form of sacrifice, either as a first-fruit offering[149] or as an act by which a worshipper sacrifices her most precious possession to the deity.[150] To Dr. Farnell it seems to be "a special modification of a wide-spread custom, the custom of destroying virginity before marriage so that the bridegroom's intercourse should be safe from a peril that is much dreaded by men in a certain stage of culture; and here, as in other ritual," he adds, "it is the stranger that takes the peril upon himself."[151] But why should the stranger have been more willing than the bridegroom to expose himself to this danger? Considering that the act was performed at the temple of the goddess of fecundity, I think its object most probably was to ensure fertility in the woman; this, in fact, is directly indicated by the words which the stranger, according to Herodotus, uttered when he threw the silver coin into her lap:--"The goddess Mylitta prosper thee!"[152] And from what has been said in a previous chapter about the semi-supernatural character ascribed to strangers, about the efficacy of their blessings and the benefits expected from their love,[153] we can see why a stranger was appointed to confer the blessing upon the girl.[154]

[Footnote 147: Avebury, _Origin of Civilisation_, p. 559.]

[Footnote 148: Jeremias, _Izdubar-Nimrod_, p. 60.]

[Footnote 149: Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 267 _sq._]

[Footnote 150: Curtiss, _Primitive Semitic Religion To-day_, p. 155.]

[Footnote 151: Farnell, 'Sociological Hypotheses concerning the Position of Women in Ancient Religion,' in _Archiv f. Religionswiss._ vii. 88.]

[Footnote 152: Herodotus, i. 199.]

[Footnote 153: _Supra_, i. ch. xxiv.]

[Footnote 154: Since the present chapter was in type, some fresh attempts have been made to explain this religious prostitution. Sir J. G. Frazer (_Adonis Attis Osiris_, p. 23 _sq._) regards it as a rite intended to ensure the fruitfulness of the ground and the increase of man and beast on the principle of hom[oe]opathic magic. A very similar opinion has been expressed by Dr. Havelock Ellis ('Ursprung und Entwicklung der Prostitution,' in _Mutterschutz_, iii. fasc. 1 _sq._). According to Mr. Hartland, again ('Concerning the Rite at the Temple of Mylitta,' in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_, p. 189 _sqq._), it was a puberty rite involving a sacrifice of virginity to which every woman was subjected. [My own theory has subsequently been accepted by van Gennep, _Les rites de passage_, p. 242 _sq._]]

Among ourselves an act of incontinence assumes a {447} different aspect if one of the parties, either the man or the woman, is married. Involving a breach of faith, adultery is an offence against him or her to whom faith is due, and at the same time the seducer commits an offence against the husband of the adulteress. But here again our own views are not universally shared.

Although it is hard to understand that the seducer could ever be regarded as guiltless, we are told that among a few peoples adultery is not held to be wrong;[155] and Mr. Morgan states that among the Iroquois "punishment was inflicted upon the woman alone, who was supposed to be the only offender."[156] But these cases are certainly quite exceptional. In a savage tribe a seducer may be thankful if he escapes by paying to the injured husband the value of the bride or some other fine, or if the penalty is reduced to a flogging, to his head being shaved, his ears cut off, one of his eyes destroyed, or his legs speared. Very commonly he has to pay with his life. We have seen that even among many peoples who generally prohibit self-redress an adulterer may be put to death by the aggrieved husband, especially if he be caught _flagrante delicto_;[157] and in other cases he may be subject to capital punishment, in the proper sense of the word.[158] In Albania, even in our days, custom not only allows, but compels, the injured husband to kill the adulterer.[159] Hebrew law enjoined the man who committed adultery with another man's wife to be put to death;[160] and Christian legislators followed the example. Constantine celebrated his new zeal for the sacramental idea of marriage by establishing the punishment of death for the seducer;[161] adultery was in point of {448} heinousness assimilated to murder, idolatry, and sorcery.[162] Various mediæval law-books punished the seducer with death;[163] whilst in Scotland notorious and manifest adultery was made capital as late as 1563.[164] This extreme severity, however, has been followed by extreme leniency. In Scotland, though adultery kept its place in the statute-book as a heinous and in some cases a capital crime, prosecution for it had ceased for many years before the time of Baron Hume;[165] and in England it is no crime at all in the eyes of the law, only an ecclesiastical offence.

[Footnote 155: Davis, _El Gringo_, p. 221 _sq._ (Indians of New Mexico). Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 146 (Cherokees). Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 204. Prejevalsky, _Mongolia_, i. 70 (Mongols). Colquhoun, _Amongst the Shans_, p. 75 (Yendalines, one of the Karen tribes). Chanler, _op. cit._ p. 317 (Rendile in Eastern Africa). Lichtenstein, _Travels in Southern Africa_, ii. 48 (Bushmans).]

[Footnote 156: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 331.]

[Footnote 157: _Supra_, i. 290 _sqq._]

[Footnote 158: _Supra_, i. 189.]

[Footnote 159: Hahn, _Albanesische Studien_, i. 177.]

[Footnote 160: _Leviticus_, xx. 10. _Deuteronomy_, xxii. 22.]

[Footnote 161: _Codex Justinianus_, ix. 9. 29. 4.]

[Footnote 162: _Codex Theodosianus_, xi. 36. i. St. Basil, quoted by Bingham, _Works_, vi. 432 _sq._]

[Footnote 163: Du Boys, _Histoire du droit criminel des peuples modernes_, ii. 606. _Idem_, _Histoire du droit criminel de l'Espagne_, p. 391.]

[Footnote 164: Erskine-Rankine, _Principles of the Law of Scotland_, p. 563.]

[Footnote 165: Hume, _Commentaries on the Law of Scotland_, ii. 302.]

The punishment of the seducer often varies according to his rank, or according to that of the husband, or according to the relative rank of both, or according to the rank of the adulteress. Among the Monbuttu, if the guilty woman belongs to the royal household, the adulterer is put to death, whereas otherwise he is only compelled to pay an indemnity to the offended husband.[166] Among the E[(w]e-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast the fine imposed for adultery depends on the rank of the injured husband;[167] and the same principle is found in Anglo-Saxon law.[168] Among the Bakongo, again, the penalties for adultery "vary from capital punishment to a trifling fine, according to the station of the offender or the district he lives in."[169] Drury tells us that in the country of Anterndroea in Madagascar, "if a man lies with another man's wife who is superior to him, he forfeits thirty head of cattle besides beads and shovels a great number," whereas "if the men are of an equal rank, then twenty beasts are the fine."[170] According to the Chinese Penal Code, a slave who is guilty of criminal intercourse with the wife or daughter of a freeman, shall be punished at the least one degree more {449} severely than a freeman would have been under the same circumstances.[171] In India a man of one of the first three castes who committed adultery with a Sûdra woman was banished, but a Sûdra who committed adultery with a woman of one of the first three castes suffered capital punishment;[172] and an opinion is also quoted that for a Brâhmana who once was guilty of adultery with a married woman of equal class, the penance was one-fourth of that prescribed for an outcast.[173] In ancient Peru "an adulterer was punish'd with death, if the woman was of note, or else with the rack."[174]

[Footnote 166: Casati, _Ten Years in Equatoria_, i. 163.]

[Footnote 167: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 202.]

[Footnote 168: _Laws of Alfred_, ii. 10.]

[Footnote 169: Johnston, _River Congo_, p. 404.]

[Footnote 170: Drury, _Journal_, p. 183.]

[Footnote 171: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. ccclxxiii. p. 409.]

[Footnote 172: _Âpastamba_, ii. 10. 27. 8 _sq._]

[Footnote 173: _Ibid._ ii. 10. 27. 11.]

[Footnote 174: Herrera, _op. cit._ iv. 338.]

We find no difficulty in explaining all these facts. In early civilisation a husband has often extreme rights over his wife. The seducer encroaches upon a right of which he is most jealous, and with regard to which his passions are most easily inflamed. Adultery is regarded as an illegitimate appropriation of the exclusive claims which the husband has acquired by the purchase of his wife, as an offence against property.[175] It is said in the 'Laws of Manu' that "seed must not be sown by any man on that which belongs to another."[176] How closely the seducer is associated with a thief is illustrated by the fact that among some peoples he is punished as such, having his hands, or one of them, cut off.[177] Yet even among savages the offence is something more than a mere infringement of the right of ownership. The Kurile Islanders, says Krasheninnikoff, have an extraordinary way of punishing adultery: the husband of the adulteress challenges the adulterer to a combat. The result is generally the death of both the combatants; but it is held to be "as great dishonour to refuse this combat as to refuse an invitation to a duel among the people of Europe."[178] The passion of jealousy, the feeling of ownership, and the sense of honour, {450} thus combine to make the seducer's act an offence, and often a heinous offence, in the eyes of custom or law; and for the same reasons as in other offences the magnitude of guilt is here also influenced by the rank of the parties concerned. Modern legislation, on the other hand, does not to the same extent as early law and custom allow a man to give free vent to his angry passion; it regards the dishonour of the aggrieved husband as a matter of too private a character to be publicly avenged; and the faithfulness which a wife owes her husband is no longer connected with any idea of ownership. Moreover, the severity of earlier European laws against adultery was closely connected with Christianity's abhorrence of all kinds of irregular sexual intercourse; and secular legislation has more and more freed itself from the bondage of religious doctrine.

[Footnote 175: See, _e.g._, Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 225; Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 77; Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 5; Letourneau, _L'évolution de la morale_, p. 154 _sq._]

[Footnote 176: _Laws of Manu_, ix. 42.]

[Footnote 177: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 130.]

[Footnote 178: Krasheninnikoff, _History of Kamschatka_, p. 238.]

Among some savage peoples it is the seducer only who suffers, whilst the unfaithful wife escapes without punishment.[179] Jealousy, in the first place, turns against the rival, and the seducer is the dishonourer and the thief. But, as a general rule, the unfaithful wife is also looked upon as an offender, and the punishment falls on both. She is discarded, beaten, or ill-treated in some way or other, and not infrequently she is killed. Often, too, she is disfigured by her enraged husband, so that no man may fall in love with her ever after.[180] Indeed, so strong is the idea that a wife belongs exclusively to her husband, that among several peoples she has to die with him;[181] and frequently a widow is prohibited from remarrying either for ever or for a certain period after the husband's death.[182] In ancient Peru widows generally continued to live single, as "this virtue was much commended in their laws and ordinances."[183] Nor is it in China considered proper {451} for a woman to contract a second marriage after her husband's death, and a lady of rank, by doing so, exposes herself to a penalty of eighty blows.[184] "As a faithful minister does not serve two lords, neither may a faithful woman marry a second husband"--this is to the Chinese a principle of life, a maxim generally received as gospel.[185] Among so-called Aryan peoples the ancient custom which ordained sacrifice of widows survived in the prohibitions issued against their marrying a second time.[186] Even now the bare mention of a second marriage for a Hindu woman would be considered the greatest of insults, and, if she married again, "she would be hunted out of society, and no decent person would venture at any time to have the slightest intercourse with her."[187] In Greece[188] and Rome[189] a widow's remarriage was regarded as an insult to her former husband; and so it is still regarded among the Southern Slavs.[190] The early Christians, especially the Montanists and Novatians, strongly disapproved of second marriages by persons of either sex;[191] a second marriage was described by them as a "kind of fornication,"[192] or as a "specious adultery."[193] It was looked upon as a manifest sign of incontinence, and also as inconsistent with the doctrine that marriage is an emblem of the union of Christ with the Church.[194]

[Footnote 179: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 122. Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 133 (Kandhs). Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 189 _sq._ Scaramucci and Giglioli, 'Notizie sui Danakil,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xiv. 26.]

[Footnote 180: Westermarck, _op. cit._ p. 122.]

[Footnote 181: _Ibid._ p. 125 _sq._ _Supra_, i. 472 _sqq._]

[Footnote 182: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 127 _sqq._]

[Footnote 183: Garcilasso de la Vega, _op. cit._ i. 305.]

[Footnote 184: Gray, _China_, i. 215.]

[Footnote 185: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 745.]

[Footnote 186: Schrader, _Prehistoric Antiquities of the Aryan Peoples_, p. 391.]

[Footnote 187: Dubois, _People of India_, p. 132.]

[Footnote 188: Pausanias, ii. 21. 7.]

[Footnote 189: Rossbach, _Römische Ehe_, p. 262.]

[Footnote 190: Krauss, _Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven_, p. 578. _Cf._ Ralston, _Songs of the Russian People_, p. 115 (Bulgarians).]

[Footnote 191: Mayer, _Die Rechte der Israeliten, Athener und Römer_, ii. 290. Bingham, _op. cit._ vi. 427 _sq._; viii. 13 _sq._]

[Footnote 192: Tertullian, _De exhortatione castitatis_, 9 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, ii. 924).]

[Footnote 193: Athenagoras, _Legatio pro Christianis_, 33 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, vi. 967).]

[Footnote 194: Gibbon, _History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, ii. 187. Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 326.]

Conjugal fidelity, whilst considered a stringent duty in the wife, is not generally considered so in the husband. This is obviously the rule among savage and barbarous tribes; but there are interesting exceptions to the rule. The Igorrotes of Luzon are so strictly monogamous that {452} in case of adultery the guilty party can be compelled to leave the hut and the family for ever,[195] and among various other monogamous savages adultery is said to be unknown.[196] The Dyak husband "preserves his vow of fidelity with a rectitude which makes jealousy a farce."[197] The Toungtha, who marry only one wife, do not consider it right for a master to take advantage of his position even with regard to the female slaves in his house.[198] Nay, the duty of fidelity in the husband has been recognised even by some savage peoples who allow polygamy. The Abipones, we are told, thought it both wicked and disgraceful to have any illicit intercourse with other women than their wives; hence adultery was almost unheard of among them.[199] Among the Omaha Indians, "if a woman's husband be guilty of adultery with another woman she may strike him or the guilty female in her anger," though she cannot claim damages.[200] In several tribes of Western Victoria a wife whose husband has been unfaithful to her "may make a complaint to the chief, who can punish the man by sending him away from his tribe for two or three moons";[201] and among some aborigines in New South Wales similar complaints may be made to the elders of the tribe, with the result that the adulterous husband may have to suffer for his conduct.[202] The Kandhs of India deny the married man certain prerogatives which are granted to his wife: whilst constancy to her husband is so far from being required in a wife, "that her pretensions do not, at least, suffer diminution in the eyes of either sex when fines are levied on her convicted lovers," infidelity in a married man is held to be highly dishonourable, and {453} is often punished with deprivation of many social privileges.[203]

[Footnote 195: Meyer, in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. f. Anthrop._ 1883, p. 385.]

[Footnote 196: Bailey, in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N. S. ii. 291 _sq._ Hartshorne, in _Indian Antiquary_, viii. 320 (Veddahs). Finsch, _Neu-Guinea_, p. 101; Earl, _Papuans_, p. 81 (Papuans of Dorey).]

[Footnote 197: Boyle, _Adventures among the Dyaks of Borneo_, p. 236. See also Low, _Sarawak_, p. 300 (Hill Dyaks).]

[Footnote 198: Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 193 _sq._]

[Footnote 199: Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 138.]

[Footnote 200: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 364.]

[Footnote 201: Dawson, _Australian Aborigines_, p. 33.]

[Footnote 202: Nieboer, _Slavery as an Industrial System_, p. 18.]

[Footnote 203: Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 133.]

The duty which savages thus in certain instances have imposed on the husband is hardly at all recognised in the archaic State. The Mexicans "did not consider, nor did they punish, as adultery the trespass of a husband with any woman who was free, or not joined in matrimony; wherefore the husband was not bound to so much fidelity as was exacted from the wife," adultery in her being inevitably punished with death.[204] In China, where adultery in a woman is branded as one of the vilest crimes and the guilty wife is oftentimes "cut into small pieces," concubinage is a recognised institution of the country.[205] In Corea "conjugal fidelity--obligatory on the woman--is not required of the husband. . . . Among the nobles, the young bridegroom spends three or four days with his bride, and then absents himself from her for a considerable time, to prove that he does not esteem her too highly. Etiquette dooms her to a species of widowhood, while he spends his hours of relaxation in the society of his concubines. To act otherwise would be considered in very bad taste, and highly unfashionable."[206] In Japan, "while the man is allowed a loose foot, the woman is expected not only to be absolutely spotless, but also never to show any jealousy, however wide the husband may roam, or however numerous may be the concubines in his family."[207] According to Hebrew law adultery was a capital offence, but it presupposed that the guilty woman was another man's wife.[208] The "Aryan" nations in early times generally saw nothing objectionable in the unfaithfulness of a married man, whereas an adulterous wife was subject to the severest penalties.[209] Until some time after the introduction of Christianity among the Teutons their {454} law-books made no mention of the infidelity of husbands, because it was permitted by custom.[210] The Romans defined adultery as sexual intercourse with another man's wife; on the other hand, the intercourse of a married man with an unmarried woman was not regarded as adultery.[211] The ordinary Greek feeling on the subject is expressed in the oration against Neæra, ascribed to Demosthenes, where the licence accorded to husbands is spoken of as a matter of course:--"We keep mistresses for our pleasures, concubines for constant attendance, and wives to bear us legitimate children and to be our faithful house-keepers."[212]

[Footnote 204: Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 356.]

[Footnote 205: Doolittle, _op. cit._ i. 339. Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 149.]

[Footnote 206: Griffis, _Corea_, p. 251 _sq._]

[Footnote 207: _Idem_, _Religions of Japan_, p. 320.]

[Footnote 208: _Leviticus_, xx. 10. _Deuteronomy_, xxii. 22.]

[Footnote 209: Schrader, _Prehistoric Antiquities of the Aryan Peoples_, p. 388.]

[Footnote 210: Wilda, _Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 821. Nordström, _op. cit._ ii. 67 _sq._ Stemann, _Den danske Retshistorie indtil Christian V.'s Lov_, pp. 324, 633. Keyser, _Efterladte Skrifter_, vol. ii. pt. ii. 32 _sq._ Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 662.]

[Footnote 211: Vinnius, _In quatuor libros institutionum imperialium commentarius_, iv. 18. 4, p. 993. _Cf._ _Digesta_, l. 16. 101. 1; Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 688 _sq._]

[Footnote 212: _Oratio in Neæram_, p. 1386. _Cf._ Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 196 _sq._]

At the same time the idea that fidelity in marriage ought to be reciprocal was not altogether unknown in classical antiquity.[213] In a lost chapter of his 'Economics,' which has come to us only through a Latin translation, Aristotle points out that it for various reasons is prudent for a man to be faithful to his wife, but that nothing is so peculiarly the property of a wife as a chaste and hallowed intercourse.[214] Plutarch condemns the man who, lustful and dissolute, goes astray with a courtesan or maid-servant; though at the same time he admonishes the wife not to be vexed or impatient, considering that "it is out of respect to her that he bestows upon another all his wanton depravity."[215] Plautus argues that it is unjust of a husband to exact a fidelity which he does not keep himself.[216]

[Footnote 213: Lecky, _op. cit._ ii. 312 _sq._ Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 195 _sq._]

[Footnote 214: Aristotle, _[OE]conomica_, p. 341, vol. ii. 679. _Cf._ Isocrates, _Nicocles sive Cyprii_, 40.]

[Footnote 215: Plutarch, _Conjugalia præcepta_, 16.]

[Footnote 216: Plautus, _Mercator_, iv. 5.]

In its condemnation of adultery Christianity made no distinction between husband and wife.[217] If continence is a stringent duty for unmarried persons independently of {455} their sex, the observance of the sacred marriage vow must be so in a still higher degree. But here again there is a considerable discrepancy between the actual feelings of Christian peoples and the standard of their religion. Even in the laws of various European countries relating to divorce or judicial separation we find an echo of the popular notion that adultery is a smaller offence in a husband than in a wife.[218]

[Footnote 217: Laurent, _op. cit._ iv. 114. Gratian, _Decretum_, ii. 35. 5. 23.]

[Footnote 218: See _supra_, ii. 397.]

The judgment pronounced upon an unfaithful husband is of course influenced by the opinion about extra-matrimonial connections in general. Where it is considered wrong for a man to have intercourse with either an unmarried woman or another man's wife, adultery in a husband is _eo ipso_ condemned. But whether, or how far, infidelity on his part is stigmatised as an offence against his wife, chiefly depends upon the degree of regard which is paid to the feelings of women. That a married man generally enjoys more liberty than a married woman is largely due to the same causes as make him the more privileged partner in other respects; but there are also special reasons for this inequality between the sexes. It was a doctrine of the Roman jurists that adultery is a crime in the wife, and in the wife only, on account of the danger of introducing strange children to the husband.[219] Moreover, the temptation to infidelity and the facility in indulging in it are commonly greater in the case of the husband than in that of the wife; and, as we have often noticed before, actual practice is always apt to influence moral opinion. And a still more important reason for the inequality in question is undoubtedly the general notion that unchastity of any kind is more discreditable for a woman than for a man.

[Footnote 219: Hunter, _Exposition of Roman Law_, p. 1071.]

CHAPTER XLIII

HOMOSEXUAL LOVE

OUR review of the moral ideas concerning sexual relations has not yet come to an end. The gratification of the sexual instinct assumes forms which fall outside the ordinary pale of nature. Of these there is one which, on account of the _rôle_ which it has played in the moral history of mankind, cannot be passed over in silence, namely, intercourse between individuals of the same sex, what is nowadays commonly called homosexual love.

It is frequently met with among the lower animals.[1] It probably occurs, at least sporadically, among every race of mankind.[2] And among some peoples it has assumed such proportions as to form a true national habit.

[Footnote 1: Karsch, 'Päderastie und Tribadie bei den Tieren,' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, ii. 126 _sqq._ Havelock Ellis, _Studies in the Psychology of Sex_, 'Sexual Inversion,' p. 2 _sqq._]

[Footnote 2: Ives, _Classification of Crimes_, p. 49. The statement that it is unknown among a certain people cannot reasonably mean that it may not be practised in secret.]

In America homosexual customs have been observed among a great number of the native tribes. In nearly every part of the continent there seem to have been, since ancient times, men dressing themselves in the clothes and performing the functions of women, and living with other men as their concubines or wives.[3] Moreover, between {457} young men who are comrades in arms there are _liaisons d'amitié_, which, according to Lafitau, "ne laissent aucun soupçon de vice apparent, quoiqu'il y ait, ou qu'il puisse y avoir, beaucoup de vice réel."[4]

[Footnote 3: von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 246; von Martius, _Von dem Rechtszustande unter den Ureinwohnern Brasiliens_, p. 27 _sq._; Lomonaco, 'Sulle razze indigene del Brasile,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xix. 46; Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 246 (Brazilian Indians). Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, ii. 441 _sqq._; Cieza de Leon, 'La crónica del Perú [primera parte],' ch. 49, in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, xxvi. 403 (Peruvian Indians at the time of the Spanish conquest). Oviedo y Valdés, 'Sumario de la natural historia de las Indias,' ch. 81, in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, xxii. 508 (Isthmians). Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, i. 585 (Indians of New Mexico); ii. 467 _sq._ (ancient Mexicans). Diaz del Castillo, 'Conquista de Nueva-España,' ch. 208, in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, xxvi. 309 (ancient Mexicans). Landa, _Relacion de las cosas de Yucatan_, p. 178 (ancient Yucatans). Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, 'Naufragios y relacion de la jornada que hizo a la Florida,' ch. 26, in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, xxii. 538; Coreal, _Voyages aux Indes Occidentales_, i. 33 _sq._ (Indians of Florida). Perrin du Lac, _Voyage dans les deux Louisianes et chez les nations sauvages du Missouri_, p. 352; Bossu, _Travels through Louisiana_, i. 303. Hennepin, _Nouvelle Découverte d'un très Grand Pays Situé dans l'Amerique_, p. 219 _sq._; 'La Salle's Last Expedition and Discoveries in North America,' in _Collections of the New-York Historical Society_, ii. 237 _sq._; de Lahontan, _Mémoires de l'Amérique septentrionale_, p. 142 (Illinois). Marquette, Recit des voyages, p. 52 _sq._ (Illinois and Naudowessies). Wied-Neuwied, _Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 351 (Manitaries, Mandans, &c.). McCoy, _History of Baptist Indian Missions_, p. 360 _sq._ (Osages). Heriot, _Travels through the Canadas_, p. 278; Catlin, _North American Indians_, ii. 214 _sq._ (Sioux). Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 365; James, _Expedition from Pittsburgh to the Rocky Mountains_, i. 267 (Omahas). Loskiel, _History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Indians_, 1.14 (Iroquois). Richardson, _Arctic Searching Expedition_, ii. 42 (Crees). Oswald, quoted by Bastian, _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_, iii. 314 (Indians of California). Holder, in _New York Medical Journal_, December 7th, 1889, quoted by Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 9 _sq._ (Indians of Washington and other tribes in the North-Western United States). See also Karsch, 'Uranismus oder Päderastie und Tribadie bei den Naturvölkern,' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iii. 112 _sqq._]

[Footnote 4: Lafitau, _Moeurs des sauvages ameriquains_, i. 603, 607 _sqq._]

Homosexual practices are, or have been, very prominent among the peoples in the neighbourhood of Behring Sea.[5] In Kadiak it was the custom for parents who had a girl-like son to dress and rear him as a girl, teaching him only domestic duties, keeping him at woman's work, and letting him associate only with women and girls. Arriving at the age of ten or fifteen years, he was married to some wealthy man and was then called an _achnuchik_ or _shoopan_.[6] Dr. Bogoraz gives the following account of a {458} similar practice prevalent among the Chukchi:--"It happens frequently that, under the supernatural influence of one of their shamans, or priests, a Chukchi lad at sixteen years of age will suddenly relinquish his sex and imagine himself to be a woman. He adopts a woman's attire, lets his hair grow, and devotes himself altogether to female occupation. Furthermore, this disowner of his sex takes a husband into the _yurt_ and does all the work which is usually incumbent on the wife in most unnatural and voluntary subjection. Thus it frequently happens in a _yurt_ that the husband is a woman, while the wife is a man! These abnormal changes of sex imply the most abject immorality in the community, and appear to be strongly encouraged by the shamans, who interpret such cases as an injunction of their individual deity." The change of sex was usually accompanied by future shamanship; indeed, nearly all the shamans were former delinquents of their sex.[7] Among the Chukchi male shamans who are clothed in woman's attire and are believed to be transformed physically into women are still quite common; and traces of the change of a shaman's sex into that of a woman may be found among many other Siberian tribes.[8] In some cases at least there can be no doubt that these transformations were connected with homosexual practices. In his description of the Koriaks, Krasheninnikoff makes mention of the _ke'yev_, that is, men occupying the position of concubines; and he compares them with the Kamchadale _koe'k[vc]u[vc]_, as he calls them, that is, men transformed into women. Every _koe'k[vc]u[vc]_, he says, is regarded as a magician and interpreter of dreams; but from his confused description Mr. Jochelson thinks it may be inferred that the most important feature of the institution of the _koe'k[vc]u[vc]_ lay, not in their shamanistic power, but in their position with regard to the satisfaction of the {459} unnatural inclinations of the Kamchadales. The _koe'k[vc]u[vc]_ wore women's clothes, did women's work, and were in the position of wives or concubines.[9]

[Footnote 5: Dall, _Alaska_, p. 402; Bancroft, _op. cit._ i. 92; Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iii. 314 (Aleuts), von Langsdorf, _Voyages and Travels_, ii. 48 (natives of Oonalaska). Steller, _Kamtschatka_, p. 289, n. _a_; Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 132 _sq._ (Kamchadales).]

[Footnote 6: Davydow, quoted by Holmberg, 'Ethnographische Skizzen über die Völker des russischen Amerika,' in _Acta Soc. Scientiarum Fennicæ_, iv. 400 _sq._ Lisiansky, _Voyage Round the World_, p. 199. von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ ii. 64. Sauer, _Billing's Expedition to the Northern Parts of Russia_, p. 176. Sarytschew, 'Voyage of Discovery to the North-East of Siberia,' in _Collection of Modern and Contemporary Voyages_, vi. 16.]

[Footnote 7: Bogoraz, quoted by Demidoff, _Shooting Trip to Kamchatka_, p. 74 _sq._]

[Footnote 8: Jochelson, _Koryak Religion and Myth_, pp. 52, 53 n. 3.]

[Footnote 9: Jochelson, _op. cit._ p. 52 _sq._]

In the Malay Archipelago homosexual love is common,[10] though not in all of the islands.[11] It is widely spread among the Bataks of Sumatra.[12] In Bali it is practised openly, and there are persons who make it a profession.[13] The _basir_ of the Dyaks are men who make their living by witchcraft and debauchery. They "are dressed as women, they are made use of at idolatrous feasts and for sodomitic abominations, and many of them are formally married to other men."[14] Dr. Haddon says that he never heard of any unnatural offences in Torres Straits;[15] but in the Rigo district of British New Guinea several instances of pederasty have been met with,[16] and at Mowat in Daudai it is regularly indulged in.[17] Homosexual love is reported as common among the Marshall Islanders[18] and in Hawaii.[19] From Tahiti we hear of a set of men called by the natives _mahoos_, who "assume the dress, attitude, and manners, of women, and affect all the fantastic oddities and coquetries of the vainest of females. They mostly associate with the women, who court their acquaintance. With the manners of the women, they adopt their peculiar employments. . . . The encouragement of this abomination is almost solely {460} confined to the chiefs."[20] Of the New Caledonians M. Foley writes:--"La plus grande fraternité n'est pas chez eux la fraternité uterine, mais la fraternité des armes. Il en est ainsi surtout au village de Poepo. Il est vrai que cette fraternité des armes est compliquée de pédérastie."[21]

[Footnote 10: Wilken, 'Plechtigheden en gebruiken bij verlovingen en huwelijken bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel,' in _Bijdragen tot de taal- land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, xxxiii. (ser. v. vol. iv.) p. 457 _sqq._]

[Footnote 11: Crawfurd, _History of the Indian Archipelago_, iii. 139. Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 261.]

[Footnote 12: Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 157, n.*]

[Footnote 13: Jacobs, _Eenigen tijd onder de Baliërs_, pp. 14, 134 _sq._]

[Footnote 14: Hardeland, _Dajacksch-deutsches Wörterbuch_, p. 53 _sq._ Schwaner, _Borneo_, i. 186. Perelaer, _Ethnographische beschrijving der Dajaks_, p. 32.]

[Footnote 15: Haddon, 'Ethnography of the Western Tribe of Torres Straits,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xix. 315.]

[Footnote 16: Seligmann, 'Sexual Inversion among Primitive Races,' in _The Alienist and Neurologist_, xxiii. 3 _sqq._]

[Footnote 17: Beardmore, 'Natives of Mowat, Daudai, New Guinea,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xix. 464. Haddon, _ibid._ xix. 315.]

[Footnote 18: Hernsheim, _Beitrag zur Sprache der Marshall-Inseln_, p. 40. A different opinion is expressed by Senfft, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse von eingeborenen Völkern in Afrika und Ozeanien_, p. 437.]

[Footnote 19: Remy, _Ka Mooolelo Hawaii_, p. xliii.]

[Footnote 20: Turnbull, _Voyage Round the World_, p. 382. See also Wilson, _Missionary Voyage to the Southern Pacific_, pp. 333, 361; Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 246, 258.]

[Footnote 21: Foley, 'Sur les habitations et les m[oe]urs des Néo-Calédoniens,' in _Bull. Soc. d'Anthrop. Paris_, ser. iii. vol. ii. 606. See also de Rochas, _Nouvelle Calédonie_, p. 235.]

Among the natives of the Kimberley District in West Australia, if a young man on reaching a marriageable age can find no wife, he is presented with a boy-wife, known as _chookadoo_. In this case, also, the ordinary exogamic rules are observed, and the "husband" has to avoid his "mother-in-law," just as if he were married to a woman. The _chookadoo_ is a boy of five years to about ten, when he is initiated. "The relations which exist between him and his protecting _billalu_" says Mr. Hardman, "are somewhat doubtful. There is no doubt they have connection, but the natives repudiate with horror and disgust the idea of sodomy."[22] Such marriages are evidently exceedingly common. As the women are generally monopolised by the older and more influential men of the tribe, it is rare to find a man under thirty or forty who has a wife; hence it is the rule that, when a boy becomes five years old, he is given as a boy-wife to one of the young men.[23] According to Mr. Purcell's description of the natives of the same district, "every useless member of the tribe" gets a boy, about five or seven years old; and these boys, who are called _mullawongahs_, are used for sexual purposes.[24] Among the Chingalee of South Australia, Northern Territory, old men are often noticed with no wives but accompanied by one or two boys, whom they jealously guard and with whom they have sodomitic intercourse.[25] {461} That homosexual practices are not unknown among other Australian tribes may be inferred from Mr. Hewitt's statement relating to South-Eastern natives, that unnatural offences are forbidden to the novices by the old men and guardians after leaving the initiation camp.[26]

[Footnote 22: Hardman, 'Notes on some Habits and Customs of the Natives of the Kimberley District,' in _Proceed. Roy. Irish Academy_, ser. iii. vol. i. 74.]

[Footnote 23: _Ibid._ pp. 71, 73.]

[Footnote 24: Purcell, 'Rites and Customs of Australian Aborigines,' in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._ 1893, p. 287.]

[Footnote 25: Ravenscroft, 'Some Habits and Customs of the Chingalee Tribe,' in _Trans. Roy. Soc. South Australia_, xv. 122. I am indebted to Mr. N. W. Thomas for drawing my attention to these statements.]

[Footnote 26: Howitt, 'Some Australian Ceremonies of Initiation,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiii. 450.]

In Madagascar there are certain boys who live like women and have intercourse with men, paying those men who please them.[27] In an old account of that island, dating from the seventeenth century, it is said: "II y a . . . quelques hommes qu'ils appellent Tsecats, qui sont hommes effeminez et impuissans, qui recherchent les garçons, et font mine d'en estre amoureux, en contrefaisans les filles et se vestans ainsi qu'elles leurs font des presents pour dormir auec eux, et mesmes se donnent des noms de filles, en faisant les honteuses et les modestes. . . . Ils haïssent les femmes et ne les veulent point hanter."[28] Men behaving like women have also been observed among the Ondonga in German South-West Africa[29] and the Diakité-Sarracolese in the French Soudan,[30] but as regards their sexual habits details are wanting. Homosexual practices are common among the Banaka and Bapuku in the Cameroons.[31] But among the natives of Africa generally such practices seem to be comparatively rare,[32] except among Arabic-speaking {462} peoples and in countries like Zanzibar,[33] where there has been a strong Arab influence. In North Africa they are not restricted to the inhabitants of towns; they are frequent among the peasants of Egypt[34] and universal among the Jbâla inhabiting the Northern mountains of Morocco. On the other hand, they are much less common or even rare among the Berbers and the nomadic Bedouins,[35] and it is reported that the Bedouins of Arabia are quite exempt from them.[36]

[Footnote 27: Lasnet, in _Annales d'hygiène et de médecine coloniales_, 1899, p. 494, quoted by Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 10. _Cf._ Rencurel, in _Annales d'hygiène_, 1900, p. 562, quoted _ibid._ p. 11 _sq._ See also Leguével de Lacombe, _Voyage à Madagascar_, i. 97 _sq._ Pederasty prevails to some extent in the island of Nossi-Bé, close to Madagascar, and is very common at Ankisimane, opposite to it, on Jassandava Bay (Walter, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 376).]

[Footnote 28: de Flacourt, _Histoire de la grande isle Madagascar_, p. 86.]

[Footnote 29: Rautanen, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 333.]

[Footnote 30: Nicole, _ibid._ p. 111.]

[Footnote 31: _Ibid._ p. 38.]

[Footnote 32: Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 525 (Barea and Kunáma). Baumann, 'Conträre Sexual-Erscheinungen bei der Neger-Bevölkerung Zanzibars,' in _Verhandl. der Berliner Gesellsch. für Anthropologie_, 1899, p. 668. Felkin, 'Notes on the Waganda Tribe of Central Africa,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 723.

Johnston, _British Central Africa_, p. 404 (Bakongo). Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 57 (Negroes of Accra). Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Mbala,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 410. Nicole, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 111 (Muhammedan Negroes). Tellier, _ibid._ p. 159 (Kreis Kita in the French Soudan). Beverley, _ibid._ p. 210 (Wagogo). Kraft, _ibid._ p. 288 (Wapokomo).]

[Footnote 33: Baumann, in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._ 1899, p. 668 _sq._]

[Footnote 34: Burckhardt, _Travels in Nubia_, p. 135.]

[Footnote 35: d'Escayrac de Lauture, _Afrikanische Wüste_, p. 93.]

[Footnote 36: Burckhardt, _Travels in Arabia_, i. 364. See also von Kremer, _Culturgeschichte des Orients_, ii. 269.]

Homosexual love is spread over Asia Minor and Mesopotamia.[37] It is very prevalent among the Tartars and Karatchai of the Caucasus,[38] the Persians,[39] Sikhs,[40] and Afghans; in Kaubul a bazaar or street is set apart for it.[41] Old travellers make reference to its enormous frequency among the Muhammedans of India,[42] and in this respect time seems to have produced no change.[43] In China, where it is also extremely common, there are special houses devoted to male prostitution, and boys are sold by their parents about the age of four, to be trained for this occupation.[44] In Japan pederasty is said by some to have prevailed from the most ancient times, whereas others are of opinion that it was introduced by Buddhism about the sixth century of our era. The monks used to live with handsome youths, to whom they were often passionately devoted; and in feudal times nearly every knight had as {463} his favourite a young man with whom he entertained relations of the most intimate kind, and on behalf of whom he was always ready to fight a duel when occasion occurred. Tea-houses with male _gheishas_ were found in Japan till the middle of the nineteenth century. Nowadays pederasty seems to be more prevalent in the Southern than in the Northern provinces of the country, but there are also districts where it is hardly known.[45]

[Footnote 37: Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 232.]

[Footnote 38: Kovalewsky, _Coutume contemporaine_, p. 340.]

[Footnote 39: Polak, 'Die Prostitution in Persien,' in _Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift_, xi. 627 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Persien_, i. 237. Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 233 _sq._ Wilson, _Persian Life and Customs_, p. 229.]

[Footnote 40: Malcolm, _Sketch of the Sikhs_, p. 140. Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 5, n. 2. Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 236.]

[Footnote 41: Wilson, _Abode of Snow_, p. 420. Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 236.]

[Footnote 42: Stavorinus, _Voyages to the East-Indies_, i. 456. Fryer, _New Account of East-India_, p. 97. Chevers, _Manual of Medical Jurisprudence for India_, p. 705.]

[Footnote 43: Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 708.]

[Footnote 44: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 193. Wells Williams, _The Middle Kingdom_, i. 836. Matignon, 'Deux mots sur la pédérastie en Chine,' in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xiv. 38 _sqq._ Karsch, _Das gleichgeschlechtliche Leben der Ostasiaten_, p. 6 _sqq._]

[Footnote 45: Jwaya, 'Nan sho k,' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iv. 266, 268, 270. Karsch, _op. cit._ p. 71 _sqq._]

No reference is made to pederasty either in the Homeric poems or by Hesiod, but later on we meet with it almost as a national institution in Greece. It was known in Rome and other parts of Italy at an early period;[46] but here also it became much more frequent in the course of time. At the close of the sixth century, Polybius tells us, many Romans paid a talent for the possession of a beautiful youth.[47] During the Empire "il était d'usage, dans les families patriciennes, de donner au jeune homme pubère un esclave du même âge comme compagnon de lit, afin qu'il pût satisfaire . . . 'ses premiers élans' génésiques";[48] and formal marriages between men were introduced with all the solemnities of ordinary nuptials.[49] Homosexual practices occurred among the Celts,[50] and were by no means unknown to the ancient Scandinavians, who had a whole nomenclature on the subject.[51]

[Footnote 46: Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitates Romanæ_, vii. 2. Athenæus, _Deipnosophistæ_, xii. 14, p. 518 (Etruscans). Rein, _Criminalrecht der Römer_, p. 863.]

[Footnote 47: Polybius, _Historiæ_, xxxii. 11. 5.]

[Footnote 48: Buret, _La syphilis aujourd'hui et chez les anciens_, p. 197 _sqq._ Catullus, _Carmina_, lxi. ('In Nuptias Juliæ et Manlii'), 128 _sqq._ _Cf._ Martial, _Epigrammata_, viii. 44. 16 _sq._]

[Footnote 49: Juvenal, _Satiræ_, ii. 117 _sqq._ Martial, _op. cit._ xii. 42.]

[Footnote 50: Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, v. 32. 7. Aristotle, _Politica_, ii. 9, p. 1269 b.]

[Footnote 51: 'Spuren von Konträrsexualität bei den alten Skandinaviern,' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iv. 244 _sqq._]

Of late years a voluminous and constantly increasing literature on homosexuality[52] has revealed its frequency in modern Europe. No country and no class of society is free from it. In certain parts of Albania it even exists as a popular custom, the young men from the age of sixteen {464} upwards regularly having boy favourites of between twelve and seventeen.[53]

[Footnote 52: See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

[Footnote 53: Hahn, _Albanesische Studien_, i. 168.]

The above statements chiefly refer to homosexual practices between men, but similar practices also occur between women.[54] Among the American aborigines there are not only men who behave like women, but women who behave like men.

Thus in certain Brazilian tribes women are found who abstain from every womanly occupation and imitate the men in everything, who wear their hair in a masculine fashion, who go to war with a bow and arrows, who hunt together with the men, and who would rather allow themselves to be killed than have sexual intercourse with a man. "Each of these women has a woman who serves her and with whom she says she is married; they live together as husband and wife."[55] So also there are among the Eastern Eskimo some women who refuse to accept husbands, preferring to adopt masculine manners, following the deer on the mountains, trapping and fishing for themselves.[56] Homosexual practices are said to be common among Hottentot[57] and Herero[58] women. In Zanzibar there are women who wear men's clothes in private, show a preference for masculine occupations, and seek sexual satisfaction among women who have the same inclination, or else among normal women who are won over by presents or other means.[59] In Egyptian harems every woman is said to have a "friend."[60] In Bali homosexuality is almost as common among women as among men, though it is exercised more secretly;[61] and the same seems to be the case in India.[62] From Greek antiquity we {465} hear of "Lesbian" love. The fact that homosexuality has been much more frequently noticed in men than in women does not imply that the latter are less addicted to it. For various reasons the sexual abnormalities of women have attracted much less attention,[63] and moral opinion has generally taken little notice of them.

[Footnote 54: Karsch, in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iii. 85 _sqq._ Ploss-Bartels, _Das Weib_, i. 517 _sqq._ von Krafft-Ebing, _Psychopathia sexualis_, p. 278 _sqq._ Moll, _Die Conträre Sexualempfindung_, p. 247 _sqq._ Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 118 _sqq._]

[Footnote 55: Magalhanes de Gandavo, _Histoire de la Province de Sancta-Cruz_, p. 116 _sq._]

[Footnote 56: Dall, _op. cit._ p. 139.]

[Footnote 57: Fritsch, quoted by Karsch, in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iii. 87 _sq._]

[Footnote 58: Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 227. _Cf._ Schinz, _Deutsch-Südwest-Afrika_, pp. 173, 177.]

[Footnote 59: Baumann, in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._ 1899, p. 668 _sq._]

[Footnote 60: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 123.]

[Footnote 61: Jacobs, _Eenigen tijd onder de Baliërs_, p. 134 _sq._]

[Footnote 62: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 124 _sq._]

[Footnote 63: See _ibid._ p. 121 _sq._]

Homosexual practices are due sometimes to instinctive preference, sometimes to external conditions unfavourable to normal intercourse.[64] A frequent cause is congenital sexual inversion, that is, "sexual instinct turned by inborn constitutional abnormality toward persons of the same sex."[65] It seems likely that the feminine men and the masculine women referred to above are, at least in many instances, sexual inverts; though, in the case of shamans, the change of sex may also result from the belief that such transformed shamans, like their female colleagues, are particularly powerful.[66] Dr. Holder affirms the existence of congenital inversion among the North-Western tribes of the United States,[67] Dr. Baumann among the people of Zanzibar;[68] and in Morocco, also, I believe it is common enough. But as regards its prevalence among non-European peoples we have mostly to resort to mere conjectures; our real knowledge of congenital inversion is derived from the voluntary confessions of inverts. The large majority of travellers are totally ignorant of the psychological side of the subject, and even to an expert it must very often be impossible to decide whether a certain case of inversion is congenital or acquired. Indeed, acquired inversion itself presupposes an innate disposition which under certain circumstances develops into actual inversion.[69] Even between inversion and normal sexuality {466} there seem to be all shades of variation. Professor James thinks that inversion is "a kind of sexual appetite, of which very likely most men possess the germinal possibility."[70] This is certainly the case in early puberty.[71]

[Footnote 64: Another reason for such practices is given by Mr. Beardmore (in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xix. 464), with reference to the Papuans of Mowat. He says that they indulge in sodomy because too great increase of population is undesired amongst the younger portion of the married people. _Cf._ _infra_, p. 484 _sqq._]

[Footnote 65: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 1.]

[Footnote 66: Jochelson, _op. cit._ p. 52 _sq._]

[Footnote 67: Holder, quoted by Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 9 _sq._]

[Footnote 68: Baumann, in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._ 1899, p. 668 _sq._]

[Footnote 69: Féré, _L'instinct sexuel_, quoted by Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 41.]

[Footnote 70: James, _Principles of Psychology_, ii. 439. See also Ives, _op. cit._ p. 56 _sqq._]

[Footnote 71: Dr. Dessoir ('Zur Psychologie der Vita sexualis,' in _Allgemeine Zeitschrift für Psychiatrie_, l. 942) even goes so far as to conclude that "an undifferentiated sexual feeling is normal, on the average, during the first years of puberty." But this is certainly an exaggeration (_cf._ Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 47 _sq._).]

A very important cause of homosexual practices is absence of the other sex. There are many instances of this among the lower animals.[72] Buffon long ago observed that, if male or female birds of various species were shut up together, they would soon begin to have sexual relations among themselves, the males sooner than the females.[73] The West Australian boy-marriage is a substitute for ordinary marriage in cases when women are not obtainable. Among the Bororó of Brazil homosexual intercourse is said to occur in their men-houses only when the scarcity of accessible girls is unusually great.[74] Its prevalence in Tahiti may perhaps be connected with the fact that there was only one woman to four or five men, owing to the habit of female infanticide.[75] Among the Chinese in certain regions, for instance Java, the lack of accessible women is the principal cause of homosexual practices.[76] According to some writers such practices are the results of polygamy.[77] In Muhammedan countries they are no doubt largely due to the seclusion of women, preventing free intercourse between the sexes and compelling the unmarried people to associate almost exclusively with members of their own sex. Among the mountaineers of Northern Morocco the excessive indulgence in pederasty thus goes hand in hand with great isolation of the women {467} and a very high standard of female chastity, whereas among the Arabs of the plains, who are little addicted to boy-love, the unmarried girls enjoy considerable freedom. Both in Asia[78] and Europe[79] the obligatory celibacy of the monks and priests has been a cause of homosexual practices, though it must not be forgotten that a profession which imposes abstinence from marriage is likely to attract a comparatively large number of congenital inverts. The temporary separation of the sexes involved in a military mode of life no doubt accounts for the extreme prevalence of homosexual love among warlike races,[80] like the Sikhs, Afghans, Dorians, and Normans.[81] In Persia[82] and Morocco it is particularly common among soldiers. In Japan it was an incident of knighthood, in New Caledonia and North America of brotherhood in arms. At least in some of the North American tribes men who were dressed as women accompanied the other men as servants in war and the chase.[83] Among the Banaka and Bapuku in the Cameroons pederasty is practised especially by men who are long absent from their wives.[84] In Morocco I have heard it advocated on account of the convenience it affords to persons who are travelling.

[Footnote 72: Karsch, in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, ii. 126 _sqq._ Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 2 _sq._]

[Footnote 73: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 2.]

[Footnote 74: von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 502.]

[Footnote 75: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 257 _sq._]

[Footnote 76: Matignon, in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xiv. 42. Karsch, _op. cit._ p. 32 _sqq._]

[Footnote 77: Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iii. 113. Bastian, _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_, iii. 305 (Dahomans).]

[Footnote 78: _Supra_, ii. 462. Karsch. _op. cit._ pp. 7. (China), 76 _sqq._ (Japan), 132 (Corea).]

[Footnote 79: See Voltaire, _Dictionnaire philosophique_, 'Amour Socratique' (_[OE]uvres_, vii. 82); Buret, _Syphilis in the Middle Ages and in Modern Times_, p. 88 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: _Cf._ Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 5.]

[Footnote 81: Freeman, _Reign of William Rufus_, i. 159.]

[Footnote 82: Polak, in _Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift_, xi. 628.]

[Footnote 83: Marquette, _op. cit._ p. 53 (Illinois). Perrin du Lac, _Voyage dans les deux Louisianes et chez les nations sauvages du Missouri_, p. 352. _Cf._ Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca, _loc. cit._ p. 538 (concerning the Indians of Florida):--" . . . tiran arco y llevan muy gran carga."]

[Footnote 84: Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 38.]

Dr. Havelock Ellis justly observes that when homosexual attraction is due simply to the absence of the other sex we are not concerned with sexual inversion, but merely with the accidental turning of the sexual instinct into an abnormal channel, the instinct being called out by an approximate substitute, or even by diffused emotional excitement, in the absence of the normal object.[85] But it seems to me probable that in such cases the homosexual {468} attraction in the course of time quite easily develops into genuine inversion. I cannot but think that our chief authorities on homosexuality have underestimated the modifying influence which habit may exercise on the sexual instinct. Professor Krafft-Ebing[86] and Dr. Moll[87] deny the existence of acquired inversion except in occasional instances; and Dr. Havelock Ellis takes a similar view, if putting aside those cases of a more or less morbid character in which old men with failing sexual powers, or younger men exhausted by heterosexual debauchery, are attracted to members of their own sex.[88] But how is it that in some parts of Morocco such a very large proportion of the men are distinctly sexual inverts, in the sense in which this word is used by Dr. Havelock Ellis,[89] that is, persons who for the gratification of their sexual desire prefer their own sex to the opposite one? It may be that in Morocco and in Oriental countries generally, where almost every individual marries, congenital inversion, through the influence of heredity, is more frequent than in Europe, where inverts so commonly abstain from marrying. But that this could not be an adequate explanation of the fact in question becomes at once apparent when we consider the extremely unequal distribution of inverts among different neighbouring tribes of the same stock, some of which are very little or hardly at all addicted to pederasty. I take the case to be, that homosexual practices in early youth have had a lasting effect on the sexual instinct, which at its first appearance, being somewhat indefinite, is easily turned into a homosexual direction.[90] In Morocco inversion is most prevalent among the scribes, who from childhood have lived in very close association with their fellow-students. Of course, influences of this kind "require a favourable organic predisposition to act on";[91] but this predisposition is probably no abnormality at all, only a {469} feature in the ordinary sexual constitution of man.[92] It should be noticed that the most common form of inversion, at least in Muhammedan countries, is love of boys or youths not yet in the age of puberty, that is, of male individuals who are physically very like girls. Voltaire observes:--"Souvent un jeune garçon, par la fraîcheur de son teint, par l'éclat de ses couleurs, et par la douceur de ses yeux, ressemble pendant deux ou trois ans à une belle fille; si on l'aime, c'est parce que la nature se méprend."[93] Moreover, in normal cases sexual attraction depends not only on sex, but on a youthful appearance as well; and there are persons so constituted that to them the latter factor is of chief importance, whilst the question of sex is almost a matter of indifference.

[Footnote 85: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 3.]

[Footnote 86: Krafft-Ebing, _op. cit._ p. 211 _sq._]

[Footnote 87: Moll, _op. cit._ p. 157 _sqq._]

[Footnote 88: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 50 _sq._ _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 181 _sqq._]

[Footnote 89: _Ibid._ p. 3.]

[Footnote 90: _Cf._ Norman, 'Sexual Perversion,' in Tuke's _Dictionary of Psychological Medicine_, ii. 1156.]

[Footnote 91: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 191.]

[Footnote 92: Dr. Havelock Ellis also admits (_op. cit._ p. 190) that, if in early life the sexual instincts are less definitely determined than when adolescence is complete, "it is conceivable, though unproved, that a very strong impression, acting even on a normal organism, may cause arrest of sexual development on the psychic side. It is a question," he adds, "I am not in a position to settle."]

[Footnote 93: Voltaire, _Dictionnaire Philosophique_, art. 'Amour Socratique,' (_[OE]uvres_, vii. 81). _Cf._ Ovid, _Metamorphoses_, x. 84 _sq._]

In ancient Greece, also, not only homosexual intercourse but actual inversion, seems to have been very common; and although this, like every form of love, must have contained a congenital element, there can be little doubt, I think, that it was largely due to external circumstances of a social character. It may, in the first place, be traced to the methods of training the youth. In Sparta it seems to have been the practice for every youth of good character to have his lover, or "inspirator,"[94] and for every well-educated man to be the lover of some youth.[95] The relations between the "inspirator" and the "listener" were extremely intimate: at home the youth was constantly under the eyes of his lover, who was supposed to be to him a model and pattern of life;[96] in battle they stood near one another and their fidelity and affection were often shown till death;[97] if his relatives were absent, the youth {470} might be represented in the public assembly by his lover;[98] and for many faults, particularly want of ambition, the lover could be punished instead of the "listener."[99] This ancient custom prevailed with still greater force in Crete, which island was hence by many persons considered to be the place of its birth.[100] Whatever may have been the case originally, there can be no doubt that in later times the relations between the youth and his lover implied unchaste intercourse.[101] And in other Greek states the education of the youth was accompanied by similar consequences. At an early age the boy was taken away from his mother, and spent thenceforth all his time in the company of men, until he reached the age when marriage became for him a civic duty.[102] According to Plato, the gymnasia and common meals among the youth "seem always to have had a tendency to degrade the ancient and natural custom of love below the level, not only of man, but of the beasts."[103] Plato also mentions the effect which these habits had on the sexual instincts of the men: when they reached manhood they were lovers of youths and not naturally inclined to marry or beget children, but, if at all, they did so only in obedience to the law.[104] Is not this, in all probability, an instance of acquired inversion? But besides the influence of education there was another factor which, co-operating with it, favoured the development of homosexual tendencies, namely, the great gulf which mentally separated the sexes. Nowhere else has the difference in culture between men and women been so immense as in the fully developed Greek civilisation. The lot of a wife in Greece was retirement and ignorance. She lived in almost absolute seclusion, in a separate part of the house, together with her female slaves, deprived of all the educating influence of male society, and having no place at those public spectacles {471} which were the chief means of culture.[105] In such circumstances it is not difficult to understand that men so highly intellectual as those of Athens regarded the love of women as the offspring of the common Aphrodite, who "is of the body rather than of the soul."[106] They had reached a stage of mental culture at which the sexual instinct normally has a craving for refinement, at which the gratification of mere physical lust appears brutal. In the eyes of the most refined among them those who were inspired by the heavenly Aphrodite loved neither women nor boys, but intelligent beings whose reason was beginning to be developed, much about the time at which their beards began to grow.[107] In present China we meet with a parallel case. Dr. Matignon observes:--"Il y a tout lieu de supposer que certains Chinois, raffinés au point de vue intellectuel, recherchent dans la pédérastie la satisfaction des sens et de l'esprit. La femme chinoise est peu cultivée, ignorante même, quelle que soit sa condition, honnête femme ou prostituée. Or le Chinois a souvent l'âme poétique: il aime les vers, la musique, les belles sentences des philosophes, autant de choses qu'il ne peut trouver chez le beau sexe de l'Empire du Milieu."[108] So also it seems that the ignorance and dullness of Muhammedan women, which is a result of their total lack of education and their secluded life, is a cause of homosexual practices; Moors are sometimes heard to defend pederasty on the plea that the company of boys, who have always news to tell, is so much more entertaining than the company of women.

[Footnote 94: Servius, _In Vergilii Æneidos_, x. 325. For the whole subject of pederasty among the Dorians see Mueller, _History and Antiquities of the Doric Race_, ii. 307 _sq._]

[Footnote 95: Aelian, _Varia historia_, iii. 10.]

[Footnote 96: Mueller, _op. cit._ ii. 308.]

[Footnote 97: Xenophon, _Historia Græca_, iv. 8. 39.]

[Footnote 98: Plutarch, _Lycurgus_, xxv. 1.]

[Footnote 99: _Ibid._ xviii. 8. Aelian, _op. cit._ iii. 10.]

[Footnote 100: Aelian, _op. cit._ iii. 9. Athenaeus, _Deipnosophistæ_, xiii. 77, p. 601.]

[Footnote 101: _Cf._ Symonds, 'Die Homosexualität in Griechenland,' in Havelock Ellis and Symonds, _Das konträre Geschlechtsgefühl_, p. 55.]

[Footnote 102: _Ibid._ p. 116. Döllinger, _The Gentile and the Jew_, ii. 244.]

[Footnote 103: Plato, _Leges_, i. 636. _Cf._ Plutarch, _Amatorius_, v. 9.]

[Footnote 104: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 192.]

[Footnote 105: 'State of Female Society in Greece,' in _Quarterly Review_, xxii. 172 _sqq._ Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 287. Döllinger, _op. cit._ ii. 234.]

[Footnote 106: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 181. That the low state of the Greek women was instrumental to pederasty has been pointed out by Döllinger (_op. cit._ ii. 244) and Symonds (_loc. cit._ pp. 77, 100, 101, 116 _sqq._).]

[Footnote 107: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 181.]

[Footnote 108: Matignon, in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xiv. 41.]

We have hitherto dealt with homosexual love as a fact; we shall now pass to the moral valuation to which it is subject. Where it occurs as a national habit we may assume that no censure, or no severe censure, is passed on it. Among the Bataks of Sumatra there is no punishment {472} for it.[109] Of the _bazirs_ among the Ngajus of Pula Patak, in Borneo, Dr. Schwaner says that "in spite of their loathsome calling they escape well-merited contempt."[110] The Society Islanders had for their homosexual practices "not only the sanction of their priests, but the direct example of their respective deities."[111] The _tsekats_ of Madagascar maintained that they were serving the deity by leading a feminine life;[112] but we are told that at Ankisimane and in Nossi-Bé, opposite to it, pederasts are objects of public contempt.[113] Father Veniaminof says of the Atkha Aleuts that "sodomy and too early cohabitation with a betrothed or intended wife are called among them grave sins";[114] but apart from the fact that his account of these natives in general gives the impression of being somewhat eulogistic, the details stated by him only show that the acts in question were considered to require a simple ceremony of purification.[115] There is no indication that the North American aborigines attached any opprobrium to men who had intercourse with those members of their own sex who had assumed the dress and habits of women. In Kadiak such a companion was on the contrary regarded as a great acquisition; and the effeminate men themselves, far from being despised, were held in repute by the people, most of them being wizards.[116] We have previously noticed the connection between homosexual practices and shamanism among various Siberian peoples; and it is said that such shamans as had changed their sex were greatly feared by the people, being regarded as very powerful.[117] Among the Illinois and Naudowessies the {473} effeminate men assist in all the juggleries and the solemn dance in honour of the _calumet_, or sacred tobacco pipe, for which the Indians have such a deference that one may call it "the god of peace and war, and the arbiter of life and death"; but they are not permitted either to dance or sing. They are called into the councils of the Indians, and nothing can be decided upon without their advice; for because of their extraordinary manner of living they are looked upon as _manitous_, or supernatural beings, and persons of consequence.[118] The Sioux, Sacs, and Fox Indians give once a year, or oftener if they choose, a feast to the _Berdashe_, or _I-coo-coo-a_, who is a man dressed in woman's clothes, as he has been all his life. "For extraordinary privileges which he is known to possess, he is driven to the most servile and degrading duties, which he is not allowed to escape; and he being the only one of the tribe submitting to this disgraceful degradation, is looked upon as 'medicine' and sacred, and a feast is given to him annually; and initiatory to it, a dance by those few young men of the tribe who can . . . . dance forward and publicly make their boast (without the denial of the Berdashe) . . . . Such, and such only, are allowed to enter the dance and partake of the feast."[119] Among some American tribes, however, these effeminate men are said to be despised, especially by the women.[120] In ancient Peru, also, homosexual practices seem to have entered in the religious cult. In some particular places, says Cieza de Leon, boys were kept as priests in the temples, with whom it was rumoured that the lords joined in company on days of festivity. They did not meditate, he adds, the committing of such sin, but only the offering of sacrifice to the demon. If the Incas by chance had some knowledge of such proceedings in the temple, they might have {474} ignored them out of religious tolerance.[121] But the Incas themselves were not only free from such practices in their own persons, they would not even permit any one who was guilty of them to remain in the royal houses or palaces. And Cieza heard it related that, if it came to their knowledge that somebody had committed an offence of that kind, they punished it with such a severity that it was known to all.[122] Las Casas tells us that in several of the more remote provinces of Mexico sodomy was tolerated, if not actually permitted, because the people believed that their gods were addicted to it; and it is not improbable that in earlier times the same was the case in the entire empire.[123] But in a later age severe measures were adopted by legislators in order to suppress the practice. In Mexico people found guilty of it were killed.[124] In Nicaragua it was punished capitally by stoning,[125] and none of the Maya nations was without strict laws against it.[126] Among the Chibchas of Bogota the punishment for it was the infliction of a painful death.[127] However, it should be remembered that the ancient culture nations of America were generally extravagant in their punishments, and that their penal codes in the first place expressed rather the will of their rulers than the feelings of the people at large.[128]

[Footnote 109: Junghuhn, _op. cit._ ii. 157, n.]

[Footnote 110: Schwaner, _op. cit._ i. 186.]

[Footnote 111: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 258. _Cf._ Moerenhout, _Voyages aux îles du Grand Océan_, ii. 167 _sq._]

[Footnote 112: de Flacourt, _op. cit._ p. 86.]

[Footnote 113: Walter, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 376.]

[Footnote 114: Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 158.]

[Footnote 115: _Ibid._ p. 158:--"The offender desirous of unburdening himself selected a time when the sun was clear and unobscured; he picked up certain weeds and carried them about his person; then deposited them and threw his sin upon them, calling the sun as a witness, and, when he had eased his heart of all that had weighed upon it, he threw the grass or weeds into the fire, and after that considered himself cleansed of his sin."]

[Footnote 116: Davydow, quoted by Holmberg, _loc. cit._ p. 400 _sq._ Lisianski, _op. cit._ p. 199.]

[Footnote 117: Bogoraz, quoted by Demidoff, _op. cit._ p. 75. Jochelson, _op. cit._ p. 52 _sq._]

[Footnote 118: Marquette, _op. cit._ p. 53 _sq._]

[Footnote 119: Catlin, _North American Indians_, ii. 214 _sq._]

[Footnote 120: 'La Salle's Last Expedition in North America,' in _Collections of the New-York Historical Society_, ii. 238 (Illinois). Perrin du Lac, _Voyage dans les deux Louisianes et chez les nations sauvages du Missouri_, p. 352. Bossu, _op. cit._ i. 303 (Chactaws). Oviedo y Valdés, _loc. cit._ p. 508 (Isthmians). von Martius, _Von dem Rechtszustande unter den Ureinwohnern Brasiliens_, p. 28 (Guaycurús).]

[Footnote 121: Cieza de Leon, _Segunda parte de Crónica del Perú_, ch. 25, p. 99. See also _Idem_, _Crónica del Perú [primera parte]_, ch. 64 (_Biblioteca de autores españoles_, xxvi. 416 _sq._).]

[Footnote 122: _Idem_, _Segunda parte de Crónica del Perú_, ch. 25, p. 98. See also Garcilasso de la Vega, _op. cit._ ii. 132.]

[Footnote 123: Las Casas, quoted by Bancroft, _op. cit._ ii. 467 _sq._ _Cf._ _ibid._ ii. 677.]

[Footnote 124: Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 357.]

[Footnote 125: Squier, 'Archæology and Ethnology of Nicaragua,' in _Trans. American Ethn. Soc._ iii. pt. i. 128.]

[Footnote 126: Bancroft, _op. cit._ ii. 677.]

[Footnote 127: Piedrahita, _Historia general de las conquistas del nuevo reyno de Granada_, p. 46.]

[Footnote 128: See _supra_, i. 186, 195.]

Homosexual practices are said to be taken little notice of even by some uncivilised peoples who are not addicted to them. In the Pelew Islands, where such practices occur only sporadically, they are not punished, although, if I understand Herr Kubary rightly, the persons committing them may be put to shame.[129] The Ossetes of the Caucasus, {475} among whom pederasty is very rare, do not generally prosecute persons for committing it, but ignore the act.[130] The East African Masai do not punish sodomy.[131] But we also meet with statements of a contrary nature. In a Kafir tribe Mr. Warner heard of a case of it--the only one during a residence of twenty-five years--which was punished with a fine of some cattle claimed by the chief.[132] Among the Ondonga pederasts are hated, and the men who behave like women are detested, most of them being wizards.[133] The Washambala consider pederasty a grave moral aberration and subject it to severe punishment.[134] Among the Waganda homosexual practices, which have been introduced by the Arabs and are of rare occurrence, "are intensely abhorred," the stake being the punishment.[135] The Negroes of Accra, who are not addicted to such practices, are said to detest them.[136] In Nubia pederasty is held in abhorrence, except by the Kashefs and their relations, who endeavour to imitate the Mamelukes in everything.[137]

[Footnote 129: Kubary, 'Die Verbrechen und das Strafverfahren auf den Pelau-Inseln,' in _Original-Mittheilungen aus der ethnologischen Abtheilung der königlichen Museen zu Berlin_, i. 84.]

[Footnote 130: Kovalewsky, _Coutume contemporaine_, p. 340.]

[Footnote 131: Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 208. The Masai, however, slaughter at once any bullock or he-goat which is noticed to practise unnatural intercourse, for fear lest otherwise their herds should be visited by a plague as a divine punishment (_ibid._ p. 159).]

[Footnote 132: Warner, in Maclean, _Compendium of Kafir Laws_, p. 62.]

[Footnote 133: Rautanen, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 333 _sq._]

[Footnote 134: Lang, _ibid._ p. 232.]

[Footnote 135: Felkin, in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 723.]

[Footnote 136: Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 57.]

[Footnote 137: Burckhardt, _Travels in Nubia_, p. 135.]

Muhammed forbade sodomy,[138] and the general opinion of his followers is that it should be punished like fornication--for which the punishment is, theoretically, severe enough[139]--unless the offenders make a public act of penitence. In order to convict, however, the law requires that four reliable persons shall swear to have been eye-witnesses,[140] and this alone would make the law a dead letter, even if it had the support of popular feelings; but such support is certainly wanting. In Morocco active {476} pederasty is regarded with almost complete indifference, whilst the passive sodomite, if a grown-up individual, is spoken of with scorn. Dr. Polak says the same of the Persians.[141] In Zanzibar a clear distinction is made between male congenital inverts and male prostitutes; the latter are looked upon with contempt, whereas the former, as being what they are "by the will of God," are tolerated.[142] The Muhammedans of India and other Asiatic countries regard pederasty, at most, as a mere peccadillo.[143] Among the Hindus it is said to be held in abhorrence,[144] but their sacred books deal with it leniently. According to the 'Laws of Manu,' "a twice-born man who commits an unnatural offence with a male, or has intercourse with a female in a cart drawn by oxen, in water, or in the day-time, shall bathe, dressed in his clothes"; and all these are reckoned as minor offences.[145]

[Footnote 138: _Koran_, iv. 20.]

[Footnote 139: Sachau, _Muhammedanisches Recht nach Schafiitischer Lehre_, pp. 809, 818:--"Sodomita si _mu[h.][s.]an_ (that is, a married person in possession of full civic rights) est punitur lapidatione, si non est _mu[h.][s.]an_ punitur et flagellatione et exsilio."]

[Footnote 140: Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 224.]

[Footnote 141: Polak, in _Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift_, xi. 628 _sq._]

[Footnote 142: Baumann, in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._ 1899, p. 669.]

[Footnote 143: Chevers, _op. cit._ p. 708. Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 222 _sqq._]

[Footnote 144: Burton, _Arabian Nights_, x. 237.]

[Footnote 145: _Laws of Manu_, xi. 175. _Cf._ _Institutes of Vishnu_, liii. 4; _Âpastamba_, i. 9. 26. 7; _Gautama_, xxv. 7.]

Chinese law makes little distinction between unnatural and other sexual offences. An unnatural offence is variously considered according to the age of the patient, and whether or not consent was given. If the patient be an adult, or a boy over the age of twelve, and consent, the case is treated as a slightly aggravated form of fornication, both parties being punished with a hundred blows and one month's cangue, whilst ordinary fornication is punished with eighty blows. If the adult or boy over twelve resist, the offence is considered as rape; and if the boy be under twelve, the offence is rape irrespective of consent or resistance, unless the boy has previously gone astray.[146] But, as a matter of fact, unnatural offences are regarded as less hurtful to the community than ordinary immorality,[147] and pederasty is not looked down upon. "L'opinion publique reste tout à fait indifférente à ce genre de distraction et la {477} morale ne s'en émeut en rien: puisque cela plaît à l'opérateur et que l'opéré est consentant, tout est pour le mieux; la loi chinoise n'aime guère à s'occuper des affaires trop intimes. La pédérastie est même considérée comme une chose de bon ton, une fantaisie dispendieuse et partout un plaisir élégant. . . . La pédérastie a une consécration officielle en Chine. Il existe, en effet, des pédérés pour l'Empereur."[148] Indeed, the only objection which Dr. Matignon has heard to be raised to pederasty by public opinion in China is that it has a bad influence on the eyesight.[149] In Japan there was no law against homosexual intercourse till the revolution of 1868.[150] In the period of Japanese chivalry it was considered more heroic if a man loved a person of his own sex than if he loved a woman; and nowadays people are heard to say that in those provinces of the country where pederasty is widely spread the men are more manly and robust than in those where it does not prevail.[151]

[Footnote 146: Alabaster, _Notes and Commentaries on Chinese Criminal Law_, p. 367 _sqq._ _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, Appendix, no. xxxii. p. 570.]

[Footnote 147: Alabaster, _op. cit._ p. 369.]

[Footnote 148: Matignon, in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, xiv. 42, 43, 52.]

[Footnote 149: _Ibid._ p. 44.]

[Footnote 150: Karsch, _op. cit._ p. 99.]

[Footnote 151: Jwaya, in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iv. 266, 270 _sq._]

The laws of the ancient Scandinavians ignored homosexual practices; but passive pederasts were much despised by them. They were identified with cowards and regarded as sorcerers. The epithets applied to them--_argr_, _ragr_, _blandr_, and others assumed the meaning of "poltroon" in general, and there are instances of the word _arg_ being used in the sense of "practising witchcraft." This connection between pederasty and sorcery, as a Norwegian scholar justly points out, helps us to understand Tacitus' statement that among the ancient Teutons individuals whom he describes as _corpore infames_ were buried alive in a morass.[152] Considering that drowning was a common penalty for sorcery, it seems probable that this punishment was inflicted upon them not, in the first place, on account of their sexual practices, but in their capacity of wizards. It is certain that the opprobrium which the pagan Scandinavians attached to homosexual love was chiefly restricted to him who played the woman's part. In one of the poems {478} the hero even boasts of being the father of offspring borne by another man.[153]

[Footnote 152: Tacitus, _Germania_, 12.]

[Footnote 153: 'Spuren von Konträrsexualität bei den alten Skandinaviern (Mitteilungen eines norwegischen Gelehrten),' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, iv. 245, 256 _sqq._]

In Greece pederasty in its baser forms was censured, though generally, it seems, with no great severity, and in some states it was legally prohibited.[154] According to an Athenian law, a youth who prostituted himself for money lost his rights as a free citizen and was liable to the punishment of death if he took part in a public feast or entered the _agora_.[155] In Sparta it was necessary that the "listener" should accept the "inspirator" from real affection; he who did so out of pecuniary considerations was punished by the ephors.[156] We are even told that among the Spartans the relations between the lover and his friend were truly innocent, and that if anything unlawful happened both must forsake either their country or their lives.[157] But the universal rule in Greece seems to have been that when decorum was observed in the friendship between a man and a youth, no inquiries were made into the details of the relationship.[158] And this attachment was not only regarded as permissible, but was praised as the highest and purest form of love, as the offspring of the heavenly Aphrodite, as a path leading to virtue, as a weapon against tyranny, as a safeguard of civic liberty, as a source of national greatness and glory. Phaedrus said that he knew no greater blessing to a young man who is beginning life than a virtuous lover, or to the lover than a beloved youth; for the principle which ought to be the guide of men who would lead a noble life cannot be implanted by any other motive so well as by love.[159] The Platonic Pausanias argued that if love of youths is held in ill repute it is so only because it is inimical to tyranny; "the interests of rulers require that their subjects should {479} be poor in spirit, and that there should be no strong bond of friendship or society among them, which love, above all other motives, is likely to inspire."[160] The power of the Athenian tyrants was broken by the love of Aristogeiton and the constancy of Harmodius; at Agrigentum in Sicily the mutual love of Chariton and Melanippus produced a similar result; and the greatness of Thebes was due to the Sacred Band established by Epaminondas. For "in the presence of his favourite, a man would choose to do anything rather than to get the character of a coward."[161] It was pointed out that the greatest heroes and the most warlike nations were those who were most addicted to the love of youths;[162] and it was said that an army consisting of lovers and their beloved ones, fighting at each other's side, although a mere handful, would overcome the whole world.[163]

[Footnote 154: Xenophon, _Lacedæmoniorum respublica_, ii. 13. Maximus Tyrius, _Dissertationes_, xxv. 4; xxvi. 9.]

[Footnote 155: Aeschines, _Contra Timarchum_, 21.]

[Footnote 156: Aelian, _Varia historia_, iii. 10. _Cf._ Plato, _Leges_, viii. 910.]

[Footnote 157: Aelian, _op. cit._ iii. 12. _Cf._ Maximus Tyrius, _op. cit._ xxvi. 8.]

[Footnote 158: _Cf._ Symonds, _loc. cit._ p. 92 _sqq._]

[Footnote 159: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 178.]

[Footnote 160: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 182.]

[Footnote 161: Hieronymus, the Peripatetic, referred to by Athenaeus, _op. cit._ xiii. 78, p. 602. See also Maximus Tyrius, _op. cit._ xxiv. 2.]

[Footnote 162: Plutarch, _Amatorius_, xvii. 14.]

[Footnote 163: Plato, _Symposium_, p. 178.]

Herodotus asserts that the love of boys was introduced from Greece into Persia.[164] Whether his statement be correct or not, such love could certainly not have been a habit of the Mazda worshippers.[165] In the Zoroastrian books "unnatural sin" is treated with a severity to which there is a parallel only in Hebrewism and Christianity. According to the Vendîdâd, there is no atonement for it.[166] It is punished with torments in the other world, and is capital here below.[167] Even he who committed it involuntarily, by force, is subject to corporal punishment.[168] Indeed, it is a more heinous sin than the slaying of a righteous man.[169] "There is no worse sin than this in the good religion, and it is proper to call those who commit it worthy of death in reality. If any one comes forth to them, and shall see {480} them in the act, and is working with an axe, it is requisite for him to cut off the heads or to rip up the bellies of both, and it is no sin for him. But it is not proper to kill any person without the authority of high-priests and kings, except on account of committing or permitting unnatural intercourse."[170]

[Footnote 164: Herodotus, i. 135.]

[Footnote 165: Ammianus Marcellinus says (xxiii. 76) that the inhabitants of Persia were free from pederasty. But see also Sextus Empiricus, _Pyrrhoniæ hypotyposes_, i. 152.]

[Footnote 166: _Vendîdâd_, i. 12; viii. 27.]

[Footnote 167: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxxxvi.]

[Footnote 168: _Vendîdâd_, viii. 26.]

[Footnote 169: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxxvi. 1 _sqq._]

[Footnote 170: _Sad Dar_, ix. 2, _sqq._]

Nor are unnatural sins allowed to defile the land of the Lord. Whosoever shall commit such abominations, be he Israelite or stranger dwelling among the Israelites, shall be put to death, the souls that do them shall be cut off from their people. By unnatural sins of lust the Canaanites polluted their land, so that God visited their guilt, and the land spued out its inhabitants.[171]

[Footnote 171: _Leviticus_, xviii. 22, 24 _sqq._; xx. 13.]

This horror of homosexual practices was shared by Christianity. According to St. Paul, they form the climax of the moral corruption to which God gave over the heathen because of their apostasy from him.[172] Tertullian says that they are banished "not only from the threshold, but from all shelter of the church, because they are not sins, but monstrosities."[173] St. Basil maintains that they deserve the same punishment as murder, idolatry, and witchcraft.[174] According to a decree of the Council of Elvira, those who abuse boys to satisfy their lusts are denied communion even at their last hour.[175] In no other point of morals was the contrast between the teachings of Christianity and the habits and opinions of the world over which it spread more radical than in this. In Rome there was an old law of unknown date, called Lex Scantinia (or Scatinia), which imposed a mulct on him who committed pederasty with a free person;[176] but this law, of which {481} very little is known, had lain dormant for ages, and the subject of ordinary homosexual intercourse had never afterwards attracted the attention of the pagan legislators.[177] But when Christianity became the religion of the Roman Empire, a veritable crusade was opened against it. Constantius and Constans made it a capital crime, punishable with the sword.[178] Valentinian went further still and ordered that those who were found guilty of it should be burned alive in the presence of all the people.[179] Justinian, terrified by certain famines, earthquakes, and pestilences, issued an edict which again condemned persons guilty of unnatural offences to the sword, "lest, as the result of these impious acts, whole cities should perish together with their inhabitants," as we are taught by Holy Scripture that through such acts cities have perished with the men in them.[180] "A sentence of death and infamy," says Gibbon, "was often founded on the slight and suspicious evidence of a child or a servant, . . . and pederasty became the crime of those to whom no crime could be imputed."[181]

[Footnote 172: _Romans_, i. 26 _sq._]

[Footnote 173: Tertullian, _De pudicitia_, 4 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, ii. 987).]

[Footnote 174: St. Basil, quoted by Bingham, _Works_, vi. 432 _sq._]

[Footnote 175: _Concilium Eliberitanum_, ch. 71 (Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, ii. 17).]

[Footnote 176: Juvenal, _Satiræ_, ii. 43 _sq._ Valerius Maximus, _Facta dictaque memorabilia_, vi. 1. 7. Quintilian, _Institutio oratoria_, iv. 2. 69:--"Decem milia, quae poena stupratori constituta est, dabit." Christ, _Hist. Legis Scatiniæ_, quoted by Döllinger, _op. cit._ ii. 274. Rein, _Criminalrecht der Römer_, p. 865 _sq._ Bingham, _op. cit._ vi. 433 _sqq._ Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 703 _sq._]

[Footnote 177: Mommsen, _op. cit._ p. 704. Rein, _op. cit._ p. 866. The passage in _Digesta_, xlviii. 5. 35. 1, refers to _stuprum_ independently of the sex of the victim.]

[Footnote 178: _Codex Theodosianus_, ix. 7. 3. _Codex Justinianus_, ix. 9. 30.]

[Footnote 179: _Codex Theodosianus_, ix. 7. 6.]

[Footnote 180: _Novellæ_, 77. See also _ibid._ 141, and _Institutiones_, iv. 18. 4.]

[Footnote 181: Gibbon, _History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_, v. 323.]

This attitude towards homosexual practices had a profound and lasting influence on European legislation. Throughout the Middle Ages and later, Christian lawgivers thought that nothing but a painful death in the flames could atone for the sinful act.[182] In England Fleta {482} speaks of the offender being buried alive;[183] but we are elsewhere told that burning was the due punishment.[184] As unnatural intercourse, however, was a subject for ecclesiastical cognizance, capital punishment could not be inflicted on the criminal unless the Church relinquished him to the secular arm; and it seems very doubtful whether she did relinquish him. Sir Frederick Pollock and Professor Maitland consider that the statute of 1533, which makes sodomy felony, affords an almost sufficient proof that the temporal courts had not punished it, and that no one had been put to death for it for a very long time past.[185] It was said that the punishment for this crime--which the English law, in its very indictments, treats as a crime not fit to be named[186]--was determined to be capital by "the voice of nature and of reason, and the express law of God";[187] and it remained so till 1861,[188] although in practice the extreme punishment was not inflicted.[189] In France persons were actually burned for this crime in the middle and latter part of the eighteenth century.[190] But in this, as in so many other respects, the rationalistic movement of that age brought about a change.[191] To punish sodomy with death, it was said, is atrocious; when unconnected with violence, the law ought to take no notice of it at all. It does not violate any other person's right, its influence on society is merely indirect, like that of drunkenness and free love; it is a disgusting vice, but its only proper punishment is contempt.[192] This view was adopted by the French 'Code pénal,' according to which homosexual practices in private, between two consenting adult parties, whether men or women, are absolutely {483} unpunished. The homosexual act is treated as a crime only when it implies an outrage on public decency, or when there is violence or absence of consent, or when one of the parties is under age or unable to give valid consent.[193] This method of dealing with homosexuality has been followed by the legislators of various European countries,[194] and in those where the law still treats the act in question _per se_ as a penal offence, notably in Germany, a propaganda in favour of its alteration is carried on with the support of many men of scientific eminence. This changed attitude of the law towards homosexual intercourse undoubtedly indicates a change of moral opinions. Though it is impossible to measure exactly the degree of moral condemnation, I suppose that few persons nowadays attach to it the same enormity of guilt as did our forefathers. And the question has even been put whether morality has anything at all to do with a sexual act, committed by the mutual consent of two adult individuals, which is productive of no offspring, and which on the whole concerns the welfare of nobody but the parties themselves.[195]

[Footnote 182: Du Boys, _Histoire du droit criminel de l'Espagne_, pp. 93, 403. _Les Établissements de Saint Louis_, i. 90, vol. ii. 147. Beaumanoir, _Coutumes du Beauvoisis_, xxx. 11, vol. i. 413. Montesquieu, _De l'esprit des lois_, xii. 6 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 283). Hume, _Commentaries on the Law of Scotland_, ii. 335; Pitcairn, _Criminal Trials in Scotland_, ii. 491, n. 2. Clarus, _Practica criminalis_, book v. § Sodomia, 4 (_Opera omnia_, ii. 151). Jarcke, _Handbuch des gemeinen deutschen Strafrechts_, iii. 172 _sqq._ Charles V.'s _Peinliche Gerichtsordnung_, art. 116. Henke, _Geschichte des deutschen peinlichen Rechts_, i. 289. Numa Praetorius, 'Die strafrechtlichen Bestimmungen gegen den gleichgeschlechtlichen Verkehr,' in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, i. 124 _sqq._ In the beginning of the nineteenth century sodomy was still nominally subject to capital punishment by burning in Bavaria (von Feuerbach, _Kritik des Kleinschrodischen Entwurfs zu einem peinlichen Gesetzbuche für die Chur-Pfalz-Bayrischen Staaten_, ii. 13), and in Spain as late as 1843 (Du Boys, _op. cit._ p. 721).]

[Footnote 183: Fleta, i. 37. 3, p. 84.]

[Footnote 184: Britton, i. 10, vol. i. 42.]

[Footnote 185: Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 556 _sq._]

[Footnote 186: Coke, _Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England_, p. 58 _sq._ Blackstone, _Commentaries on the Laws of England_, iv. 218.]

[Footnote 187: Blackstone, _op. cit._ iv. 218.]

[Footnote 188: Stephen, _History of the Criminal Law of England_, i. 475.]

[Footnote 189: Blackstone, _op. cit._ iv. 218.]

[Footnote 190: Desmaze, _Pénalités anciennes_, p. 211. Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 207.]

[Footnote 191: Numa Praetorius, _loc. cit._ p. 121 _sqq._]

[Footnote 192: Note of the editors of Kehl's edition of Voltaire's 'Prix de la justice et de l'humanité,' in _[OE]uvres complètes_, v. 437, n. 2.]

[Footnote 193: _Code pénal_, 330 _sqq._ _Cf._ Chevalier, _L'inversion sexuelle_, p. 431 _sqq._; Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 207 _sq._]

[Footnote 194: Numa Praetorius, _loc. cit._ pp. 131-133, 143 _sqq._]

[Footnote 195: See, _e.g._, Bax, _Ethics of Socialism_, p. 126.]

From this review of the moral ideas on the subject, incomplete though it be, it appears that homosexual practices are very frequently subject to some degree of censure, though the degree varies extremely. This censure is no doubt, in the first place, due to that feeling of aversion or disgust which the idea of homosexual intercourse tends to call forth in normally constituted adult individuals whose sexual instincts have developed under normal conditions. I presume that nobody will deny the general prevalence of such a tendency. It corresponds to that instinctive repugnance to sexual connections with women which is so frequently found in congenital inverts; whilst that particular form of it with which legislators have chiefly busied themselves evokes, in addition, a physical disgust of its own. And in a society where the {484} large majority of people are endowed with normal sexual desires their aversion to homosexuality easily develops into moral censure and finds a lasting expression in custom, law, or religious tenets. On the other hand, where special circumstances have given rise to widely spread homosexual practices, there will be no general feeling of disgust even in the adults, and the moral opinion of the society will be modified accordingly. The act may still be condemned, in consequence of a moral doctrine formed under different conditions, or of the vain attempts of legislators to check sexual irregularities, or out of utilitarian considerations; but such a condemnation would in most people be rather theoretical than genuine. At the same time the baser forms of homosexual love may be strongly disapproved of for the same reasons as the baser forms of intercourse between men and women; and the passive pederast may be an object of contempt on account of the feminine practices to which he lends himself, as also an object of hatred on account of his reputation for sorcery. We have seen that the effeminate men are frequently believed to be versed in magic;[196] their abnormalities readily suggest that they are endowed with supernatural power, and they may resort to witchcraft as a substitute for their lack of manliness and physical strength. But the supernatural qualities or skill in magic ascribed to men who behave like women may also, instead of causing hatred, make them honoured or reverenced.

[Footnote 196: See also Bastian, in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ i. 88 _sq._ Speaking of the witches of Fez, Leo Africanus says (_History and Description of Africa_, ii. 458) that "they haue a damnable custome to commit vnlawfull Venerie among themselues." Among the Patagonians, according to Falkner (_Description of Patagonia_, p. 117), the male wizards are chosen for their office when they are children, and "a preference is always shown to those who at that early time of life discover an effeminate disposition." They are obliged, as it were, to leave their sex, and to dress themselves in female apparel.]

It has been suggested that the popular attitude towards homosexuality was originally an aspect of economics, a question of under- or over-population, and that it was forbidden or allowed accordingly. Dr. Havelock Ellis thinks it probable that there is a certain relationship {485} between the social reaction against homosexuality and against infanticide:--"Where the one is regarded leniently and favourably, there generally the other is also; where the one is stamped out, the other is usually stamped out."[197] But our defective knowledge of the opinions of the various savage races concerning homosexuality hardly warrants such a conclusion; and if a connection really does exist between homosexual practices and infanticide it may be simply due to the numerical disproportion between the sexes resulting from the destruction of a multitude of female infants.[198] On the other hand we are acquainted with several facts which are quite at variance with Dr. Ellis's suggestion. Among many Hindu castes female infanticide has for ages been a genuine custom,[199] and yet pederasty is remarkably rare among the Hindus. The ancient Arabs were addicted to infanticide,[200] but not to homosexual love,[201] whereas among modern Arabs the case is exactly the reverse. And if the early Christians deemed infanticide and pederasty equally heinous sins, they did so certainly not because they were anxious that the population should increase; if this had been their motive they would hardly have glorified celibacy. It is true that in a few cases the unproductiveness of homosexual love has been given by indigenous writers as a reason for its encouragement or condemnation. It was said that the Cretan law on the subject had in view to check the growth of population; but, like Döllinger,[202] I do not believe that this assertion touches the real root of the matter. More importance may be attached to the following passage in one of the Pahlavi texts:--"He who is wasting seed makes a practice of causing the death of progeny; when the custom is completely continuous, which produces an evil stoppage of the progress of the race, the creatures have become annihilated; and certainly, that action, from which, when it is universally proceeding, the depopulation {486} of the world must arise, has become and furthered the greatest wish of Aharman."[203] I am, however, of opinion that considerations of this kind have generally played only a subordinate, if any, part in the formation of the moral opinions concerning homosexual practices. And it can certainly not be admitted that the severe Jewish law against sodomy was simply due to the fact that the enlargement of the population was a strongly felt social need among the Jews.[204] However much they condemned celibacy, they did not put it on a par with the abominations of Sodom. The excessive sinfulness which was attached to homosexual love by Zoroastrianism, Hebrewism, and Christianity, had quite a special foundation. It cannot be sufficiently accounted for either by utilitarian considerations or instinctive disgust. The abhorrence of incest is generally a much stronger feeling than the aversion to homosexuality. Yet in the very same chapter of Genesis which describes the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah we read of the incest committed by the daughters of Lot with their father; [205] and, according to the Roman Catholic doctrine, unnatural intercourse is an even more heinous sin than incest and adultery.[206] The fact is that homosexual practices were intimately associated with the gravest of all sins: unbelief, idolatry, or heresy.

[Footnote 197: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 206. See Additional Notes.]

[Footnote 198: _Cf._ _supra_, ii. 466 (Tahitians).]

[Footnote 199: _Supra_, i. 407.]

[Footnote 200: _Supra_, i. 406 _sq._]

[Footnote 201: von Kremer, _Culturgeschichte des Orients_, ii. 129.]

[Footnote 202: Döllinger, _op. cit._ ii. 239.]

[Footnote 203: _Dâdistân-î Dînîk_, lxxvii. 11.]

[Footnote 204: Havelock Ellis, _op. cit._ p. 206.]

[Footnote 205: _Genesis_, xix. 31 _sqq._]

[Footnote 206: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 154. 12. Katz, _Grundriss des kanonischen Strafrechts_, pp. 104, 118, 120. Clarus, _Practica criminalis_, book v. § Sodomia, Additiones, 1 (_Opera omnia_, ii. 152):--"Hoc vitium est majus, quam si quis propriam matrem cognosceret."]

According to Zoroastrianism, unnatural sin had been created by Angra Mainyu.[207] "Aharman, the wicked, miscreated the demons and fiends, and also the remaining corrupted ones, by his own unnatural intercourse."[208] Such intercourse is on a par with Afrâsiyâb, a Turanian king who conquered the Iranians for twelve years;[209] with Dahâk, a king or dynasty who is said to have conquered Yim and reigned for a thousand years;[210] with Tûr-i Brâdar-vakhsh, {487} a heterodox wizard by whom the best men were put to death.[211] He who commits unnatural sin is "in his whole being a Daêva";[212] and a Daêva-worshipper is not a bad Zoroastrian, but a man who does not belong to the Zoroastrian system, a foreigner, a non-Aryan.[213] In the Vendîdâd, after the statement that the voluntary commission of unnatural sin is a trespass for which there is no atonement for ever and ever, the question is put, When is it so? And the answer given is:--If the sinner be a professor of the religion of Mazda, or one who has been taught in it. If not, his sin is taken from him, in case he makes confession of the religion of Mazda and resolves never to commit again such forbidden deeds.[214] This is to say, the sin is inexpiable if it involves a downright defiance of the true religion, it is forgiven if it is committed in ignorance of it and is followed by submission. From all this it appears that Zoroastrianism stigmatised unnatural intercourse as a practice of infidels, as a sign of unbelief. And I think that certain facts referred to above help us to understand why it did so. Not only have homosexual practices been commonly associated with sorcery, but such an association has formed, and partly still forms, an incident of the shamanistic system prevalent among the Asiatic peoples of Turanian stock, and that it did so already in remote antiquity is made extremely probable by statements which I have just quoted from Zoroastrian texts. To this system Zoroastrianism was naturally furiously opposed, and the "change of sex" therefore appeared to the Mazda worshipper as a devilish abomination.

[Footnote 207: _Vendîdâd_, i. 12.]

[Footnote 208: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, viii. 10.]

[Footnote 209: _Sad Dar_, ix. 5. West's note to _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, viii. 29 (_Sacred Books of the East_, xxiv. 35, n. 4.)]

[Footnote 210: _Sad Dar_, ix. 5. West's note to _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, viii. 29 (_Sacred Books of the East_, xxiv. 35, n. 3).]

[Footnote 211: _Sad Dar_, ix. 5. West's note to _Dâdistân-î Dînîk_, lxxii. 8 (_Sacred Books of the East_, xviii. 218).]

[Footnote 212: _Vendîdâd_, viii. 32.]

[Footnote 213: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. li.]

[Footnote 214: _Vendîdâd_, viii. 27 _sq._]

So also the Hebrews abhorrence of sodomy was largely due to their hatred of a foreign cult. According to Genesis, unnatural vice was the sin of a people who were not the Lord's people, and the Levitical legislation represents Canaanitish abominations as the chief reason {488} why the Canaanites were exterminated.[215] Now we know that sodomy entered as an element in their religion. Besides _[k.]ed[=e]sh[=o]th_, or female prostitutes, there were _[k.]ed[=e]sh[=i]m_, or male prostitutes, attached to their temples.[216] The word _[k.]ad[=e]sh_, translated "sodomite," properly denotes a man dedicated to a deity;[217] and it appears that such men were consecrated to the mother of the gods, the famous Dea Syria, whose priests or devotees they were considered to be.[218] The male devotees of this and other goddesses were probably in a position analogous to that occupied by the female devotees of certain gods, who also, as we have seen, have developed into libertines; and the sodomitic acts committed with these temple prostitutes may, like the connections with priestesses, have had in view to transfer blessings to the worshippers.[219] In Morocco supernatural benefits are expected not only from heterosexual, but also from homosexual intercourse with a holy person.[220] The _[k.]ed[=e]sh[=i]m_ are frequently alluded to in the Old Testament, especially in the period of the monarchy, when rites of foreign origin made their way into both Israel and Judah.[221] And it is natural that the Yahveh worshipper should regard their practices with the utmost horror as forming part of an idolatrous cult.

[Footnote 215: _Leviticus_, xx. 23.]

[Footnote 216: _Deuteronomy_, xxiii. 17. Driver, _Commentary on Deuteronomy_, p. 264.]

[Footnote 217: Driver, _op. cit._ p. 264 _sq._ Selbie, 'Sodomite,' in Hastings, _Dictionary of the Bible_, iv. 559.]

[Footnote 218: St. Jerome, _In Osee_, i. 4. 14 (Migne, _op. cit._ xxv. 851). Cook's note to _1 Kings_, xiv. 24, in his edition of _The Holy Bible_, ii. 571. See also Lucian, _Lucius_, 38.]

[Footnote 219: Rosenbaum suggests (_Geschichte der Lustseuche im Alterthume_, p. 120) that the eunuch priests connected with the cult of the Ephesian Artemis and the Phrygian worship of Cybele likewise were sodomites.]

[Footnote 220: See Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness_, p. 85.]

[Footnote 221: _1 Kings_, xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxii. 46. _2 Kings_, xxiii. 7. _Job_, xxxvi. 14. Driver, _op. cit._ p. 265.]

The Hebrew conception of homosexual love to some extent affected Muhammedanism, and passed into Christianity. The notion that it is a form of sacrilege was here strengthened by the habits of the gentiles. St. Paul found the abominations of Sodom prevalent among nations who had "changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the {489} Creator."[222] During the Middle Ages heretics were accused of unnatural vice as a matter of course.[223] Indeed, so closely was sodomy associated with heresy that the same name was applied to both. In 'La Coutume de Touraine-Anjou' the word herite, which is the ancient form of _hérétique_,[224] seems to be used in the sense of "sodomite";[225] and the French _bougre_ (from the Latin _Bulgarus_, Bulgarian), as also its English synonym, was originally a name given to a sect of heretics who came from Bulgaria in the eleventh century, and was afterwards applied to other heretics, but at the same time it became the regular expression for a person guilty of unnatural intercourse.[226] In mediæval laws sodomy was also repeatedly mentioned together with heresy, and the punishment was the same for both.[227] It thus remained a religious offence of the first order. It was not only a "vitium nefandum et super omnia detestandum,"[228] but it was one of the four "clamantia peccata," or crying sins,[229] a "crime de Majestie, vers le Roy celestre."[230] Very naturally, therefore, it has come to be regarded with somewhat greater leniency by law and public opinion in proportion as they have emancipated themselves from theological doctrines. And the fresh light which the scientific study of the sexual impulse has lately thrown upon the subject of homosexuality must also necessarily influence the moral ideas relating to it, in so far as no scrutinising judge can fail to take into account the pressure which a powerful non-volitional desire exercises upon an agent's will.

[Footnote 222: _Romans_, i. 25 _sqq._]

[Footnote 223: Littré, _Dictionnaire de la langue française_, i. 386, 'Bougre.' Haynes, _Religious Persecution_, p. 54.]

[Footnote 224: Littré, _op. cit._ i. 2010, 'Hérétique.']

[Footnote 225: _Les Établissements de Saint Louis_, i. 90, vol. ii. 147. Viollet, in his Introduction to the same work, i. 254.]

[Footnote 226: Littré, _op. cit._ i. 386, 'Bougre.' Murray, _New English Dictionary_, i. 1160, 'Bugger.' Lea, _History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages_, i. 115, note.]

[Footnote 227: Beaumanoir, _Coutumes du Beauvoisis_, xxx. 11, vol. i. 413:--"Qui erre contre le foi, comme en mescreance, de le quele il ne veut venir à voie de verité, ou qui fet sodomiterie, il doit estre ars, et forfet tout le sien en le maniere dessus." Britton, i. 10, vol. i. 42. Montesquieu, _De l'esprit des lois_, xii. 6 (_[OE]uvres_, p. 283). Du Boys, _Histoire du droit criminel de l'Espagne_, pp. 486, 721.]

[Footnote 228: Clarus, _Practica criminalis_, book v. § Sodomia, 1 (_Opera omnia_, ii. 151).]

[Footnote 229: Coke, _Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England_, p. 59.]

[Footnote 230: _Mirror_, quoted _ibid._ p. 58.]

CHAPTER XLIV

REGARD FOR THE LOWER ANIMALS

MEN'S conduct towards the lower animals is frequently a subject of moral valuation.

Totem animals must be treated with deference by those who bear their names, and animals generally regarded as divine must be respected by all; of this more will be said in a subsequent chapter.[1] Among various peoples the members of certain animal species must not be killed, because they are considered to be receptacles for the souls of departed men,[2] or because the species is believed to have originated through a transformation of men into animals.[3] The Dyaks of Borneo have a superstitious dread of killing orang-utans, being of opinion that these apes are men who went to live in the forest and abstain from speaking merely in order to be exempt from paying taxes.[4] The Moors consider it wrong to kill a monkey, because the monkey was once a man whom God changed into his present shape as a punishment for the sin he committed by performing his ablutions with milk; and they would never do harm to a stork, because, as they say, the stork was originally a judge, who passed unjust sentences upon his fellow creatures and therefore became what he is. They also account it a sin to kill a swallow or a pigeon, a white spider or a bee, because they regard them as holy. Other creatures, again, are spared by the Moors because they {491} appear uncanny or are suspected of being evil spirits in disguise. It is believed that anybody who kills a raven easily goes mad and that he who kills a toad will get fever or die; and no Moor would dare to hit a cat or a dog in the dark, since it seems very doubtful what kind of being it really is. Superstitions of this sort are world-wide.]

[Footnote 1: _Infra_, on Duties to Gods.]

[Footnote 2: _Infra_, p. 516 _sq._]

[Footnote 3: See Meiners, _Allgemeine Geschichte der Religionen_, i. 213 _sqq._]

[Footnote 4: Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 57.]

It is a common belief among uncultured peoples that a person who slays an animal is exposed to the vengeance either of its disembodied spirit or of all the other creatures belonging to the same species.[5] Hence, as Sir J. G. Frazer has shown, the savage often makes it a rule to spare the lives of those animals which he has no pressing motive for killing, at least such fierce and dangerous ones as are likely to exact a bloody revenge for the slaughter of any of their kind; and when, for some reason or other, he overcomes his superstitious scruples and takes the life of the beast, he is anxious to appease the victim and its kindred by testifying his respect for them, or making apologies, or trying to conceal his share in procuring the death of the animal, or promising that its remains will be honourably treated.[6] The Stiêns of Cambodia, for instance, who believe that animals have souls which wander about after death, ask pardon when they have killed one, lest its soul should visit and torment them; and they also offer it sacrifices proportioned to the strength and size of the animal.[7] When a party of Koriaks have killed a bear or a wolf, they skin the beast, dress one of their family in the skin, and dance round the skin-clad man, saying that it was not they who killed the animal but someone else, by preference a Russian.[8] The Eskimo about Behring Strait maintain that the dead bodies of various animals must be treated very carefully by the hunter who obtains them, so that their shades may not be offended and bring bad luck or even death upon him or his people.[9]

[Footnote 5: _Supra_, i. 258.]

[Footnote 6: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 389 _sqq._]

[Footnote 7: Mouhot, _Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China_, i. 252.]

[Footnote 8: Bastian, _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_, iii. 26.]

[Footnote 9: Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 438.]

{492} The savage, moreover, desires to keep on good terms with animals which, without being feared, are either eaten or valued for their skins. Hence, when he captures one, he shows such deference for it as may be necessary for inducing its fellows to come and be killed also.[10] Alaskan hunters preserve the bones of sables and beavers out of reach of the dogs for a year and then bury them carefully, lest the spirits which look after these species should consider that "they are regarded with contempt and hence no more should be killed or trapped."[11] The Thompson River Indians of British Columbia said that when a deer was killed its fellows would be well pleased if the hunters butchered the animal nicely and cleanly.[12] The Hurons refrained from throwing fish bones into the fire, lest the souls of the fish should go and warn the other fish not to let themselves be caught, since, if they were, their own bones would also be burned.[13] Some savages respect the bones of the animals which they eat because they believe that the bones, if preserved, will, in the course of time, be reclothed with flesh and the animal thus come to life again.[14]

[Footnote 10: Frazer, _op. cit._ ii. 403 _sqq._]

[Footnote 11: Dall, _Alaska_, p. 89.]

[Footnote 12: Teit, 'Thompson Indians of British Columbia,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, 'Anthropology,' i. 346.]

[Footnote 13: Sagard, _Le grand voyage du pays des Hurons_, p. 255.]

[Footnote 14: Frazer, _op. cit._ ii. 415 _sqq._]

Besides the creatures which primitive man treats with respect because he dreads their strength and ferocity or on account of the benefits he expects from them, there is yet a third class of animate beings which he sometimes deems it necessary to conciliate, namely, vermin that infest the crops.[15] Among the Saxons of Transylvania, in order to keep sparrows from the corn, the sower begins by throwing the first handful of seed backwards over his head, saying, "That is for you, sparrows."[16] And of the Drâvidian tribes of Mirzapur we are told that, when locusts threaten to eat up the fruits of the earth, the people catch one, decorate its head with a spot of red {493} lead, salaam to it, and let it go; after which civilities the whole flight immediately departs.[17]

[Footnote 15: _Ibid._ ii. 422 _sqq._]

[Footnote 16: Heinrich, quoted _ibid._ ii. 423.]

[Footnote 17: Crooke, _Popular Religion and Folk-lore of Northern India_, ii. 303.]

Domestic animals are frequently objects of superstitious reverence.[18] They are expected to reward masters who treat them well, whereas those who harm them are believed to expose themselves to their revenge. Among the Eskimo about Behring Strait dogs are never beaten for biting people, lest the _inua_ or shade of the dog should become angry and prevent the wound from healing.[19] Butchers are often regarded as unclean, and the original reason for this was in all probability the idea that they were haunted by the spirits of the animals they had slain. Among the Guanches of the Canary Islands it was unlawful for anybody but professional butchers to kill cattle, and a butcher was forbidden to enter other persons' houses, to touch their property, and to keep company with any one not of his own trade.[20] In Morocco a butcher, like a manslayer, is thought to be haunted by _jnûn_ (_jinn_), and it seems that in this case also the notion of haunting _jnûn_ has replaced an earlier belief in troublesome ghosts.[21] So, too, the ancient Troglodytes of East Africa, who derived their whole sustenance from their flocks and herds, are said to have looked upon butchers as unclean.[22] In the rural districts of Japan it is believed that a butcher will have a cripple among his descendants.[23]

[Footnote 18: See Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 296 _sqq._]

[Footnote 19: Nelson, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xviii. 435.]

[Footnote 20: Abreu de Galindo, _History of the Discovery and Conquest of the Canary Islands_, p. 71 _sq._ Bory de St. Vincent, _Essais sur les Isles Fortunées_, p. 103 _sq._]

[Footnote 21: _Cf._ _supra_, i. 378.]

[Footnote 22: Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ p. 296 _sq._]

[Footnote 23: Griffis, _Mikado's Empire_, p. 472.]

How far ideas of this sort may account for the great disinclination of many peoples to kill their cattle, it is impossible to say; but they certainly do not constitute the only motive. We have noticed above that pastoral tribes are unwilling to reduce their herds and agricultural peoples to kill the ploughing ox, because this would imply {494} loss of valuable property.[24] And apart from economic considerations, we may assume that feelings of genuine sympathy also induce them to treat their animals with kindness. The altruistic sentiment has not necessarily reference to members of the same species only; of this we find instances even among animals in confinement and domesticated animals, which frequently become attached to individuals of a different species with whom they live together.[25] And the savage feels himself much more closely related to the animal world than does his civilised fellow creature; indeed, as we have seen, he habitually obliterates the boundaries between man and beast and regards all animals as practically on a footing of equality with himself.[26] Among the pastoral races of Africa the men delight in attending their cattle, and spend much time in ornamenting and adorning them; the herdsman knows every beast in his herd, calls it by its name, and affectionately observes all its peculiarities.[27] Of the Bahima, a cow tribe in Uganda, the Rev. J. Roscoe tells us that the men form warm attachments for their cattle; some of them love the animals like children, pet and coax them, talk to them, and weep over their ailments, and should a favourite die their grief is so extreme that it sometimes leads to suicide.[28] The mythical founder of the kingdom of Uganda, Kintu, is said to have been so humane and averse from the sight of blood, that "even cattle killed for necessary food were slaughtered at some distance from his dwelling."[29] But cattle are not the only dumb creatures that excite tender feelings in the bosom of a savage. The For tribe of Central Africa regard it as a characteristic of a good man to be kind to animals in general, and consider it wicked to be otherwise.[30] Concerning the Eastern Central Africans Mr. {495} Macdonald writes that if they appear destitute of pity, say, for their fowls in their methods of carrying them, it is because they do not reflect that it gives them pain--"all would admit that it was a cruel thing to pain the fowl"; and they have fables in their language which show a desire to enter minutely into the feelings of dumb creatures, representing, for instance, fowls as reasoning on their hard fate in being killed for their master's supper.[31] Among the Indians of the province of Quito, according to Juan and Ulloa, the women are so fond of their fowls that they will not sell them, much less kill them with their own hands; "so that if a stranger, who is obliged to pass the night in one of their cottages, offers ever so much money for a fowl, they refuse to part with it, and he finds himself under a necessity of killing the fowl himself. At this his landlady shrieks, dissolves in tears, and wrings her hands, as if it had been an only son; till seeing the mischief past remedy she wipes her eyes, and quietly takes what the traveller offers her."[32] North American Indians, again, are very fond of their hunting dogs. Those on the west side of the Rocky Mountains "appear to have the same affection for them that they have for their children; and they will discourse with them, as if they were rational beings. They frequently call them their sons or daughters; and when describing an Indian, they will speak of him as father of a particular dog which belongs to him. When these dogs die, it is not unusual to see their masters or mistresses place them on a pile of wood, and burn them in the same manner as they do the dead bodies of their relations; and they appear to lament their deaths, by crying and howling, fully as much as if they were their kindred."[33] So also the natives of Australia often display much affection for their dogs; Mr. Gason has seen women crying over a dog when bitten by a snake as if it had been one of their own children, and if a puppy has lost its mother the {496} women suckle and nurse it.[34] Of the Maoris of New Zealand we read that their extreme love of offspring "was also carried out to excess towards the young of brutes--especially of their dogs, and, afterwards, of cats and pigs introduced. Hence it was by no means an unusual sight to see a woman carrying her child at her back, and a pet dog, or pig, in her bosom."[35] The Chukchi of North-Eastern Siberia believe that if a person is cruel to brutes his soul will after his death migrate into some domestic animal--a dog, a horse, or a reindeer.[36] Even the miserable Veddahs of Ceylon are said to be indignant at the needless killing of a beast.[37]

[Footnote 24: _Supra_, ii. 331.]

[Footnote 25: See _supra_, i. 112.]

[Footnote 26: _Supra_, i. 258.]

[Footnote 27: Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, ii. 415.]

[Footnote 28: Roscoe, 'Bahima,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvii. 94 _sq._]

[Footnote 29: Felkin, 'Notes on the Waganda Tribe,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 764.]

[Footnote 30: Felkin, 'Notes on the For Tribe,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xiii. 232 _sq._]

[Footnote 31: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 10 _sq._]

[Footnote 32: Juan and Ulloa, _Voyage to South America_, i. 426 _sq._]

[Footnote 33: Harmon, _Journal of Voyages in the Interior of North America_, p. 335 _sq._]

[Footnote 34: Gason, 'Dieyerie Tribe,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 259. Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 5. Williams, 'Yircla Meening Tribe,' in Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 402.]

[Footnote 35: Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, p. 43.]

[Footnote 36: Ratzel, _op. cit._ ii. 231.]

[Footnote 37: Sarasin, _Ergebnisse naturwissenschaftlicher Forschungen auf Ceylon_, iii. 539.]

On the other hand we also hear of savages who are greatly lacking in sympathy for the brute creation. Darwin says that humanity to the lower animals is apparently unfelt by savages, except towards their pets.[38] Mr. Atkinson charges the New Caledonians with great cruelty to animals.[39] The Tasmanians appeared much to enjoy the tortures of a wounded bird or beast.[40] It is not to be expected that people whose kindly feelings towards men hardly extend beyond the borders of their own communities should be compassionate to wild animals. They may also appear wantonly cruel because they do not realise the pain which they inflict. And, like children, they may enjoy the agony of a suffering beast or bird because it excites their curiosity.

[Footnote 38: Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 123.]

[Footnote 39: Atkinson, 'Natives of New Caledonia,' in _Folk-lore_, xiv. 248.]

[Footnote 40: Davies, quoted by Ling Roth, _Tasmanians_, p. 66.]

It is obvious from what has been said above that already at the savage stage men's conduct towards the lower animals must in some cases be a matter of moral concern. For hand in hand with the altruistic sentiment we always find the feeling of sympathetic resentment whenever there is an occasion for its outburst. Moreover, {497} acts which are, or are believed to be, injurious to the agent, by exposing him to an animal's revenge or otherwise, are prohibited because they are imprudent; and, as we have often noticed, such prohibitions are apt to assume a moral character. Finally, if a certain mode of conduct is considered to be productive of public harm, as is the case with any act or omission which reduces, or is supposed to reduce, the supply of food or animal clothing, it is naturally looked upon as a wrong against the community.

Similar facts have, among peoples of a higher culture, led to moral rules inculcating regard for animals--rules which have often assumed a definite shape in their laws or religious books.

According to Brahmanism tenderness towards all creatures is a duty incumbent upon the four castes. It is said that "he who injures innoxious beings from a wish to give himself pleasure, never finds happiness, neither living nor dead."[41] If a blow is struck against animals in order to give them pain, the judge shall inflict a fine in proportion to the amount of pain caused, just as if the blow had been struck against a man.[42] The killing of various creatures, including fish and snakes, reduces the offender to a mixed caste;[43] and, according to 'Vishnu Purana,' fishermen go after death to the same hell as awaits prisoners, incendiaries, and treacherous friends.[44] To kill a cow is a great crime;[45] whereas he who unhesitatingly abandons life for the sake of a cow is freed even from the guilt of the murder of a Brâhmana, and so is he who saves the life of a cow.[46] Among many of the Hindus the slaughter of a cow excites more horror than the killing of a man, and is punished with great severity, even with death.[47]

[Footnote 41: _Laws of Manu_, v. 45.]

[Footnote 42: _Ibid._ viii. 286.]

[Footnote 43: _Ibid._ xi. 69.]

[Footnote 44: _Vish['n]u Purá['n]a_, p. 208 _sq._]

[Footnote 45: _Institutes of Vishnu_, l. 16 _sqq._ _Gautama_, xxii. 18. _Âpastamba_, i. 26. 1. _Laws of Manu_, xi. 109 _sqq._]

[Footnote 46: _Laws of Manu_, xi. 80.]

[Footnote 47: Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 264. Kipling, _Beast and Man in India_, p. 118 _sq._ Crooke, _Things Indian_, p. 91.]

In Buddhism, Jainism, and Taouism the respect for animal life is extreme. A disciple of Buddha may not {498} knowingly deprive any creature of life, not even a worm or an ant. He may not drink water in which animal life of any kind whatever is contained, and must not even pour it out on grass or clay.[48] And the doctrine which forbids the killing of animate beings is not only professed, but in a large measure followed, by the great majority of people in Buddhistic countries. In Siam the tameness of many living creatures which in Europe fly from the presence of man is very striking. Instances have been known in which natives have quitted the service of Europeans on account of their unwillingness to destroy reptiles and vermin, and it is a not uncommon practice for rich Siamese to buy live fish to have the merit of restoring them to the sea.[49] In Burma, though fish is one of the staple foods of the people, the fisherman is despised; not so much, perhaps, as if he killed other living things, but he is still an outcast from decent society, and "will have to suffer great and terrible punishment before he can be cleansed from the sins that he daily commits."[50] The Buddhists of Ceylon are more forbearing: they excuse the fisherman by saying that he does not kill the fish, but only removes it from the water.[51] In Tibet all dumb creatures are treated with humanity, and the taking of animal life is rather strictly prohibited, except in the case of yaks and sheep needed for food. Owing to the coldness of the climate, flesh forms an essential staple of diet; but the butchers are regarded as professional sinners and are therefore the most despised of all classes in Tibet. Wild animals and even small birds and fish are seldom or never killed, on account of the religious penalties attached to this crime.[52]

[Footnote 48: Oldenberg, _Buddha_, pp. 290 n. *, 351.]

[Footnote 49: Bowring, _Siam_, i. 107.]

[Footnote 50: Fielding Hall, _The Soul of a People_, p. 230.]

[Footnote 51: Schmidt, _Ceylon_, p. 316 _sq._]

[Footnote 52: Waddell, _Buddhism of Tibet_, p. 567 _sq._]

The Jain is stricter still in his regard for animal life. He sweeps the ground before him as he goes, lest animate things be destroyed; he walks veiled, lest he inhale a living organism; he considers that the evening and night are {499} not times for eating, since one might then swallow a live thing by mistake; and he rejects not only meat but even honey, together with various fruits that are supposed to contain worms, not because of his distaste for worms but because of his regard for life.[53] Some towns in Western India in which Jains are found have their beast hospitals, where animals are kept and fed. At Surat there was quite recently an establishment of this sort with a house where a host of noxious and offensive vermin, dense as the sands on the sea-shore, were bred and nurtured; and at Anjár, in Kutch, about five thousand rats were kept in a certain temple and daily fed with flour, which was procured by a tax on the inhabitants of the town.[54]

[Footnote 53: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 288. Barth, _op. cit._ p. 145. Kipling, _op. cit._ p. 10 _sq._]

[Footnote 54: Burnes, 'Notice of a remarkable Hospital for Animals at Surat,' in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc._ i. 96 _sq._]

According to 'Thâi-Shang,' one of the books of Taouism, a good man will feel kindly towards all creatures, and refrain from hurting even the insect tribes, grass, and trees; and he is a bad man who "shoots birds and hunts beasts, unearths the burrowing insects and frightens roosting birds, blocks up the dens of animals and overturns nests, hurts the pregnant womb and breaks eggs."[55] In the book called 'Merits and Errors Scrutinised,' which enjoys great popularity in China, it is said to be meritorious to save animals from death--even insects if the number amounts to a hundred,--to relieve a brute that is greatly wearied with work, to purchase and set at liberty animals intended to be slaughtered. On the other hand, to confine birds in a cage, to kill ten insects, to be unsparing of the strength of tired animals, to disturb insects in their holes, to destroy the nests of birds, without great reason to kill and dress animals for food, are all errors of various degrees. And "to be the foremost to encourage the slaughter of animals, or to hinder persons from setting them at liberty," is regarded as an error of the same magnitude as the crime of devising a person's death or of drowning or murdering a child.[56] Kindness {500} to animals is conspicuous in the writings of Confucius and Mencius;[57] the Master angled but did not use a net, he shot but not at birds perching.[58] Throughout Japan, according to Sir Edward Reed, "the life of animals has always been held more or less sacred. . . ., neither Shintoism nor Buddhism requiring or justifying the taking of the life of any creature for sacrifice."[59]

[Footnote 55: _Thâi-Shang_, 3 _sq._]

[Footnote 56: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 164, 205 _sq._]

[Footnote 57: Mencius, i. 1. 7.]

[Footnote 58: _Lun Yü_, vii. 26.]

[Footnote 59: Reed, _Japan_, i. 61.]

The regard for the lower animals which is shown by these Eastern religions and their adherents is to some extent due to superstitious ideas, similar to those which we found prevalent among many savages. Dr. de Groot observes that in China the virtues of benevolence and humanity are extended to animals because these, also, have souls which may work vengeance or bring reward.[60] The conduct of Orientals towards the brute creation has further been explained by their belief in the transmigration of souls. But it seems that the connection between their theory of metempsychosis and their rules relating to the treatment of animals is not exclusively, nor even chiefly, one of cause and effect, but rather one of a common origin. This theory itself may in some measure be regarded as a result of that intimacy which prevails in the East between animals and men. Buddhism recognises no fundamental distinction between them, only an accidental or phenomenal difference;[61] and the step is not long from this attitude to the doctrine of metempsychosis. Captain Forbes maintains that the humanity with which the Burmans treat dumb animals comes "more from the innate good nature and easiness of their dispositions than from any effect over them of this peculiar doctrine";[62] and they laugh at the suggestion made by Europeans that Buddhists abstain from taking life because they believe in the transmigration of souls, having never heard of it before. Their motive, says Mr. Fielding Hall, is compassion and _noblesse oblige_.[63] But by its punishments {501} and rewards, religion has greatly increased the natural regard for animal life and welfare, and introduced a new motive for conduct which originally sprang in the main from kindly feeling.

[Footnote 60: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. iv. book) ii. 450.]

[Footnote 61: Rhys Davids, _Hibbert Lectures on Buddhism_, p. 214.]

[Footnote 62: Forbes, _British Burma_, p. 321.]

[Footnote 63: Fielding Hall, _op. cit._ p. 237 _sq._]

In Zoroastrianism we meet with a different attitude towards the lower animal world. A fundamental distinction is made between the animals of Ormuzd and those of Ahriman. To kill one of the former is a heinous sin, to kill one of the latter is a pious deed.[64] Sacred above all other animals is the dog. The ill-feeding and maltreatment of dogs are prosecuted as criminal, and extreme penalties are inflicted on those who venture to kill them.[65] Nay, if there be in the house of a worshipper of Mazda a mad dog who has no scent, the worshippers of Mazda "shall attend him to heal him, in the same manner as they would do for one of the faithful."[66] In the eyes of the Parsis, animals are enlisted under the standards of either Ormuzd or Ahriman according as they are useful or hurtful to man; but M. Darmesteter is of opinion that they originally belonged to the one or the other not on account of any such qualities, but according as they chanced to have lent their forms to either the god or the fiend in the storm tales. "It was not animal psychology," he says, "that disguised gods and fiends as dogs, otters, hedge-hogs, and cocks, or as snakes, tortoises, frogs, and ants, but the accidents of physical qualities and the caprice of popular fancy, as both the god and the fiend might be compared with, and transformed into, any object, the idea of which was suggested by the uproar of the storm, the blazing of the lightning, the streaming of the water, or the hue and shape of the clouds."[67] This hypothesis, however, seems to attach undue importance to mythical fancies, and it presupposes an almost unbounded and capricious allegorism, for which there is apparently little foundation {502} in facts. The suggestion that the animals are referred to either the one or the other category according as they are useful or obnoxious to man, is at all events borne out by a few salient features, although in many details the matter remains obscure.

[Footnote 64: Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 283.]

[Footnote 65: _Vendîdâd_, xiii. _sq._ Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Iranians_, ii. 36.]

[Footnote 66: _Vendîdâd_, xiii. 35.]

[Footnote 67: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. (1st edit.) p. lxxii. _sq._ See also _Idem_, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 283 _sqq._]

It appears that among the Zoroastrians, also, the respect for the life of animals is partly due to superstitious ideas about their souls and fear of their revenge. According to the 'Yasts,' "the souls of the wild beasts and of the tame" are objects of worship;[68] and in one of the Pahlavi texts it is said that people should abstain from unlawfully slaughtering any species of animals, since otherwise, in punishment for such an act, each hair of the animal killed becomes like a sharp dagger, and he who is unlawfully a slaughterer is slain.[69] But here again we may assume the co-operating influence of the feeling of sympathy. Various passages in the Zoroastrian 'Gathas' which enjoin kindness to domestic animals[70] suggest as their motives not only considerations of utility but genuine tenderness. In a later age Firdausi sang, "Ah! spare yon emmet rich in hoarded grain: He lives with pleasure, and he dies with pain."[71] And of the modern Persian Dr. Polak says that, "naturally not cruel, he treats animals with more consideration than men."[72] His present religion, too, enjoins kindness to animals as a duty.

[Footnote 68: _Yasts_, xiii. 154.]

[Footnote 69: _Shâyast Lâ-Shâyast_, x. 8.]

[Footnote 70: Darmesteter, in _Le Zend-Avesta_, i. p. cvi.]

[Footnote 71: Firdausi, quoted by Jones, 'Tenth Anniversary Discourse,' in _Asiatick Researches_, iv. 12.]

[Footnote 72: Polak, _Persien_, i. 12.]

According to Muhammedanism, beasts, birds, fish, insects, are all, like man, the slaves of God, the tools of His will. There is no intrinsic distinction between them and the human species, except what accidental diversity God may have been pleased to make.[73] Muhammed said to his followers:--"There is not a beast upon the earth nor a bird that flies with both its wings, but is a nation like to you; . . . to their Lord shall they be gathered."[74] Muhammedan law prescribes that domestic animals shall {503} be treated with consideration and not be overworked;[75] and in various Muhammedan countries this law has also been habitually put into practice. The Moslems of India are kind to animals.[76] In his earlier intercourse with the people of Egypt, Mr. Lane noticed much humanity to beasts.[77] Montaigne said that the Turks gave alms to brutes and had hospitals for them;[78] and Mr. Bosworth Smith is of opinion that beasts of burden and domestic animals are nowhere in Christendom with the one exception, perhaps, of Norway treated with such unvarying kindness and consideration as they are in Turkey. "In the East," he adds, "so far as it has not been hardened by the West, there is a real sympathy between man and the domestic animals; they understand one another."[79]

[Footnote 73: _Cf._ Palgrave, _Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia_, i. 368.]

[Footnote 74: _Koran_, vi. 38.]

[Footnote 75: Sachau, _Muhammedanisches Recht_, pp. 18, 103.]

[Footnote 76: Pool, _Studies in Mohammedanism_, pp. 176, 177, 247. _Cf._ Heber, _Journey through the Upper Provinces of India_, ii. 131.]

[Footnote 77: Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 293.]

[Footnote 78: Montaigne, _Essais_, ii. 11.]

[Footnote 79: Bosworth Smith, _Mohammed and Mohammedanism_, pp. 180, 217.]

So also the ancient Greeks were on familiar terms with the animal world. This appears from the frequency with which their poets illustrate human qualities by metaphors drawn from it. And as men were compared with animals, so animals were believed to possess human peculiarities. When a beast was going to be sacrificed it had to give its consent to the act by a nod of the head before it was killed.[80] Animals were held in some measure responsible for their deeds; they were tried for manslaughter, sentenced, and executed.[81] On the other hand, honours were bestowed upon beasts which had rendered signal services to their masters. The graves of Cimon's mares with which he three times conquered at the Olympic games were still in the days of Plutarch to be seen near his own tomb;[82] and a certain Xanthippus honoured his dog by burying it on a promontory, since then called "the dog's grave," because when the Athenians were compelled to abandon their city it swam by the side of his galley to Salamis.[83] According to Xenocrates, there were in existence {504} at Eleusis three laws which had been made by an ancient legislator, namely:--"Honour your parents; Sacrifice to the gods from the fruits of the earth; Injure not animals."[84] At Athens a man was punished for flaying a living ram.[85] The Areopagites once condemned a boy to death because he had picked out the eyes of some quails.[86] As we have noticed before, the life of the ploughing ox was sacred;[87] and young animals in particular were believed to be under the protection of the gods.[88] An ancient proverb says that "there are Erinyes even for dogs."[89] This seems to indicate that the Greeks, also, were influenced by the common notion that the soul of an animal may take revenge upon him who killed it, the Erinys of the slain animal being originally its persecuting ghost. Among the Pythagoreans, again, the rule that animals which are not obnoxious to the human race should be neither injured nor killed[90] was connected with their theory of metempsychosis;[91] and in some cases the prohibition of slaying useful animals may be traced to utilitarian motives.[92] But both in Greece and Rome kindness to brutes was also inculcated for their own sake, on purely humanitarian grounds. Porphyry says that, as justice pertains to rational beings and animals have been proved to be possessed of reason, it is necessary that we should act justly towards them.[93] He adds that "he who does not restrict harmless conduct to man alone, but extends it to other animals, most closely approaches to divinity; and if it were possible to extend it to plants, he would preserve this image in a still greater degree."[94] According to Plutarch kindness and beneficence to creatures of every species flow from the breast of a well-natured man as {505} streams that issue from the living fountain. We ought to take care of our dogs and horses not only when they are young, but when they are old and past service.[95] We ought not to violate or kill anything whatsoever that has life, unless it hurt us first.[96] And if we cannot live unblamably we should at least sin with discretion: when we kill an animal in order to satisfy our hunger we should do so with sorrow and pity, without abusing and tormenting it.[97] Cicero says it is a crime to injure an animal.[98] And Marcus Aurelius enjoins man to make use of brutes with a generous and liberal spirit, since he has reason and they have not.[99]

[Footnote 80: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 96 _sq._]

[Footnote 81: _Supra_, i. 254.]

[Footnote 82: Plutarch, _Cato Major_, v. 6.]

[Footnote 83: _Ibid._ v. 7.]

[Footnote 84: Porphyry, _De abstinentia ab esu animalium_, iv. 22.]

[Footnote 85: Plutarch, _De carnium esu oratio I._ vii. 2.]

[Footnote 86: Quintilian, _De institutione oratoria_, v. 9. 13.]

[Footnote 87: _Supra_, ii. 331.]

[Footnote 88: Aeschylus, _Agamemnon_, 48 _sqq._ Xenophon, _Cynegeticus_, v. 14.]

[Footnote 89: Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 96.]

[Footnote 90: Jamblichus, _De Pythagorica vita_, 21 (98).]

[Footnote 91: Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, viii. 2. 12 (77). Aristotle, _Rhetorica_, i. 13. 2, p. 1373 b. Schmidt, _op. cit._ ii. 94.]

[Footnote 92: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iv. 22. _Supra_, ii. 331.]

[Footnote 93: Porphyry, _op. cit._ iii. 18.]

[Footnote 94: _Ibid._ iii. 28.]

[Footnote 95: Plutarch, _Cato Major_, v. 3 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: _Idem_, _Questiones Romanæ_, 75.]

[Footnote 97: _Idem_, _De carnium esu oratio II._ i. 3.]

[Footnote 98: Cicero, _De republica_, iii. 11.]

[Footnote 99: Marcus Aurelius, _Commentarii_, vi. 23.]

In the Old Testament we meet with several instances of kindly feeling towards animals.[100] God watches over and controls the sustenance of their life. He sends springs into the valleys which will give drink to every beast of the field. He gives nests to the birds of the heaven, which sing among the branches. He causes grass to grow for the cattle; and the young lions, roaring after their prey, seek their food from God.[101] Whilst the Jews, as Professor Toy observes, found it hard to conceive of the God of Israel as thinking kindly of its enemies, they had no such feeling of hostility towards beasts and birds.[102] But at the same time man is the centre of the creation, a being set apart from all other sentient creatures as God's special favourite, for whose sake everything else was brought into existence. The sun, the moon, and the stars were placed in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the estate of man.[103] For his sustenance the fruits of the earth were made to grow, and to him was given dominion over the fish of the sea, {506} and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moves upon the earth.[104] And when the earth is to be replenished after the deluge, the same privileges are again granted to him. The fear of man and the dread of man shall be upon all living creatures, into his hand are they all delivered, they shall all be meat for him.[105] And they are given over to his supreme and irresponsible control without the slightest injunction of kindness or the faintest suggestion of any duties towards them. They are to be regarded by him simply as food.[106]

[Footnote 100: See Bertholet, _Die Stellung der Israeliten zu den Fremden_, p. 14. Various passages, however, which are often quoted as instances of tenderness towards animals allow of another and more natural interpretation. This is especially the case with the Sabbatarian injunctions referring to domestic animals.]

[Footnote 101: _Psalms_, civ. 10-12, 14, 17, 21.]

[Footnote 102: Toy, _Judaism and Christianity_, p. 81.]

[Footnote 103: _Genesis_, i. 16 _sq._]

[Footnote 104: _Genesis_, i. 28.]

[Footnote 105: _Ibid._ ix. 2 _sq._]

[Footnote 106: _Cf._ Evans, 'Ethical Relations between Man and Beast,' in _Popular Science Monthly_, xlv. 637 _sq._]

Among the Hebrews the harshness of this anthropocentric doctrine was somewhat mitigated by the sympathy which a simple pastoral and agricultural people naturally feels for its domestic animals. In Christianity, on the other hand, it was further strengthened by the exclusive importance which was attached to the spiritual salvation of man. He was now more than ever separated from the rest of sentient beings. Even his own animal nature was regarded with contempt, the immortality of his soul being the only object of religious interest. "It would seem," says Dr. Arnold, "as if the primitive Christian, by laying so much stress upon a future life in contradistinction to this life, and placing the lower creatures out of the pale of hope, placed them at the same time out of the pale of sympathy, and thus laid the foundation for this utter disregard of animals in the light of our fellow-creatures."[107] St. Paul asks with scorn, "Doth God take care for oxen?"[108] No creed in Christendom teaches kindness to animals as a dogma of religion.[109] In the Middle Ages various councils of the Church declared hunting unlawful for the clergy;[110] but the obvious reason for this prohibition was its horror of bloodshed,[111] not any consideration {507} for the animals. Mr. Mauleverer in Sir Arthur Helps' 'Talk about Animals and their Masters,' says, "Upon a moderate calculation, I think I have heard, in my time, 1320 sermons; and I do not recollect that in any one of them I ever heard the slightest allusion made to the conduct of men towards animals."[112] Nor is there any such allusion in most treatises on Ethics which base their teachings upon distinctly Christian tenets. The kindest words, I think, which from a Christian point of view have been said about animals have generally come from Protestant sectarians, Quakers and Methodists,[113] whereas Roman Catholic writers--with a few exceptions[114]--when they deal with the subject at all, chiefly take pains to show that animals are entirely destitute of rights. Brute beasts, says Father Rickaby, cannot have any rights for the reason that they have no understanding and therefore are not persons. We have no duties of any kind to them, as neither to stocks and stones; we only have duties _about_ them. We must not harm them when they are our neighbour's property, we must not vex and annoy them _for_ sport, because it disposes him who does so to inhumanity towards his own species. But there is no shadow of evil resting on the practice of causing pain to brutes _in_ sport, where the pain is not the sport itself, but an incidental concomitant of it. Much more in all that conduces to the sustenance of man may we give pain to animals, and we are not "bound to any anxious care to make this pain as little as may be. Brutes are as _things_ in our regard: so far as they are useful to us, they exist for us, not for themselves; and we do right in using them unsparingly for our need and convenience, though not for our wantonness."[115] According to another {508} modern Catholic writer the infliction of suffering upon an animal is not only justifiable, but a duty, "when it confers a certain, a solid good, however small, on the spiritual nature of man."[116] Pope Pius IX. refused a request for permission to form in Rome a Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Animals on the professed ground that it was a theological error to suppose that man owes any duty to an animal.[117]

[Footnote 107: Arnold, quoted by Evans, in _Popular Science Monthly_, xlv. 639.]

[Footnote 108: _1 Corinthians_, ix. 9.]

[Footnote 109: The Manichæans prohibited all killing of animals (Baur, _Das Manichäische Religionssystem_, p. 252 _sqq._); but Manichæism did not originate on Christian ground (Harnack, 'Manichæism,' in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, xv. 485; _supra_, ii. 312).]

[Footnote 110: Le Grand d'Aussy, _Histoire de la vie privée des François_, i. 394 _sq._]

[Footnote 111: _Supra_, i. 381 _sq._]

[Footnote 112: Helps, _Some Talk about Animals and their Masters_, p. 20. _Cf._ Mrs. Jameson, _Common-Place Book of Thoughts_, p. 212.]

[Footnote 113: See Gurney, _Views and Practices of the Society of Friends_, p. 392 _sq._ n. 8; Richmond, 'Sermon on the Sin of Cruelty to the Brute Creation,' in _Methodist Magazine_ (London), xxx. 490 _sqq._; Chalmers, 'Cruelty to Animals,' in _Methodist Magazine_ (New York), ix. 259 _sqq._]

[Footnote 114: See de la Roche-Fontenelles, _L'Église et la pitié envers animaux_, _passim_.]

[Footnote 115: Rickaby, _Moral Philosophy_, p. 248 _sqq._ See also Addis and Arnold, _Catholic Dictionary_, p. 33; Clarke, 'Cruelty to Animals,' in _The Month and Catholic Review_, xxv. 401 _sqq._; Hedley, 'Dr. Mivart on Faith and Science,' in _Dublin Review_, ser. iii. vol. xviii. 418.]

[Footnote 116: Clarke, in _The Month and Catholic Review_, xxv. 406.]

[Footnote 117: Cobbe, _Modern Rack_, p. 6.]

It is not only theological moralists that maintain that animals can have no rights and that abstinence from wanton cruelty is a duty not to the animal but to man. This view has been shared by Kant[118] and by many later philosophers.[119] So also the legal protection of animals has often been vindicated merely on the ground that cruelty to animals might breed cruelty to men or shows a cruel disposition of mind,[120] or that it wounds the sensibilities of other people.[121] In 'Parliamentary History and Review' for 1825-1826 it is stated that no reason can be assigned for the interference of the legislator in the protection of animals unless their protection be connected, either directly or remotely, with some advantage to man.[122] The Bill for the abolition of bear-baiting and other cruel practices was expressly propounded on the ground that nothing was more conducive to crime than such sports, that they led the lower orders to gambling, that they educated them for thieves, that they gradually trained them up to bloodshed and murder.[123] The criminal code of the German Empire, again, imposes a fine upon any person "who spitefully tortures or cruelly ill-treats beasts, {509} either publicly or in a manner to create scandal"[124]--in other words, he is punished, not because he puts the animal to pain, but because his conduct is offensive to his fellow men.

[Footnote 118: Kant, _Metaphysische Anfangungsgründe der Tugendlehre_, § 16 _sq._, pp. 106, 108.]

[Footnote 119: _E.g._, Alexander, _Moral Order and Progress_, p. 281; Ritchie, _Natural Rights_, p. 110 _sq._]

[Footnote 120: Hommel, quoted by von Hippel, _Die Thielquälerei in der Strafgesetzgebung_, p. 110. Tissot, _Le droit pénal_, i. 17. Lasson, _System der Rechtsphilosophie_, p. 548 _sq._]

[Footnote 121: Lasson, _op. cit._ p. 548. von Hippel, _op. cit._ p. 125.]

[Footnote 122: _Parliamentary History and Review_, 1825-6, p. 761.]

[Footnote 123: _Ibid._ p. 546.]

[Footnote 124: _Strafgesetzbuch_, § 360 (13).]

Indifference to animal suffering has been a characteristic of public opinion in European countries up to quite modern times. Only a little more than a hundred years ago Thomas Young declared in his 'Essay on Humanity to Animals' that he was sensible of laying himself open to no small portion of ridicule in offering to the public a book on such a subject.[125] Till the end of the eighteenth century and even later cock-fighting was a very general amusement among the English and Scotch, entering into the occupations of both the old and young. Travellers agreed with coachmen that they were to wait a night if there was a cock-fight in any town through which they passed. Schools had their cock-fights; on Shrove Tuesday every youth took to the village schoolroom a cock reared for his special use, and the schoolmaster presided at the conflict.[126] Those who felt that the practice required some excuse found it in the idea that the race was to suffer this annual barbarity by way of punishment for St. Peter's crime;[127] but the number of people who had any scruples about the game cannot have been great considering that even such a strong advocate of humanity to animals as Lawrence had no decided antipathy to it.[128] Other pastimes indulged in were dog-fighting, bull-baiting and badger-baiting; and in the middle of the eighteenth century the bear-garden was described by Lord Kames as one of the chief entertainments of the English, though it was held in abhorrence by the French and "other polite nations," being too savage an amusement to be relished {510} by those of a refined taste.[129] As late as 1824 Sir Robert (then Mr.) Peel argued strongly against the legal prohibition of bull-baiting.[130]

[Footnote 125: Young, _Essay on Humanity to Animals_, p. 1.]

[Footnote 126: Roberts, _Social History of the People of the Southern Counties of England_, p. 421 _sqq._ Rogers, _Social Life in Scotland_, ii. 340. In 1856, when Roberts wrote his book, cock-penance was still paid in some English grammar schools to the master as a perquisite on Shrove Tuesday (Roberts, p. 423).]

[Footnote 127: Roberts, _op. cit._ p. 422.]

[Footnote 128: Lawrence, _Philosophical and Practical Treatise on Horses_, ii. 12.]

[Footnote 129: Kames, _Essays on the Principles of Morality_, p. 7.]

[Footnote 130: Hansard, _Parliamentary Debates_, New Series, x. 491 _sqq._]

About two years previously, however, humanity to animals had, for the first time, become a subject of English legislation by the Act which prevented cruel and improper treatment of cattle.[131] This Act was afterwards followed by others which prohibited bear-baiting, cock-fighting, and similar pastimes, as also cruelty to domestic animals in general. In 1876 vivisection for medical or scientific purposes was subjected to a variety of restrictions, and since 1900 cases of ill-treatment of wild animals in captivity may be dealt with under the Wild Animals in Captivity Protection Act.[132] On the Continent cruelty to animals was first prohibited by criminal law in Saxony, in 1838,[133] and subsequently in most other European states. But in the South of Europe there are still countries in which the law is entirely silent on the subject.[134]

[Footnote 131: _Statutes of Great Britain and Ireland_, lxii. 403 _sqq._]

[Footnote 132: Stephen, _New Commentaries on the Laws of England_, iv. 213 _sqq._]

[Footnote 133: von Hippel, _op. cit._ p. 1.]

[Footnote 134: _Ibid._ p. 90 _sq._]

Whatever be the professed motives of legislators for preventing cruelty to animals, there can be no doubt that the laws against it are chiefly due to a keener and more generally felt sympathy with their sufferings. The actual feelings of men have commonly been somewhat more tender than the theories of law, philosophy, and religion. The anthropocentric exclusiveness of Christianity was from ancient times to some extent counterbalanced by popular sentiments and beliefs. In the folk-tales of Europe man is not placed in an isolated and unique position in the universe. He lives in intimate and friendly intercourse with the animals round him, attributes to them human qualities, and regards them with mercy.[135] Tender feelings towards the brute creation are also displayed in many legends of saints.[136] St. Francis of Assisi {511} talked with the birds and called them "brother birds" or "little sister swallows," and was seen employed in removing worms from the road that they might not be trampled by travellers.[137] John Moschus speaks of a certain abbot who early in the morning not only used to give food to all the dogs in the monastery, but would bring corn to the ants and to the birds on the roof.[138] In the 'Revelations of St. Bridget' we read, "Let a man fear, above all, me, his God, and so much the gentler will he become towards my creatures and animals, on whom, on account of me, their Creator, he ought to have compassion."[139] Many kind words about animals have come from poets and thinkers. Montaigne says that he has never been able to see without affliction an innocent beast, which is without defence and from which we receive no offence, pursued and killed.[140] Shakespeare points out that "the poor beetle that we tread upon, in corporal sufferance finds a pang as great as when a giant dies."[141] Mandeville thinks that if it was not for that tyranny which custom usurps over us, no men of any tolerable good-nature could ever be reconciled to the killing of so many animals for their daily food, as long as the bountiful earth so plentifully provides them with varieties of vegetable dainties.[142] Towards the end of the eighteenth century Bentham wrote:--"Men must be permitted to kill animals; but they should be forbidden to torment them. Artificial death may be rendered less painful than natural death by simple processes, well worth the trouble of being studied, and of becoming an object of police. Why should the law refuse its protection to any sensitive being? A time will come when humanity will spread its mantle over everything that breathes. The lot of slaves has begun to {512} excite pity; we shall end by softening the lot of the animals which labour for us and supply our wants."[143] Some years later Thomas Young pronounced hunting, shooting, and fishing for sport to be "unlawful, cruel, and sinful."[144] And in the course of the nineteenth century humanity to animals, from being conspicuous in a few individuals only, became the keynote of a movement gradually increasing in strength. Humanitarians, says Mr. Salt, "insist that the difference between human and non-human is one of degree only and not of kind, and that we owe duties, the same in kind though not in degree, to all our sentient fellow-beings."[145] Some people maintain that it is wrong to kill animals for food or in sport; but the most vigorous attacks concerning the treatment of the brute creation are at present directed against the practice of vivisection. The claim is made that this practice should be, not merely restricted, but entirely prohibited by law. And while the antivivisectionists generally endeavour to deny or minimise the scientific importance of experiments on living animals, their cry for the abolition of such experiments is mainly based on the argument that humanity at large has no right to purchase relief from its own suffering by torturing helpless brutes.

[Footnote 135: _Supra_, i. 259. Schwarz, _Prähistorisch-anthropologische Studien_, p. 203.]

[Footnote 136: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, ii. 168 _sqq._ Joyce, _Social History of Ancient Ireland_, ii. 517 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: Sabatier, _Life of St. Francis of Assisi_, p. 176 _sq._ Digby, _Mores Catholici_, ii. 291.]

[Footnote 138: Moschus, _Pratum spirituale_, 184 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Græca, lxxxvii. 3056).]

[Footnote 139: St. Bridget, quoted by Helps, _op. cit._ p. 124.]

[Footnote 140: Montaigne, _Essais_, ii. 11.]

[Footnote 141: Shakespeare, _Measure for Measure_, iii. 1.]

[Footnote 142: Mandeville, _Fable of the Bees_, p. 187.]

[Footnote 143: Bentham, _Theory of Legislation_, p. 428 _sq._]

[Footnote 144: Young, _op. cit._ p. 75 _sq._]

[Footnote 145: Salt, _Animals' Rights_, p. v.]

This rapidly increasing sympathy with animal suffering is no doubt to a considerable extent due to the decline of the anthropocentric doctrine and the influence of another theory, which regards man, not as an image of the deity separated from the lower animals by a special act of creation, but as a being generally akin to them, and only representing a higher stage in the scale of mental evolution. Through this doctrine the orthodox contempt for dumb creatures was succeeded by feelings of affinity and kindly interest. But apart from any theory as regards human origins, growing reflection has also taught men to be more considerate in their treatment of animals by producing a more vivid idea of their sufferings. Human thoughtlessness {513} has been responsible for much needless pain to which they have been made subject. In spite of some improvement it is so still; whilst, at the same time, the movement advocating greater humanity to animals is itself not altogether free from inconsistencies and a certain lack of discrimination.

It has been observed that the Neapolitan would not act so cruelly as he does to almost all animals except the cat if he could bring himself to conceive their capacity for joy and pain.[146] So also we ourselves should often behave differently if we realised the tortures we thoughtlessly cause to creatures whose sufferings escape our notice from want of obvious outward expression. While the practice of whipping young pigs to death to make them tender, which occurred in England not much more than a century ago,[147] would nowadays be regarded with general horror, cruelties inflicted for gastronomic purposes upon creatures of a lower type are little thought of. Cray-fish, oysters, and fish in general, as Mandeville observed, excite hardly any compassion at all, because "they express themselves unintelligibly to us; they are mute, and their inward formation, as well as outward figure, vastly different from ours."[148] On the other hand, even passionate sportsmen describe the hunting of monkeys as repulsive on account of their resemblance to man; Rajah Brooke thought it almost barbarous to kill an orang-utan, unless for the sake of scientific research.[149] Buddhism itself declares that "he who takes away the life of a large animal will have greater demerit than he who takes away the life of a small one. . . . The crime is not great when an ant is killed; its magnitude increases in this progression--a lizard, a guana, a hare, a deer, a bull, a horse, and an elephant."[150] How little the feelings which underlie men's opinions concerning conduct {514} towards the lower animals are influenced by reflection is also apparent in the present crusade against vivisection, when compared with the public indifference to the sufferings inflicted on wild animals in sport. The vivisector who in cold blood torments his helpless victim in the interest of science and for the benefit of mankind is called a coward, and is a much more common object of hatred than the sportsman who causes agonies to the creature he pursues for sheer amusement. The pursued animal, it is argued, has "free chances of escape."[151] This is an excellent argument--provided we share the North American Indian's conviction that an animal can never be killed without its own permission.

[Footnote 146: 'Cruelty to Animals in Naples,' in _Saturday Review_, lix. 854.]

[Footnote 147: _The World_, 1756, nr. 190, p. 1142. Young, _op. cit._ p. 129.]

[Footnote 148: Mandeville, _op. cit._ p. 187.]

[Footnote 149: Brooke, _Ten Years in Saráwak_, i. 100. _Cf._ Rengger, _Naturgeschichte in der Säugethiere von Paraguay_, p. 26.]

[Footnote 150: Hardy, _Manual of Budhism_, pp. 478, 480.]

[Footnote 151: Cobbe, _op. cit._ p. 10.]

At present there is among ourselves no topic of moral concern which presents a greater variety of opinion than the question how far the happiness of the lower animals may be justly sacrificed for the benefit of man. The extreme views on this subject might, no doubt, be somewhat modified, on the one hand by a more vivid representation of animal suffering, on the other hand by the recognition of certain facts, often overlooked, which make it unreasonable to regard conduct towards dumb creatures in exactly the same light as conduct towards men. It should especially be remembered that the former have none of those long-protracted anticipations of future misery or death which we have.[152] If they are destined to serve as meat they are not aware of it; whereas many domestic animals would never have come into existence, and been able to enjoy what appears a very happy life, but for the purpose of being used as food. But though greater intellectual discrimination may somewhat lessen the divergencies of moral opinion on the subject, nothing like unanimity can be expected, for the simple reason that moral judgments are ultimately based upon emotions, and sympathy with the animal world is a feeling which varies extremely in different individuals.

[Footnote 152: _Cf._ Bentham, _Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation_, p. 311, n.]

CHAPTER XLV

REGARD FOR THE DEAD

MORALITY takes notice not only of men's conduct towards the living but of their conduct towards the dead.

There is a general tendency in the human mind to assume that what has existed still exists and will exist. When a person dies it is difficult for those around him to conceive that he is really dead, and when the cold motionless body bears sad testimony to the change which has taken place, there is a natural inclination to believe that the soul has only changed its abode. In the savage the tendency to assume the continued existence of the soul after death is strongly supported by dreams and visions of his deceased friends. What else could these mean but visits of their souls?

There are, it is true, some savages who are reported to believe in the annihilation of the soul at the moment of death, or to have no notion whatever of a future state.[1] But the accuracy of these statements is hardly beyond suspicion. We sometimes hear that the very people who are said to deny any belief in an after-life are afraid of ghosts.[2] A native of Madagascar will almost in the same {516} breath declare that when he dies he ceases altogether to exist and yet confess the fact that he is in the habit of praying to his dead ancestors.[3] Of the Masai in Eastern Africa some writers state that they believe in annihilation,[4] others that they attribute a future existence to their chiefs, medicine men, or influential people.[5] The ideas on this subject are often exceedingly vague, and inconsistencies are only to be expected.

[Footnote 1: Powers, _Tribes of California_, p. 348 _sq._ (Miwok). Brinton, _Myths of the New World_, p. 233 _sq._ (some Oregon Indians). Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 101 (natives of the Herbert River, Northern Queensland). Martin, _Reisen in den Molukken_, p. 155 (Alfura). Worcester, _Philippine Islands_, p. 412 (Mangyans). Colquhoun, _Amongst the Shans_, p. 76 (Lethtas). Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 257 (Oráons). Petherick, _Travels in Central Africa_, i. 321 (Nouaer tribes). Du Chaillu, _Explorations in Equatorial Africa_, p. 385.]

[Footnote 2: New, _Life in Eastern Africa_, p. 105.]

[Footnote 3: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, 393.]

[Footnote 4: Thomson, _Through Masai Land_, p. 259. Hinde, _The Last of the Masai_, p. 99.]

[Footnote 5: Johnston, _Uganda_, ii. 832. Hollis, _Masai_, pp. 304, 305, 307. Eliot, _ibid._ p. xx.]

The disembodied soul is commonly supposed to have the shape of a small unsubstantial human image, and to be in its nature a sort of vapour, film, or shadow.[6] It is believed to have the same bodily wants and to possess the same mental capacities as its owner possessed during his lifetime. It is not regarded as invulnerable or immortal--it may be hurt and killed. It feels hunger and thirst, heat and cold. It can see and hear and think, it has human passions and a human will, and it has the power to influence the living for evil or for good. These notions as regards the disembodied soul determine the relations between the living and the dead.

[Footnote 6: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, i. 429.]

The dead are supposed to have rights very similar to those they had whilst alive. The soul must not be killed or injured. The South Australian Dieyerie, for instance, show great reverence for certain trees, which are believed to be their fathers transformed; they will not cut them down and protest against the settlers doing so.[7] So also some of the Philippine Islanders maintain that the souls of their forefathers are in trees, which they therefore spare.[8] The North American Powhatans refrained from doing harm to some small wood-birds, which were supposed to receive the souls of their chiefs.[9] In Lifu, {517} when a father was about to die, surrounded by members of his family, he might say what animal he would be, for instance a butterfly or some kind of bird, and that creature would be sacred to his family, who would neither injure nor kill it.[10] The Rejangs of Sumatra imagine that tigers in general contain the spirits of departed men, and "no consideration will prevail on a countryman to catch or to wound one, but in self-defence, or immediately after the act of destroying a friend or relation."[11] Among other peoples monkeys, crocodiles, or snakes, being thought men in metempsychosis, are held sacred and must not be hurt.[12] Some Congo Negroes, again, abstain for a whole year after a death from sweeping the house, lest the dust should injure the delicate substance of the ghost.[13] In China, for seven days after a man's death his widow and children avoid the use of knives and needles, and even of chopsticks, eating their food with their fingers, so as not to wound the ghost.[14] And to this day it remains a German peasants' belief that it is wrong to slam a door, lest one should pinch a soul in it.[15]

[Footnote 7: Gason, 'Dieyerie Tribe,' in Woods' _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 280.]

[Footnote 8: Blumentritt, 'Der Ahnencultus der Malaien des Philippinen-Archipels,' in _Mittheil. d. kais. u. kön. Geograph. Gesellsch. in Wien_, xxv. 164 _sqq._]

[Footnote 9: Brinton, _Myths of the New World_, p. 102.]

[Footnote 10: Codrington, quoted by Tylor, 'Remarks on Totemism,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxviii. 147.]

[Footnote 11: Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 292. The same belief prevails among the natives of the Malay Peninsula (Newbold, _British Settlements in the Straits of Malacca_, ii. 192).]

[Footnote 12: Meiners, _Geschichte der Religionen_, i. 212. Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 8.]

[Footnote 13: Bastian, _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_, ii. 323.]

[Footnote 14: Gray, _China_, i. 288.]

[Footnote 15: Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_, § 609, p. 396 _sq._]

But the survivors must not only avoid doing anything which might hurt the soul, they must also positively contribute to its comfort and subsistence. They often provide it with a dwelling, either burying the deceased in his own house, or erecting a tent or hut on his grave. Some Australian natives kindle a fire at a few yards' distance from the tomb, and repeat this until the soul is supposed to have gone somewhere else;[16] others, again, are in the habit of wrapping the body up in a rug, professedly for the purpose of keeping it warm.[17] In the Saxon district of Voigtland people have been known to {518} put into the coffin an umbrella and a pair of galoshes.[18] An extremely prevalent custom is to place provisions in or upon the grave, and very commonly feasts are given for the dead.[19] Weapons, implements, and other movables are deposited in the tomb; domestic animals are buried or slaughtered at the funeral;[20] and, as we have seen before, even human beings are sacrificed to the dead to serve them as companions or attendants, or to vivify their spirits with their blood, or to gratify their craving for revenge.[21]

[Footnote 16: Roth, _North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, p. 165.]

[Footnote 17: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 79 _sq._]

[Footnote 18: Kohler, _Volksbrauch im Voigtlande_, p. 441.]

[Footnote 19: See Tylor. _op. cit._ ch. xi. _sq._; Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 155 _sqq._, 257 _sqq._; Frazer, _Adonis Attis Osiris_, p. 242 _sqq._]

[Footnote 20: See Spencer, _op. cit._ i. 184 _sqq._]

[Footnote 21: _Supra_, i. 472 _sqq._]

The offerings made to the dead may be gifts presented to them by the survivors, but the regular funeral sacrifice consists of the deceased person's own individual property. Among savages the whole, or a large part, of it is often consigned to the grave or destroyed.[22] The right of ownership does not cease with death where the belief prevails that the dead stand in need of earthly chattels. The recognition of this right is also apparent in the severe condemnation of robbery or violation committed at a tomb. Among various North American tribes such an act was regarded as an offence of the first magnitude and provoked cruel revenge.[23] Of the Chippewa Indians it is said that however bad a person may be or however much inclined to steal, the things left at a grave, valuable or not, are never touched, being sacred to the spirit of the {519} dead.[24] Among the Maoris "the least violation of any portion of the precincts of the dead is accounted the greatest crime that a human being can commit, and is visited with the direst revenge of a surviving tribe."[25] The laws of Athens[26] and Rome[27] and the ancient Teutonic law-books[28] punished with great severity the plunder of a corpse or a tomb. In Rome the punishment was death if the offence was committed by force, otherwise condemnation to the mines.

[Footnote 22: Boas, 'Central Eskimo,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi. 580. Murdoch, 'Ethn. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' _ibid._ ix. 424 _sq._ (Point Barrow Eskimo). Powell, _ibid._ iii. p. lvii. (North American Indians). Yarrow, 'Mortuary Customs of the North American Indians,' _ibid._ i. 98 (Pimas), 100 (Comanches). McGee, 'Siouan Indians,' _ibid._ xv. 178. Roth, _op. cit._ p. 164 (certain Queensland tribes). Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, p. 57. Kolff, _Voyages of the Dourga_, p. 166 _sq._ (Arru Islanders). Kloss, _In the Andamans and Nicobars_, p. 304 (Kar Nicobarese). Batchelor, _Ainu and their Folk-Lore_, p. 560 _sq._ Georgi, _Russia_, iv. 152 (Burats). Caillié, _Travels through Central Africa_, i. 164 (Bagos). Burrows, _Land of the Pigmies_, p. 107 (Monbuttu). Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 79 (Barotse). Strabo, xi. 4. 8 (Albanians of the Eastern Caucasus). See also Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 185 _sq._; Post, _Entwicklungsgeschichte des Familienrechts_, p. 295 _sq._; _Idem_, _Grundriss der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz_, ii. 173 _sq._; _infra_, p. 514 _sq._]

[Footnote 23: Sagard, _Voyage du Pays des Hurons_, p. 288. Gibbs, 'Tribes of Western Washington and North-western Oregon,' in _Contributions to North American Ethnology_, i. 204.]

[Footnote 24: Reid, 'Religious Belief of the Ojibois,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iii. 112.]

[Footnote 25: Polack, _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_, i. 111 _sq._]

[Footnote 26: Cicero, _De legibus_, ii. 26. See also Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 105 _sq._]

[Footnote 27: _Digesta_, xlvii. 12, 'De sepulchro violato.']

[Footnote 28: Wilda, _Das Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 975 _sqq._]

Like living men the dead are sensitive to insults and fond of praise; hence respect must be shown for their honour and self-regarding pride. _De mortuis nil nisi bonum;_ [Greek: ou) ga\r e)sthla\ katthanou=si kertomei=n e)p' a)ndra/sin].[29] In Greece custom required that at the funeral meal the virtues of the deceased should be enumerated and extolled,[30] and calumny against a dead person was punished by law.[31] The same was the case in ancient Egypt.[32] In Greenland, after the interment, the nearest male relative of the dead commemorated in a loud plaintive voice all the excellent qualities of the departed.[33] Among the Iroquois the near relatives and friends approached the body in turn and addressed it in a laudatory speech.[34]

[Footnote 29: Archilochus, _Reliquiæ_, 40.]

[Footnote 30: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 122 _sq._]

[Footnote 31: Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 224.]

[Footnote 32: Diodorus Siculus, i. 92. 5. Erman, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 322.]

[Footnote 33: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 218.]

[Footnote 34: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 175, n. 2.]

The dead also demand obedience and are anxious that the rules they laid down while alive should be followed by the survivors. Hence the sacredness which is attached to a will;[35] hence also, in a large measure, the rigidity of ancestral custom. The greatest dread of the natives of South-Eastern Africa "is to offend their ancestors and the only way to avoid this is to do everything according to {520} traditional usage."[36] Among the Basutos "the anger of the deified generations could not be more directly provoked than by a departure from the precepts and examples they have left behind them."[37] The E[(w]e-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast have a proverb which runs:--"Follow the customs of your father. What he did not do, avoid doing, or you will harm yourself."[38] Among the Aleuts the old men always impress upon the native youth the great importance of strictly observing the customs of their forefathers in conducting the chase and other matters, as any neglect in this respect would be sure to bring upon them disaster and punishment.[39] The Kamchadales, says Steller, consider it a sin to do anything which is contrary to the precepts of their ancestors.[40] The Papuans of the Motu district, in New Guinea, believe that when men and women are bad--adulterers, thieves, quarrellers, and the like--the spirits of the dead are angry with them.[41] One of the most powerful sentiments in the mind of a Chinese is his reverence for ancestral custom; and in a large sense Japan also is still a country governed by the voices that are hushed.[42] The life of the ancient Roman was beset with a society of departed kinsmen whose displeasure he provoked if he varied from the practice handed down from his fathers. The expression _mos majorum_, "the custom of the elders," was used by him as a charm against innovation.[43]

[Footnote 35: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, iii. 116 (Tahitians). Shortland, _Traditions and Superstitions of the New Zealanders_, p. 257. Sarbah, _Fanti Customary Laws_, p. 82. Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 124 _sq._]

[Footnote 36: Macdonald, _Light in Africa_, p. 192.]

[Footnote 37: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 254.]

[Footnote 38: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 263.]

[Footnote 39: Elliott, _Alaska and the Seal Islands_, p. 170. Veniaminof, quoted by Petroff, _Report on the Population, &c. of Alaska_, p. 156.]

[Footnote 40: Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 274.]

[Footnote 41: Chalmers, _Pioneering in New Guinea_, p. 169.]

[Footnote 42: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 308. Hozumi, _Ancestor-Worship and Japanese Law_, p. 1, &c.]

[Footnote 43: Granger, 'Moral Life of the Early Romans,' in _Internal. Jour. of Ethics_, vii. 287. _Idem_, _Worship of the Romans_, pp. 65, 66, 138.]

Besides such duties to the dead as are similar in nature to those which men owe to their living fellow men or superiors, there are obligations of a different character arising from the fact of death itself. The funeral, the rites connected with it, and the mourning customs are largely regarded as duties to the dead.

{521} The grave is represented as a place where the deceased finds his desired rest, and if denied proper burial he is believed not only to walk but to suffer. The Iroquois considered that unless the rites of burial were performed, the spirits of the dead had to wander for a time upon the earth in a state of great unhappiness; hence their extreme solicitude to recover the bodies of their slain in battle.[44] The Abipones regard it as the greatest misfortune for the dead to be left to rot in the open air, and they therefore inter even the smallest bone of a departed friend.[45] In Ashantee the spirits of those who for some reason or other have been deprived of the customary funeral rites are doomed, in the imagination of the people, to haunt the gloom of the forest, stealing occasionally to their former abodes in rare but lingering visits, troubling and bewitching their neglectful relatives.[46] The Negroes of Accra believe that happiness in a future life depends not only upon courage, power, and wealth in this world, but also upon a proper burial.[47] In some Australian tribes the souls of those whose bodies have been left to lie unburied are supposed to have to prowl on the face of the earth and about the place of death, with no gratification but to harm the living;[48] or there is said to be no future existence for them, as their bodies will be devoured by crows and native dogs.[49] Among the Bataks of Sumatra nothing is considered to be a greater disgrace to a person than to be denied a grave; for by not being held worthy of burial he is declared to be spiritually dead.[50] The Samoans believed that the souls of unburied friends, for instance such as had been drowned or had fallen in war, haunted them everywhere, crying out in a pitiful tone, "Oh, how cold! Oh, how cold!"[51] According to Karen ideas the {522} spirits of those who die a natural death and are decently buried go to a beautiful country and renew their earthly life, whereas the ghosts of persons who by accident are left uninterred will wander about the earth, occasionally showing themselves to mankind.[52] Confucius connected the disposal of the dead immediately with the great virtue of submission and devotion to superiors.[53] No act is in China recognised more worthy a virtuous man than that of interring stray bones and covering up exposed coffins,[54] and to bury a person who is without friends is considered to be as great a merit as to save life.[55] It is also held highly important to provide the proper place for a grave; the Taouists maintain that "if a coffin be interred in an improper spot, the spirit of the dead is made unhappy, and avenges itself by causing sickness and other calamities to the relatives who have not taken sufficient care for its repose."[56] The ancient Chaldeans believed that the spirits of the unburied dead, having neither place of repose nor means of subsistence, wandered through the town and country, occupied with no other thought than that of attacking and robbing the living.[57] In classical antiquity it was the most sacred of duties to give the body its funeral rites,[58] and the Greeks referred the right of sepulture to the gods as its authors.[59]

[Footnote 44: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 175.]

[Footnote 45: Dobrizhoffer, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 284.]

[Footnote 46: Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 262 _sq._]

[Footnote 47: Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 4.]

[Footnote 48: Oldfield, 'Aborigines of Australia,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. iii. 228, 236 _sq._]

[Footnote 49: Chauncy, in Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, ii. 280.]

[Footnote 50: Buning, in _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 75.]

[Footnote 51: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 233. Hood, _Cruise in H.M.S. "Fawn" in the Western Pacific_, p. 142.]

[Footnote 52: Cross, quoted by Mac Mahon, _Far Cathay_, p. 202 _sq._ Mason, 'Religion, &c. among the Karens,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxiv. pt. ii. 203.]

[Footnote 53: de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. ii. book) i. 659.]

[Footnote 54: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, ii. 147, n. 11.]

[Footnote 55: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 161.]

[Footnote 56: Legge, _Religions of China_, p. 200.]

[Footnote 57: Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 689. Jeremias, _Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode_, p. 54 _sqq._ Halévy, _Mélanges de critique et d'histoire relatifs aux peuples sémitiques_, p. 368.]

[Footnote 58: See Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 97 _sqq._; Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, p. 37 _sqq._; Aust, _Die Religion der Römer_, p. 226 _sq._]

[Footnote 59: Sophocles, _Antigone_, 454 _sq._ Euripides, _Supplices_, 563.]

So also among peoples who practise cremation the dead themselves are considered to be benefited by being burned. The Nâyars of Malabar are of opinion that no time should be lost in setting about the funeral, as the disposal of a corpse either by cremation or burial as soon {523} as possible after death is conducive to the happiness of the spirit of the departed; they say that "the collection and careful disposal of the ashes of the dead gives peace to his spirit."[60] The Thlinkets maintain that those whose bodies are burned will be warm and comfortable in the other world, whereas others will have to suffer from cold. "Burn my body! Burn me!" pleaded a dying Thlinket; "I fear the cold. Why should I go shivering through all the ages and the distances of the next world?"[61] The ancient Persians, on the other hand, considered both cremation and burial to be sins for which there was no atonement, and exposed their dead on the summits of mountains, thinking it a great misfortune if neither birds nor beasts devoured their carcases.[62] So also the Samoyedes and Mongols held it to be good for the deceased if his corpse was soon devoured by beasts,[63] and the Kamchadales regarded it as a great blessing to be eaten by a beautiful dog.[64] The East African Masai, who likewise, as a rule, expose their dead to the wild beasts, say that if the corpse is eaten by the hyænas the first night, the deceased must have been a good man, as the hyænas are supposed to act by the command of 'Ng ais, or God.[65]

[Footnote 60: Fawcett, 'Nâyars of Malabar,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iii. 245, 251.]

[Footnote 61: Dall, _Alaska_, p. 423. Petroff, _op. cit._ p. 175. McNair Wright, _Among the Alaskans_, p. 333.]

[Footnote 62: _Vendîdâd_, i. 13, 17; vi. 45 _sqq._; viii. 10. Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxxv. _sqq._ Agathias, _Historiæ_, ii. 22 _sq._ (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, lxxxviii. 1377). Herodotus, i. 140; iii. 16.]

[Footnote 63: Preuss, _Die Begräbnisarten der Amerikaner und Nordostasiaten_, p. 272. _Cf._ Yarrow, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ i. 103 (Caddoes or Timber Indians).]

[Footnote 64: Steller, _op. cit._ p. 273.]

[Footnote 65: Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 193.]

Certain ceremonies are professedly performed for the purpose of preventing evil spirits from doing harm to the dead.[66] This is sometimes the case with cremation; we are told that among some Siberian peoples the dead are burned so as to be "effectually removed from the machinations of spirits."[67] The Teleutes believe that the {524} spirits of the earth do much mischief to the departed; hence their shamans drive them off at the funeral by striking the air several times with an axe.[68] In Christian countries the passing-bell has likewise been supposed to repel evil spirits.[69]

[Footnote 66: See Frazer, 'Certain Burial Customs as illustrative of the Primitive Theory of the Soul,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 87 _sq._; Hertz, 'La représentation collective de la mort,' in _L'année sociologique_, x., 1905-1906, p. 56 _sq._]

[Footnote 67: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 264.]

[Footnote 68: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 264.]

[Footnote 69: Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 87.]

Fasting after a death is regarded as a dutiful tribute to the dead; the Chinese say that it is "a means of raising the mind up to the soul, a means to enable the sacrificer to perform in a more perfect way the acts of worship incumbent upon him, by bringing about a closer contact between himself and the soul."[70] The self-mutilations performed by the relatives of the dead are supposed to be pleasing to him as tokens of affliction;[71] and the same is of course the case with the lamentations at funerals. In some Central Australian tribes the custom of painting the body of a mourner is said to have as its object "to render him or her more conspicuous, and so to allow the spirit to see that it is being properly mourned for."[72] The mourning dress is a sign of regard for the dead. Nay, even the custom of not mentioning his name is looked upon in the same light. Some peoples maintain that to name him would be to disturb his rest,[73] or that he would take it as an indication that his relatives are not properly mourning for him, and would feel it as an insult.[74]

[Footnote 70: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 657.]

[Footnote 71: Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 216 _sqq._]

[Footnote 72: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 511.]

[Footnote 73: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 233 (Greenlanders). Tout, 'Ethnology of the Stlatlumh of British Columbia,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 138. Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 27 (Samoyedes).]

[Footnote 74: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 498.]

As the duties to the living, so the duties to the dead are greatly influenced by the relationship between the parties. Everywhere the obligation to satisfy the wants of the deceased is incumbent upon those who were nearest to him whilst alive. In the archaic State, as we have seen, it is considered the greatest misfortune which can befall a person to die without descendants, since in such a case there would be nobody to attend to his soul.[75] Confucius {525} said, "For a man to sacrifice to a spirit which does not belong to him is flattery."[76] The distinction between a tribesman or fellow countryman and a stranger also applies to the dead. In Greenland a stranger without relatives or friends was generally suffered to lie unburied.[77] Among North American Indians it is permitted to scalp warriors of a hostile tribe, whereas "there is no example of an Indian having taken the scalp of a man of his own tribe, or of one belonging to a nation in alliance with his own, and whom he may have killed in a quarrel or a fit of anger";[78] and an Indian who would never think of desecrating the grave of a tribesman may have "no such scruple in regard to the graves of another tribe."[79] Yet already from early times we hear of the recognition of certain duties even to strangers and enemies. The Greeks of the post-Homeric age made it a rule to deliver up a slain enemy so that he should receive the proper funeral rites.[80] It was considered a disgraceful act of Lysander not to accord burial to Philocles, the Athenian general at Aegospotami, together with about four thousand prisoners whom he put to the sword;[81] and the Athenians themselves boasted that their ancestors had with their own hands buried the Persians who had fallen in the battle of Marathon, holding it to be "a sacred and imperative duty to cover with earth a human corpse."[82] According to the Chinese penal code, "destroying, mutilating, or throwing into the water the unenclosed and unburied corpse of a stranger," though a much less serious crime than the same injury inflicted upon the corpse of a relative, is yet an offence punishable with 100 blows, and perpetual banishment to the distance of 3,000 _lee_.[83]

[Footnote 75: _Supra_, ii. 400 _sqq._]

[Footnote 76: _Lun Yü_, ii. 24. 1.]

[Footnote 77: Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 218.]

[Footnote 78: Domenech, _Seven Years' Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 357.]

[Footnote 79: Dodge, _Our Wild Indians_, p. 162.]

[Footnote 80: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 100 _sqq._ Rohde, _op. cit._ p. 200 _sq._]

[Footnote 81: Pausanias, ix. 32. 9.]

[Footnote 82: _Ibid._ i. 32. 5; ix. 32. 9.]

[Footnote 83: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. cclxxvi. p. 295.]

The duties to the dead also vary according to the age, {526} sex, and social position of the departed. Among the natives of Australia children and women are interred with but scant ceremony.[84] In the tribes of North-West-Central Queensland nobody paints his body in mourning for a young child.[85] In Eastern Central Africa the spirit of a child which dies when about four or five days of age gets nothing of the attention usually bestowed on the dead.[86] Among the Wadshagga married persons are buried in their huts, whilst the bodies of unmarried ones and especially children are put in some hidden place, where they are left to rot or be devoured by beasts.[87] Some Siberian tribes were formerly accustomed to inhume adults only, whereas the corpses of children were exposed on trees.[88] The natives of Port Jackson, in New South Wales, consigned their young people to the grave, but burned those who had passed middle age.[89] The Kondayamkottai Maravars, a Dravidian tribe of Tinnevelly in Southern India, bury the corpses of unmarried persons, whilst those of married ones are cremated.[90] In some other tribes in India burial is practised in the case of young children only,[91] and this has long been a rule of Brahmanism.[92] Among the Andaman Islanders, again, infants are buried within the encampment, whereas all other dead are carried to some distant and secluded spot in the jungle.[93] We meet with a kindred custom in the neighbourhood of Victoria Nyanza in Central Africa: in Karagwe and Nkole "children are buried in the huts themselves, grown-up people outside, generally in cultivated fields, or in such as are going to be cultivated."[94] The bodies of women are sometimes disposed of in a {527} different way from those of men. Thus among the Blackfeet Indians the latter were fastened in the branches of trees so high as to be beyond the reach of wolves, and then left to waste in the dry winds; whilst the body of a woman or child was thrown into the underbush or jungle, where it soon became the prey of the wild animals.[95] Among the Tuski (Chukchi), who cremate or rather boil the bodies of good men, women are not usually burned, on account of the scarcity of wood.[96]

[Footnote 84: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 89.]

[Footnote 85: Roth, _op. cit._ p. 164.]

[Footnote 86: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 59.]

[Footnote 87: Volkens, _Der Kilimandscharo_, p. 253.]

[Footnote 88: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 31 (Koibales).]

[Footnote 89: Collins, _English Colony of New South Wales_, i. 601.]

[Footnote 90: Fawcett, 'Kondayamkottai Maravars,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiii. 64.]

[Footnote 91: Thurston, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, i. 198 (Kotas). Fawcett, 'Nâyars of Malabar,' _ibid._ iii. 245.]

[Footnote 92: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 273.]

[Footnote 93: Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 144.]

[Footnote 94: Kollmann, _Victoria Nyanza_, p. 63 _sq._]

[Footnote 95: Yarrow, _Introduction to the Study of Mortuary Customs among the North American Indians_, p. 67.]

[Footnote 96: Dall, _op. cit._ p. 382.]

Class distinctions likewise influence the disposal of the dead. In some American tribes cremation seems to be reserved for persons of higher rank.[97] Among the pagans of Obubura Hill district in Southern Nigeria "the bodies of ordinary people are buried in the bush, sometimes being merely thrown on the ground, but those of chiefs and important men and women are buried in their huts or in the adjoining verandah."[98] The Masai throw away the corpses of ordinary persons to be eaten by hyænas, whereas medicine-men and influential people are buried.[99] The Nandi do not bury their dead unless they have been very important persons.[100] Among the Waganda, when a chief dies, he is buried in a wooden coffin, whilst the bodies of slaves are thrown into the jungle.[101] Some other African peoples throw the corpses of slaves into a morass or the nearest pool of water.[102] The Thlinkets committed them to the tender mercies of the sea.[103] Among the Maoris a slave would not be greatly bewailed after death, nor have his bones ceremonially scraped.[104] The Roman 'Law of the Twelve Tables' prohibited the bodies of slaves from being embalmed.[105] Moral distinctions, also, are noticeable in {528} the treatment of the dead. In some parts of Central America the bodies of men of high standing who had committed a crime were, like those of the common people, exposed to be devoured by wild beasts.[106] Among the Tuski the corpses of bad men were simply left to rot.[107] In Greenland the body of a dead malefactor was dismembered, and the separate limbs were thrown apart.[108] To the same class of facts belong the punishments which were inflicted upon the corpses of criminals in classical antiquity and formerly in Christian Europe.[109]

[Footnote 97: Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 301.]

[Footnote 98: Partridge, _Cross River Natives_, p. 237.]

[Footnote 99: Hollis, _op. cit._ pp. 304, 305, 307; Eliot, _ibid._ p. xx.]

[Footnote 100: Johnston, _Uganda_, ii. 880.]

[Footnote 101: Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, i. 188.]

[Footnote 102: Denham and Clapperton, _Travels in Northern and Central Africa_, ii. 64 (natives of Kano). Pogge, _Im Reiche des Muata Jamwo_, p. 243 (Kalunda).]

[Footnote 103: Holmberg, 'Ethnographische Skizzen über die Völker des russischen Amerika,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, iv. 323. Dall, _op. cit._ pp. 417, 420.]

[Footnote 104: Colenso, _op. cit._ p. 30.]

[Footnote 105: _Lex Duodecim Tabularum_, x. 6.]

[Footnote 106: Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 301.]

[Footnote 107: Dall, _op. cit._ p. 382.]

[Footnote 108: Rink, _Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo_, p. 64.]

[Footnote 109: Ayrault, _Des procez faicts au cadaver_, p. 5 _sqq._ Trummer, _Vorträge über Tortur, &c._ i. 455 _sqq._ _Supra_, ii. 254.]

From this survey of facts we shall now pass to a consideration of the causes from which the duties to the dead have sprung. In the first place, there can be no doubt that these duties to a considerable extent are based upon the feeling of sympathetic resentment, in the same way as is the case with duties to living persons. Death does not entirely extinguish the affection which was felt for a person whilst he was alive. The rites and customs connected with a death are very largely similar to or identical with natural expressions of grief, and in spite of their ceremonial character it is impossible to believe that they are altogether counterfeit. We are told by trustworthy eye-witnesses that, although the self-inflicted pain and the loud lamentations which form part of a funeral among the Australian blacks are not to be taken as a measure of the grief actually felt, this expression of despair "is not all artificial or professional";[110] and Mr. Man believes that among the Andaman Islanders "in the majority of cases the display of grief is thoroughly sincere."[111] But the dead also inspire other feelings than sympathy and sorrow, and the duties towards them have consequently a complex origin.

[Footnote 110: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 44. Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 510 _sq._]

[Footnote 111: Man, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 145.]

The souls of the dead are not generally supposed to lead a merely passive existence. They are conceived as {529} capable of acting upon the living, of conferring upon them benefits, or at all events of inflicting upon them harm. Death has in some respects enhanced their powers. They know what is going on upon earth, what those whom they have left behind are doing. Their power of acting, also, is greater than that which they possessed when they were tied to the flesh. They are raised to a higher sphere of influence; magic properties are ascribed even to their corpses. Their character may remain on the whole unchanged, and so, too, their affection for their surviving friends. Hence they often become guardians of their descendants. Among the Amazulu the head of each house is worshipped by his children; remembering his kindness to them while he was living, they say, "He will still treat us in the same way now he is dead."[112] The Herero invoke the blessings of their deceased friends or relatives, praying for success against their enemies, an abundance of cattle, numerous wives, and prosperity in their undertakings.[113] On the West African Slave Coast the head of a family, after death, often becomes its protector, and is sometimes regarded as the guardian of a whole community or village.[114] The Mpongwe teach the child "to look up to the parent not only as its earthly protector, but as a friend in the spirit-land."[115] The Gournditch-mara in Australia believed that "the spirit of the deceased father or grandfather occasionally visited the male descendant in dreams, and imparted to him charms (songs) against disease or against witchcraft."[116] The Veddah of Ceylon invokes the spirits of his departed relatives "as sympathetic and kindred, though higher powers than man, to direct him to a life pleasing to the gods, through which he may gain their protection or favour."[117] The Nay[=a]dis of Malabar, on certain ceremonial occasions, offer solemn prayers that the souls of the {530} departed may protect them from the ravages of wild beasts and snakes.[118] The Vedic people called upon the aid of their dead:--"O Fathers, may the sky-people grant us life; may we follow the course of the living."[119] So also the Zoroastrian Fravashis, who corresponded to the Vedic "Fathers," helped their own kindred, borough, town, or country.[120] Aeschylus, in his 'Eumenides,' represents Orestes as saying, "My father will send me aid from the tomb."[121] The Lar Familiaris, the spirit guardian of the Roman family, was undoubtedly the spirit of a deceased ancestor.[122] The old Slavonians believed that the souls of fathers watched over their children and their children's children. In Galicia the people still think that their hearths are haunted by the souls of the dead, who make themselves useful to the family; and among the Czechs, it is a common belief that departed ancestors look after the fields and herds of their descendants and assist them in hunting and fishing.[123]

[Footnote 112: Callaway, _Religious System of the Amazulu_, p. 144 _sq._]

[Footnote 113: Andersson, _Lake Ngami_, p. 222.]

[Footnote 114: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 104. See also _ibid._ p. 24 (Slave and Gold Coast natives).]

[Footnote 115: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 394.]

[Footnote 116: Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, p. 278.]

[Footnote 117: Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 194.]

[Footnote 118: Iyer, 'Nay[=a]dis of Malabar,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iv. 72.]

[Footnote 119: _Rig-Veda_, x. 57. 5. _Cf._ Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 143 _sq._]

[Footnote 120: _Yasts_, xiii. 66 _sqq._; &c.]

[Footnote 121: Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 598.]

[Footnote 122: Jevons, in Plutarch's _Romane Questions_, p. xli. Rohde, _op. cit._ p. 232.]

[Footnote 123: Ralston, _Songs of the Russian People_, pp. 119, 121. For other instances of a similar kind see Shooter, _Kafirs of Natal_, p. 161; Arbousset and Daumas, _Tour to the North-East of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope_, p. 340 (Bechuanas); Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 248; Wilken, _Het animisme bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel_, p. 194 _sqq._; Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 290 (Greenlanders); Jessen, _Afhandling over de Norske Finners og Lappers Hedenske Religion_, p. 27; Friis, _Lappisk Mythologi_, p. 115 _sq._; von Düben, _Lappland_, p. 249; Abercromby, _Pre- and Proto-historic Finns_, i. 178 (Mordvins); von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube der Zigeuner_, p. 43 _sqq._ (Gypsies).]

But the ancestral guardian spirit does not bestow his favours for nothing. He must be properly attended to,[124] and if neglected he easily becomes positively dangerous to his living relatives. The same Africans who invoke the dead in adversity think them "capable of wreaking their vengeance on those who do not liberally minister to their wants and enjoyments."[125] The Chaldeans believed that {531} the departed who otherwise carefully watched over the welfare of his children, if abandoned and forgotten, avenged himself for their neglect by returning to torment them in their homes, by letting sickness attack them, and by ruining them with his imprecations.[126] The Vedic poet prays to the Fathers, "May ye not injure us for whatever impiety we have as men committed."[127] The Fravashis come to the help of those only who treat them well, and are "dreadful unto those who vex them."[128] In Rome, according to Ovid, once upon a time when the great festival of the dead was not observed, and the manes failed to receive the customary gifts, the injured spirits revenged themselves on the living, and the city "became heated by the suburban funeral pyres."[129] So also, according to Slavonic beliefs, the dead "might be induced, if proper respect was not paid to them, to revenge themselves on their forgetful survivors."[130]

[Footnote 124: Wilken, _op. cit._ p. 194 _sq._ (peoples in the Malay Archipelago). Abercromby, _op. cit._ i. 178 (Mordvins). Jessen, _op. cit._ p. 27; Friis, _op. cit._ p. 116 _sq._ (Laplanders).]

[Footnote 125: Rowley, _Religion of the Africans_, p. 90.]

[Footnote 126: Halevy, _op. cit._ p. 368.]

[Footnote 127: _Rig-Veda_, x. 15. 6.]

[Footnote 128: _Yasts_, xiii. 31, 42, 51, 70, &c.]

[Footnote 129: Ovid, _Fasti_, ii. 549 _sqq._]

[Footnote 130: Ralston, _op. cit._ p. 335.]

Moreover, we must not conclude that wherever the spirits of deceased ancestors are invoked as guardians they are necessarily looked upon as essentially benevolent to their descendants.[131] Concerning the ancient Babylonians and Assyrians

Professor Jastrow writes:--"In general the dead were not favorably disposed towards the living, and they were inclined to use what power they had to work evil rather than for good. In this respect they resembled the demons, and it is noticeable that an important class of demons was known by the name _ekimmu_, which is one of the common terms for the shades of the dead."[132] The Greeks were much afraid of their dead, and regarded their "heroes" as extremely irritable, in later times as exclusively malicious.[133] It appears from Ovid's 'Fasti' that fear was the predominant feeling of the Romans with reference to the spirits of the departed, who were supposed {532} to wander about by night, causing men to pine away or bewitching them into madness.[134] Even in China, where the souls of the dead are supposed effectually to control the destiny of the living,[135] malevolent rather than benevolent inclinations are ascribed to them by the popular belief, as appears from the fact that the words for "ghost" and "devil" are the same and form a portion of the objectionable epithets applied to foreigners.[136] Generally speaking, my collection of facts has led me to the conclusion that the dead are more commonly regarded as enemies than friends,[137] and that Professor Jevons[138] and Mr. Grant Allen[139] are mistaken in their assertion that, according to early beliefs, the malevolence of the dead is for the most part directed against strangers only, whereas they exercise a fatherly care over the lives and fortunes of their descendants and fellow clansmen.

[Footnote 131: _Cf._ Karsten, _Origin of Worship_, p. 122 _sqq._]

[Footnote 132: Jastrow, _op. cit._ p. 581.]

[Footnote 133: Rohde, _op. cit._ pp. 177 _sqq._, 225 n. 4. Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 130.]

[Footnote 134: Ovid, _Fasti_, v. 429 _sqq._ Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, p. 67.]

[Footnote 135: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. v. book) ii. 464.]

[Footnote 136: Dennys, _Folk-Lore of China_, p. 73. See also Legge, _Religions of China_, pp. 13, 201.]

[Footnote 137: Dr. Steinmetz (_Ethnol. Studien zur ersten Entwicklung der Strafe_, i. 283) has arrived at the same conclusion. See also Meiners, _Geschichte der Religionen_, i. 301 _sqq._; Karsten, _op. cit._ p. 115 _sqq._]

[Footnote 138: Jevons, _Introduction to the History of Religion_, p. 53 _sq._]

[Footnote 139: Grant Allen, _Evolution of the Idea of God_, p. 347 _sq._]

Thus the Bondeis in East Africa apparently make little difference between a devil and a departed ancestor.[140] Among the Fjort of Loango the good people who have left this life "are generally considered the enemies of mankind."[141] Other Africans maintain that the spirits of the dead hover in the air, "watching the destiny of friends, haunting houses, killing children, injuring cattle, and causing disease and destruction," all being malevolent to the living.[142] Of the Savage Islanders in Polynesia we are told that "no effort of the missionary can avail to break them of their belief in the malevolence of ghosts, even of those who loved them best in life; the spirits of the dead seem compelled to work ill to the living without their own volition."[143] In Tahiti the spirits of parents and children, sisters and brothers, "seemed to have been regarded as a sort of {533} demons."[144] Among the Maoris "the nearest and most beloved relatives were supposed to have their natures changed by death, and to become malignant, even towards those they formerly loved."[145] The natives of Erromanga, in the New Hebrides, maintained that all the spirits of their departed ancestors were evil, and roamed the earth doing harm to men.[146] In the tribes inhabiting the mouth of the Wanigela River, in New Guinea, all dead ancestors are supposed to be constantly on the watch to deal out sickness or death to anyone who may displease them; hence the natives are most particular to do nothing that should raise their anger.[147] Australian natives believe that a deceased person is malevolent for a long time after death, and the more nearly related the more he is feared.[148] The _anitos_ or ghosts, of the Tagales in the Philippine Islands are likewise perpetually anxious to do harm to their descendants, trying to kill people, especially shortly after death, and being the causes of nearly all diseases.[149] The Saora of the Madras Presidency only know the existence of the departed souls by the mischief they do, and think that all ills are occasioned either by ancestral spirits or gods.[150] In the North-Western Provinces of India the _díwárs_, or _genii loci_, are oftentimes "the spirits of good men, Brahmans, or village heroes, who manage, when they become objects of worship, to be generally considered very malicious devils";[151] and the ghosts of all low caste natives are notoriously malignant.[152] The Tibetans are of opinion that a ghost is always malicious, and that it returns and gives troubles either on account of its malevolence or its desire to see how its former property is being disposed of.[153] The Finns and other peoples of the same stock believed that the souls of the dead were generally intent to do harm to the living, their nearest relatives included.[154] Thus, according to Votyak ideas, even a mother may become {534} the enemy of her own child from the moment of her death.[155] Among the Ainu of Japan, "if a man is at a loss for the authorship of any particular calamity, which has befallen him, he is very apt to refer it to the ghost of a dead wife, mother, grandmother, or, still more certainly, to that of a dead mother-in-law";[156] an Ainu who accompanied Mr. Batchelor would on no account come within twenty-five or thirty yards of the spot where his own mother was burned.[157] The Koniagas believe that after death every man becomes a devil.[158] According to ideas prevalent among the Central Eskimo, the dead are at first malevolent spirits who frequently roam around the villages, causing sickness and mischief and killing men by their touch; but subsequently they are supposed to attain to rest and are no longer feared.[159] The Tarahumares of Mexico are afraid of their dead; a mother asks her deceased infant to go away and not to come back, and the weeping widow implores her husband not to carry off, or do harm to, his own sons or daughters.[160] Mr. Bridges informs us that the Fuegian word for a ghost, _cúshpich_, is also an adjective signifying "frightful, dreadful, awful."[161]

[Footnote 140: Dale, 'Natives inhabiting the Bondei Country,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxv. 233.]

[Footnote 141: Dennett, _Folklore of the Fjort_, p. 11 _sq._]

[Footnote 142: Burton, _Lake Regions of Central Africa_, ii. 344.]

[Footnote 143: Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 94.]

[Footnote 144: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 334 _sq._]

[Footnote 145: Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, p. 18. See also _ibid._ pp. 137, 221; Polack, _op. cit._ i. 242.]

[Footnote 146: Robertson, _Erromanga_, p. 389.]

[Footnote 147: Guise, 'Tribes inhabiting the Mouth of the Wanigela River,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxviii. 216.]

[Footnote 148: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 80. Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 87.]

[Footnote 149: Blumentritt, in _Mittheil. d. kais. u. kön. Geograph. Gesellsch. in Wien_, p. 166 _sqq._ de Mas, _Informe sobre el estado de las Islas Filipinas en_ 1842, 'Orijen de los habitantes de la Oceania,' p. 15; 'Poblacion,' p. 29. _Cf._ _ibid._ 'Poblacion,' p. 17; Blumentritt, p. 168 (Igorrotes).]

[Footnote 150: Fawcett, _Saoras_, pp. 43, 51.]

[Footnote 151: Elliot, _Races of the North Western Provinces of India_, p. 243.]

[Footnote 152: Crooke, _Popular Religion of Northern India_, i. 269.]

[Footnote 153: Waddell, _Buddhism of Tibet_, p. 498.]

[Footnote 154: Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, iii. 121 _sqq._ Waronen, _Vainajainpalvelus muinaisilla Suomalaisilla_, p. 23.]

[Footnote 155: Buch, 'Die Wotjäken,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xii. 607.]

[Footnote 156: Howard, _Life with Trans-Siberian Savages_, p. 196.]

[Footnote 157: Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 220 _sq._]

[Footnote 158: Holmberg, in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, iv. 402.]

[Footnote 159: Boas, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi. 591.]

[Footnote 160: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, i. 380, 382.]

[Footnote 161: Bridges, 'Manners and Customs of the Firelanders,' in _A Voice for South America_, xiii. 211.]

The belief in the irritable or malevolent character of the dead is easily explained. As Bishop Butler observed, we presume that a thing will remain as it is except when we have some reason to think that it will be altered.[162] And in the case of the souls of departed friends men may have reason to suppose that they undergo a change. Death is commonly regarded as the gravest of all misfortunes; hence the dead are believed to be exceedingly dissatisfied with their fate. According to primitive ideas a person only dies if he is killed--by magic if not by force,--and such a death naturally tends to make the soul revengeful and ill-tempered. It is envious of the living and is longing for the company of its old friends; no wonder, then, that it sends them diseases to cause their {535} death. The Basutos maintain that their dead ancestors are continually endeavouring to draw them to themselves, and therefore attribute to them every disease;[163] and the Tarahumares in Mexico suppose that the dead make their relatives ill from a feeling of loneliness, that they, too, may die and join the departed.[164] But the notion that the disembodied soul is on the whole a malicious being constantly watching for an opportunity to do harm to the living is also, no doubt, intimately connected with the instinctive fear of the dead, which is in its turn the outcome of the fear of death.

[Footnote 162: Butler, _Analogy of Religion_, i. 1, p. 82.]

[Footnote 163: Casalis, _op. cit._ p. 249.]

[Footnote 164: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, i. 380.]

We are told, it is true, that many savages meet death with much indifference, or regard it as no great evil, but merely as a change to a life very similar to this.[165] But it is a fact often noticed among ourselves, that a person on the verge of death may resign himself to his fate with the greatest calmness, although he has been afraid to die throughout his life. Moreover, the fear of death may be disguised by thoughtlessness, checked by excitement, or mitigated by dying in company. There are peoples who are conspicuous for their bravery, and yet have a great dread of death.[166] Nobody is entirely free from this feeling, though it varies greatly in strength among different races and in different individuals. In many savages it is so strongly developed, that they cannot bear to hear death mentioned.[167] And inseparably mingled with {536} this fear of death is the fear of the dead. The place in which a death occurs is abandoned,[168] or the hut is destroyed,[169] or the corpse is carried out from it as speedily as possible.[170] The survivors endeavour to frighten away the ghost by firing off guns,[171] or shooting into the grave,[172] or throwing sticks and stones behind themselves after they have interred the corpse.[173] To prevent the return of the ghost the body is buried face downwards,[174] or its limbs are firmly tied,[175] or, in extreme cases, it is fixed in the ground with a stake driven through it.[176] We may assume that these and many other funeral ceremonies are very closely connected with the fear of the pollution of death; for even when their immediate object is to keep the ghost at {537} a distance, it is likely that they are largely due to dread of its presence for the reason that it is conceived as a seat of deadly contagion.[177] It seems to me that certain anthropologists, in their explanations of funeral ceremonies, have too much accentuated the volitional activity of ghosts. To take an instance. The common custom of carrying the dead body away through some aperture other than the door,[178] has generally been interpreted as a means of preventing the ghost from finding its way back to the old home; but various facts indicate that it also may have sprung from a desire to keep the ordinary exit free from pollution. According to the Vendîdâd a spirit of death is breathing all along the way which a corpse has passed; hence no man, no flock, no being whatever that belongs to the world of Ahura Mazda is allowed to go that way until the deadly breath has been blown away to hell.[179] In the capital of Corea there is a small gate in the city-wall known as the "Gate of the Dead," through which alone a dead body can be carried out, and no one is ever allowed to enter through that passage-way.[180] In China even a messenger who delivers tidings of death strictly abstains from passing the threshold of the houses at which he knocks, unless urgently requested by the inmates to walk in.[181] Among the Kwakiutl Indians of British Columbia a mourner, who is regarded as unclean, "must not use the house door, but a separate door is cut for his use"; girls at puberty, whilst in a state of uncleanness, may leave {538} and enter their room only through a hole made in the floor;[182] and men who have polluted themselves by partaking of human flesh are for four months allowed to go out only by the secret door in the rear of the house.[183] Even the water and fire ceremonies performed in connection with a death have been represented as methods of preventing the ghost from attacking the living by placing a physical barrier of water or fire between them.[184] But I see no reason whatever to assume, with Sir J. G. Frazer, that "the conceptions of pollution and purification are merely the fictions of a later age, invented to explain the purpose of a ceremony of which the original intention was forgotten."[185]

[Footnote 165: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 192 (Hudson Bay Eskimo), 269 _sq._ (Hudson Bay Indians). de Brebeuf, 'Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans le pays des Hurons,' in _Relations des Jésuites_, i. 1636, p. 129. Roth, _North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, p. 161. Tregear, 'Niue,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ ii. 14 (Savage Islanders). Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 204 _sq._ Romilly, _From my Verandah in New Guinea_, p. 45 (Solomon Islanders). Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 266 (Siberian shamans). Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 23 (Negroes of Accra). Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 72.]

[Footnote 166: _E.g._, the Kalmucks (Bergmann, _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_, ii. 318 _sqq._) and the ancient Caribs (Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 215).]

[Footnote 167: Dunbar, 'Pawnee Indians,' in _Magazine of American History_, viii. 742. Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 203. Bergmann, _op. cit._ ii. 318. Bosman, _Description of the Coast of Guinea_, p. 327 (Negroes of Fida). Du Chaillu, _Explorations in Equatorial Africa_, p. 338. Kropf, _Das Volk der Xosa-Kaffern_, p. 155. For other instances of savages' great fear of death, see Bridges, in _A Voice for South America_, xiii. 211 (Fuegians); Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 215 (Caribs); Dunbar, in _Magazine of American History_, v. 334 (various North American tribes); Brinton, _Myths of the New World_, p. 238; Georgi, _op. cit._ ii. 400 (Jakuts); Bosman, _op. cit._ p. 130 (Gold Coast natives).]

[Footnote 168: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 22 (North American Indians). von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 502 (Bororó). Hyades and Deniker, _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn_, vii. 379 (Fuegians). Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 44. Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 82. Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 498. Worcester, _Philippine Islands_, p. 496 (Tagbanuas of Busuanga). Bailey, 'Veddahs of Ceylon,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N. S. ii. 296; Deschamps, _Carnet d'un voyageur_, p. 383 (Veddahs). Decle, _op. cit._ p. 79 (Barotse). von Düben, _Lappland_, pp. 241, 249.]

[Footnote 169: Hyades and Deniker, _op. cit._ vii. 379 (Fuegians). Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 222 _sq._ Worcester, _op. cit._ p. 108 _sq._ (Tagbanuas of Palawan). Butler, _Travels in Assam_, p. 228. Fawcett, _Saoras_, p. 50 _sq._ Cunningham, _Uganda_, p. 130 (Bavuma).]

[Footnote 170: Howard, _op. cit._ p. 197 (Ainu). Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 89 (Dyaks). The rapid pace of the funeral procession among the Bataks (von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 235) probably belongs to the same class of facts.]

[Footnote 171: von Brenner, _op. cit._ p. 235 (Bataks). Fawcett, _Saoras_, p. 46 _sq._]

[Footnote 172: von Brenner, _op. cit._ p. 235 (Bataks). von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube der Magyaren_, p. 134.]

[Footnote 173: Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, i. 45 (Aheriya, in Duâb), 287 (Bhangi, the sweeper tribe of Hindustan). Ralston, _op. cit._ p. 320 (ancient Bohemians).]

[Footnote 174: Dorsey, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 420 (Omahas). Crooke, _op. cit._ i. 44 (Aheriya, in Duâb).]

[Footnote 175: Zimmer, _Altindisches Leben_, p. 402 (Vedic people). Turner, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 191 (Hudson Bay Eskimo). Yarrow, _ibid._ i. 98 (Pimas of Arizona). Southey, _History of Brazil_, i. 248 (Tupinambas). Of the trussing and tying of the dead body which is practised in various Australian tribes the blacks themselves say that it is done "to prevent the spirit of the deceased from wandering in the night from its bed, and disturbing the living and doing them harm" (Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 79 _sq._; see also Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 44, 87).]

[Footnote 176: _Supra_, ii. 256. Hyltén-Cavallius, _Wärend och Wirdarne_, i. 472 (Middle Ages).]

[Footnote 177: _Cf._ _supra_, ii. 303. For the contagion of death see also Crawley, _The Mystic Rose_, p. 95 _sqq._]

[Footnote 178: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 26 _sq._ Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 69 _sq._ Trumbull, _Threshold Covenant_, p. 23 _sqq._ Liebrecht, _Zur Volkskunde_, pp. 372, 373, 414 _sq._ Lippert, _Christenthum, Volksglaube und Volksbrauch_, p. 391 _sq._ Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 152 _sq._; Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 245 _sq._ (Greenlanders). Turner, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 191 (Hudson Bay Eskimo). McNair Wright, _Among the Alaskans_, p. 313. Jochelson, 'Koryak Religion', in _Jesup North Pacific Expedition_, vi. 110 _sq._ Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 26 _sq._; Jackson, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 406 (Samoyedes). Ramseyer and Kühne, _Four Years in Ashantee_, p. 50. Kålund, 'Skandinavische Verhältnisse,' in Paul, _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_, ii. pt. ii. 227 (ancient Scandinavians).]

[Footnote 179: _Vendîdâd_, viii. 14 _sqq._ Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lxxiv. _sq._]

[Footnote 180: Trumbull, _op. cit._ p. 24.]

[Footnote 181: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 644.]

[Footnote 182: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 42 _sqq._]

[Footnote 183: _Idem_, quoted by Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 341 _sq._ Among the Bhuiyâr, a Dravidian tribe in South Mirzapur, each house has two doors, one of which is only used by menstruous women; and when such a woman has to quit the house "she is obliged to creep out on her hands and knees so as to avoid polluting the house thatch by her touch" (Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, ii. 87). Among the Thompson River Indians of British Columbia meat was only taken into the hunting lodge through a hole in the back of the structure, because the common door was used by women and women were regarded as unclean (Teit, 'Thompson Indians,' in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History_, 'Anthropology,' i. 347). In other instances ordinary people are prohibited from using a door through which a sacred person has passed, obviously because contact with his sanctity is looked upon as dangerous. In some of the South Sea Islands, where the first-born, whether male or female, was especially sacred, no one else was allowed to pass by the door through which he or she entered the paternal dwelling (Gill, _Life in the Southern Isles_, p. 46). "In some parts of the Pacific, the door through which the king or queen passed in opening a temple was shut up, and ever after made sacred" (Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 328). Ezekiel (xliv. 2 _sq._) represents the Lord as saying:--"This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. It is for the prince; . . . he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same." Among the Arabs in olden days those who returned from a pilgrimage to Mecca entered their houses not by the door but by a hole made in the back wall (Palmer, in _Sacred Books of the East_, vi. 27, n. 1). This practice was forbidden by Muhammed (_Koran_, ii. 185).]

[Footnote 184: Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 76 _sqq._]

[Footnote 185: It should be added, however, that. Sir J. G. Frazer's important essay on 'Burial Customs' was published many years ago and therefore perhaps does not exactly represent the author's present views on the subject.]

It is obvious that the beliefs held as regards the character, activity, and polluting influence of the dead greatly affect the conduct of the survivors. They are {539} naturally anxious to gain the favour of the disembodied soul, to avert its ill-will, to keep it at a distance, and to avoid the defilement of death. Self-interest is often a conspicuous motive for acts and omissions which are regarded as duties to the dead, and prudence also has a very large share in their being enjoined as obligatory. This is obviously true of the offerings made to the dead. The Thompson River Indians of British Columbia threw some food on the ground near the grave of the deceased, "that he might not visit the house in search of food, causing sickness to the people."[186] Among the Iroquois, "on the death of a nursing child two pieces of cloth are saturated with the mother's milk and placed in the hands of the dead child so that its spirit may not return to haunt the bereaved mother."[187] The Negroes of Accra, when asked why they slaughtered animals at the tombs of their departed friends, answered that they did so in order to prevent the ghosts from walking.[188] The Monbuttu place some oil and other victuals in the little hut which is erected for the dead in the forest, so that his spirit shall not return to his old home in search of food.[189] For the same reason the Bataks of Sumatra put various things into the graves of their deceased friends, ask the dead to be quiet and not to long for the company of the living, and finish their address with the words, "Here you have still some _sirih_ and tobacco, and every year, at harvest time, we shall give you some rice."[190] Among the Chuvashes the son says to his departed father, "We remember you with a feast, here are bread and different kinds of food for you, everything you have before you, do not come to us."[191] It is considered particularly dangerous to keep back and make use of articles which belonged to the dead. The Gypsies burn on the grave all those chattels which the deceased was in the habit of using during his lifetime, "because his soul would otherwise {540} return to torment his relatives and claim back his property."[192] A Saora gave the following reason for the custom of burning all the belongings of a dead person:--"If we do not burn these things with the body, the Kulba (soul) will come and ask us for them and trouble us."[193] The Kafirs believe that, after his death, "a man's personality haunts his possessions."[194] Among the Brazilian Tupinambas "whoever happened to have any thing which had belonged to the dead produced it, that it might be buried with him, lest he should come and claim it."[195] When a Navaho Indian dies within a house the rafters are pulled down over the remains and the place is usually set on fire; after that nothing would induce a Navaho to touch a piece of the wood or even approach the immediate vicinity of the place, the shades of the dead being regarded "as inclined to resent any intrusion or the taking of any liberties with them or their belongings."[196] The Greenlanders, as soon as a man is dead, "throw out every thing which has belonged to him; otherwise they would be polluted, and their lives rendered unfortunate. The house is cleared of all its movables till evening, when the smell of the corpse has passed away."[197]

[Footnote 186: Teit, _loc. cit._ p. 329.]

[Footnote 187: Smith, _Myths of the Iroquois_, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ii. 69.]

[Footnote 188: Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 26.]

[Footnote 189: Burrows, _op. cit._ p. 103.]

[Footnote 190: von Brenner, _op. cit._ p. 234 _sqq._]

[Footnote 191: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 123 _sq._]

[Footnote 192: von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube der Zigeuner_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 193: Fawcett, _op. cit._ p. 47.]

[Footnote 194: Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 83.]

[Footnote 195: Southey, _op. cit._ i. 248. _Cf._ von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 502 (Bororó).]

[Footnote 196: Mindeleff, 'Navaho Houses,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xvii. 487.]

[Footnote 197: Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 217.]

The fear of the dead has also taught men to abstain from robbing or violating their tombs. The Omahas believe that, if anybody touched an article of food exposed at a grave, "the ghost would snatch away the food and paralyse the mouth of the thief, and twist his face out of shape for the rest of his life; or else he would be pursued by the ghost, and food would lose its taste, and hunger ever after haunt the offender."[198] The Brazilian Coroados "avoid disturbing the repository of the dead, for fear they should appear to them and torment them."[199] {541} The Maoris suppose that the violation of a burial place would bring disease and death on the criminal.[200] The extreme dislike of the Chinese to disturbing a grave is based on the supposition that the spirit of the person buried will haunt and cause ill-luck or death to the disturber.[201] According to the popular beliefs of the Magyars, he who seizes upon anything belonging to a tomb, even if it were only a flower, will be unhappy for the rest of his life.[202] The Rumanians of Transylvania think that a person who picks a flower which grows on a grave will die in consequence, and that he who smells at such a flower will lose his sense of smell.[203]

[Footnote 198: La Flesche, 'Death and Funeral Customs among the Omahas,' in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, ii. 11. _Cf._ Reid, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iii. 112 (Chippewas).]

[Footnote 199: von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 251.]

[Footnote 200: Polack, _op. cit._ i. 112.]

[Footnote 201: Dennys, _op. cit._ p. 26. de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. iv. book) ii. 446 _sq._]

[Footnote 202: von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube der Magyaren_, p. 135. _Cf._ _Idem_, _Volksglaube der Zigeuner_, p. 96 _sq._]

[Footnote 203: Prexl, 'Geburts- und Todtengebräuche der Rumänen in Siebenbürgen,' in _Globus_, lvii. 30.]

The transgression of ancestral custom, as we have already seen, is supposed to be punished by the spirits of the dead; and the sacredness of a will largely springs from superstitious fear. The South Slavonian belief that, if a son does not fulfil the last will of his father the soul of the father will curse him from the grave,[204] has its counterpart in the denunciatory clause in Anglo-Saxon landbooks, which usually curses all and singular who attack the donee's title.[205]

[Footnote 204: _Supra_, i. 624.]

[Footnote 205: Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 251 _sq._]

The custom of praising the dead, again, is mainly flattery, and the lamentations over them are not altogether sincere.[206] By their excessive demonstrations of grief the Andaman Islanders hope to conciliate the spirits of the departed, and to be preserved from many misfortunes which might otherwise befall them.[207] The Central Australian native fears "that, unless a sufficient amount of grief be displayed, he will be harmed by the offended _Ulthana_ or spirit of the dead man."[208] The Angmagsaliks {542} on the East Coast of Greenland say that they cry and groan and perform other mourning rites "in order to prevent the dead from getting angry."[209] But the loud wailing of mourners may also, like the shouting after a death,[210] be intended to drive away the ghost, or perhaps death itself.

[Footnote 206: See Gibbs, _loc. cit._ p. 205 (tribes of Western Washington and North-western Oregon); Wied-Neuwied, _Reise nach Brasilien_, ii. 56 (Botocudos).]

[Footnote 207: Man, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 145.]

[Footnote 208: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 510.]

[Footnote 209: Holm, 'Ethnologisk Skizze af Angmagsalikerne,' in _Meddelelser om Grønland_, x. 107.]

[Footnote 210: Spencer and Gillen, _op. cit._ p. 506. _Cf._ Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 432, n. 2.]

Fear is certainly a very common motive for funeral and mourning rites which have been interpreted as duties to the dead. This is the case with the various methods of disposing of the corpse. Thus the custom of leaving it as food for beasts of prey[211] is, in some instances at least, deliberately practised for the purpose of preventing the ghost from walking. The Herero who accompanied Chapman said of two of their sick comrades who formed part of the company, "You must throw them away, and let the wolves eat them; then they won't come and bother us."[212] Cremation, also, has frequently been resorted to as a means of protecting the living from unwelcome visits of the dead, or, as the case may be, of effectually getting rid of the contagion of death.[213] The Vedic people, while burning the corpses of their dead, cried aloud, "Away, go away, O Death! injure not our sons and our men."[214] In Northern India the corpses of all low caste people are either cremated or buried face downwards, in order to prevent the evil spirit from escaping and troubling its neighbours.[215] The Nâyars of Malabar not only believe that the collection and careful disposal of the ashes of the dead man gives peace to his spirit, but, "what is more important, the pacified spirit will not thereafter injure the living members of the Taravâd (house or family), cause miscarriage {543} to the women, possess the men, as with an evil spirit, and so on."[216] In Tibet a ghost which makes its presence felt in dreams or by causing deliriousness or temporary insanity is disposed of by cremation.[217] In his description of the Savage Islanders, Mr. Thomson tells us of a mother who destroyed her own daughter's grave by fire in order to burn the spirit which was afflicting her.[218] Among the ancient Scandinavians the bodies of persons who were believed to walk after death were dug up from their graves and burned.[219] And exactly the same is done in Albania to this day.[220]

[Footnote 211: For this custom see also Murdoch, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 424 _sq._ (Point Barrow Eskimo); Nordenskiöld, _Vegas färd kring Asien och Europa_, ii. 93 (Chukchi); Andersson, _Notes on Travel in South Africa_, p. 234 (Ovambo).]

[Footnote 212: Chapman, _Travels in the Interior of South Africa_, ii. 282.]

[Footnote 213: _Cf._ Rohde, _op. cit._ p. 28 _sqq._ (ancient Greeks); Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 294.]

[Footnote 214: _Rig-Veda_, x. 18. 1.]

[Footnote 215: Crooke, _Popular Religion of Northern India_, i. 269.]

[Footnote 216: Fawcett, in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iii. 251. See also Iyer, 'Nay[=a]dis of Malabar,'_ibid._ iv. 71.]

[Footnote 217: Waddell, _op. cit._ p. 498.]

[Footnote 218: Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 134.]

[Footnote 219: Kålund, _loc. cit._ p. 227.]

[Footnote 220: von Hahn, _Albanesische Studien_, i. 163.]

Burial itself has served a similar purpose.[221] According to the Danish traveller Monrad, the Negroes of Accra expressly believe that by covering the body of a dead person with earth they keep the ghost from walking and causing trouble to the survivors; and he adds that exactly the same superstition prevails in Jutland in Denmark.[222] This belief is also preserved in the Swedish word for committing a corpse to the earth, _jordfästa_, which literally means "to fasten to the earth." In Gothland, in Sweden, there was an old tradition of a man called Takstein who in his lifetime was overbearing and cruel and after his death haunted the living, in consequence of which "a wizard finally earth-fastened him in such a manner that he afterwards lay quiet."[223] But burial has often been supplemented by other precautions against the return of the ghost. Högström says that the Laplanders carefully wrapped up their dead in cloth so as to prevent the soul from slipping away.[224] The practice of placing logs or stones immediately over the corpse may have a similar origin; in some Queensland tribes, when an individual has been killed by the whole tribe in punishment for some {544} serious crime, boomerangs are substituted for the ordinary logs, evidently for fear of the ghost.[225] The Chuvashes, again, put two stakes across the coffin of a dead man for the purpose of preventing him from lifting up the cover.[226] Graves are often provided with mounds, tombstones, or enclosures in order to keep the dead from walking.[227] The Omahas raise no mound over a man who has been killed by lightning, but bury him face downwards and with the soles of his feet split, in the belief that he will then go to the spirit-land without giving further trouble to the living.[228] The Savage Islanders pile heavy stones upon the grave to keep the ghost down.[229] The Cheremises believe that the ghosts cannot step over the fence-poles with which they surround the graves.[230] When ceremonies like that of striking the air at a funeral or the ringing of bells are represented as means of keeping off evil spirits from the dead, we have reason to suspect that their original object was to keep off the ghost from the living. At Central Australian funerals women beat the air with the palms of their hands for the express purpose of driving the spirit away from the old camp which it is supposed to haunt, and the men beat the air with their spear-throwers.[231] The Bondeis of East Africa frighten the ghosts by beating drums.[232] And at Port Moresby, in New Guinea, when the church bell was first used, the natives thanked the missionaries for having driven off numerous bands of ghosts.[233]

[Footnote 221: _Cf._ Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 64 _sq._; Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 292 _sq._]

[Footnote 222: Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 13.]

[Footnote 223: Läffler, _Den gottländska Taksteinar-sägnen_, p. 5.]

[Footnote 224: Högström, _Beskrifning öfver de til Sveriges Krona lydande Lapmarker_, p. 207.]

[Footnote 225: Roth, _op. cit._ p. 165.]

[Footnote 226: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 121.]

[Footnote 227: _Cf._ Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xv. 65 _sq._; Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 293.]

[Footnote 228: Dorsey, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 420. La Flesche, in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, ii. 11.]

[Footnote 229: Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 52.]

[Footnote 230: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 122.]

[Footnote 231: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 506.]

[Footnote 232: Dale, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxv. 238.]

[Footnote 233: Chalmers and Gill, _Work and Adventure in New Guinea_, p. 260.]

That the mourning fast is essentially a precaution taken by the survivors, and not a tribute to the dead, is obvious from what has been said in a previous chapter.[234] When mourners mutilate, cut, or beat themselves, the original object of their doing so seems often to be to ward off the {545} contagion of death.[235] Among the Bedouins of Morocco women at funerals not only scratch their faces, but also rub the wounds with cow-dung, and cow-dung is regarded as a means of purification. The mourning customs of painting the body and of assuming a special costume have been explained as attempts on the part of the survivors to disguise themselves;[236] but the latter custom may also have originated in the idea that a mourner is more or less polluted for a certain period and that therefore a dress worn by him then, being a seat of contagion, could not be used afterwards. Egede writes of the Greenlanders, "If they have happened to touch a corpse, they immediately cast away the clothes they have then on; and for this reason they always put on their old clothes when they go to a burying, in which they agree with the Jews."[237] There can, finally, be no doubt that the widespread prohibition of mentioning the name of a dead person[238] does not in the first instance arise from respect for the departed, but from fear. To name him is to summon him; the Indians of Washington Territory even change their own names when a relative dies, because "they think the spirits of the dead will come back if they hear the same name called that they were accustomed to hear {546} before death."[239] But apart from this, a dead man's name itself is probably felt to be defiling, or at all events produces an uncanny association of thought, which even among ourselves makes many people reluctant to mention it.[240] And to do so may also be a wrong to other persons who would be endangered thereby. Among the Goajiro Indians of Colombia, to mention a dead man before his relatives is a dreadful offence, which is often punished even with death.[241]

[Footnote 234: _Supra_, ii. 302 _sqq._]

[Footnote 235: _Cf._ Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 302.]

[Footnote 236: Frazer, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ 73. _Idem_, 'Folk-Lore in the Old Testament,' in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_, p. 110.]

[Footnote 237: Egede, _op. cit._ p. 197.]

[Footnote 238: Tylor, _Researches into the Early History of Mankind_, p. 144. Nyrop, 'Navnets magt,' in _Mindre afhandlinger udgivne af det philologisk-historiske samfund_, pp. 147-151, 190 _sq._ and _passim_. Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 421 _sqq._ Clodd, _Tom Tit Tot_, p. 166 _sqq._ Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 230 _sq._ (Greenlanders). Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 84 (North American Indians). Bourke, 'Medicine-Men of the Apache,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 462. Batchelor, _Ainu and their Folk-Lore_, p. 242. Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 27, 28, 262 _sq._ (Samoyedes and shamanistic peoples in Siberia). Jackson, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 406 (Samoyedes). Rivers, _Todas_, p. 625 _sqq._ Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, i. 11 (Agariya, a Dravidian tribe), von Wlislocki, _Volksglaube der Zigeuner_, p. 96 (Gypsies). Yseldijk, in _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 42. (Kotting, in the island of Flores). Roth, _North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, p. 164. Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 498. Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 82. Thornton, in Hill and Thornton, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 7. Fison and Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 249 (Kurnai). Curr, _Squatting in Victoria_, p. 272 (Bangerang). Hinde, _op. cit._ p. 50 (Masai). Duveyrier, _Exploration du Sahara_, p. 415 (Touareg). Werner, 'Custom of "Hlonipa,"' in _Jour. African Soc._ 1905, April, p. 346 (Zulus).]

[Footnote 239: Swan, _Residence in Washington Territory_, p. 189.]

[Footnote 240: I had much difficulty in inducing my teacher in Shel[h.]a, a Berber from the Great Atlas Mountains, to tell me the equivalent for "illness" in his own language; and when he finally did so, he spat immediately afterwards. Among the Central Australian Arunta the older men will not look at the photograph of a deceased person (Gillen, 'Aborigines of the McDonnell Ranges,' in _Report of the Horn Expedition_, iv. 'Anthropology,' p. 168).]

[Footnote 241: Simons, 'Exploration of the Goajira Peninsula,' in _Proceed. Roy. Geograph. Soc._ N. S. vii. 791.]

By all this I certainly do not mean to assert that the funeral and mourning customs to which I have just referred have exclusively or in every case originated in fear of the dead or of the pollution of death. Burial may also be genuinely intended to protect the body from beasts or birds; and the same may be the case with mounds, tombstones, and enclosures.[242] Some savages are reported to burn the dead in order to prevent their bodies from falling into the hands of enemies,[243] which might be bad both for the dead and for their friends, as charms might be made from the corpses.[244] Moreover, cremation does away with the slow process of transformation to which a dead body is naturally subject, and this process is regarded not only as a danger to the living but also as painful to the deceased himself.[245] The same object may be achieved by exposing the corpse to wild animals. And we should also remember that the putrefactive process {547} itself, whether accompanied by any superstitious ideas or not, is a sufficient motive for disposing of the dead body in some way or other--either by burial or cremation or exposure; and if one method is held objectionable another will be resorted to. Among the Masai the custom of throwing away corpses is said to spring from the notion that to bury them would be to poison the soil;[246] and the Zoroastrian law enjoining the exposure of the dead was closely connected with the sacredness ascribed to fire and earth and the consequent dread of polluting them.

[Footnote 242: Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 217 (Greenlanders). Turner, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 192 (Hudson Bay Eskimo). Yarrow, _ibid._ i. 102 (Wichita Indians). Dunbar, in _Magazine of American History_, viii. 734 (Pawnee Indians). Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 87.]

[Footnote 243: Hyades and Deniker, _op. cit._ vii. 379 (Fuegians). Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 310 (Seminole Indians of Florida).]

[Footnote 244: Ralph, quoted by Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 437 (Haidahs of British Columbia).]

[Footnote 245: See Hertz, _loc. cit._ p. 71.]

[Footnote 246: Thomson, _Through Masai Land_, p. 259.]

Again, as for the mutilations and self-inflicted wounds which accompany funerals, I have suggested in a previous chapter that they may be partly practised for the purpose of refreshing the departed soul with human blood;[247] or, as Dr. Hirn observes, they may be instinctive efforts to procure that relief from overpowering feelings which is afforded by pain and the subsequent exhaustion.[248] The reluctance to name the dead may, in some measure, be traced to a natural unwillingness in his old friends to revive past sorrows.[249] And with reference to the mourning apparel, Dr. de Groot believes--if rightly or wrongly I am not in a position to decide--that, so far as China is concerned, it originated in the custom of sacrificing to the dead the clothes on one's own back. He thinks that this explanation is confirmed by the fact that in the age of Confucius it was customary for the mourners to throw off their clothes as far as decency allowed when the corpse was being dressed.[250]

[Footnote 247: _Supra_, i. 476.]

[Footnote 248: Hirn, _Origins of Art_, p. 66 _sq._]

[Footnote 249: Fison and Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 249 (Kurnai). Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 422.]

[Footnote 250: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. ii. book) i. 475 _sq._]

There are several reasons why practices connected with death which originally sprang from self-regarding motives have come to be enjoined as duties. We have first to remember the various factors mentioned above[251] which tend to make self-regarding conduct a matter of moral concern. {548} But in this case the transition from the prudential to the obligatory has been much facilitated by the circumstance that all the acts which a person's self-interest induces him to perform or to abstain from have direct reference to another individual, and, indeed, to an individual who is supposed to reward benefits bestowed upon him or at all events to resent injuries and neglect. These punishments and rewards sent by the departed soul are all the more readily recognised to be well deserved, as the claims of the dead are similar in nature to those of the living and are at the same time in some degree supported by sympathetic feelings in the survivors. Nor is it difficult to explain why even such practices as are not originally supposed to comfort the dead have assumed the character of duties towards them. The dead are not only beings whom it is dangerous to offend and useful to please, but they are also very easily duped. No wonder therefore that the living are anxious to put the most amiable interpretation upon their conduct, trying to persuade the ghost, as also one another, that they do what they do for _his_ benefit, not for their own. It is better for him to have rest in his grave than to wander about on earth unhappy and homeless. It is better for him to enjoy the heat of the flames than to suffer from the cold of an arctic climate. It is better for him to be eaten by an animal--say, a beautiful dog or a hyæna sent by God--than to lie and rot in the open air. And all the mourning customs, what are they if not tokens of grief? Moreover, if the corpse is not properly disposed of or any funeral or mourning rite calculated to keep off the ghost is not observed, the dead man will easily do harm to the survivors. And does not this indicate that they have been neglectful of their duties to him?

[Footnote 251: _Supra_, ii. 266 _sq._]

The mixture of sympathy and fear which is at the bottom of the duties to the dead accounts for the fact that these duties are rarely extended to strangers. A departed stranger is not generally an object of either pity or fear. He expects attention from his own people only, he haunts his own home. But he may of course be dangerous to {549} anybody who directly offends him, for instance by inflicting an injury upon his body, or to people who live in the vicinity of his grave. We are told that the Angami Nagas bestow as much care on the tombs of foes who have fallen near their villages as on those of their own warriors.[252] So also the differences in the treatment of the dead which depend upon age, sex, and social position are no doubt closely connected with variations in the feelings of sympathy, respect, or fear,[253] although in many cases we are unable to explain those differences in detail. Among the Australian natives women and children are said to be interred with little ceremony because they are held to be very inferior to men while alive and consequently are not much feared after death;[254] and if in Eastern Central Africa the attention usually bestowed upon the dead is not extended to children which die when four or five days old, the reason seems to be that such children are hardly supposed to possess a soul.[255] We may assume that the special treatment to which the bodies of criminals are subject is due not only to indignation but, in some instances at least, to fear of their ghosts. And we have noticed above that suicides, murdered persons, and those struck with lightning are sometimes left unburied because no one dares to interfere with their bodies, or perhaps in order to prevent them from mixing with the other dead.[256]

[Footnote 252: Prain, 'Angami Nagas,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, v. 493.]

[Footnote 253: _Cf._ Hertz, _loc. cit._ pp. 122, 132 _sqq._]

[Footnote 254: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 89.]

[Footnote 255: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 68.]

[Footnote 256: _Supra_, ii. 238 _sq._]

It should finally be noticed that the duties to the departed become less stringent as time goes on. As Dr. Hertz has recently shown, the fear of the dead is greatest as long as the process of decomposition lasts and till the second funeral is performed, and this ceremony brings the period of mourning to an end.[257] Moreover, the dead are gradually less and less thought of, they appear less frequently in dreams and visions, the affection for them fades away, and, being forgotten, they are no longer feared. The Chinese say that ghosts are much more {550} liable to appear very shortly after death, than at any other period.[258] The natives of Australia are only afraid of the spirits of men who have lately died.[259] In the course of time savages also become more willing to speak of their dead.[260] But whilst the large bulk of disembodied souls sooner or later lose their individuality and dwindle into insignificance or sink into the limbo of All Souls, it may be that some of them escape this fate, and, instead of being ignored, are raised to the rank of gods.

[Footnote 257: Hertz, _loc. cit._ _passim_.]

[Footnote 258: Dennys, _op. cit._ p. 76.]

[Footnote 259: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 44, 87. Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 279 (Northern Queensland aborigines).]

[Footnote 260: Tout, 'Ethnology of the Stlatlumh of British Columbia,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 138. Bourke, 'Medicine-Men of the Apache,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 462. Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 431 _sqq._]

* * * * *

Progress in intellectual culture has a tendency to affect the notions of death. The change involved in it appears greater. The soul, if still thought to survive the death of the body, is more distinctly separated from it; it is rid of all sensuous desires, as also of all earthly interests. Duties to the dead which arose from the old ideas may still be maintained, but their meaning is changed.

Thus the funeral sacrifice may be continued as a mark of respect or affection. In Melanesia, for instance, at the death-meals which follow upon funerals or begin before them, and which still form one of the principal institutions of the natives, a piece of food is put aside for the dead. "It is readily denied now," says Dr. Codrington, "that the dead . . . are thought to come and eat the food, which they say is given as a friendly remembrance only, and in the way of associating together those whom death has separated."[261] In many cases the offerings made to the dead have become alms given to the poor, just as has been the case with sacrifices offered to gods;[262] and this almsgiving is undoubtedly looked upon as a duty to the dead. Among the Omahas goods are collected from the kindred of the dead between the death and the funeral, and when the body has been deposited in the grave they {551} are brought forth and equally divided among the poor who are assembled on the spot.[263] At a Hindu funeral in Sindh, on the road to the burning place, the relatives of the dead throw dry dates into the air over the corpse; these are considered as a kind of alms and are left to the poor.[264] Among some peoples of Malabar, at the _çráddha_, or yearly anniversary of a death, not less than three Brahmins are well fed and presented with money and cloth;[265] and according to Brahmanism the _çráddha_ is "a debt which is transferred from one generation to another, and on the payment of which depends the happiness of the dead in the next life."[266] Among Muhammedans alms, generally consisting of food, are distributed in connection with a death in order to confer merits upon the deceased.[267] Thus in Morocco bread or dried fruits are given to the poor who are assembled at the grave-side on the day of the funeral, as also on the third and sometimes on the fortieth day after it, on the tenth day of Mu[h.]arram, and in many parts of the country on other feast-days as well, when the graves are visited by relatives of the dead. These alms are obviously survivals of offerings to the dead themselves. While residing among the Bedouins of Dukkâla, I was told that if the funeral meal were omitted the dead man's mouth would be filled with earth; and it is a common custom among the Moors that, if a dead person appears in a dream complaining of hunger or thirst, food or drink is at once given to some poor people. Among the Christians, in former days, alms were distributed in the church when, soon after a death or on the anniversary of a death, the sacrifice of the mass was offered; and alms were also given at funerals and at graves, in the hope that their merit might be of advantage to the deceased.[268] At Mykonos, in the Cyclades, on some fixed days after the {552} burial a dish consisting of boiled wheat adorned with sugar plums or other delicacy is put on the tomb, and finally distributed to the poor at the church door;[269] and in some parts of Russia the people still believe that if the usual alms are not given at a funeral the dead man's soul will reveal itself to his relatives in the form of a moth flying about the flame of a candle.[270] The supposed conferring of merits upon the dead and the prayers on their behalf, so common both in Christianity and Muhammedanism, are the last remains of a series of customs by means of which the living have endeavoured to benefit their departed friends.

[Footnote 261: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 271 _sq._ _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 128.]

[Footnote 262: _Supra_, i. 565 _sqq._]

[Footnote 263: La Flesche, in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, ii. 8 _sqq._]

[Footnote 264: Burton, _Sindh_, p. 350.]

[Footnote 265: Fawcett, 'Notes on some of the People of Malabar,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, iii. 71.]

[Footnote 266: Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 52.]

[Footnote 267: Garnett, _Women of Turkey_, ii. 496. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 530. Certeux and Carnoy, _L'Algérie traditionelle_, p. 220.]

[Footnote 268: Uhlhorn, _Die christliche Liebesthätigkeit_, i. 281.]

[Footnote 269: Bent, _Cyclades_, p. 221 _sq._]

[Footnote 270: Ralston, _op. cit._ p. 117.]

But even when the dead are no longer believed to be in need of human care, nay, though death be thought to put an end to existence, there are still duties, if not to the dead, at all events to those who were once alive. A person may be wronged by an act which he can no longer feel. There are rights that are in force not only during his lifetime but after his death. A given promise is not buried with him to whom it was made. A dead man's will is binding. His memory is protected against calumny. These rights have the same foundation as all other rights: the feelings of the person himself and the claims of others that his feelings shall be respected. We have wishes with regard to the future when we live no more. We take an interest in persons and things that survive us. We desire to leave behind a spotless name. And the sympathy felt for us by our fellow men will last when we ourselves are gone.

CHAPTER XLVI

CANNIBALISM

BEFORE we take leave of the dead we have still to consider the practice of eating them.

Habitual cannibalism, permitted or in some cases enjoined by custom, has been met with in a large number of savage tribes and, as a religious or magical rite, among several peoples of culture. It is, or has been, particularly prevalent in the South Sea Islands, Australia, Central Africa, and South and Central America. But it has also been found among various North American Indians, in certain tribes of the Malay Archipelago, and among a few peoples on the Asiatic continent. And it is proved to have occurred in many parts of Europe.[1]

[Footnote 1: For the prevalence and extenson of cannibalism, see Andree, _Die Anthropophagie_, p. 1 _sqq._; Bergemann, _Die Verbreitung der Anthropophagie_, p. 5 _sqq._; Steinmetz, _Endokannibalismus_, p. 2 _sqq._; Schneider, _Die Naturvölker_, i. 121 _sqq._; Letourneau, _L'évolution de la morale_, p. 82 _sqq._; Ritson, _Abstinence from Animal Food_, p. 125 _sqq._; Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 279 _sqq._; Schaafhausen, 'Die Menschenfresserei und das Menschenopfer,' in _Archiv f. Anthropologie_, iv. 248 _sqq._; Henkenius, 'Verbreitung der Anthropophagie,' in _Deutsche Rundschau f. Geographie u. Statistik_, xv. 348 _sqq._; de Nadaillac, 'L'Anthropophagie et les sacrifices humains,' in _Revue des Deux Mondes_, lxvi. 406 _sqq._; _Idem_, in _Bulletins de la Soc. d'Anthrop. de Paris_, 1888, p. 27 _sqq._; Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 145 _sqq._ (American aborigines); Koch, 'Die Anthropophagie der südamerikanischen Indianer,' in _Internationales Archiv f. Ethnographie_, xii. 84 _sqq._; Preuss, _Die Begräbnisarten der Amerikaner

und Nordostasiaten_, p. 217 _sqq._; Vos, 'Die Verbreitung der Anthropophagie auf dem asiatischen Festlande,' in _Intern. Archiv f. Ethnogr._ iii. 69 _sqq._; de Groot, _Religious System of China_, (vol. iv. book) ii. 363 _sqq._; Hübbe-Schleiden, _Ethiopien_, p. 209 _sqq._; Matiegka, 'Anthropophagie in der prähistorischen Ansiedlung bei Knovize und in der prähistorischen Zeit überhaupt,' in _Mittheil. d. Anthrop. Gesellsch. in Wien_, xxvi. 129 _sqq._; Wood-Martin, _Traces of the Elder Faiths of Ireland_, ii. 286 _sqq._]

{554} Sometimes the whole body is eaten, with the exception of the bones, sometimes only a part of it, as the liver or the heart. Frequently the victim is an enemy or a member of a foreign tribe, but he may also be a relative or fellow tribesman. Among various savages exo- and endo-anthropophagy prevail simultaneously; but many cannibals restrict themselves to eating strangers, slain enemies, or captives taken in war, whereas others eat their own people in preference to strangers, or are exclusively endo-anthropophagous. Thus the Birhors of the Central Provinces of India are said to eat their aged relatives, but to abhor any other form of cannibalism;[2] and in certain Australian tribes it is not the dead bodies of slain enemies that are eaten, but the bodies of friends, the former being left where they fell.[3] Sometimes people feed on the corpses of such kinsmen as have happened to die, sometimes they kill and eat their old folks, sometimes parents eat their children, sometimes criminals are eaten by the other members of their own community. The Australian Dieyerie have a fixed order in which they partake of their dead relatives:--"The mother eats of her children. The children eat of their mother. Brothers-in-law and sisters-in-law eat of each other. Uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces, grandchildren, grandfathers, and grandmothers eat of each other. But the father does not eat of his offspring, or the offspring of the sire."[4] Among some peoples cannibalism is an exclusively masculine custom, the women being forbidden to eat human flesh, except perhaps in quite exceptional circumstances.[5]

[Footnote 2: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 220 _sq._]

[Footnote 3: Palmer, 'Some Australian Tribes,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiii. 283; Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 56; Howitt, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 753 (Queensland aborigines). Dawson, _Australian Aborigines_, p. 67 (tribes of Western Victoria).]

[Footnote 4: Gason, 'Dieyerie Tribe,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 274.]

[Footnote 5: Coquilhat, _Sur le Haut-Congo_, p. 274 (Bangala). Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Mbala,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 403 _sq._ _Iidem_, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Huana,' _ibid._ xxxvi. 279. Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 158 (West Equatorial Africans). Thomson, _Story of New Zealand_, i. 145; Best, 'Art of War, as conducted by the Maori,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xi. 71 (some of the Maoris). von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ i. 134 (Nukahivans). Erskine, _Cruise among the Islands of Western Pacific_, p. 260 (Fijians). Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 548. With reference to the natives of Australia Mr. Curr says (_The Australian Race_, i. 77) that "human flesh seems to have been entirely forbidden to females"; but this certainly does not hold true of all the Australian tribes.]

{555} The practice of cannibalism may be traced to many different sources. It often springs from scarcity or lack of animal food.[6] In the South Sea Islands, according to Ellis, "the cravings of nature, and the pangs of famine, often led to this unnatural crime."[7] The Nukahivans, who were in the habit of eating their enemies slain in battle, also killed and ate their wives and children in times of scarcity, but not unless forced to it by the utmost necessity.[8] Hunger has been represented as the motive for cannibalism in some North and West Australian tribes, parents sometimes consuming even their own children when food is scarce.[9] The Indians north of Lake Superior often resorted to the eating of human flesh when hard pressed by their enemies or during a famine.[10] Among the Hudson Bay Eskimo "instances are reported where, in times of great scarcity, families have been driven to cannibalism after eating their dogs and the clothing and other articles made of skins."[11]

[Footnote 6: Bergemann, _op. cit._ p. 48. de Nadaillac, in _Bull. Soc. d'Anthr._ 1888, p. 27 _sqq._ _Idem_, in _Revue des Deux Mondes_, lxvi. 428 _sq._ Steinmetz, _Endokannibalismus_, p. 25 _sqq._ Lippert, _Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit_, ii. 281 _sqq._ Henkenius, _loc. cit._ p. 348 _sq._ Letourneau, _L'évolution de la Morale_, p. 97. Matiegka, _loc. cit._ p. 136. Hübbe-Schleiden, _Ethiopien_, p. 216 _sq._ Rochas, _La Nouvelle Calédonie_, p. 304 _sq._]

[Footnote 7: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 359.]

[Footnote 8: von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ i. 144.]

[Footnote 9: Lumholtz, _Among Cannibals_, p. 134. Nisbet, _A Colonial Tramp_, ii. 143. Oldfield, 'Aborigines of Australia,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. iii. 285. In hard summers the new-born babies were all eaten by the Kaura tribe in the neighbourhood of Adelaide (Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 749).]

[Footnote 10: Warren, in Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, ii. 146.]

[Footnote 11: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 187.]

But whilst among some peoples starvation is the only inducement to cannibalism, there are others who can plead no such motive for their anthropophagous habits. The Fijians, until lately some of the greatest man-eaters on earth, inhabit a country where food of every kind abounds.[12] The Brazilian cannibals generally have a great {556} plenty of game or fish.[13] In Africa cannibalism prevails in many countries which are well supplied with food.[14] Thus the Bangala of the Upper Congo have been known to make frequent warlike expeditions against adjoining tribes seemingly for the sole object of obtaining human flesh to eat, although their land is well provided with a variety of vegetable food and domestic animals, to say nothing of the incredible abundance of fish in its lakes and rivers.[15] Of the cave-cannibals in the Trans-Gariep Country, in South Africa, a traveller remarks with some surprise:--"They were inhabiting a fine agricultural tract of country, which also abounded in game. Notwithstanding this, they were not contented with hunting and feeding upon their enemies, but preyed much upon each other also, for many of their captures were made from amongst the people of their own tribe."[16] Far from being an article of food resorted to in emergency only, human flesh is not seldom sought for as a delicacy.[17] The highest praise which the Fijians could bestow on a dainty was to say that it was "tender as a dead man."[18] In various other islands of the South Seas human flesh is spoken of as a delicious food, far superior to pork.[19] The {557} Australian Kurnai said that it tasted better than beef.[20] In some tribes in Australia a plump child is considered "a sweet mouthful, and, in the absence of the mother, clubs in the hands of a few wilful men will soon lay it low."[21] Of certain natives of Northern Queensland we are told that the greatest incentive to taking life is their appetite for human flesh, as they know no greater luxury than the flesh of a black man.[22]

[Footnote 12: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 182. Erskine. _op. cit._ p. 262.]

[Footnote 13: von Martius, _Beiträge zur Ethnographie Amerika's_, i. 538. Koch, _loc. cit._ p. 87. de Nadaillac, in _Bull. Soc. d'Anthr._ 1888, p. 30 _sq._]

[Footnote 14: Johnston, 'Ethics of Cannibalism,' in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xlv. 20 _sqq._ Hübbe-Schleiden, _Ethiopien_, p. 212. de Nadaillac, in _Bull. Soc. d'Anthr._ 1888, p. 32 _sq._]

[Footnote 15: Coquilhat, _op. cit._ pp. 271, 273. Johnston, in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xlv. 20.]

[Footnote 16: Layland, quoted by Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 216.]

[Footnote 17: Bergemann, _op. cit._ p. 49 _sq._ von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ i. 141. Hübbe-Schleiden, _Ethiopien_, p. 218. Johnston, in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xlv. 20 _sqq._ (various African peoples). Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 330 (Fans). Reade, _op. cit._ p. 158 (West Equatorial Africans). Coquilhat, _op. cit._ p. 271 (Bangala). Torday and Joyce, 'Ba-Mbala,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 404. _Iidem_, 'Ba-Huana,' _ibid._ xxxvi. 279.]

[Footnote 18: Wilkes, _U. S. Exploring Expedition_, iii. 101. _Cf._ Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ pp. 175, 178, 195.]

[Footnote 19: Romilly, _Western Pacific_, p. 59 (New Irelanders). _Idem_, _From my Verandah in New Guinea_, p. 65. Brenchley, _Cruise of H.M.S. Curaçoa_, p. 209; Turner, _Samoa_, p. 313 (natives of Tana, in the New Hebrides). _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 344 (New Caledonians); Hale, _U. S. Exploring Expedition. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_, p. 39 (Polynesians). The Bataks of Sumatra likewise consider human flesh even better than pork (Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 160 _sq._). For the high appreciation of its taste see also Marco Polo, _Book concerning the Kingdoms and Marvels of the East_, ii. 179 (hill people in Fokien), 209 (Islanders in the Seas of China); Schaafhausen, _loc. cit._ p. 247 _sq._; Matiegka, _loc. cit._ p. 136, n. 3.]

[Footnote 20: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 752.]

[Footnote 21: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, pp. 3, 57.]

[Footnote 22: Lumholtz, _op. cit._ pp. 101, 271.]

However, bodily appetites, whether hunger or _gourmandise_, are by no means the sole motives for cannibalism. Very frequently it is described as an act of revenge.[23] The Typees of the Marquesas Islands, according to Melville, are cannibals only when they seek to gratify the passion of revenge upon their foes.[24] The cannibalism of the Solomon Islanders seems mainly to have been an expression of the deepest humiliation to which they could make a person subject.[25] The Samoans affirmed that, when in some of their wars a body was occasionally cooked, "it was always some one of the enemy who had been notorious for provocation or cruelty, and that eating a part of his body was considered the climax of hatred and revenge, and was not occasioned by the mere relish for human flesh." To speak of roasting {558} him is the very worst language that can be addressed to a Samoan, and if applied to a chief of importance, he may raise war to avenge the insult.[26] Among the Maoris human flesh was frequently eaten from motives of revenge and hatred, to cast disgrace on the person eaten, and to strike terror. "It was such a disgrace for a New Zealander to have his body eaten, that if crews of Englishmen and New Zealanders, all friends, were dying of starvation in separate ships, the English might resort to cannibalism, but the New Zealanders never would."[27] Even in Fiji, where cannibalism was largely indulged in for the mere pleasure of eating human flesh as food, revenge is said to have been the chief motive for it.[28] Thus, "in any transaction where the national honour had to be avenged, it was incumbent upon the king and principal chiefs--in fact, a duty they owed to their exalted station--to avenge the insult offered to the country by eating the perpetrators of it."[29]

[Footnote 23: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 310 (Tahitians). von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ i. 149 (Nukahivans). Forster, _Voyage round the World_, ii. 315 (natives of Tana and generally). Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 248 (natives of New Britain and New Ireland). Howitt, _Natives of South-East Australia_, pp. 247, 751. Marsden, _History of Sumatra_, p. 391; Buning, in _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 74 _sq._; Junghuhn. _op. cit._ ii. 156, 160 (Bataks). de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. iv. book) ii. 369 _sqq._ (ancient Chinese). Schneider, _Die Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 208 _sq._ (Negroes). Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 216 (natives of Bonny and New Calabar). Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 145 _sq._ Carver, _Travels through the Interior Parts of North America_, p. 303 _sq._ (Naudowessies). Keating, _Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_, i. 104 (Potawatomis). Koch, _loc. cit._ pp. 87, 89 _sqq._ (South American tribes). von Humboldt, _Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent_, v. 421 (Indians of Guyana). Wied-Neuwied, _Reise nach Brasilien_, ii. 50 (Botocudos and some other Brazilian tribes). Lomonaco, 'Sulle razze indigene del Brasile,' in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, xix. 58 (Tupis). Andree, _op. cit._ p. 102 _sq._ and _passim_.]

[Footnote 24: Melville, _Typee_, p. 181.]

[Footnote 25: Parkinson, _Zur Ethnographie der nordwestlichen Salomo Inseln_, p. 14.]

[Footnote 26: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 194. _Cf._ Pritchard, _Polynesian Reminiscences_, p. 125 _sq._]

[Footnote 27: Thomson, _Story of New Zealand_, i. 141 _sqq._ Yate, _Account of New Zealand_, p. 129. Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 128. Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, p. 353. Best, in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xi. 71 _sq._]

[Footnote 28: Wilkes, _op. cit._ iii. 101. Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 178.]

[Footnote 29: Seemann, _Viti_, p. 181.]

The practice of eating criminals, which is quite a common form of cannibalism, seems to be largely due to revenge or indignation.[30] In Lepers' Island, in the New Hebrides, the victims of it were not generally enemies who had been killed in fighting, but "it was a murderer or particularly detested enemy who was eaten, in anger and to treat him ill."[31] Among the Bataks of Sumatra offenders condemned for certain capital crimes, such as atrocious murder, treason, and adultery, were usually eaten by the injured persons and their friends with all the signs of angry passion.[32] But this form of cannibalism may also have another foundation.[33] If for any reason there is a desire to eat human flesh, an unsympathetic being like a criminal is apt to be chosen as a victim. {559} It is said that some of the Line Islanders in the South Seas began their cannibalism by eating thieves and slaves.[34] In Melanesia, where human sacrifices were combined with the eating of bits of the victim, "advantage was taken of a crime, or imputed crime, to take a life and offer the man to some _tindalo_."[35]

[Footnote 30: _Cf._ Matiegka, _loc. cit._ p. 137.]

[Footnote 31: Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 344.]

[Footnote 32: Marsden, _op. cit._ p. 391. Junghuhn, _op. cit._ ii. 156 _sq._]

[Footnote 33: See Steinmetz, _op. cit._ p. 55 _sq._]

[Footnote 34: Tutuila, 'Line Islanders,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 270.]

[Footnote 35: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 135.]

It has been questioned whether cannibalism can be a direct expression of hatred;[36] but for no good reason. To eat a person is, according to primitive ideas, to annihilate him as an individual,[37] and we can readily imagine the triumphant feelings of a savage who has his enemy between his jaws. The Fijian eats in revenge even the vermin which bite him, and when a thorn pricks him he picks it out of his flesh and eats it.[38] The Cochin-Chinese express their deepest hatred of a person by saying, "I wish I could eat his liver or his flesh."[39] Other people want to "drink the blood" of their enemies.

[Footnote 36: Steinmetz, _op. cit._ p. 33.]

[Footnote 37: Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 118 (Maoris). Johnston, in _Fortnightly Review_, N. S. xlv. 27 (Negroes of the Niger Delta). Koch, _loc. cit._ pp. 87, 109. Lippert, _Der Seelencult_, p. 69. _Idem_, _Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit_, ii. 282 _sq._]

[Footnote 38: Pritchard, _op. cit._ p. 371.]

[Footnote 39: von Langsdorf, _op. cit._ i. 148.]

The idea that a person is annihilated or loses his individuality by being eaten has led to cannibalism not only in revenge but as an act of protection, as a method of making a dangerous individual harmless after death.[40] Among the Botocudos warriors devoured the bodies of their fallen enemies in the belief that they would thus be safe from the revengeful hatred of the dead.[41] In Ashantee "several of the hearts of the enemy are cut out by the fetish men who follow the army, and the blood and small pieces being mixed (with much ceremony and incantation) with various consecrated herbs, all those who have never killed an enemy before eat a portion, for it is believed that if they did not, their vigour and courage would be secretly wasted by the haunting spirit of the {560} deceased."[42] In Greenland "a slain man is said to have the power to avenge himself upon the murderer by rushing into him, which can only be prevented by eating a piece of his liver."[43] Many cannibals are in the habit of consuming that part of a slain enemy which is supposed to contain his soul or courage or strength, and one reason for this practice may be the wish to render him incapable of doing further harm. Queensland natives eat the kidneys of the persons whom they have killed, believing that "the kidneys are the centre of life."[44] Among the Maoris a chief was often satisfied with the left eye of his enemy, which they considered to be the seat of the soul; or they drank the blood from a corresponding belief;[45] or in the case of a blood feud the heart of the enemy, representing the vital essence of him, was eaten "to fix or make firm the victory and the courage of the victor."[46] Other peoples likewise eat the hearts or suck the brains of their foes.

[Footnote 40: _Cf._ Lippert, _Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit_, ii. 282; Koch, _loc. cit._ pp. 87, 109.]

[Footnote 41: Featherman, _Social History of Mankind_, 'Chiapo- and Guarano-Maranonians,' p. 355.]

[Footnote 42: Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 300.]

[Footnote 43: Rink, _Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo_, p. 45.]

[Footnote 44: Lumholtz, _op. cit._ p. 272.]

[Footnote 45: Dieffenbach, _op. cit._ ii. 128 _sq._]

[Footnote 46: Best, in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xii. 83, 147.]

Moreover, by eating the supposed seat of a certain quality in his enemy the cannibal thinks not only that he deprives his victim of that quality, but also that he incorporates it with his own system.[47] In many cases this is the chief or the only reason for the practice of cannibalism. The Shoshone Indians supposed that they became animated by the heroic spirit of a fallen foe if they partook of his flesh.[48] Among the Hurons, if an enemy had shown courage, his heart, roasted and cut into small pieces, {561} was given to the young men and boys to eat.[49] The E[(w]e-speaking peoples of the Slave Coast used to eat the hearts of foes remarkable for sagacity, holding that the heart is the seat of the intellect as well as of courage.[50] Among the Kimbunda of South-Western Africa, when a new king succeeds to the throne, a brave prisoner of war is killed in order that the king and nobles may eat his flesh, and so acquire his strength and courage.[51] The idea of transference very largely underlies Australian cannibalism.[52] In some tribes enemies are consumed with a view to acquiring some part of their qualities and courage.[53] The Dieyerie devour the fatty portions of their foes because they think it will impart strength to them.[54] And similar motives are often given for the practice of eating relatives or friends. When a man is killed in one of the ceremonial fights in the tribes about Maryborough, in Queensland, his friends skin and eat him in the hope that his virtues as a warrior may go into those who partake of him.[55] Among the natives of the River Darling, in New South Wales, a piece of flesh is cut from the dead body and taken to the camp, and after being sun-dried is cut up into small pieces, which are distributed among the relatives and friends of the deceased. Some of them use the piece in making a charm, or throw it into the river to bring a flood and fish, but others suck it to get strength and courage.[56] In certain Central Australian tribes, when a party starts on an avenging expedition, every man of it drinks some blood and also has some spurted over his body, so as to make him lithe and active; the elder men {562} indicate from whom the blood is to be drawn, and the persons thus selected must not decline.[57] In certain South Australian tribes cannibalism is only practised by old men and women, who eat a baby in order to get the youngster's strength.[58] Among other natives of the same continent, as we have noticed above, a mother used to kill and eat her first child, as this was believed to strengthen her for later births.[59] And in various Australian tribes it is, or has been, the custom when a child is weak or sickly to kill its infant brother or sister and feed it with the flesh to make it strong.[60] Many of the Brazilian Indians are in the habit of burning the bones of their departed relatives, and mix the ashes with a drink of which they partake for the purpose of absorbing their spirits or virtues.[61] Dr. Couto de Magalhães was informed that the savage Chavantes "eat their children who die, in the hope of gathering again to their body the soul of the child."[62]

[Footnote 47: Blumentritt, 'Der Ahnencultus der Malaien des Philippinen-Archipels,' in _Mittheil. d. kais. u. könig. Geograph. Gesellsch. in Wien_, xxv. 154 (Italones). Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 269 (Kukis). de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. iv. book) ii. 373 _sqq._ (ancient Chinese). Schneider, _Die Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 209 _sq._ (Negroes). Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 145 _sq._ (North American Indians). Keating, _op. cit._ i. 104 (Potawatomis). Koch, _loc. cit._ pp. 87, 89 _sqq._, 109 (South American Indians). Andree, _op. cit._ p. 101 _sq._ and _passim_. Lippert, _Der Seelencult_, p. 70 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Kulturgeschichte_, ii. 282. Trumbull, _Blood Covenant_, p. 128 _sqq._ Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 357 _sqq._ Gomme, _Ethnology in Folklore_, p. 151 _sqq._ Crawley, _Mystic Rose_, p. 101 _sqq._]

[Footnote 48: Featherman, _op. cit._ 'Aoneo-Maranonians,' p. 206.]

[Footnote 49: Parkman, _Jesuits in North America_, p. xxxix.]

[Footnote 50: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 51: Magyar, _Reisen in Süd-Afrika_, p. 273.]

[Footnote 52: Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, pp. 56, 81. Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. p. xxxviii. Howitt, 'Australian Medicine Men,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xvi. 30. Langloh Parker, _Euahlayi Tribe_, p. 38. Gason, 'Dieyerie Tribe,' in Curr, _op. cit._ ii. 52.]

[Footnote 53: Howitt, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 752.]

[Footnote 54: Gason, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 172.]

[Footnote 55: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 753. McDonald,'Mode of Preparing the Dead among the Natives of the Upper Mary River, Queensland,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ ii. 179.]

[Footnote 56: Bonney, 'Aborigines of the River Darling,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiii. 135.]

[Footnote 57: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 461.]

[Footnote 58: Crauford, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 182.]

[Footnote 59: _Supra_, i. 458.]

[Footnote 60: Howitt, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 749 _sq._ (all the tribes of the Wotjo nation, and the Tatathi and other tribes on the Murray River frontage). Stanbridge, 'Tribes in the Central Part of Victoria,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc. London_, N.S. i. 289. Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, pp. 52, 475 (Luritcha tribe).]

[Footnote 61: Wallace, _Travels on the Amazon_, p. 498 (Tariánas, Tucános, and some other tribes of the Uaupés). Coudreau, _La France équinoxiale_, ii. 173 (Cobbéos, of the Uaupés). Monteiro, quoted by von Spix and von Martius, _Reise in Brasilien_, iii. 1207, n. * (Jumánas). Koch, _loc. cit._ p. 83 _sq._ Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 151.]

[Footnote 62: Couto de Magalhães, _Trabalho preparatorio para aproveitamento do selvagem e do solo por elle occupado no Brazil--O selvagem_, p. 132. _Cf._ de Castelnau, _Expédition dans les parties centrales de l'Amérique du Sud_, iv. 382 (Camacas).]

The belief in the principle of transference has also led to cannibalism in connection with human sacrifice and to the eating of man-gods. At Florida, in the Solomon Islands, human flesh was eaten in sacrifice only.[63] In Hawaii, "après le sacrifice, le peuple, qui d'ailleurs ne fut jamais anthropophage, pratiquait une sorte de communion en mangeant certaines parties de la victime."[64] In West Equatorial Africa, according to Mr. Winwood Reade, there are two kinds of cannibalism--the one is simply an {563} act of _gourmandise_, the other is sacrificial and is performed by the priests, whose office it is to eat a portion of the victims, whether men, goats, or fowls.[65] And this sacrificial cannibalism is not restricted to the priests. In British Nigeria "no great human sacrifice offered for the purpose of appeasing the gods and averting sickness or misfortune is considered to be complete unless either the priests or the people eat the bodies of the victims";[66] and among the Aro people in Southern Nigeria the human victims offered to the god were eaten by all the people, the flesh being distributed throughout their country.[67] The inhabitants of the province of Caranque, in ancient Peru, likewise consumed the flesh of those whom they sacrificed to their gods.[68] The Aztecs ate parts of the human bodies whose blood had been poured out on the altar of sacrifice,[69] and so did the Mayas.[70] In Nicaragua the high-priests received the heart, the king the feet and hands, he who captured the victim took the thighs, the entrails were given to the trumpeters, and the rest was divided among the people.[71] In ancient India it was a prevalent opinion that he who offered a human victim in sacrifice should partake of its flesh; though, in opposition to this view, it was also said that a man cannot be allowed, much less required, to eat human flesh.[72] The sacrificial form of cannibalism obviously springs from the idea that a victim offered to a supernatural being participates in his sanctity[73] and from the wish of the worshipper to transfer to himself something of its benign virtue. So also the divine qualities of a man-god are supposed to be assimilated by the person {564} who eats his flesh or drinks his blood.[74] This was the idea of the early Christians concerning the Eucharist. In the holy food they assumed a real bestowal of heavenly gifts, a bodily self-communication of Christ, a miraculous implanting of divine life. The partaking of the consecrated elements had no special relation to the forgiveness of sins; but it strengthened faith and knowledge, and, especially, it was the guarantee of eternal life, because the body of Christ was eternal. The holy food was described as the "medicine of immortality."[75]

[Footnote 63: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 343. See also Geiseler, _Die Oster-Insel_, p. 30 _sq._ (Easter Islanders).]

[Footnote 64: Remy, _Ka Mooolelo Hawaii_, p. xl.]

[Footnote 65: Reade, _op. cit._ p. 158. See also Schneider, _Die Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 209 _sq._]

[Footnote 66: Mockler-Ferryman, _British Nigeria_, p. 261.]

[Footnote 67: Partridge, _Cross River Natives_, p. 59.]

[Footnote 68: Ranking, _Researches on the Conquest of Peru_, p. 89.]

[Footnote 69: Prescott, _History of the Conquest of Mexico_, p. 41. Réville, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religions of Mexico and Peru_, p. 89. Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, ii. 176; iii. 443 _sq._]

[Footnote 70: Bancroft, _op. cit._ ii. 725.]

[Footnote 71: _Ibid._ ii. 725.]

[Footnote 72: Weber, 'Ueber Menschenopfer bei den Indern der vedischen Zeit,' in _Indische Streifen_, i. 72 _sq._]

[Footnote 73: See _supra_, i. 445 _sq._]

[Footnote 74: See Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 352, 353. 366.]

[Footnote 75: Harnack, _History of Dogma_, i. 211; ii. 144 _sqq._; iv. 286, 291, 294, 296, 297, 299 _sq._]

In various other instances human flesh or blood is supposed to have a supernatural or medicinal effect upon him who partakes of it. The Banks Islanders in Melanesia believe that a man or woman may obtain a power like that of Vampires by stealing and eating a morsel of a corpse; the ghost of the dead man would then "join in a close friendship with the person who had eaten, and would gratify him by afflicting any one against whom his ghostly power might be directed."[76] Australian sorcerers are said to acquire their magic influence by eating human flesh.[77] The Egyptian natives who accompanied Baker on one of his expeditions imagined that the rite of consuming an enemy's liver would give a fatal direction to a random bullet.[78] Among the aborigines of Tasmania a man's blood was often administered as a healing draught.[79] In China the heart, the liver, the gall, and the blood of executed criminals are used for life-strengthening purposes;[80] thus at Peking, when a person has been executed by the sword, certain large pith balls are steeped in the blood and, under the name of "blood-bread," sold as a medicine for consumption.[81] Tertullian speaks of those "who at the gladiatorial shows, for the cure of epilepsy, {565} quaff with greedy thirst the blood of criminals slain in the arena, as it flows fresh from the wound."[82] So also in Christian Europe the blood of criminals has been drunk as a remedy against epilepsy, fever, and other diseases.[83] In these cases the ascription of a healing effect to the blood of the dead may perhaps have been derived from a belief in the transference of some quality which they possessed in their lifetime; the blood or life of a sound and strong individual might impart health to the sickly. But the mystery of death would also give to the corpse a miraculous power of its own, especially when combined with the horror or awe inspired by an executed felon.

[Footnote 76: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 221 _sq._]

[Footnote 77: Eyre, _Expeditions of Discovery into Central Australia_, ii. 255.]

[Footnote 78: Baker, _Ismailïa_, p. 393.]

[Footnote 79: Bonwick, _Daily Life and Origin of the Tasmanians_, p. 89.]

[Footnote 80: de Groot, _op. cit._ (vol. iv. book) ii. 377.]

[Footnote 81: Rennie, quoted by Yule, in his translation of Marco Polo, i. 275, n. 7.]

[Footnote 82: Tertullian, _Apologeticus_, 9 (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, i. 321 _sq._).]

[Footnote 83: Strack, _Der Blutaberglaube in der Menschheit_, p. 27 _sqq._ Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_, § 189 _sqq._, p. 137 _sq._ Jahn, 'Ueber den Zauber mit Menschenblut,' in _Verhandl. d. Berliner Gesellsch. f. Anthrop._ 1888, p. 134 _sqq._ Havelock Ellis, _The Criminal_, p. 284. Peacock, 'Executed Criminals and Folk-Medicine,' in _Folk-Lore_, vii. 270 _sq._]

In other instances, again, the belief in the wonderful effects of cannibal practices may have originated in the notion that, if a person or the essential part of him is eaten, he ceases to exist even as a spirit, or at all events loses his power of doing mischief. Among the Indians of British Guiana, when a man is pointed out as the secret murderer of a relative who has died, the avenger will shoot him through the back; and if he happens to fall dead to the ground, his corpse is dragged aside and buried in a shallow grave. The third night the avenger goes to the grave and presses a pointed stick through the corpse; and if on withdrawing the stick he finds blood on the end of it, he tastes the blood in order to ward off any evil effects that might follow from the murder, returning home appeased and apparently at ease. But if it happens that the wounded individual is able to escape, he charges his relatives to bury him after his death in some place where he cannot be found. This is to punish the murderer for his deed, "inasmuch as the belief prevails that if he taste not the blood he must perish by madness."[84] In Prussia it was a popular superstition that {566} if a murderer cut off, roasted, and ate a piece of his victim's body, he would never after think of his deed.[85] But by eating a part of the corpse a homicide may also protect himself against the vengeance of the survivors, presumably because he has now absorbed their relative into his own system.[86] The natives of New Britain eat their enemies and fix the leg and arm bones of the victims at the butt end of their spears, believing that this not only gives them the strength of the man whose bones they carry but also makes them invulnerable by his relatives.[87] The Botocudos thought that by devouring their fallen enemies they both protected themselves from the hatred of the dead and at the same time prevented the arrows of the hostile tribe from hitting them.[88] In Greenland the relatives of a murdered person, when highly enraged, will cut to pieces the body of the murderer and devour part of the heart or liver, "thinking thereby to disarm his relatives of all courage to attack them."[89] In the South of Italy there is a popular belief that a murderer will not be able to escape unless he taste or bedaub himself with his victim's blood.[90] Sometimes, we are told, cannibalism is even supposed to have a positively injurious effect upon the victim's relatives, in accordance, as it seems, with the principle of sympathetic magic. Among the Chukchi, in the case of revenge for blood, the slayers eat a little bit of the enemy's heart or liver, supposing that they in this way cause the hearts of his kinsfolk to sicken.[91]

[Footnote 84: Bernau, _Missionary Labours in British Guiana_, p. 57 _sq._]

[Footnote 85: von Tettau and Temme, _Die Volkssagen Ostpreussens_, p. 267.]

[Footnote 86: _Cf._ Hartland, _op. cit._ ii. 245 _sq._]

[Footnote 87: Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 92.]

[Footnote 88: Castelnau, _Expédition dans les parties centrales de l'Amérique du Sud_, iv. 382.]

[Footnote 89: Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 178.]

[Footnote 90: Pasquarelli, quoted by Hartland, _op. cit._ ii. 246.]

[Footnote 91: Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, ii. 212.]

Human flesh or blood is not only believed to impart certain qualities or beneficial magic energy to him who partakes of it, but also serves as a means of transferring conditional curses from one person to another. This I take to be the explanation of cannibalism as a covenant rite; in a previous chapter I have tried to show that the {567} main principle underlying the blood-covenant is the idea that the transference of blood conveys to the person who drinks it, or is inoculated with it, a conditional curse which will injure or destroy him should he break his promise.[92] The drinking of human blood, or of wine mixed with such blood, has been a form of covenant among various ancient and mediæval peoples, as well as among certain savages.[93] In some South Slavonic districts compacts between different clans are even now made by their representatives sucking blood from each other's right hands and swearing fidelity till the grave.[94] In certain parts of Africa, again, the partaking of human flesh, generally prepared in a kind of paste mixed with condiments and kept in a quaintly-carved wooden box and eaten with round spoons of human bone, constitutes a bond of union between strangers who are suspicious of one another or between former enemies, or accompanies the making of a solemn declaration or the taking of an oath.[95] Among the Bambala, a Bantu tribe in the Kasai, south of the River Congo, cannibalism accompanies the ceremony by which a kind of alliance is established between chiefs of the same region. The most powerful chief will invite the other chiefs of the neighbourhood to a meeting held on his territory, in order to make a compact against bloodshed. "A slave is fattened for the occasion and killed by the host, and the invited chiefs and their followers partake of the flesh. Participation in this banquet is taken as a pledge to prevent murder. Supposing that a chief, after attending an assembly of this kind, kills a slave, every village which took part in the bond has the right to claim compensation, and the murderer is sure to be completely ruined."[96]

[Footnote 92: _Supra_, ii. 208.]

[Footnote 93: Strack, _op. cit._ p. 9 _sqq._ Rühs, _Handbuch der Geschichte des Mittelalters_, p. 323. _Supra_, ii. 207 _sqq._]

[Footnote 94: Krauss, 'Sühnung der Blutrache im Herzögischen,' in _Am Ur-Quell_, N.F. i. 196.]

[Footnote 95: Johnston, in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xlv. 28.]

[Footnote 96: Torday and Joyce, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 404, 409.]

For the practice of eating relatives or friends, finally, some special reasons are given besides those already mentioned.{568} It is represented as a mark of affection or respect for the dead,[97] as an act which benefits not only the person who eats but also him who is eaten. The reason which the Australian Dieyerie assign for their endo-anthropophagy is, that should they not eat their relatives they would be perpetually crying and become a nuisance to the camp.[98] The natives of the Boulia district, Queensland, among whom children that die suddenly are partly eaten by the parents and their blood brothers and sisters, say that "putting them along hole" would make them think too much about their beloved little ones.[99] In the Turrbal tribe in Southern Queensland a man who happened to be killed in one of the ceremonial combats which followed the initiation rites was eaten by those members of the tribe who were present; and the motive stated is that they ate him because "they knew him and were fond of him, and they now knew where he was, and his flesh would not stink."[100] The Bataks of Sumatra declared that they frequently ate their own relatives when aged and infirm, "not so much to gratify their appetite, as to perform a pious ceremony."[101] Among the Samoyedes old and decrepit persons who were no longer able to work let their children kill and eat them in the hope that they thereby might fare better after death.[102] The Indian of Hayti "would think he was wanting to the memory of a relation, if he had not thrown into his drink a small portion of the body of the deceased, after having dried it . . . and reduced it to powder."[103] Among the Botocudos old men who were unable to keep up in the march were at their own request eaten up by their sons so that their {569} enemies should be prevented from digging up and injuring their bodies;[104] whilst mothers not infrequently consumed their dead children out of love.[105] The Mayorunas considered it more desirable for the departed to be eaten by relatives than by worms;[106] and the Cocomas, a tribe of the Marañon and Lower Huallaga, said it was better to be inside a friend than to be swallowed up by the cold earth.[107] It is impossible to decide how far these statements represent original motives for the custom of eating dead relatives. They may be later interpretations of a habit which in the first place sprang from selfishness rather than love.

[Footnote 97: Dawson, _op. cit._ p. 67 (tribes of Western Victoria). McDonald, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ ii. 179 (natives of the Upper Mary River, Queensland). Featherman, _op. cit._ 'Oceano-Melanesians,' p. 243 (Hawaiians). Southey, _History of Brazil_, i. 379 (Tapuyas). Marcgravius de Liebstad, _Historia rerum naturalium Brasiliæ_, viii. 12, p. 282 (ancient Tupis).]

[Footnote 98: Gason, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 172. _Idem_, in Woods, _op. cit._ p. 274.]

[Footnote 99: Roth, _North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, p. 166.]

[Footnote 100: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 753.]

[Footnote 101: Leyden, 'Languages and Literature of the Indo-Chinese Nations,' in _Asiatick Researches_, x. 202.]

[Footnote 102: Preuss, _op. cit._ p. 218.]

[Footnote 103: Bembo, quoted by von Humboldt, _op. cit._ v. 248.]

[Footnote 104: Voss, in _Verhandl. Berliner Geellsch. Anthr._ 1891, p. 26.]

[Footnote 105: Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, iii. 446.]

[Footnote 106: von Schütz-Holzhausen, _Der Amazonas_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 107: Markham, 'List of the Tribes in the Valley of the Amazon,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 253.]

The cannibalism of modern savages has often been represented as the survival of an ancient practice which was once universal in the human race.[108] The advocates of this theory, however, have not generally made any serious attempts to prove it. I have in another place put the question how ethnographical facts can give us information regarding the early history of mankind, and my answer was:--We have first to find out the causes of the social phenomena; we may then from the prevalence of the causes infer the prevalence of the phenomena themselves, if the former must be assumed to have operated without being checked by other causes.[109] This seems a very obvious method; but, so far as I know, Dr. Steinmetz is the only one who has strictly applied it to the question of cannibalism. He has arrived at the conclusion that primitive man most probably was in the habit of eating the bodies of his dead kinsmen as also of slain enemies. His argument is briefly as follows:--{570} The chief impulse of primitive man was his desire for food. He fed not only on fruits and vegetables, but on flesh. His taste for animal food was not limited by any sufficient esthetic horror of human corpses. Nor was he kept back from eating them by fear of exposing himself to the revenge of the disembodied soul of his victim, nor by any fantastic sympathy for the dead body. Consequently, he was an habitual cannibal.[110] If I cannot accept Dr. Steinmetz's conclusion it is certainly not because I find fault with his method, but because I consider his chief premise exceedingly doubtful.

[Footnote 108: Andree, _op. cit._ p. 98 _sq._ Lippert, _Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit_, ii. 279. Schurtz, _Speiseverbote_, p. 25. Réville, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religions of Mexico and Peru_, p. 87. Johnston, in _Fortnightly Review_, N.S. xlv. 28. M. Letourneau (_L'évolution de la morale_, p. 76) calls cannibalism "le péché originel de toutes les races humaines."]

[Footnote 109: Westermarck, _History of Human Marriage_, p. 3 _sq._]

[Footnote 110: Steinmetz, _Endokannibalismus_, p. 34 _sqq._]

It is quite likely that early man preferred cannibalism to death from starvation, and that he occasionally practised it from the same motive as has induced many shipwrecked men even among civilised peoples to have recourse to the bodies of their comrades in order to save their lives. But we are here concerned with habitual cannibalism only. Although I consider it highly probable that man was originally in the main frugivorous, there can be no doubt that he has from very early times fed largely on animal food. We may further take for granted that he has habitually eaten the flesh of whatever animals he could get for which he had a taste and from the eating of which no superstitious or sentimental motive held him back. But that he at first had no aversion to human flesh seems to me a very precarious assumption.

A large number of savage tribes have never been known to be addicted to cannibalism, but are, on the contrary, said to feel the greatest dislike of it. In times of scarcity the Eskimo will eat their clothing sooner than touch human flesh. The Fuegians have been reported to devour their old women in cases of extreme distress;[111] but Mr. Bridges, who has spent most part of his life among them, emphatically affirms that cannibalism is unknown amongst the natives of Cape Horn and that {571} they abhor it.[112] Concerning the natives of South Andaman Mr. Man observes:--"Not a trace could be discovered of the existence of such a practice in their midst, even in far-off times. . . . They express the greatest horror of the custom, and indignantly deny that it ever held a place among their institutions."[113] We meet with similar statements with reference to many African tribes. The editor of

Livingstone's 'Last Journals' says that it was common on the River Shiré to hear Manganja and Ajawa people speak of tribes far away to the north who eat human bodies, and that on every occasion the fact was related with the utmost abhorrence and disgust.[114] Amongst the Dinka the accounts of the cannibalism of the Niam-Niam excites as much horror as amongst ourselves.[115] The Bakongo "shudder with repugnance at the mere mention of eating human flesh."[116] Among the Bayaka, in the Congo Free State, "cannibalism is never found, and is regarded as something quite abhorrent."[117] No intermarriage takes place between the Fans and their non-cannibal neighbours, as "their peculiar practices are held in too great abhorrence."[118] According to Burton, cannibalism "is execrated by the Efiks of Old Calabar, who punish any attempts of the kind with extreme severity."[119] Even amongst the South Sea Islanders there are tribes which have been known to view cannibalism with great repugnance.[120]

[Footnote 111: Darwin, _Journal of Researches_, p. 214. King and Fitzroy, _Voyages of the "Adventure" and "Beagle,"_ ii. 183, 189.]

[Footnote 112: Bridges, 'Manners and Customs of the Firelanders,' in _A Voice for South America_, xiii. 207. _Idem_, quoted by Hyades and Deniker, _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn_, vii. 259.]

[Footnote 113: Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 113.]

[Footnote 114: Livingstone, _Last Journals_, ii. 39.]

[Footnote 115: Schweinfurth, _Heart of Africa_, i. 158.]

[Footnote 116: Ward, _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_, p. 37.]

[Footnote 117: Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Yaka,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 42.]

[Footnote 118: Du Chaillu, _Explorations in Equatorial Africa_, p. 97.]

[Footnote 119: Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 216 _sq._]

[Footnote 120: Nisbet, _op. cit._ ii. 136. Turner, _Samoa_, p. 305 (Savage Islanders). Angas, _Polynesia_, p. 385 (natives of Bornabi, in the Caroline Islands). Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 247 (some of the tribes in New Guinea). Calder, 'Native Tribes of Tasmania,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ iii. 23; Ling Roth, _Aborigines of Tasmania_, p. 111.]

It is true that the information which a traveller visiting a savage tribe receives as regards its attitude towards {572} cannibalism is often apt to be misleading. There is nothing as to which many savages are so reticent or the practice of which they will deny so readily as cannibalism, though at the same time they are much inclined to accuse other peoples of it.[121] The reason why they are so anxious to conceal its prevalence among themselves is of course their knowledge of the detestation in which it is held by the visiting stranger; but not infrequently they really seem to feel that it is something to be ashamed of. It has been said of some Australian natives that, "unlike many other offences with which they are justly charged, . . . this one in general they knew to be wrong," their behaviour when they were questioned on the subject showing that "they erred knowingly and wilfully."[122] At all events the reproaches of the whites have been taken to heart with remarkable readiness. Even among peoples who have been extremely addicted to it, cannibalism has disappeared with a rapidity to which, I think, there is hardly any parallel in the history of morals. Erskine wrote in the middle of the last century:--"Our experience in New Zealand has proved that this unnatural propensity can be eradicated from the habits of a whole savage nation, in the course of a single generation. I have heard it asserted that there did not exist in 1845 many New Zealand males of twenty years of age who had not, in their childhood, tasted of human flesh; yet it is perfectly well known that at the present time the occurrence of a single case of cannibalism, in any part of those islands, would attract as much notice as in any country of Europe; and that, when a native can be induced to talk on the subject, his information is given reluctantly, and with an unmistakable consciousness of degradation, and a feeling of shame that he and his {573} countrymen should ever have been liable to such a reproach."[123] Of the Bataks it was said some time ago that the rising generation began to refrain from cannibalism, and that those of them who had submitted to European rule thought with horror of the wild times when they or their ancestors were addicted to it.[124] Cieza de Leon remarks with some astonishment that, as soon as the Peruvian Incas began to put a stop to this practice among all the peoples with whom they came in contact, it was in a short time forgotten throughout their empire even by those who had previously held it in high estimation.[125] Moreover, the extinction of cannibalism has not always been due to the intervention of superior races.[126]

[Footnote 121: Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 77; Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. p. xxxvii. _sq._; Fraser, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 56. Romilly, _Western Pacific_, p. 59 _sqq._ _Idem_, _From my Verandah in New Guinea_, p. 68. Powell, _op. cit._ pp. 52, 59 (natives of the Duke of York Group). Erskine, _op. cit._ p. 190 _sq._ (Fijians). Melville, _op. cit._ p. 341 (Polynesians). Reade, _op. cit._ p. 159; Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 330 (Fans). At the same time there are many cannibals who make no attempts to conceal the practice.]

[Footnote 122: Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ i. p. xxxviii.]

[Footnote 123: Erskine, _op. cit._ p. 275 _sq._]

[Footnote 124: Buning, in _Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago_, p. 74.]

[Footnote 125: Cieza de Leon, _Segunda parte de la Crónica del Perú_, ch. 25, p. 100.]

[Footnote 126: Waitz-Gerland, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, vi. 158 _sqq._ (Polynesians). Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 303. Ribot, _Psychology of the Emotions_, p. 295 _sq._ Schurtz, _Speiseverbote_, p. 26. _Cf._ Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 324.]

Even among peoples very notorious for cannibalism there are individuals who abhor the practice. Dr. Schweinfurth asserts that some of the Niam-Niam "turn with such aversion from any consumption of human flesh that they would peremptorily refuse to eat out of the same dish with any one who was a cannibal."[127] With reference to Fijian cannibalism Dr. Seemann observes:--"It would be a mistake to suppose that all Fijians, not converted to Christianity, are cannibals. There were whole towns, as for instance Nakelo, on the Rewa river, which made a bold stand against this practice, declaring that it was _tabu_ forbidden to them by their gods, to indulge in it. The common people throughout the group, as well as women of all classes, were by custom debarred from it. Cannibalism was thus restricted to the chiefs and gentry, and again amongst them there is a number . . . who never eat human flesh, nor go near the biers when any dead bodies have been brought in, and who abominate the practice as much as any white man does."[128] {574} It should also be remembered that many cannibals eat human flesh not as ordinary food, but only in special circumstances, and that their cannibalism is often restricted to the devouring of some small part of the victim's body.

[Footnote 127: Schweinfurth, _op. cit._ ii. 18 _sq._]

[Footnote 128: Seemann, _Viti_, p. 179 _sq._ _Cf._ Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 179.]

The dislike of cannibalism may be a complex feeling. In many instances sympathy for the dead is undoubtedly one of its ingredients. It is true that endo-anthropophagy is frequently described as a mark of affection, but on the other hand there are many cannibals who never eat their dead friends though they eat strangers or foes. Some cannibals exchange their own dead for those of another tribe so as to avoid feeding on their kinsmen;[129] the natives of Tana, in the New Hebrides, are said to do so "when they happen to have a particular regard for the deceased."[130] But neither affection nor regard can be the reason why savages abstain from eating their enemies. I think that aversion to cannibalism is most likely, in the first instance, an instinctive feeling akin to those feelings which regulate the diet of the various animal species. Although our knowledge of their habits in this respect is defective, there can be little doubt that carnivorous animals as a rule refuse to eat members of their own species; and this reluctance is easy to understand considering its race-preserving tendency.

[Footnote 129: Arbousset and Daumas, _Exploratory Tour to the Cape of Good Hope_, p. 123. Steinmetz, _Endokannibalismus_, pp. 22, 47.]

[Footnote 130: Brenchley, _op. cit._ p. 209.]

Moreover, the eating of human flesh is regarded with some degree of superstitious dread. This is not seldom the case even among peoples who are themselves cannibals. In Lepers' Island, in the New Hebrides, where cannibalism still prevails, the natives say that "to eat human flesh is a dreadful thing," and that a man-eater is a person who is afraid of nothing; hence "men will buy flesh when some one has been killed, that they may get the name of valiant men by eating it."[131] In those parts of Fiji where cannibalism was a national institution, only the select few, the taboo-class, the priests, chiefs, and higher orders, were deemed fit to indulge in it; and {575} whilst every other kind of food was eaten with the fingers, human flesh was eaten with forks, which were handed down as heirlooms from generation to generation, and with which the natives would not part even for a handsome equivalent.[132] The Fijians of Nakelo, again, who did not practise cannibalism, attributed to it those fearful skin diseases with which children are so often visited in Fiji.[133] The New Caledonians, who are exo-anthropophagous, believe that if a man eats a tribes-fellow he will break out into sores and die.[134] Among the Maoris no men but sacred chiefs could partake of human flesh without becoming _tapu_, in which state they could not return to their usual occupations without having the _tapu_ removed from their bodies.[135] So also among the Kwakiutl Indians of British Columbia a man who has eaten human flesh as a ceremonial rite is for a long time afterwards subject to a variety of restrictions, being considered unclean. For sixteen days he must not eat any warm food. For four months he is not allowed to blow hot food in order to cool it. For the same period he uses a spoon, dish, and kettle of his own, which are thrown away after the lapse of the prescribed time. He must stay alone in his bedroom, and is not allowed to go out of the house door but must use the secret door in the rear of the house. And for a whole year he must not touch his wife, nor is he allowed to gamble or to work.[136] Among the West African Fans, before a cannibal meal, the corpse is carried to a hut built on the outskirts of the settlement. There "it is eaten secretly by the warriors, women and children not being allowed to be present, or even to look upon man's flesh; and the cooking pots used for the banquet must all be broken. A joint of 'black brother' is never seen in the villages."[137] So also {576} among the Bambala, south of the River Congo, vessels in which human flesh has been cooked are broken and the pieces thrown away.[138] In Eastern Central Africa the person who eats a human being is believed to run a great risk; Mr. Macdonald knew a headman whose success in war was attributed to the fact that he had eaten the whole body of a strong young man, but it was supposed that if he had not been protected by powerful charms, such cannibalism might have been dangerous to him.[139]

[Footnote 131: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 344.]

[Footnote 132: Seemann, _Viti_, pp. 179, 181 _sq._]

[Footnote 133: _Ibid._ p. 179 _sq._]

[Footnote 134: Atkinson, 'Natives of New Caledonia,' in _Folk-Lore_, xiv. 253.]

[Footnote 135: Thomson, _op. cit._ i. 147 _sq._]

[Footnote 136: Boas, 'Social Organization of the Kwakiutl Indians,' in _Report of the U.S. National Museum_, 1895, p. 537 _sq._ _Cf._ Woldt, _Kaptein Jacobsens Reiser til Nordamerikas Nordvestkyst_, p. 44 _sqq._; Mayne, _Four Years in British Columbia_, p. 256 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 212.]

[Footnote 138: Torday and Joyce, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 404.]

[Footnote 139: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 170.]

One reason for this superstitious dread of cannibalism is undoubtedly fear of the dead man's spirit, which is then supposed not to be annihilated by the act, but to become a danger to him who partakes of the corpse. The Fijian cannibals avowed "that they were always frightened at night lest the spirit of the man they had eaten should haunt them."[140] In the Luritcha tribe in Central Australia care is invariably taken to destroy the bones of those enemies who have been eaten, "as the natives believe that unless this is done the victims will arise from the coming together of the bones, and will follow and harm those who have killed and eaten them."[141] And among the Kwakiutl Indians the taboos imposed upon a cannibal are more obligatory when he has devoured a corpse than when he has contented himself with taking bites out of a living man.[142] But it may also be that the superstitious fear of cannibalism is to some extent an outcome of the natural reluctance to partake of human flesh, just as the aversion to eating certain animals may give rise to the idea that their meat is unwholesome food,[143] and as the supernatural dangers attributed to incest spring from the instinctive horror of it.[144]

[Footnote 140: Pritchard, _op. cit._ p. 372.]

[Footnote 141: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 475.]

[Footnote 142: Boas, _loc. cit._ p. 537 _sq._ _Cf._ Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 342.]

[Footnote 143: _Supra_, ii. 332.]

[Footnote 144: _Supra_, ii. 375 _sq._]

The fact that so many peoples partake or are known to have partaken of human flesh without repugnance, or even with the greatest eagerness, by no means proves {577} that there was no original aversion to it in the human race. It is easy to imagine that the feeling of reluctance may have been overcome by other motives, such as hunger, revenge, the desire to acquire another person's courage or strength, the hope of making an enemy harmless, or of gaining supernatural benefits. And everybody knows that men and even many animals, when once induced to taste a certain food which they have previously avoided, often conceive a great liking for it. There is evidence that this also applies to cannibalism. In 1200 Egypt was afflicted with a terrible famine, in consequence of which the poor fed even upon human corpses and fell to devouring children. An eyewitness, the Arabian physician [(]Abd-Allatif, writes that, when the poor began to eat human flesh, the wonder and horror excited were such, that these crimes were in every mouth, and people were never weary of the extraordinary topic. But by degrees custom operated, and produced even a taste for such detestable repasts. Many men made children their ordinary food, eating them from pure gluttony and laying up stores of their flesh. Various modes of cooking and seasoning this kind of food were invented; and the practice soon spread through the provinces, so that there was not a single district in which cannibalism became not common. By this time it caused no longer either surprise or horror, and the matter was discussed with indifference. Diverse rich people, who could have procured other food, seemed to become infatuated, and practised cannibalism as a luxury, using murderers as their purveyors and inviting their friends to dinner, without taking too much trouble to conceal the truth.[145] There is a similar story from Polynesia. Cannibalism, we are told, was introduced into Futuna by king Veliteki in consequence of a great tempest which brought on a disastrous famine; but in time it became a dreadful scourge, which threatened to depopulate the island. The desire to eat human flesh arrived at such a point that wars no longer sufficed to {578} furnish victims in sufficient numbers, hence the people took to hunting down members of their own tribes.[146] It has been suggested that in other islands of the South Seas cannibalism likewise arose in times of great famine, and that the inhabitants, becoming used to it, acquired a taste for human flesh.[147] In Western Equatorial Africa, again, gastronomic cannibalism has been supposed to be a practical extension of the sacrificial ceremony, neither the women nor the young men being allowed to touch the dainty.[148] That such a practice may easily grow up when the beginning has been made, is well illustrated by the words of a cannibal chief who declared that he who has once indulged in a repast of human flesh will find it very difficult to abstain from it in the future.[149]

[Footnote 145: [(]Abd-Allatif, _Relation de l'Égypte_, p. 360 _sqq._]

[Footnote 146: Percy Smith, 'Futuna,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 37.]

[Footnote 147: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 196 _sq._ Powell, _Wanderings in a Wild Country_, p. 248.]

[Footnote 148: Reade, _op. cit._ p. 158.]

[Footnote 149: Powell, _op. cit._ p. 248.]

The question whether early man was in the habit of eating human flesh may thus, I think, be resolved into the question whether his natural shrinking from it may be assumed to have been subdued by any of those factors which in certain circumstances have induced men to become habitual cannibals. For such an assumption I find no sufficient grounds. On the contrary, I maintain that it is made highly improbable by the fact that cannibalism is much less prevalent among the lowest savages than among races somewhat more advanced in culture.[150] In America, instead of being confined to savage peoples, it was practised "to a greater extent and with more horrible rites among the most civilised. Its religious inception," Mr. Dorman adds, "was the cause of this."[151] Humboldt observed long ago:--"The nations who hold it a point of honour to devour their prisoners are not always the rudest and most ferocious . . . . The Cabres, the Guipunavis, and the Caribees, have {579} always been more powerful and more civilised than the other hordes of the Oroonoko; and yet the former are as much addicted to anthropophagy, as the last are repugnant to it."[152] In Brazil, Martius found the cannibalism of the Central Tupis to form a strange contrast to their relatively high state of culture.[153] Cannibals like the Fijians and Maoris were on the verge of semi-civilisation, and the Bataks of Sumatra were already in early times so advanced as to frame an alphabet of their own, though after the Indian model. Among the African Niam-Niam and Monbuttu a great predilection for human flesh coexists with a remarkable degree of culture; whereas in the dwarf tribes of Central Africa, which are of a very low type, Mr. Burrows never heard of a single case of cannibalism.[154]

[Footnote 150: See Peschel, _Races of Man_, p. 162 _sq._; Schneider, _Die Naturvölker_, i. 186; Bergemann, _op. cit._ p. 53; Ratzel, _op. cit._ ii. 352; Sutherland, _Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct_, i. 372.]

[Footnote 151: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 152.]

[Footnote 152: von Humboldt, _op. cit._ v. 424 _sq._]

[Footnote 153: von Martius, _op. cit._ i. 199 _sq._]

[Footnote 154: Burrows, _Land of the Pigmies_, p. 149.]

It would be very instructive to follow the history of cannibalism among those peoples who are, or have lately been, addicted to it, if we were able to do so; but the subject is mostly obscure. The most common change which we have had an opportunity to notice is the decline and final disappearance of the practice under European influence; but we must not assume that every change has been in the direction towards extinction. Among the East African Wadoe and Wabembe cannibalism is, according to their own account, of modern origin.[155] Mr. Torday informs me that among some of the Congo natives it is spreading in the present day. In the Solomon Islands it has recently extended itself; it is asserted by the elder natives of Florida that man's flesh was formerly never eaten except in sacrifice, and that human sacrifice is an innovation introduced from further west.[156] Erskine maintains that in Fiji cannibalism, though a very ancient custom, did not prevail in earlier times to the same extent as it did more recently;[157] and Mr. Fornander has arrived {580} at the conclusion that among the Polynesians this practice was not an original heirloom brought with them from their primitive homes in the Far West, but was adopted subsequently by a few of the tribes under conditions and circumstances now unknown.[158] For various reasons, then, it is an illegitimate supposition to regard the cannibalism of modern savages as a survival from the first infancy of mankind, or, more generally, from a stage through which the whole human race has passed.

[Footnote 155: Burton, _Two Trips to Gorilla Land_, i. 214.]

[Footnote 156: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 343.]

[Footnote 157: Erskine, _op. cit._ p. 272.]

[Footnote 158: Fornander, _Account of the Polynesian Race_, i. 132.]

As for the moral opinions about cannibalism, we may assume that peoples who abstain from it also generally disapprove of it, or would do so if they were aware of its being practised. Aversion, as we have often noticed, leads to moral indignation, especially where the moral judgment is little influenced by reflection. Another source of the condemnation of cannibalism may be sympathetic resentment resulting from the idea that the dead is annihilated or otherwise injured by the act, or from the feeling that it is an insult to him to use his body as an article of food; but this could certainly not be the origin of savages disapproval of eating their foes. Among civilised races, as well as among non-anthropophagous savages, horror or disgust is undoubtedly the chief reason why cannibalism is condemned as wrong. This emotion is often so intense that the same people whose moral feelings are little affected by a conquest, with all its horrors, made for the purpose of gain, shudder at the stories of wars waged by famished savages for the purpose of procuring human flesh for food. On the other hand, where the natural aversion to such food is for some reason or other overcome, the disapproval of cannibalism is in consequence no longer felt. But an attitude of moral indifference towards this practice has also been advocated on a totally different ground, by persons whose moral emotions are too much tempered by thought to allow them to pronounce an act as wrong simply because it creates in them {581} disgust. Thus, Montaigne argued that it is more barbarous to torture a man to death under colour of piety and religion than to roast and eat him after he is dead.[159] And he quotes with apparent agreement the opinion of some Stoic philosophers that there is no harm in feeding upon human carcases to avoid starvation.[160]

[Footnote 159: Montaigne, _Essais_, i. 30.]

[Footnote 160: Diogenes Laertius, _Vitæ philosophorum_, vii. 1. 64 (121); vii. 7. 12 (188). Zeller, _Stoics_, p. 307.]

CHAPTER XLVII

THE BELIEF IN SUPERNATURAL BEINGS

WE now come to the last of those six groups of moral ideas into which we have divided our subject--ideas concerning conduct towards beings, real or imaginary, that are regarded as supernatural. But before we enter upon a discussion of human behaviour in relation to such beings, it is necessary to say some words about man's belief in their existence and the general qualities attributed to them.

Men distinguish between two classes of phenomena--"natural" and "supernatural,"[1] between phenomena which they are familiar with and, in consequence, ascribe to "natural causes," and other phenomena which seem to them unfamiliar, mysterious, and are therefore supposed to spring from causes of a "supernatural" character. We meet with this distinction at the lowest stages of culture known to us, as well as at higher stages. It may be that in the mind of a savage the natural and supernatural are often confused, and that no definite limit can be drawn between the phenomena which he refers to the one class and those which he refers to the other; but he certainly sees a difference between events of everyday occurrence or ordinary objects of nature and other events or objects which fill him with mysterious awe. The germ of such a {583} distinction is found even in the lower animal world. The horse fears the whip but it does not make him shy; on the other hand, he may shy when he sees an umbrella opened before him or a paper moving on the ground. The whip is well known to the horse, whereas the moving paper or umbrella is strange and uncanny. Dogs and cats are alarmed by an unusual noise or appearance, and remain uneasy till they have by examination satisfied themselves of the nature of its cause.[2] Professor Romanes frightened a dog by attaching a fine thread to a bone and surreptitiously drawing it from the animal, giving to the bone the appearance of self-movement; and the same dog was frightened by soap-bubbles.[3] Even a lion is scared by an unexpected noise or the sight of an unfamiliar object; a horse, the lion's favourite prey, has been known to wander for days in the vicinity of a troop of these animals and be left unmolested simply because it was blanketed and knee-haltered.[4] And we are told of a tiger which stood trembling and roaring in an ecstasy of fear when a mouse tied by a string to a stick had been inserted into its cage.[5] Little children are apt to be terrified by the strange and irregular behaviour of a feather as it glides along the floor or lifts itself into the air.[6]

[Footnote 1: I do not share the objections raised by various writers to the term "supernatural." It has the sanction of common usage; and I consider it preferable to the word "superhuman," when applied to inanimate things or animals which are objects of worship.]

[Footnote 2: Morgan, _Animal Life and Intelligence_, p. 339.]

[Footnote 3: Romanes, _Animal Intelligence_, 455 _sq._]

[Footnote 4: Gillmore, quoted by King, _The Supernatural_, p. 80.]

[Footnote 5: Basil Hall, quoted _ibid._ p. 81. See also _ibid._ p. 78 _sqq._; Vignioli, _Myth and Science_, p. 58 _sqq._]

[Footnote 6: Sully, _Studies of Childhood_, p. 205 _sq._]

But the primitive mind not only distinguishes between the natural and the supernatural, it makes, practically, yet a further distinction. The supernatural, like the natural, may be looked upon in the light of mechanical energy, which discharges itself without the aid of any volitional activity. This is, for instance, the case with the supernatural force inherent in a tabooed object; mere contact with such an object communicates the taboo infection. So also the baneful energy in a curse is originally conceived as a kind of supernatural miasma, which injures or destroys anybody to whom it cleaves; in fact, to {584} taboo a certain thing commonly consists in charging it with a curse. On the other hand, supernatural qualities may also be attributed to the mental constitution of animate beings, especially to their will. Such an attribution makes them supernatural beings, as distinct from any ordinary individuals who, without being endowed with special miraculous gifts, may make use of supernatural mechanical energy in magical practices. This distinction is in many cases vague; a wizard may be looked upon as a god and a god as a wizard. But it is nevertheless essential, and is at the bottom of the difference between religion and magic. Religion may be defined as a belief in and a regardful[7] attitude towards a supernatural being on whom man feels himself dependent and to whose will he makes an appeal in his worship. Supernatural mechanical power, on the other hand, is applied in magic. He who performs a purely magical act utilises such power without making any appeal at all to the will of a supernatural being.[8]

[Footnote 7: Though somewhat indefinite, the epithet "regardful" seems a necessary attribute of a religious act. We do not call it religion when a savage flogs his fetish to make it submissive.]

[Footnote 8: See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

This, I think, is what we generally understand by religion and magic. But in the Latin word _religio_ there seems to be no indication of such a distinction. _Religio_ is probably related to _religare_, which means "to tie." It is commonly assumed that the relationship between these words implies that in religion man was supposed to be tied by his god. But I venture to believe that the connection between them allows of another and more natural interpretation--that it was not the man who was tied by the god, but the god who was tied by the man. This interpretation was suggested to me by certain ideas and practices prevalent in Morocco. The Moors are in the habit of tying rags to objects belonging to a _síyid_, that is, a place where a saint has, or is supposed to have, his grave, or where such a person is said to have sat or camped. In very many cases, at least, this tying of rags is _[(]âr_ upon the {585} saint, and _l-[(]âr_ implies the transference of a conditional curse.[9] Thus, in the Great Atlas Mountains I found a large number of rags tied to a pole which was stuck in a cairn dedicated to the great saint Mûlai [(]Abd-[)u]l-[k.]âder, and when I asked for an explanation the answer was that petitioners generally fasten a strip of their clothes to the pole muttering some words like these:--"O saint, behold! I promised thee an offering, and I will not release (literally 'open') thee until thou attendest to my business." If the petitioner's wish is fulfilled he goes back to the place, offers the sacrifice which he promised, and unties the knot which he made. A Berber servant of mine from Aglu in Sûs told me that once when in prison he invoked Lälla R[)a][h.]ma Yusf, a great female saint whose tomb is in a neighbouring district, and tied his turban, saying, "I am tying thee, Lälla R[)a][h.]ma Yusf, and I am not going to open the knot till thou hast helped me." Or a person in distress will go to her grave and knot the leaves of some palmetto growing in its vicinity, with the words, "I tied thee here, O saint, and I shall not release thee unless thou releasest me from the toils in which I am at present." All this is what we should call magic, but the Romans would probably have called it _religio_. They were much more addicted to magic than to true religion; they wanted to compel the gods rather than to be compelled by them. Their _religio_ was probably nearly akin to the Greek [Greek: kata/desmos], which meant not only an ordinary tie, but also a magic tie or knot or a bewitching thereby.[10] Plato speaks of persons who with magical arts and incantations bound the gods, as they said, to execute their will.[11] That _religio_, however, from having originally a magical significance, {586} has come to be used in the sense which we attribute to the term "religion," is not difficult to explain. Men make use of magic not only in relation to their fellow men, but in relation to their gods. Magical and religious elements are often almost inseparably intermingled in one and the same act; and, as we shall soon see, the magical means of constraining a god are often externally very similar to the chief forms of religious worship, prayer and sacrifice.

[Footnote 9: See Westermarck, '_L-[(]âr_, or the Transference of Conditional Curses in Morocco,' in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_, p. 361 _sqq._]

[Footnote 10: I am indebted to my friend Mr. R. R. Marett for drawing my attention to this meaning of the word [Greek: kata/desmos]. So also the verb [Greek: katade/ô] means not only "to tie" but "to bind by magic knots" (Athenaeus, _Deipnosophistæ_, xv. 9, p. 670; Dio Cassius, _Historia Romana_, l. 5), and [Greek: kata/desis] is used to denote "a binding by magic knots" (Plato, _Leges_, xi. 933). See Liddell-Scott, _Greek-English Lexicon_, p. 754; Harrison, _Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion_, p. 138 _sqq._]

[Footnote 11: Plato, _Respublica_, ii. 364.]

That mystery is the essential characteristic of supernatural beings is proved by innumerable facts. It is testified by language. The most prominent belief in the religion of the North American Indians was their theory of _manitou_, that is, of "a spiritual and mysterious power thought to reside in some material form." The word is Algonkin, but all the tribes had some equivalent for it.[12] Thus the Dacotahs express the essential attribute of their deities by the term _wakan_, which signifies anything which they cannot comprehend, "whatever is wonderful, mysterious, superhuman, or supernatural."[13] The Navaho word _d[)i]g[)i]'n_ likewise means "sacred, divine, mysterious, or holy";[14] and so does the Hidatsa term _mahopa_.[15] In Fiji "the native word expressive of divinity is _kalou_, which, while used to denote the people's highest notion of a god, is also constantly heard as a qualification of anything great or marvellous."[16] The Maoris of New Zealand applied the word _atua_, which is generally translated as "god," not only to spirits of every description, but to various phenomena not understood, such as menstruation and foreign marvels, a compass for instance, or a barometer.[17] The natives of Madagascar, {587} says Ellis, designate by the term _ndriamanitra_, or god, everything that exceeds the capacity of their understanding. "Whatever is new and useful and extraordinary, is called god. . . . Rice, money, thunder and lightning, and earthquakes, are all called god. . . . _Taratasy_, or book, they call god, from its wonderful capacity of speaking by merely looking at it."[18] The Monbuttu use the word _kilima_ for anything they do not understand--the thunder, a shadow, the reflection in water, as well as the supreme being in which they vaguely believe.[19] The Masai conception of the deity (_ng[)a]i_), says Dr. Thomson, "seems to be marvellously vague. I was Ng[)a]i. My language was Ng[)a]i. Ng[)a]i was in the steaming holes. . . . In fact, whatever struck them as strange or incomprehensible, that they at once assumed had some connection with Ng[)a]i."[20] Mr. and Mrs. Hinde use "the Unknown" as their equivalent of the word _ng[)a]i_.[21]

[Footnote 12: Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 226. Parkman, _Jesuits in North America_, p. lxxix. Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 102. Hoffman, 'Menomini Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xiv. 39, n. 1.]

[Footnote 13: Schoolcraft, _Archives of Aboriginal Knowledge_, iv. 642. Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 366. McGee, 'Siouan Indians,' _ibid._ xv. 182 _sq._]

[Footnote 14: Matthews, _Navaho Legends_, p. 37.]

[Footnote 15: _Idem_, _Hidatsa Indians_, p. 47 _sq._]

[Footnote 16: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 183.]

[Footnote 17: Best, 'Lore of the Whare-Kohanga,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xiv. 210. Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 116, 118. The word _tupua_ (or _tipua_) is used in a very similar way (Tregear, _Maori-Polynesian Comparative Dictionary_, p. 557).]

[Footnote 18: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 390 _sqq._]

[Footnote 19: Burrows, _Land of the Pigmies_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 20: Thomson, _Through Masai Land_, p. 260.]

[Footnote 21: Hinde, _Last of the Masai_, p. 99.]

The testimony of language is corroborated by kindred facts referring to the nature of those objects which are most commonly worshipped.[22] Among all the American tribes, says Mr. Dorman, "any remarkable features in natural scenery or dangerous places became objects of superstitious dread and veneration, because they were supposed to be abodes of gods."[23] A great cataract, a difficult and dangerous ford in a river, a spring bubbling up from the ground, a volcano, a high mountain, an isolated rock, a curious or unusually large tree, the bones of the mastodon or of some other immense animal--all were looked upon by the Indians with superstitious respect {588} or were propitiated by offerings.[24] In Fiji "every object that is specially fearful, or vicious, or injurious, or novel," is eligible for admission to the native Pantheon.[25] It is said that when the Aëtas of the Philippines saw the first locomotive passing through their country "they all fell upon their knees in abject terror, worshipping the strange monster as some new and powerful deity."[26] Of the shamanistic peoples in Siberia Georgi writes, "All the celestial bodies, and all terrestrial objects of a considerable magnitude, all the phenomena of nature that can do good or harm, every appearance capable of conveying terror into a weak and superstitious mind, are so many gods to whom they direct a particular adoration."[27] Among the Samoyedes "a curiously twisted tree, a stone with an uncommon shape would receive, and in some quarters still receives, not only veneration but actual ceremonial worship."[28] Castrén states that the Ostyaks worshipped no other objects of nature but such as were very unusual and peculiar either in shape or quality.[29] The Lapps made offerings not only to large and strange-looking objects, but to places which were difficult to pass, or where some accident had occurred, or where they had been either exceptionally unlucky or exceptionally lucky in fishing or the chase.[30] The Ainu of Japan deify all objects and phenomena which seem to them extraordinary or dreadful.[31] In China "a steep mountain, or any mountain at all remarkable, is supposed to have a special local spirit, who acts as guardian."[32] The average middle-class Hindu, according to Sir Alfred Lyall, worships stocks or stones which are unusual or grotesque in size, shape, or position; or inanimate things which are gifted with mysterious {589} motion; or animals which he fears; or visible things, animate or inanimate, which are directly or indirectly useful and profitable or which possess any incomprehensible function or property.[33] From all parts of Africa we hear of similar cults.[34] The Negroes of Sierra Leone dedicate to their spirits places which "inspire the spectator with awe, or are remarkable for their appearance, as immensely large trees rendered venerable by age, rocks appearing in the midst of rivers, and having something peculiar in their form, in short, whatever appears to them strange or uncommon."[35] When Tshi-speaking natives of the Gold Coast take up their abode near any remarkable natural feature or object, they worship and seek to propitiate its indwelling spirit; whereas they do not worship any of the heavenly bodies, the regularity of whose appearance makes little impression upon their minds.[36] Throughout East Africa the people seem to attach religious sanctity to anything of extraordinary size; in the island of Zanzibar, where the hills are low, they reverence the baobab tree, which is the largest growing there, and in all parts of the country where hills are not found they worship some great stone or tall tree.[37] In Morocco places of striking appearance are generally supposed to be haunted by _jnûn_ (_jinn_) or are associated with some dead saint.[38] As I have elsewhere tried to show, the Arabic _jinn_ were probably "beings invented to explain what seems to fall outside the ordinary pale of nature, the wonderful and unexpected, the superstitious imaginations of men who fear";[39] and the saint was in many cases only the successor of the _jinn_. Indeed, the superstitious dread of unusual objects is not altogether dead even among ourselves.{590} It survives in England to this day in the habit of ascribing grotesque and striking landmarks or puzzling antiquities to the Devil, who became the residuary legatee of obsolete pagan superstitions in Christian countries.[40]

[Footnote 22: See, besides the instances referred to below, Karsten, _Origin of Worship_, p. 14 _sqq._; von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 220 (Bataks); _Mitteil. d. Geograph. Gesellsch. zu Jena_, iii. 14 (Bannavs, between Siam and Annam). In Lord Kames's _Essays on the Principles of Morality and Religion_ there is (p. 309 _sqq._) an interesting discussion on the dread of unknown objects.]

[Footnote 23: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 300. See also Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, i. 52; Harmon, _Voyages and Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 363 _sq._; Smith, 'Myths of the Iroquois,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ii. 51.]

[Footnote 24: Dorman, _op. cit._ pp. 279, 290, 291, 302, 303, 308, 313-315, 319. Chamberlain, in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, i. 157 (Mississagua Indians). Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 237 _sq._ (Aleuts.)]

[Footnote 25: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 183.]

[Footnote 26: Lala, _Philippine Islands_, p. 96.]

[Footnote 27: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 256.]

[Footnote 28: Jackson, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 398. _Cf._ Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, iii. 230.]

[Footnote 29: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 227.]

[Footnote 30: _Ibid._ iii. 210. Högström, _Beskrifning öfver de til Sveriges Krona lydande Lapmarker_, p. 182. Leem, _Beskrivelse over Finmarkens Lapper_, p. 442 _sq._ Friis, _Lappish Mythologi_, p. 133 _sq._]

[Footnote 31: Sugamata, quoted in _L'Anthropologie_, x. 98.]

[Footnote 32: Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 221.]

[Footnote 33: Lyall, _Asiatic Studies_, p. 7.]

[Footnote 34: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 388 (Mpongwe). Mockler-Ferryman, _British Nigeria_, p. 255. Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, p. 340 (Hottentots).]

[Footnote 35: Winterbottom, _Native Africans of Sierra Leone_, i. 223.]

[Footnote 36: Ellis, _Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 282. _Idem_, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 21.]

[Footnote 37: Chanler, _Through Jungle and Desert_, p. 188.]

[Footnote 38: See Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_, _passim_.]

[Footnote 39: _Idem_, 'Nature of the Arab _[vG]inn_,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxix. 268.]

[Footnote 40: Lyall, _op. cit._ p. 9.]

The common prevalence of animal worship is no doubt due to the mysteriousness of the animal world; the most uncanny of all creatures, the serpent, is also the one most generally worshipped. Throughout India we meet with the veneration of animals which by their appearance or habits startle human beings.[41] In the Indian tribes of North America animals of an unusual size were objects of some kind of adoration.[42] In certain parts of Africa a cock crowing in the evening or a crane alighting on a house-top is regarded as supernatural.[43] White men have often been taken for spirits by red, yellow, or black savages, when seen by them for the first time.[44] Religious veneration is among various races bestowed on persons suffering from some abnormality, such as deformity, albinoism, or madness.[45] Some South American Indians "regard as divinities all phenomenal children, principally such as are born with a larger number of fingers or toes than is natural."[46] The Hindus venerate persons remarkable for any extraordinary qualities great valour, virtue, or even vice.[47] By performing miracles men directly prove that they are supernatural beings. The Muhammedan saints, like the Christian in olden days, are believed to perform all kinds of wonders, such as flying in the air, passing unhurt {591} through fire, walking upon water, transporting themselves in a moment of time to immense distances, or supporting themselves and others with food in desert places.[48] When Muhammed first claimed to be the Prophet of Allah, he was urged to give proof of his calling by working some miracle; and though he uniformly denied that he possessed such power, it was nevertheless ascribed to him even by his contemporaries.[49]

[Footnote 41: _Ibid._ p. 13.]

[Footnote 42: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 258. Harmon, _op. cit._ p. 364.]

[Footnote 43: Macdonald, _Religion and Myth_, p. 39.]

[Footnote 44: Avebury, _Origin of Civilisation_, pp. 272, 273, 375. Goblet d'Alviella, _Hibbert Lectures on the Origin and Growth of the Conception of God_, p. 67. Schultze, _Fetischismus_, p. 224. In Australia and elsewhere white people were taken for ghosts by the natives (Fison and Howitt, _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_, p. 248; Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, ii. 269 _sq._; Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 5 _sq._; Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 170 _sq._).]

[Footnote 45: Schultze, _op. cit._ p. 222. _Supra_, i. 270 _sq._ "Among many savage or barbarous peoples of the world albinos have been reserved for the priestly office"

(Bourke, 'Medicine-Men of the Apache,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 460).]

[Footnote 46: Guinnard, _Three Years' Slavery among the Patagonians_, p. 144.]

[Footnote 47: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 350. For criminal-worship in Sicily, see Peacock, 'Executed Criminals and Folk-Medicine,' in _Folk-Lore_, vii. 275.]

[Footnote 48: Lane, _Arabian Society in the Middle Ages_, p. 49. Westermarck, 'Sul culto del santi nel Marocco,' in _Actes du XII. Congrès International des Orientalistes_, iii. 153 _sqq._ _Idem_, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness_, p. 77 _sqq._]

[Footnote 49: Muir, _Life of Mahomet_, i. p. lxv. _sq._ Bosworth Smith, _Mohammed and Mohammedanism_, p. 19. Sell, _Faith of Islám_, p. 218.]

The dead are objects of worship much more commonly than are the living. Whilst the human individual consisting of body and soul is as a rule well-known, the disembodied soul, seen only in dreams or visions, is a mysterious being which inspires the survivors with awe. Mr. Spencer and Mr. Grant Allen even regard the worship of the dead as "the root of every religion."[50] But this is to carry the ghost theory to an extreme for which there is no justification in facts. The spirits of the dead are worshipped because they are held capable of influencing, in a mysterious manner, the welfare of the living; but there is no reason to assume that they were originally conceived as the only supernatural agents existing. We have noticed that even the lower animals show signs of the same feeling as underlies the belief in supernatural beings; and we can hardly suppose that they are believers in ghosts.

[Footnote 50: Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 411. Grant Allen, _The Evolution of the Idea of God_, pp. 91, 433, 438, &c.]

On account of their wonderful effects medicines, intoxicants, and stimulants, are frequently objects of veneration. Most of the plants for which the American Indians had superstitious feelings were such as have medical qualities;[51] tobacco was generally held sacred by them,[52] and so was cocoa in Peru.[53] The Vedic deification {592} of the drink _soma_ was due to its exhilarating and invigorating effects.[54]

[Footnote 51: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 298 _sq._ Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 428.]

[Footnote 52: Mooney, 'Myths of the Cherokee,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xix. 439. Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 295.]

[Footnote 53: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 295.]

[Footnote 54: Whitney, 'Vedic Researches in Germany,' in _Jour. American Oriental Soc._ iii. 299. Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 108.]

Among all the phenomena of nature none is more wonderful, impressive, awe-inspiring than thunder, and none seems more generally to have given rise to religious veneration. But with growing reflection man finds a mystery even in events of daily occurrence. The Vedic poet, when he sees the sun moving freely through the heavens, asks how it comes that it does not fall downward, although "unpropped beneath, not fastened firm, and downward turned";[55] and it seems to him a miracle that the sparkling waters of all rivers flow into one ocean without ever filling it.[56] "Verily," says the Koran, "in the creation of the heavens and the earth, and in the succession of night and day, are signs to those possessed of minds."[57]

[Footnote 55: _Rig-Veda_, iv. 13. 5.]

[Footnote 56: _Ibid._ v. 85. 6.]

[Footnote 57: _Koran_, iii. 87.]

The attribution of miraculous power to a certain object or being may be due to direct experience of some effect produced by it, as in the case of a medical plant, or a poisonous snake, or a miracle-working spring, or a Christian or Muhammedan saint. Or it may be based on the inference that objects with a strange and mysterious appearance also possess strange and mysterious powers. This inference, too, is in a way supported by facts. The unusual appearance of the object makes an impression on the person who sees it, and predisposes him to the belief that the object is endowed with secret powers. If then anything unusual actually happens in its neighbourhood or shortly after it has been seen, the strange event is attributed to the influence of the strange object. Thus a Siberian tribe came to regard the camel as the small-pox demon because, just when the animal had appeared among them for the first time with a passing caravan, the small-pox broke out.[58] Of the British Guiana Indian we are {593} told by Sir E. F. Im Thurn that if his eye falls upon a rock in any way abnormal or curious, and if shortly after any evil happens to him, he regards rock and evil as cause and effect, and perceives a spirit in the rock.[59] With the lapse of time the data of experience readily increase. If a certain object has gained the reputation of being supernatural, it is looked upon as the cause of all kinds of unusual events which may possibly be associated with it. When I visited the large cave Imi-nta[k.][k.]ándut in the Great Atlas Mountains, the interior of which is said to contain a whole spirit city, my horse happened to stumble on my way back to my camp, and fell upon one of my servants who was carrying a gun. The gun was broken and the man became lame for some days. I was told that the accident was caused by the cave spirits, because they were displeased at my visit. When the following day I again passed the cave with my little caravan, heavy rain began to fall; and now the rain was attributed to the ill-temper of the spirits.

[Footnote 58: Tiele, _Elements of the Science of Religion_, i. 70.]

[Footnote 59: Im Thurn, _Indians of Guiana_, p. 354.]

Startling events are ascribed to the activity not only of visible, but of invisible supernatural agents. Thus sudden or strange diseases are, at the lower stages of civilisation, commonly supposed to be occasioned by a supernatural being, which has taken up its abode in the sick person's body, or otherwise sent the disease.[60] Among the Maoris, for instance, "each disease was supposed to be occasioned by a different god, who resided in the part affected."[61] The Australian Kurnai maintain that phthisis, pneumonia, bowel complaints, and insanity are produced by an evil spirit, "who is like the wind."[62] According to Moorish beliefs convulsions, epileptic or paralytic fits, rheumatic or neuralgic pains, and certain rare and violent epidemics, like the cholera, are caused by spirits, which either strike their victim, or enter his body, or sometimes, in the case of an epidemic, shoot at the {594} people with poisonous arrows. Indeed, unexpected events of every kind are readily ascribed to supernatural influence, in Morocco and elsewhere. Among the North American Indians "the storms and tempests were generally thought to be produced by aërial spirits from hostile lands."[63] Among the Hudson Bay Indians "everything not understood is attributed to the working of one of the numerous spirits."[64] "Dans toute l'Afrique," says M. Duveyrier in his description of the Touareg, "il n'y a pas un individu, éclairé ou ignare, instruit ou illettré, qui n'attribue aux génies tout ce qui arrive d'extraordinaire sur la terre."[65] Of the South African natives Livingstone writes, "Everything not to be accounted for by common causes, whether of good or evil, is ascribed to the Deity."[66] With the progress of science the chain of natural causes is extended, and, as Livy puts it, it is left to superstition alone to see the interference of the deity in trifling matters. Among ourselves the ordinary truths of science are so generally recognised that in this domain God is seldom supposed to interfere. On the other hand, with regard to social events, the causes of which are often hidden, the idea of Providence is still constantly needed to fill up the gap of human ignorance.

[Footnote 60: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 146 _sqq._ Schneider, _Die Naturvölker_, i. 217. Bartels, _Die Medicin der Naturvölker_, p. 27 _sqq._ Höfler, 'Krankheits-Dämonen,' in _Archiv für Religionswissenschaft_, ii. 86 _sqq._ Karsten, _op. cit._ p. 27 _sqq._]

[Footnote 61: Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, p. 137.]

[Footnote 62: Fison and Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 250.]

[Footnote 63: Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 350.]

[Footnote 64: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 272.]

[Footnote 65: Duveyrier, _Exploration du Sahara_, p. 418. See also Schneider, _Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 103.]

[Footnote 66: Livingstone, _Expedition to the Zambesi_, p. 521 _sq._]

Man's belief in supernatural agents, then, is an attempt to explain strange and mysterious phenomena which suggest a volitional cause.[67] The assumed cause is the will of a supernatural being. Such beings are thus, in the first place, conceived as volitional. But a being which has a will must have a mind, with emotions, desires, and a certain amount of intelligence. Neither the savage nor ourselves can imagine a volitional being {595} which has nothing but a will. If an object of nature, therefore, is looked upon as a supernatural agent, mentality and life are at the same time attributed to it as a matter of course. This I take to be the real origin of animism. It is not correct to say that "as the objects of the visible world are conceived as animated, volitional, and emotional, they may be deemed the originators of those misfortunes of which the true cause is unknown."[68] This is to reverse the actual order of ideas. Inanimate things are conceived as volitional, emotional, and animate, _because_ they are deemed the originators of startling events. The savage does not speculate upon the nature of things unless he has an interest in doing so. He is not generally inquisitive as to causes.[69] The natives of West Australia, says Eyre, "are not naturally a reasoning people, and by no means given to the investigation of causes or their effects."[70] In matters not concerning the common wants of life the mind of the Brazilian Indian is a blank.[71] When Mungo Park asked some negroes, what became of the sun during the night? they considered his question a very childish one; "they had never indulged a conjecture, nor formed any hypothesis, about the matter."[72] I often found the Beduins of Morocco extremely curious, but their curiosity consisted in the question, What? rather than in the question, Why?

[Footnote 67: Already Hobbes (_Leviathan_, i. 12, p. 79) traced, in part, the origin of religion to the fact that when man cannot assure himself of the true causes of things, he supposes causes of them. See also Meiners, _Geschichte der Religionen_, i. 16.]

[Footnote 68: Peschel, _Races of Man_, p. 245.]

[Footnote 69: _Cf._ Spencer, _Principles of Sociology_, i. 86 _sq._; Karsten, _op. cit._ p. 43 _sq._]

[Footnote 70: Eyre, _Expeditions of Discovery into Central Australia_, ii. 355.]

[Footnote 71: Bates, _The Naturalist on the River Amazons_, ii. 163.]

[Footnote 72: Mungo Park, _Travels in the Interior of Africa_, i. 413.]

Whilst belief in supernatural agents endowed with a will made the savage an animist, the idea that a mind presupposes a body, when thought out, led to anthropomorphism. Impossible as it is to imagine a will without a mind, it is hardly less impossible to imagine a mind without a body. The immaterial soul is an abstraction to which has been attributed a metaphysical reality, but of which no clear conception can be formed. As Hobbes observed, the opinion that spirits are incorporeal or immaterial, "could {596} never enter into the mind of any man by nature; because, though men may put together words . . . . as _Spirit_ and _Incorporeall_; yet they can never have the imagination of anything answering to them."[73] Descartes himself frankly confessed, "What the soul itself was I either did not stay to consider, or, if I did, I imagined that it was something extremely rare and subtile, like wind, or flame, or ether, spread through my grosser parts."[74] The supernatural agents were consequently of necessity considered to possess a more or less material constitution. The disembodied human soul which the savage saw in dreams or visions, in the shadow or the reflection, was only the least material being which he could imagine; and when raised to the dignity of an ancestor-god, it by no means lost its materiality, but, on the contrary, tended to acquire a more substantial body.

[Footnote 73: Hobbes, _op. cit._ i. 12, p. 80.]

[Footnote 74: Descartes, _Meditationes_, 2, p. 10.]

Of a grosser substantiality and very unlike the human shape are the inanimate objects of nature which receive divine veneration. It has been said of savages that they do not worship the thing itself, only the spirit dwelling in it. But such a distinction cannot be primitive. The natural object is worshipped because it is believed to possess supernatural power, but it is nevertheless the object itself that is worshipped.[75] Castrén, who combined great personal experience with unusual acuteness of judgment, states that the Samoyedes do not know of any spirits attached to objects of nature, but worship the objects as such; "in other words, they do not separate the spirit from the matter, but adore the thing in its totality as a divine being."[76] Of the deification of the Nerbudda river Sir W. H. Sleeman likewise observes, "As in the case of the Ganges, it is the river itself to whom they address themselves, and not to any deity residing in it, or presiding over it--the stream itself is the deity which fills their imaginations, and receives their {597} homage."[77] The animist who endows an inanimate object with a soul regards the visible thing itself as its body.[78] How a being with such a body, like a tree or a stone, can hear the words of men, can see their doings, and can partake of the food they offer, might be difficult to explain--if it had to be explained. But, as I have said, the inquisitiveness of savage curiosity does not go to the roots of things, and religion is in its essence mystery.

[Footnote 75: _Cf._ Tiele, _Max Müller und Fritz Schultze über ein Problem der Religionswissenschaft_, p. 35; Parkman, _op. cit._ p. lxvii. (North American Indians).]

[Footnote 76: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 192. _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 161, 200 _sq._]

[Footnote 77: Sleeman, _Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official_, i. 20.]

[Footnote 78: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 164 _sq._]

However, in proportion as a supernatural being comes more and more to occupy the thoughts of its worshippers and to stir their imagination, a more distinct personality is attributed to it; and at length neither the ethereal or vaporous materiality of a departed human soul, nor the crude substantiality of an inanimate object is considered a satisfactory body for such a being. It is humanised also with regard to its essential shape. The Koriaks of Siberia believe "that objects and phenomena of nature conceal an anthropomorphic substance underneath their outer forms"; but they also show the first signs of a belief in spiritual owners or masters ruling over certain classes of things or over large objects.[79] The supernatural being which is originally embodied in a natural phenomenon is gradually placed behind it. In the Vedic hymns we may study this anthropomorphism as a process in growth. The true gods of the Veda are almost without exception the deified representatives of the phenomena or forces of nature,[80] which are personified, though in varying degrees. When the name of the god is the same as that of his natural basis, the personification has not yet advanced beyond the rudimentary stage; names like Dyaus ("heaven"), P[r.]thiv[=i] ("earth"), S[=u]rya ("sun"), U[s.]as ("dawn"), represent the double character of natural phenomena and of the personalities presiding over them. Speaking of the nature of the gods, the ancient Vedic interpreter Y[=a]ska remarks that "what is seen of the gods is certainly not {598} anthropomorphic, for example the sun, the earth, and so forth."[81] Again, when the name of the god is different from that of the physical substance he is supposed to inhabit, the anthropomorphism is more developed, though never very distinct. The Vedic people always recognised behind its gods the natural forces of which they were the expression, and their physical appearance often only represents aspects of their natural bases figuratively described to illustrate their activities. The sun is spoken of as the eye with which Varuna observes mankind;[82] or it is said that the all-seeing sun, rising from his abode, goes to the dwellings of Mitra and Varuna to report the deeds of men.[83] Even to this day the Hindu, to whatever sect he may belong, does homage to the rising sun every morning of his life by repeating a text of the Veda.[84] The god does not very readily change his old solid body for another which, though more respectable, has the disadvantage of being invisible. The simple unreflecting mind finds it easier to worship a material thing which may be seen, than a hidden god, however perfect in shape. To the common Japanese the sun is still the god to whom he prays morning and evening.[85] Whilst Chinese scholars declare that the sacrifice offered to Heaven "is assuredly not addressed to the material and sensible heaven, which our eyes see, but to the Master of heaven, earth, and all things,"[86] the people are less metaphysical; and the Russian peasant to this day makes an appeal to the Svarog of the old religion when crying, "Dost thou hear, O Sky? dost thou see, O Sky?"[87] That the worship of animals survives at comparatively late stages of civilisation is probably due to the double advantage of their bodies being both visible and animate.

[Footnote 79: Jochelson, 'Koryak Religion and Myth,' in _Jesup North Pacific Expedition_, vi. 115, 118.]

[Footnote 80: Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, p. 591 _sqq._]

[Footnote 81: _Nirukta_, vii. 4, quoted by Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 82: _Rig-Veda_, i. 50. 6. Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 67. _Cf._ _Rig-Veda_, i. 25. 10 _sq._; i. 136. 2.]

[Footnote 83: _Rig-Veda_, vii. 60. 1 _sq._ See Macdonell, _op. cit._ pp. 2, 15, 17, 23; Muir, _Original Sanskrit Texts_, v. 6; Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 178; Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, p. 591 _sqq._]

[Footnote 84: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 342.]

[Footnote 85: Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, p. 87.]

[Footnote 86: Legge, _Notions of the Chinese concerning God and Spirits_, p. 38.]

[Footnote 87: Ralston, _Songs of the Russian People_, p. 362.]

{599} But though man created his gods in his own image and likeness, endowing them with a mind and a body modelled after his own, he never lost sight of the difference between him and them. He always ascribed to them a superior power of action; otherwise they would have been no gods at all. In many cases, at least, he also attributed to them a superior knowledge. The Bechuanas maintain that their gods are much wiser than they are themselves.[88] In the admonitions of an Aztek mother to her daughter reference is made to a god who "sees every secret fault."[89] The gods of the Greeks and Romans were possessed of superhuman wisdom,[90] and so was Yahveh. It is true that the anthropomorphic god acquires knowledge of the affairs of men through his senses. When hearing the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah, Yahveh said, "I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know."[91] But the senses of a god are generally superior to those of a man. "A god," says Orestes, "can hear even from a distance."[92] Varuna has an all-seeing eye, and the Zoroastrian Mithra has a thousand ears and ten thousand eyes.[93] In other respects, also, the bodies of gods excel the bodies of men. Sometimes they are more beautiful, sometimes they have a gigantic shape. When Ares is felled to the ground by the stone flung by Athene, his body covers seven roods of land. [94] When Here takes a solemn oath, she grasps the earth with one hand and the sea with the other.[95] In three steps Poseidon goes an immense distance;[96] in three paces Vishnu traverses earth, air, and sky.[97]

[Footnote 88: Arbousset and Daumas, _Exploratory Tour to the North-East of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope_, p. 341.]

[Footnote 89: Sahagun, _Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España_, vi. 19, vol. ii. 131.]

[Footnote 90: _Cf._ Westcott, _Essays in the History of Religious Thought_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 91: _Genesis_, xviii. 20 _sq._]

[Footnote 92: Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 297.]

[Footnote 93: _Yasts_, x. 7.]

[Footnote 94: _Iliad_, xxi. 407.]

[Footnote 95: _Ibid._ xiv. 272 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: _Ibid._ xiii. 20.]

[Footnote 97: Grimm, _Teutonic Mythology_, i. 325.]

However, the tendency to make gods more and more {600} perfect--of which I shall say more in a following chapter--gradually led to the notion that materiality is a quality which is not becoming to a god; hence men endeavoured, to the best of their ability, to grasp the idea of a purely spiritual being, endowed with a will and even with human emotions, but without a material body. Like Xenophanes in Greece, the Inca Yupangui in Peru protested against the prevailing anthropomorphism, declaring that purely spiritual service was befitting the almighty creator, not tributes or sacrifices.[98] In the Bible we notice a successive transformation of the nature of the deity, from crude sensuousness to pure spirituality. According to the oldest traditions, Yahveh works and rests, he plants the garden of Eden, he walks in it in the cool of the day, and Adam and Eve hear his voice. In a great part of the Old Testament he is expressly bound by conditions of time and space. He is attached in an especial manner to the Jerusalem temple or some other shrine, and his favour is gained by definite modes of sacrifice. At the time of the Prophets the cruder anthropomorphisms of the earlier religion have been overcome; Yahveh is no longer seen in person, and by a prophet like Isaiah his residence in Zion is almost wholly dematerialised. Yet, as Professor Robertson Smith observes, not even Isaiah has risen to the full height of the New Testament conception that God, who is spirit and who is to be worshipped spiritually, makes no distinction of spot with regard to worship, and is equally near to receive men's prayers in every place.[99] Moslem theologians take pains to point out that God neither is begotten nor begets, and that he is without figure, form, colour, and parts. He hears all sounds, whether low or loud; but he hears without an ear. He sees all things, even the steps of a black ant on a black stone in a dark night; {601} but he has no eyes, as men have. He speaks; but not with a tongue, as men do.[100] He is endowed with knowledge, feelings, and a will.[101] Thus the dematerialised god still retains a mental constitution modelled upon the human soul, with all its bodily desires and imperfections removed, with its higher qualities indefinitely increased, and, above all, endowed with a supernatural power of action.

[Footnote 98: Brinton, _American Hero-Myths_, p. 236.]

[Footnote 99: Goblet d'Alviella, _op. cit._ p. 216. Toy, _Judaism and Christianity_, p. 87. Montefiore, _op. cit._ p. 424. Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 117.]

[Footnote 100: Risálah-i-Berkevi, quoted by Sell, _op. cit._ p. 166 _sq._]

[Footnote 101: Sell, _op. cit._ p. 185.]

In following chapters we shall see how the moral ideas of men have been influenced by the attributes they ascribe to supernatural beings.

CHAPTER XLVIII

DUTIES TO GODS

MEN not only believe in the existence of supernatural beings, but enter into frequent relations with them. In every religion we may distinguish between two elements: a belief, and a regardful attitude towards the object of this belief. At the same time the assumption that supernatural beings exist is not necessarily connected with religious veneration of them. Relations may be established with some of them to the exclusion of others. If the relations between man and a certain supernatural being are of a more or less permanent character, the latter is generally called his god.

As man attributes to his gods a variety of human qualities, his conduct towards them is in many respects determined by considerations similar to those which regulate his conduct towards his fellow men. He endows them with rights quite after human fashion, and imposes on himself corresponding duties.

Gods have the rights to life and bodily integrity. They are not necessarily either invulnerable or immortal.[1] According to ancient Egyptian beliefs, the life of a god is indeed longer than that of a man, but death puts an end to the one as well as to the other.[2] The Vedic gods were mortal at first; immortality was only bestowed upon them by Savitr or by Agni, or they obtained it by drinking {603} _soma_, or by practising continence and austerity, or by the performance of certain ceremonies.[3]

Nor were the Greek gods eternal by nature; they secured immortality by feasting on nectar and ambrosia.[4] The Scandinavian gods had in Idun's apples a means of preserving perpetual freshness and youth; but for all that they were subject to the encroachments of age, and their death is spoken of without disguise.[5]

[Footnote 1: See Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 1 _sqq._]

[Footnote 2: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 173. _Cf._ Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 111; Erman, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 265.]

[Footnote 3: Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 17. Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, p. 176.]

[Footnote 4: _Iliad_, v. 339 _sqq._ _Odyssey_, v. 199. _Cf._ Grimm, _Teutonic Mythology_, i. 317 _sq._]

[Footnote 5: Grimm, _op. cit._ i. 318 _sqq._]

Though liable to death, the invisible anthropomorphic gods generally run little risk of being killed by men. But the case is different with such supernatural beings as live on earth in a visible and destructible shape. They may be, and occasionally are, slain by human hands, although in this case killing hardly means absolute destruction, the soul surviving the death of the body. But to kill such a being is in ordinary circumstances looked upon as a dangerous act. We have noticed above that people are often reluctant to slay animals of certain species for fear lest either the disembodied spirit of the slain animal or others of its kind should avenge the injury;[6] and the danger is naturally increased when the victim and its whole species are regarded as divine. Savages as a rule avoid killing animals of their own totem, and various statements imply that the act is disapproved of.[7]

[Footnote 6: _Supra_, ii. 491.]

[Footnote 7: Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 7 _sqq._; _Idem_, _Totemism and Exogamy_, iv. 6 _sq._]

It has been suggested that this regard for the life of a totemic animal is due to the notion that a man is akin to his totem.[8] But the various taboos imposed upon him with reference to it, and the nature of the penalties incurred by the taboo-breaker,[9] indicate that the relation between a human individual and the animal members of his totem are after all somewhat different from that between cousins. It seems that the totemic animal is in {604} the first place looked upon as a supernatural being, and that a person's attitude towards it depends on the degree of dread or veneration which he feels for it. Such sacred animals as are not conceived to be of one stock with their devotees are equally tabooed; in ancient Egypt, we are told, offences against holy animals were punished even with death.[10] On the other hand, so little respect is not seldom felt for the totem that it is treated in a way to which there is no parallel in the treatment of human relatives. Speaking of the native tribes of Central Australia, Messrs. Spencer and Gillen observe, "That the totemic animal or plant is not regarded exactly as a close relative, whom it would be wrong to kill, or to assist any one else to kill, is very evident; on the contrary, the members of one totem not only, as it were, give their permission to those who are not of the totem to kill and eat the totemic animal or plant, but . . . they will actually help in the destruction of their totems."[11] The South Australian Narrinyeri kill their totemic animals if they are good for food.[12] A Bechuana will kill his totem if it be a hurtful animal, for instance a lion; the slayer then only makes an apology to the beast and goes through a form of purification for the sacrilege.[13] Among the Menomini Indians a man belonging to the Bear clan may kill a bear, although he must first address himself to his victim and apologise for depriving it of life.[14] The Indian tribes in the South-Eastern States had no respect for their totems and would kill them when they got the chance.[15] Among the Thlinkets a Wolf man will hunt wolves without hesitation, although he calls them his relatives when praying them not to hurt him.[16]

[Footnote 8: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 285. _Cf._ Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 7.]

[Footnote 9: See Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 11 _sqq._; Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, pp. 322, 324 _sq._]

[Footnote 10: Wiedemann, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 279.]

[Footnote 11: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 207.]

[Footnote 12: Taplin, 'Narrinyeri,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 63.]

[Footnote 13: Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 211.]

[Footnote 14: Hoffman, 'Menomini Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xiv. 44.]

[Footnote 15: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 16.]

[Footnote 16: Boas, in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_, p. 23. For some other instances see Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 19.]

In certain cases divine animals are killed as a religious {605} or magical ceremony. Several instances of this have been pointed out by Sir J. G. Frazer.[17] Sometimes, when the revered animal is habitually spared, it is nevertheless killed on rare and solemn occasions. In other cases, when the revered animal is habitually killed, there is a special annual atonement, at which a select individual of the species is slain with extraordinary marks of respect and devotion. Frazer has offered ingenious explanations of both customs. As regards the former one he argues that the savage apparently thinks that a species left to itself will grow old and die like an individual, and that the only means he can think of to avert the catastrophe is to kill a member of the species in whose veins the tide of life is still running strong and has not yet stagnated among the fens of old age; "the life thus diverted from one channel will flow, he fancies, more freshly and freely in a new one."[18] The latter custom, again, is explained by Frazer as a kind of atonement; by showing marked deference to a few chosen individuals of a species the savage thinks himself entitled to exterminate with impunity all the remainder upon which he can lay hands.[19] These explanations, as Frazer himself is the first to admit, are only hypothetical, but, so far as I know, they are the only ones yet offered. However, it is worth noticing that certain acts accompanying the slaughter of divine animals sometimes clearly indicate a desire in the worshippers to transfer to themselves supernatural benefits--as when they eat the flesh of the animal, or sprinkle themselves with its blood, or by other means place themselves in contact with it; and it may be that in such cases the animal is killed for the express purpose of communicating to the people the sanctity, or beneficial magic energy, with which it is endowed. The Madi or Moru tribe of Central Africa furnish an instructive example. Once a year, as it seems, a very choice lamb is killed by a man belonging to a kind of priestly order, who {606} sprinkles some of the blood four times over the assembled people and then smears each individual with the same fluid. But this ceremony is also observed on a small scale at other times--if a family is in any great trouble, through illness or bereavement, their friends and neighbours come together and a lamb is killed with a view to averting further evil.[20] Among the Arunta and some other tribes in Central Australia, as we have noticed above, at the time of Intichiuma, totemic animals are killed with the object of being eaten. But here the sacramental meal is a magical ceremony intended to multiply the species, so as to increase the food supply for other totemic groups; the fundamental idea being that the members of each totemic group are responsible for providing other individuals with a supply of their totem.[21]

[Footnote 17: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 366 _sqq._]

[Footnote 18: _Ibid._ ii. 368.]

[Footnote 19: _Ibid._ ii. 435.]

[Footnote 20: Felkin, 'Madi or Moru Tribe of Central Africa,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xii. 336 _sq._]

[Footnote 21: _Supra_, ii. 210 _sq._ Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. vi. _Iidem_, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, ch. ix. _sq._]

Frazer has also called attention to various instances in which a man-god or divine king is put to death by his worshippers, and has suggested the following explanation of this custom:--Primitive people sometimes believe that their own safety and even that of the world is bound up with the life of one of these god-men or human incarnations of the divinity. They therefore take the utmost care of his life, out of a regard for their own. But no amount of care and precaution will prevent the divine king from growing old and feeble and at last dying. And in order to avert the catastrophes which may be expected from the enfeeblement of his powers and their final extinction in death, they kill him as soon as he shows symptoms of weakness, and his soul is transferred to a vigorous successor before it has been seriously impaired by the threatened decay. But some peoples appear to have thought it unsafe to wait for even the slightest symptom of decay and have preferred to kill the divine king while he is still in the full vigour of life. Accordingly, they have fixed a term beyond which he {607} may not reign, and at the close of which he must die, the term fixed upon being short enough to exclude the probability of his degenerating physically in the interval. Thus it appears that in some places the people could not trust the king to remain in full bodily and mental vigour for more than a year; whilst in Ngoio, a province of the ancient kingdom of Congo, the rule obtains that the chief who assumes the cap of sovereignty one day shall be put to death on the next.[22]

[Footnote 22: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 5 _sqq._]

Every reader of _The Golden Bough_ must admire the ingenuity, skill, and learning with which its author has worked out his theory, even though he may fail to find the argument in every point convincing. It is obvious that the supernatural power of divine kings is frequently supposed to be influenced by the condition of their bodies. In some cases it is also obvious that they are killed on account of some illness, corporal defect, or symptom of old age, and that the ultimate reason for this lies in the supposed connection between physical deterioration and waning divinity. But, as Frazer himself observes, in the chain of his evidence a link is wanting: he can produce no direct proof of the idea that the soul of the slain man-god is transmitted to his royal successor.[23] In the absence of such evidence I venture to suggest a some what different explanation, which seems to me more in accordance with known facts--to wit, that the new king is supposed to inherit, not the predecessor's soul, but his divinity or holiness, which is looked upon in the light of a mysterious entity, temporarily seated in the ruling sovereign, but separable from him and transferable to another individual.

[Footnote 23: _Ibid._ ii. 56.]

This modification of Frazer's theory is suggested by certain beliefs prevalent among the Moors. The Sultan of Morocco, who is regarded by the people as "the vicegerent of God," appoints before his death some member of his family--by preference one of his sons--as his successor, and this implies that his _baraka_, or holiness, will {608} be transferred to the new sovereign. But his holiness may also be appropriated by a pretender during his lifetime, which proves that it is regarded as something quite distinct from his soul. Thus the people told me that the pretender Bu[h.]amâra had come into possession of the Sultan's _baraka_, and that he would subsequently hand it over to one of the Sultan's brothers, who was then denied his liberty. Like the sultans of Morocco, the divine Kafir kings of Sofala, who were put to death if afflicted with some disease, nominated their successors.[24] In ancient Bengal, again, whoever killed the king and succeeded in placing himself on the royal throne, was immediately acknowledged as king; the people said, "We are faithful to the throne, whoever fills the throne we are obedient and true to it."[25] In the kingdom of Passier, on the northern coast of Sumatra, whose sacred monarch was not allowed by his subjects to live long, "the man who struck the fatal blow was of the royal lineage, and as soon as he had done the deed of blood and seated himself on the throne he was regarded as the legitimate king, provided that he contrived to maintain his seat peaceably for a single day."[26] In these cases, it seems, the sanctity was considered to be inherent in the throne and to be partly communicated to persons who came into close contact with it.[27]

[Footnote 24: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 10.]

[Footnote 25: _Ibid._ ii. 16.]

[Footnote 26: _Ibid._ ii. 16.]

[Footnote 27: Since the above was written, Sir J. G. Frazer himself has kindly drawn my attention to some statements in his _Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship_ (p. 121 _sqq._) from which it appears that in some parts of the Malay region the regalia are regarded as wonder-working talismans or fetishes, the possession of which carries with it the right to the throne. Among the Yorubas of West Africa, a miraculous virtue seems to be attributed to the royal crown, and the king sometimes sacrifices sheep to it (_ibid._ p. 124, n. 1). See _infra_, Additional Notes.]

Now, as we have noticed before, holiness is generally held to be exceedingly susceptible to any polluting influence,[28] and this would naturally suggest the idea that, in order to remain unimpaired, it has to be removed from a body which is defiled by disease or blemish. Such an idea may be supposed to underlie those cases in which {609} even the slightest bodily defect is a sufficient motive for putting the divine king to death. It is of the greatest importance for the community that the holiness on which its welfare depends should not be attached to an individual whose organism is no longer a fit receptacle for it, and who is consequently unable to fulfil the duties incumbent upon a divine monarch; and it may be thought that the only way of removing the holiness from him is to kill him. The same explanation would seem to apply to the killing of kings or magicians who have actually proved incapable of bringing about the benefits expected from them, such as rain or good crops,[29] although in these instances the murderous act may also be a precaution against the revenge they might otherwise take for being deposed, or it may be a punishment for their failure,[30] or have the character of a sacrifice to a god.[31] Moreover, the disease, weakness, or physical deterioration of the king might cause his death; and, owing to the extremely polluting effect ascribed to natural death, this would be the greatest catastrophe which could happen to the holiness seated in him. The people of Congo believed that if their pontiff, the Chitomé, were to die a natural death, the world would perish, and the earth, which he alone sustained by his power and merit, would immediately be annihilated; hence, when he fell ill and seemed likely to die, the man who was destined to be his successor entered the pontiff's house with a rope or a club and strangled or clubbed him to death.[32] Similar motives may also have induced people to kill their divine king after a certain period, as everybody is sooner or later liable to fall ill or grow weak and die. But I can also imagine another possible reason for this custom. Supernatural {610} energy is sometimes considered so sensitive to external influences that it appears to wear away almost by itself in the course of time. I have heard from Arabs in Morocco that a pretender's holiness usually lasts only for half a year. And it may be that some of the divine kings mentioned by Frazer were exposed to a similar fatality and therefore had to be slain in time.

[Footnote 28: See especially _supra_, ii. 294-296, 352, 353, 415 _sqq._]

[Footnote 29: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 158 _sq._ Landtman, _Origin of Priesthood_, p. 144 _sqq._]

[Footnote 30: Landtman, _op. cit._ p. 144. Divine animals are sometimes treated in a similar way. In ancient Egypt, if the sacred beasts could not, or would not, help in emergency, they were beaten; and if this measure failed to prove efficacious, then the creatures were punished with death (Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 178; _Idem_, _Herodots zweites Buch_, p. 428 _sq._).]

[Footnote 31: _Supra_, i. 443.]

[Footnote 32: Frazer, _Golden Bough_, ii. 8.]

As the right to life, generally granted to gods, is thus in certain circumstances abrogated for the benefit of their worshippers, so their right to bodily integrity may be suspended if their behaviour does not answer the expectations of their devotees. Men punish their gods as they punish their fellow men. Among the Amazulu, when it thunders or, as they say, "the heaven is coming badly," the doctors go out and scold it; "they take a stick and say they are going to beat the lightning of heaven."[33] The negro cudgels his fetish unmercifully to make it submissive.[34] The Samoyede flogs his idol or throws it away if he does not succeed in his doings.[35] The idols of the Typees, in the Marquesas Islands, "received more hard knocks than supplications."[36] When his guardian spirit proves stubborn, the Hudson Bay Eskimo deprives it of food, or strips it of its garments.[37]

[Footnote 33: Callaway, _Religious System of the Amazulu_, p. 404.]

[Footnote 34: Bastian, _Afrikanische Reisen_, p. 61.]

[Footnote 35: von Struve, in _Ausland_, 1880 p. 795.]

[Footnote 36: Melville, _Typee_, p. 261.]

[Footnote 37: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 194.]

* * * * *

In normal circumstances men regard it as a duty, not only to refrain from killing or injuring their gods, but positively to promote their existence and comfort. According to early beliefs, supernatural beings are subject to human needs. The gods of the heathen Siberians laboured for their subsistence, engaged in hunting and fishing, and laid up provisions of roots against times of dearth.[38] When the heavens appear checkered with white clouds on a blue surface, the Maoris of New Zealand say that the god is planting his potatoes and {611} other divine edibles.[39] The Fijian gods are described as enormous eaters.[40] The Vedic gods wore clothes, were great drunkards, and suffered from constant hunger;[41] I need only refer to the numerous passages in the Rig-Veda where mention is made of the appetite or thirst of Indra and the pleasure he has in filling his belly.[42] An Egyptian god cannot be conceived without his house in which he lives, in which his festivals are solemnised, and which he never leaves except on professional days. His dwelling has to be cleaned, and he is assisted at his toilet by his attendants; the priest has to dress and serve his god, and places every day on his table offerings of food and drink.[43] So also the Chaldean gods had to be nourished, clothed, and amused; and the stone or wooden statues erected to them in the sanctuaries furnished them with bodies which they animated with their breath.[44]

[Footnote 38: Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 259.]

[Footnote 39: Polack, _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_, i. 244.]

[Footnote 40: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, pp. 184, 195.]

[Footnote 41: Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, pp. 304, 366 _sqq._ Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 36, n. 2.]

[Footnote 42: _Rig-Veda_, ii. 11. 11; viii. 4. 10; viii. 17. 4; viii. 78. 7; x. 86. 13 _sqq._]

[Footnote 43: Erman, _op. cit._ pp. 273, 275, 279. Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 110.]

[Footnote 44: Ball, 'Glimpses of Babylonian Religion,' in _Proceed. Soc. Biblical Archæology_, xiv. 153 _sqq._ Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 679.]

The idea that supernatural beings have human appetites and human wants leads to the practice of sacrifice. Whatever means they may have of earning their livelihood, they are certainly not indifferent to gifts offered by men. If such offerings fail them they may even suffer want and become feeble and powerless. The Egyptian gods, says M. Maspero, "were dependent upon the gifts of mortals, and the resources of each individual deity, and consequently his power, depended on the wealth and number of his worshippers."[45] We meet with the same idea at every step in the Vedic hymns.[46] Should sacrifices cease for an instant to be offered, the gods would cease to send rain, {612} to bring back at the appointed hour Aurora and the sun, to raise and ripen harvests--not only because they would be unwilling, but because they would be unable to do so.[47] It was by sacrifice that the gods delivered the world from chaos, and it is by sacrifice that man prevents it from lapsing back into the same state;[48] in the 'Laws of Manu' it is said that sacrifices support "both the movable and the immovable creation."[49] The Zoroastrian books likewise represent the sacrifice as an act of assistance to the gods, by which they become victorious in their combats with the demons.[50] When not strengthened by offerings they fly helpless before their foes. Overcome by the demon Apaosha, the bright and glorious Tistrya cries out in distress:--"Woe is me, O Ahura Mazda! . . . Men do not worship me with a sacrifice in which I am invoked by my own name. . . . If men had worshipped me with a sacrifice in which I had been invoked by my own name, as they worship the other Yazatas with sacrifices in which they are invoked by their own names, I should have taken to me the strength of ten horses, the strength of ten camels, the strength of ten bulls, the strength of ten mountains, the strength of ten rivers."[51]

[Footnote 45: Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 302. _Cf._ Wiedemann, _Ancient Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul_, p. 19.]

[Footnote 46: _Rig-Veda_, ii. 15. 2; x. 52. 5 _sq._; x. 121. 7. _Cf._ _Atharva-Veda_, xi. 7. 14 _sq._; Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 149; Kaegi, _Rigveda_, p. 31; Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 329.]

[Footnote 47: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 36.]

[Footnote 48: _Rig-Veda_, x. 130. Barth, _op. cit._ p. 37.]

[Footnote 49: _Laws of Manu_, iii. 75 _sqq._]

[Footnote 50: See Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 327; _Idem_, in _Sacred Books of the East_ (1st edit.), iv. p. lxviii.]

[Footnote 51: _Yasts_, viii. 23 _sq._]

Men are induced by various motives to offer sacrificial gifts to supernatural beings. In early religion the most common motive is undoubtedly a desire to avert evils; and we have reason to believe that such a desire was the first source of religious worship. In spite of recent assertions to the contrary, the old saying holds true that religion was born of fear. Those who maintain that the savage is little susceptible to this emotion,[52] and that he for the most part takes his gods joyously,[53] show ignorance {613} of facts. One of his characteristics is great nervous susceptibility,[54] and he lives in constant apprehension of danger from supernatural powers. We are told of the Samoyedes that a sudden blow on the outside of a tent will sometimes throw the occupants into spasms. "The Indian," says Parkman, "lived in perpetual fear. The turning of a leaf, the crawling of an insect, the cry of a bird, the creaking of a bough, might be to him the mystic signal of weal or woe."[55] From all quarters of the uncivilised world we hear that terror or fear is the predominant element in the religious sentiment, that savages are more inclined to ascribe evil than good to the influence of supernatural agents, that their sacrifices and other acts of worship more frequently have in view to avert misfortunes than to procure positive benefits, or that, even though benevolent deities are believed in, much more attention is paid to malignant ones.[56] And even among peoples who have passed beyond the stage of {614} savagery fear still remains a prominent factor in their religion. The great bulk of Homeric cult-operations lay in propitiatory rites in avoidance of evil.[57] "No one," says Sir Monier-Williams, "who has ever been brought into close contact with the Hind[=u]s in their own country can doubt the fact that the worship of at least ninety per cent. of the people of India in the present day is a worship of fear."[58] In one of the Pahlavi texts we read that "he is not to be considered as faithful who has no fear of the sacred beings."[59] The Egyptian Amon Râ, who is praised as "the beautiful and beloved god, who giveth life by all manner of warmth, by all manner of fair cattle," is at the same time styled "Lord of fear, great one of terror."[60] The Psalmist says that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,"[61] and, as Nöldeke points out, "the fear of God" was used in its literal sense.[62] Although the Koran has much to tell about the loving kindness of God, the god of Islam evokes much more fear than love. Faith is said by Muhammedan theologians to "stand midway between hope and fear."[63]

[Footnote 52: Gruppe, _Die griechischen Culte und Mythen_, p. 244 _sq._]

[Footnote 53: Grant Allen, _Evolution of the Idea of God_, p. 347.]

[Footnote 54: See Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 14.]

[Footnote 55: Parkman, _Jesuits in North America_, p. lxxxiv.]

[Footnote 56: Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 391 (American Indians generally). Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, pp. 84, 171, 214, 260. von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 243 (Coroados). Brett, _Indian Tribes of Guiana_, p. 361 _sq._; Im Thurn, _Among the Indians of Guiana_, p.

367 _sq._ Dunbar, 'Pawnee Indians,' in _Magazine of American History_, viii. 736. McGee, 'Siouan Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xv. 184. Murdoch, 'Ethn. Results of the Point Barrow Expedition,' _ibid._ ix. 432 (Point Barrow Eskimo). Ross, 'Eastern Tinneh,' in _Smithsonian Report_, 1866, p. 306. Radloff, _Schamanenthum_, p. 15 (Turkish tribes of the Altai). Fawcett, _Saoras_, p. 57. Campbell, _Wild Tribes of Khondistan_, p. 163 _sq._ Hunter, _Annals of Rural Bengal_, i. 181 _sq._ (Santals). Mouhot, _Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China_, ii. 29 (Bannavs of Cambodia). Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 157. Wilken, _Het animisme bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel_, p. 207 _sq._ St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 69, 70, 178; Low, _Sarawak_, p. 253; Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. in (Dyaks). von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 216. Kubary, 'Die Palau-Inseln,' in _Jour. des Museum Godeffroy_, iv. 44 (Pelew Islanders). Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 189. Percy Smith, 'Uea,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 114. Turner, _Samoa_, p. 21. Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 336 (Tahitians). Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, pp. 104, 148; Yate, _Account of New Zealand_, p. 141; Polack, _op. cit._ i. 244 (Maoris). Fritsch, _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_, pp. 338, 339, 341 (Hottentots). Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 153 (Matabele). Livingstone, _Missionary Travels_, p. 435 (peoples inhabiting the country north of the Zambesi). Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 2 (Negroes of Accra). See also Karsten, _Origin of Worship_, p. 44 _sqq._; _infra_, p. 665 _sqq._]

[Footnote 57: _Cf._ Keller, _Homeric Society_, p. 115 _sq._]

[Footnote 58: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 230.]

[Footnote 59: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xxxix. 33.]

[Footnote 60: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 111 _sq._]

[Footnote 61: _Psalms_, cxi. 10.]

[Footnote 62: Nöldeke, in _Archiv für Religionswissenschaft_, i. 362.]

[Footnote 63: Sell, _Faith of Islám_, p. 165.]

Hope, indeed, forms an element in every religion, even the lowest. The assumed authors of painful or alarming events became objects of worship because they were conceived, not as mechanical causes, but as personal agencies which might be influenced by the regardful attitude of the worshipper. The savage is not so irrational as to make offerings to beings from whom he expects no benefits in return. And in proportion as the deities grew more benignant and their sphere of action was extended, their worshippers became more confident, expecting from them not only mercy but positive assistance.

We may suppose that already at an early stage of {615} culture man, occasionally, was struck by some unexpected fortunate event and ascribed it to the influence of a friendly spirit with which he was anxious to keep on amicable terms. Among the Tshi-speaking peoples of the Gold Coast worship is the result not only of fear, but also of the hope of obtaining some direct advantage or protection.[64] The pagans of Siberia accompanied their sacrifices with words like these:--"Behold what I bring you to eat; bring me then in return children, cattle, and a long life."[65] The Point Barrow

Eskimo, when he arrives at a river, throws into the air a small piece of tobacco, crying out, "Spirits, spirits, I give you tobacco, give me plenty of fish!"[66] Of the Sia Indians (Pueblos) Mrs. Stevenson writes that their religion is not mainly one of propitiation, but rather of supplication for favours and payment for the same--they "do the will of and thereby please the beings to whom they pray."[67] We even hear of savages making thank-offerings to their gods. In Fiji, after successful fishing for turtle, or remarkable deliverance from danger in war or at sea, or recovery from sickness, a kind of thank-offering was sometimes presented to the deities.[68] When certain natives of Eastern Central Africa, after they have prayed for a successful hunting expedition, return home laden with venison or ivory, they know that they are indebted to "their old relative" for their good fortune, and give him a thank-offering.[69] We are told that in Northern Guinea, when a person has been repeatedly fortunate through the agency of a fetish, "he contracts a feeling of attachment and gratitude to it."[70] Yet we have reason to suspect that the gratitude of the sacrificer is commonly {616} of the kind which La Rochefoucauld defined as "a secret desire to receive greater benefits in the future."[71] Sometimes the thank-offering, if it may be called so, is expressly preceded by a vow. Among the Kansas the warrior, when going to war says, facing the East, "I wish to pass along the road to the foe! O Wakanda! I promise you a blanket if I succeed"; and turning to the West, "O Wakanda! I promise you a feast if I succeed."[72] Even in religions of a higher type the offering of sacrificial gifts is mainly a sort of bargain with the god to whom they are offered. In the Vedic hymns the gods are addressed by phrases like these, "If you give me this, I shall give you that," or, "As you have given me this, I shall give you that."[73] The singer naïvely confesses, "I looked forth in spirit, seeking good, O Indra and Agni, to relations and kinsmen; but I have no other helper than you; therefore I have made you a powerful song."[74] The Greeks expressed the idea connected with their sacrifices in the proverbial saying, [Greek: dô=ra theou\s pei/thei].[75] The ancient Hebrew view on the subject is illustrated by the vow of Jacob:--"If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God: And this stone, which I have set for a pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee."[76]

[Footnote 64: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 17. _Cf._ _Idem_, _Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 277.]

[Footnote 65: Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 284.]

[Footnote 66: Murdoch, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 433.]

[Footnote 67: Stevenson, 'Sia,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 67.]

[Footnote 68: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._ p. 195.]

[Footnote 69: Macdonald, _Africana_, i. 61. For other instances of thank-offerings see Shooter, _Kafirs of Natal_, p. 165; Smith, 'Myths of the Iroquois,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ii. 51. Jochelson, 'Koryak Religion and Myth,' in _Jesup North Pacific Expedition_, vi. 25, 92. Leem, _Beskrivelse over Finmarkens Lapper_, p. 431 (Lapps).]

[Footnote 70: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 212.]

[Footnote 71: La Rochefoucauld, _Maximes_, 298.]

[Footnote 72: Dorsey, 'Mourning and War Customs of the Kansas,' in _American Naturalist_, xix. 678.]

[Footnote 73: Müller, _Physical Religion_, p. 100. Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, pp. 302-326, 430 _sqq._]

[Footnote 74: _Rig-Veda_, i. 109. 1. _Cf._ _ibid._ i. 71. 7.]

[Footnote 75: Plato, _Respublica_, iii. 390.]

[Footnote 76: _Genesis_, xxviii. 20 _sqq._]

In many cases the sacrificial victims are intended to serve as substitutes for other individuals, whose lives are in danger. We have previously noticed that the practice of human sacrifice is mainly based on the idea of substitution.[77] We have also seen that a growing reluctance to this practice often led to the offering of animals instead of {617} men.[78] But we have no right to assume that the sacrifice of an animal for the purpose of saving the life of a man is in every case a later modification of a previous human sacrifice. The idea that spirits which threaten the lives of men are appeased by other than human blood may in some instances be primary though in others it is derivative. The Moors invariably sacrifice an animal at the foundation of a new building; and though this is said to be _[(]âr_ upon the spirit owners of the place some idea of substitution seems also to be connected with the act, as they maintain that if no animal were killed the inmates of the house would die or remain childless. A similar practice prevails in Syria, where the people believe that "every house must have its death, either man, woman, child, or animal."[79] Among the Jews it is or has been the custom for the master of each house to kill a cock on the eve of the fast of atonement. Before doing so he strikes his head with the cock three times, saying at each stroke, "Let this cock be a commutation for me, let him be substituted for me"; and when he strangles his victim by compressing the neck with his hand, he at the same time reflects that he himself deserves to be strangled.[80] These customs can certainly not be regarded as survivals of an earlier practice of killing a human being. Moreover an animal is sometimes sacrificed for the purpose of saving the lives of other animals. Thus in a place in Scotland, in 1767, a young heifer was offered in the holy fire during a cattle-plague.[81] And in Great Benin, in West Africa, on the anniversary of the death of Adolo, king Overami's father, not only twelve men, but twelve cows, twelve goats, twelve sheep, and twelve fowls were offered, and Overami, addressing his father, asked him to look after the "cows, goats, and fowls, and everything in the farms," as well as the people.[82] Sacrifices which are {618} substitutional in character may or may not be intended to satisfy the material needs of supernatural beings. In some cases, as we have seen, their object is to appease a resentful god by the mere death of the victim.[83]

[Footnote 77: _Supra_, ch. xix.]

[Footnote 78: _Supra_, i. 469 _sq._]

[Footnote 79: Curtiss, _Primitive Semitic Religion To-day_, p. 224 _sq._]

[Footnote 80: Allen, _Modern Judaism_, p. 406.]

[Footnote 81: Grimm, _Teutonic Mythology_, ii. 608.]

[Footnote 82: Moor and Roupell, quoted by Read and Dalton, _Antiquities from the City of Benin_, p. 6, and by Ling Roth, _Great Benin_, p. 70 _sq._]

[Footnote 83: _Supra_, i. 438 _sqq._]

We have further noticed that, in the case of human sacrifice, the victim is occasionally regarded as a messenger between the worshippers and their god even though the primary object of the rite be a different one.[84] The same is sometimes true of other offerings as well.[85] The Iroquois sacrifice of the white dog[86] was, according to Mr. Morgan, intended "to send up the spirit of the dog as a messenger to the Great Spirit, to announce their continued fidelity to his service, and, also, to convey to him their united thanks for the blessings of the year"; and in their thanksgiving addresses they were in the habit of throwing leaves of tobacco into the fire from time to time that their words might ascend to the dwelling of the Great Spirit in the smoke of their offerings.[87] The Huichols of Mexico often use the arrows which they sacrifice to their gods as carriers of special prayers.[88]

[Footnote 84: _Supra_, i. 465 _sq._]

[Footnote 85: _Cf._ Hubert and Mauss, 'Essai sur la nature et la fonction du sacrifice,' in _L'année sociologique_, ii. 106, n. 1.]

[Footnote 86: See _supra_, i. 53, 64.]

[Footnote 87: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 216 _sqq._]

[Footnote 88: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, ii. 205.]

Not only are sacrifices used as bearers of prayers, but they are also frequently offered for the purpose of transferring curses. In Morocco every _síyid_[89] of any importance is constantly visited by persons who desire to invoke the saint to whom it is dedicated with a view to being cured of some illness, or being blessed with children, or getting a suitable husband or wife, or receiving help against an enemy, or deriving some other benefit from the saint. To secure his assistance the visitor makes _[(]âr_ upon him; and the Moorish _[(]âr_, of which I have spoken above,[90] implies the transference of a conditional curse, whether it be made upon an ordinary man or a saint, living or dead. The _[(]âr_ put upon a saint may consist in throwing stones upon a cairn connected with his sanctuary, or making a pile of {619} stones to him, or tying a piece of cloth at the _síyid_, or knotting the leaves of some palmetto or the stalks of white broom growing in its vicinity, or offering an animal sacrifice to the saint.[91] This making of _[(]âr_ is accompanied by a promise to reward the saint if he grants the request; but the sacrifice offered in fulfilment of such a promise (_l-wâ[(]da_) is totally distinct from that offered as _[(]âr_. It is a genuine gift, whereas the _[(]âr_-sacrifice is a means of constraining the saint. When an animal is killed as _[(]âr_ the usual phrase _bismillâh_, "In the name of God," is not used, and the animal may not be eaten, except by poor people.[92] On the other hand, the animal which is sacrificed as _wâ[(]da_ is always killed "in the name of God," and is offered for the very purpose of being eaten by the saint's earthly representatives. Nothing can better show than the Moorish distinction between _l-[(]âr_ and _l-wâ[(]da_ how futile it would be to try to explain every kind of sacrifice by one and the same principle. The distinction between them is fundamental: the former is a threat, the latter is a promised reward.[93] But at the same time it is not improbable that the idea of transferring curses to a supernatural being by means of a sacrifice was originally suggested by the previous existence of sacrifice as a religious act, combined with the ascription of mysterious propensities to blood, and especially to sacrificial blood, which, according to primitive ideas, made it a most efficient conductor of curses.

[Footnote 89: For the meaning of this word see _supra_, ii. 584.]

[Footnote 90: _Supra_, i. 586 _sq._; ii. 584 _sq._]

[Footnote 91: Westermarck, '_L-[(]âr_, or the Transference of Conditional Curses in Morocco,' in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_, p. 368 _sqq._ _Idem_, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_, p. 90 _sqq._]

[Footnote 92: However, if the _síyid_ has a _m[K.]áddem_, or regular attendant, the petitioner often hands the animal over to him alive, so that he may himself kill it "in the name of God," and thus make it eatable. Then the descendants of the saint, if he has any, and the _m[K.]áddem_ himself, have no hesitation in eating the animal, _bismillâh_ being a holy word which removes the curse or evil energy inherent in _l-[(]âr_.]

[Footnote 93: When I have asked how it is that a saint, although invoked with _l-[(]âr_, does not always grant the request made to him, the answer has been that he can, but that he is not all-powerful and the failure is due to the fact that God does not listen to his prayer. But it also occurs that a person who has in vain made _[(]âr_ upon a saint goes to another _síyid_ to complain of him. There is a general belief that saints do not help unless _[(]âr_ is made on them--an idea which is not very flattering to their character.]

{620} There are obvious indications that the _[(]âr_-sacrifice of the Moors is not unique of its kind, but has its counterpart among certain other peoples. In ancient religions sacrifice is often supposed to exercise a constraining influence on the god to whom it is offered. We meet with this idea in Zoroastrianism,[94] in many of the Vedic hymns,[95] and especially in Brahmanism. "Here," says Barth, "the rites of religion are the real deities, or at any rate they constitute together a sort of independent and superior power, before which the divine personalities disappear, and which almost holds the place allotted to destiny in other systems. The ancient belief, which is already prominent in the Hymns, that sacrifice conditionates the regular course of things, is met with here in the rank of a commonplace, and is at times accompanied with incredible details."[96] Now, there can be little doubt that this ascription of a magic power to the sacrifice, by means of which it could control the actions of the gods, was due to the idea that it served as a conductor of imprecations; for it was invariably accompanied by a formula which was considered to possess irresistible force. In the invocation lies the hidden energy which gives the efficacy to the sacrifice; without Brahma[n.]aspati, the lord of prayer, sacrifice does not succeed.[97] The Greeks actually offered anathemata, or curses, to their gods.[98] The ancient Arabs, again, after killing the sacrificial animal, threw its hair on a holy tree as a curse.[99] But so little has the true import of such sacrifices been understood even by eminent scholars, that they have been represented as votive offerings or gifts to the deity.[100]

[Footnote 94: Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 330.]

[Footnote 95: _Rig-Veda_, iii. 45. 1; iv. 15. 5; vi. 51. 8; viii. 2. 6. Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, p. 311 _sq._]

[Footnote 96: Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 47 _sq._]

[Footnote 97: _Rig-Veda_, i. 18. 7.]

[Footnote 98: Rouse, _Greek Votive Offerings_, p. 337 _sqq._]

[Footnote 99: Wellhausen, _Reste arabischen Heidentums_, p. 124.]

[Footnote 100: Rouse, _op. cit._ p. 337. Wellhausen, _op. cit._ p. 124.]

Considering that the idea of sacrifice being a conductor of imprecations has hitherto almost entirely escaped the notice of students of early religion, it is impossible to say {621} how widely it prevails and whether it also occurs in the savage world. We know that the practice of cursing a god not only was familiar to the ancient nations of culture, including the Egyptians,[101] Hebrews, and other Semites,[102] but is common among peoples like the South African Bechuanas[103] and the Nagas of India.[104] And that the shedding of blood is frequently applied as a means of transferring curses is suggested by various cases in which, however, the object of the imprecation is not a god but a man. We have previously noticed the reception sacrifices offered to visiting strangers, presumably for the purpose of transmitting to them conditional curses;[105] and a very similar idea seems to underlie certain cases of oath-taking. Sometimes the oath is taken in connection with a sacrifice made to a god, and then the sanctity of the sacrificial animal naturally increases the efficacy of the self-imprecation. In other instances the oath is taken on the blood of an animal which is killed for the purpose, apparently without being sacrificed to a god. But in either case, I believe, the blood of the animal is thought not only to add supernatural energy to the oath, but to transfer, as it were, the self-imprecation to the very person who pronounces it. The Mrús, a Chittagong hill tribe, "will swear by one of their gods, to whom, at the same time, a sacrifice must be offered."[106] Among the ancient Norsemen both the accused and the accuser grasped the holy ring kept for that purpose on the altar, stained with the blood of a sacrificial bull, and made oath by invoking Freyr, Niordr, and the almighty among the Asas.[107] At Athens a person who charged another with murder made an oath with imprecations upon himself and his family and his house, standing upon the entrails of a boar, a ram, and a bull, {622} which had been sacrificed by special persons on the appointed days.[108] Tyndareus "sacrificed a horse and swore the suitors of Helen, making them stand on the pieces of the horse," the oath being to defend Helen and him who might be chosen to marry her if ever they should be wronged.[109] One of the three binding forms of oath prevalent among the Sânsiya in India is to "kill a cock and pouring its blood on the ground swear over it."[110] When the Annamese swear by heaven and earth, they often kill a buffalo or he-goat and drink its blood.[111] Among the ancient Arabs comrades in arms swore fidelity to each other by dipping their hands in the blood of a camel killed for the purpose.[112]

[Footnote 101: _Book of the Dead_, ch. 125.]

[Footnote 102: _Exodus_, xxii. 28. _1 Samuel_, xvii. 43. _Isaiah_, viii. 21.]

[Footnote 103: Chapman, _Travels in the Interior of South Africa_, i. 45 _sq._]

[Footnote 104: Woodthorpe, 'Wild Tribes inhabiting the so-called Naga Hills,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xi. 70.]

[Footnote 105: _Supra_, i. 590 _sq._]

[Footnote 106: Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 233. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 244 (Pankhos and Bunjogees).]

[Footnote 107: _Landnámabók_, iv. 7 (_Islendínga Sögur_, i. 258). Lea, _Superstition and Force_, p. 27. Keyser, _Efterladte Skrifter_, ii. pt. i. 388. Gummere, _Germanic Origins_, p. 301.]

[Footnote 108: Demosthenes, _Oratio (xxiii.) contra Aristocratem_, 67 _sq._, p. 642.]

[Footnote 109: Pausanias, iii. 20. 9. For Homeric oath sacrifices see _Iliad_, iii. 260 _sqq._; xix. 250 _sqq._; Keller, _Homeric Society_, p. 176 _sqq._]

[Footnote 110: Crooke, _Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces_, iv. 281.]

[Footnote 111: Kohler, _Rechtsvergleichende Studien_, p. 208.]

[Footnote 112: Wellhausen, _Reste arabischen Heidentums_, p. 128.]

The last mentioned case, which implies shedding of blood as a means of sealing a compact, leads us to a special class of sacrifices offered to gods, namely, the covenant sacrifice, known to us from Semitic antiquity. The Hebrews, as Professor Robertson Smith observes,[113] thought of the national religion as constituted by a formal covenant sacrifice at Mount Sinai, where half of the blood of the sacrificed oxen was sprinkled on the altar and the other half on the people,[114] or even by a still earlier covenant rite in which the parties were Yahve and Abraham;[115] and the idea of sacrifice establishing a covenant between God and man is also apparent in the Psalms.[116] In various cases recorded in the Old Testament sacrifice is accompanied by a sacrificial meal;[117] "the god and his worshippers are wont to eat and drink together, and by this token their fellowship is declared {623} and sealed."[118] Robertson Smith and his followers have represented this as an act of communion, as a sacrament in which the whole kin--the god with his clansmen--unite, and in partaking of which each member renews his union with the god and with the rest of the clan. At first, we are told, the god--that is, the totem god--himself was eaten, whilst at a later stage the practice of eating the god was superseded by the practice of eating with the god. Communion still remains the core of sacrifice; and it is said that only subsequently the practice of offering gifts to the deity develops out of the sacrificial union between the worshippers and their god.[119] But I venture to think that the whole of this theory is based upon a misunderstanding of the Semitic evidence, and that existing beliefs in Morocco throw new light upon the covenant sacrifice.

[Footnote 113: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 318 _sq._]

[Footnote 114: _Exodus_, xxiv. 4 _sqq._]

[Footnote 115: _Genesis_, xv. 8 _sqq._]

[Footnote 116: _Psalms_, l. 5.]

[Footnote 117: _Genesis_, xxxi. 54. _Exodus_, xxiv. 11. _1 Samuel_, xi. 15. Wellhausen says (_Prolegomena to the History of Israel_, p. 71) that, according to the practice of the older period, a meal was nearly always connected with a sacrifice.]

[Footnote 118: Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ p. 271.]

[Footnote 119: _Ibid._ lec. ix. _sqq._ Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 236. Jevons, _Introduction to the History of Religion_, p. 225.]

The Moorish covenant (_l-[(]ahd_) is closely connected with the Moorish _[(]âr_. Whilst _l-[(]âr_ is one-sided, _l-[(]ahd_ is mutual, both parties transferring conditional curses to one another. And here again the transference requires a material conductor. Among the Arabs of the plains and the Berbers of Central Morocco chiefs, in times of rebellion, exchange their cloaks or turbans, and it is believed that if any of them should break the covenant he would be punished with some grave misfortune. Among the Ulád Bu [(]Azîz, in the province of Dukkâla, it is a common custom for persons who wish to be reconciled after a quarrel to go to a holy man and in his presence join their right hands so that the fingers of the one go between the fingers of the other, after which the saint throws his cloak over the united hands, saying, "This is _[(]ahd_ between you." Or they may in a similar manner join their hands at a saint's tomb over the head of the box under which the saint is buried, or they may perform the same ceremony simply in the presence of some friends. In either case the joining of hands is usually {624} accompanied by a common meal, and frequently the hands are joined over the dish after eating. If a person who has thus made a compact with another is afterwards guilty of a breach of faith, it is said that "God and the food will repay him"; in other words, the conditional curse embodied in the food which he ate will be realised. All over Morocco the usual method of sealing a compact of friendship is by eating together, especially at the tomb of some saint. As we have noticed above,[120] the sacredness of the place adds to the efficacy of the imprecation, but its vehicle, the real punisher, is the eaten food, because it contains a conditional curse.

[Footnote 120: _Supra_, i. 587.]

The _[(]ahd_ of the Moors helps us to understand the covenant sacrifice of the ancient Semites. The only difference between them is that the former is a method of establishing a compact between men and men, whilst the latter established a compact between men and their god. The idea of a mutual transference of conditional curses undoubtedly underlies both. It should be noticed that in the Old Testament also, as among the Moors, we meet with human covenants made by the parties eating together.[121] Thus the Israelites entered into alliance with the Gibeonites by taking of their victuals, without consulting Yahve, and the meal was expressly followed by an oath.[122] In other instances, again, the common dish consisted of sacrificial food, either because the sacredness of such food was supposed to make the conditional curse embodied in it more efficacious, or because the deity was included as a third party to the covenant.

[Footnote 121: _Genesis_, xxvi. 30; xxxi. 46. _2 Samuel_, iii. 20 _sq._ Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ p. 271. Nowack, _Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie_, i. 359.]

[Footnote 122: _Joshua_, ix. 14 _sq._]

Whilst in some cases the object of a sacrifice is to transfer conditional curses either to the god to whom it is made, or to both the god and the worshipper, the victim or article offered may in other instances be used as a vehicle for transferring benign virtue to him who offered it or to other persons. As we have noticed {625} above, a sacrifice is very frequently believed to be endowed with beneficial magic energy in consequence of its contact or communion with the supernatural being to which it is offered, and this energy is then supposed to have a salutary effect upon the person who comes in touch with it. I have said before that in Morocco magic virtue is ascribed to various parts of the sheep which is sacrificed at the "Great Feast," and that every offering to a holy person, especially a dead saint, is considered to participate to some extent in his sanctity.[123] The Vedic people regarded sacrificial food as a kind of medicine.[124] The Siberian Kachinzes blessed their huts with sacrificial milk.[125] The Lapps strewed the ashes of their burnt-offerings upon their heads.[125] It is quite possible that in some instances a desire to receive the benefit of the supernatural energy with which the sacrifice is endowed is by itself a sufficient motive for offering it to a god.

[Footnote 123: _Supra_, i. 445 _sq._ See also Westermarck, 'The Popular Ritual of the Great Feast in Morocco,' in _Folk-Lore_, xxii. 145 _sqq._; Hubert and Mauss, _loc. cit._ p. 133.]

[Footnote 124: Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 328 _sqq._]

[Footnote 125: Georgi, _op. cit._ iii. 275.]

[Footnote 126: von Düben, _Lappland och Lapparne_, p. 258.]

As is the case with other rites, sacrifices also have a strong tendency to survive the ideas from which they sprang. Thus when the materialistic conception of the nature of gods faded away, offerings continued to be made to them, though their meaning was changed. As Sir E. B. Tylor observes, "the idea of practical acceptableness of the food or valuables presented to the deity, begins early to shade into the sentiment of divine gratification or propitiation by a reverent offering, though in itself of not much account to so mighty a divine personage,"[127] Sacrifice then becomes mainly, or exclusively, a symbol of humility and reverence. Even in the Rig-Veda, in spite of its crude materialism, we meet with indications of the idea that the value of a sacrifice lies in the feelings of the worshipper; if unable to offer an ox or cow, the singer hopes that a small gift from the heart, a fagot, a libation, a bundle of grass, offered with reverence, {626} will be more acceptable to the god than butter or honey.[128] In Greece, though the sacrificial ritual remained unchanged till the end of paganism, we frequently come upon the advanced reflection that righteousness is the best sacrifice, that the poor man's slight offering avails more with the deity than hecatombs of oxen.[129] According to Porphyry, the gods have no need of banquets and magnificent sacrifices, but we should with the greatest alacrity make a moderate oblation to them of our own property, as "the honours which we pay to the gods should be accompanied by the same promptitude as that with which we give the first seat to worthy men."[130] It is said in the Talmud that "he who offers humility unto God and man, shall be rewarded with a reward as if he had offered all the sacrifices in the world."[131]

[Footnote 127: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 394.]

[Footnote 128: _Rig-Veda_, viii. 19. 5. Kaegi, _op. cit._ p. 30.]

[Footnote 129: Farnell, _Cults of the Greek States_, i. 101. Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 43. Westcott, _Essays in the History of Religious Thought_, p. 116.]

[Footnote 130: Porphyry, _De abstinentia ab esu animalium_, ii. 60.]

[Footnote 131: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 55.]

I have here spoken of the _practice_ of sacrifice and the ideas on which it is based. But sacrifice has also a moral value attached to it. Though no doubt in many cases optional, it is under various circumstances regarded as a stringent duty. This is particularly the case with the offerings regularly made by the community at large on special occasions fixed by custom.

* * * * *

As supernatural beings have material needs like men, they also possess property like men, and this must not be interfered with. The Fjort of West Africa believe that the spirits of the rivers kill those who drink their waters and sometimes punish those who fish in them for greediness, by making them deaf and dumb.[132] When their chief god "played" by thundering, the Amazulu said to him who was frightened, "Why do you start, because the lord plays? What have you taken which belongs to him?"[133] The Fijians speak of a deluge {627} the cause of which was the killing of a favourite bird belonging to the god Ndengei by two mischievous lads, his grandsons.[134] In Efate, of the New Hebrides, to steal cocoanuts which are consecrated to the worship of the gods at some forthcoming festival "would be regarded as a much greater offence than common stealing."[135] So, too, the pillaging of a temple has commonly been looked upon as the worst kind of robbery.[136] Among the Hebrews any trespass upon ground which was hallowed by the localised presence of Yahveh was visited with extreme punishment.[137] In Arabia people were forbidden to cut fodder, fell trees, or hunt game within the precincts of a sacred place.[138] The Moors believe that a person would incur a very great risk indeed by cutting the branch of a tree or shooting a bird in the _[h.]orm_ of a _síyid_, or dead saint. The _[h.]orm_ is the homestead and domain of the saint, and he is the owner of everything within its borders. But the offence is not exclusively one against property, and it may be doubted whether originally any clear idea of ownership at all was connected with it. In a holy place all objects are endowed with supernatural energy, and may therefore themselves, as it were, avenge injuries committed against them. This is true of the _[h.]orm_ of a saint, as well as of any other sanctuary, all his belongings being considered to partake of his sanctity. But, as a matter of fact, the so-called tomb of a saint is frequently a place which was at first regarded as holy by itself, on account of its natural appearance, and was only afterwards traditionally associated with a holy person, when the need was felt of giving an anthropomorphous interpretation of its holiness.[139] According to early ideas a {628} sacred object cannot with impunity be appropriated for ordinary purposes;[140] but, on the other hand, visitors are allowed to take a handful of earth from the tomb of the saint or in certain cases to cut a small piece of wood from some tree growing in his _[h.]orm_, to be used as a charm.[141] It also deserves notice that the saint protects not only his own property, but any goods left in his care; hence the country Arabs of Morocco often have their granaries in the _[h.]ór[)u]mat_ of saints.

[Footnote 132: Dennett, _Folklore of the Fjort_, p. 5 _sq._]

[Footnote 133: Callaway, _Religious System of the Amazulu_, p. 57.]

[Footnote 134: Williams and Calvert, _op. cit._p. 212.]

[Footnote 135: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 208.]

[Footnote 136: Schmidt, _Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 19 _sq._ Cicero, _De legibus_, ii. 9, 16; Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 458. Wilda, _Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 950; Dahn, _Bausteine_, ii. 106 (Teutons). Du Boys, _Histoire du droit criminel des peuples modernes_, ii. 605 _sq._ Filangieri, _La scienza della legislazione_, iv. 205 (laws of Christian countries).]

[Footnote 137: Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 38.]

[Footnote 138: Wellhausen, _Reste arabischen Heidentums_, p. 106.]

[Footnote 139: Westermarck, 'Sul culto dei santi nel Marocco,' in _Actes du XII. Congrès International des Orientalistes_, iii. 175. _Cf._ Goldziher, _Muhammedanische Studien_, ii. 344 _sqq._]

[Footnote 140: See Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ lec. iv. and Additional Note B.]

[Footnote 141: Westermarck, in _Actes du XII. Congrès des Orientalistes_, iii. 167 _sq._]

Moreover, anybody who takes refuge at a _síyid_ is for the moment safe. The right of sanctuary is regarded as very sacred in Morocco, especially in those parts of the country where the Sultan's government has no power. To violate it is an outrage which the saint is sure to punish. I saw a madman whose insanity was attributed to the fact that he once had forcibly removed a fugitive from a saint's tomb; and of a late Grand-Vizier it is said that he was killed by two powerful saints of Dukkâla, on whose refugees he had laid violent hands. Even the descendants of the saint or his manager (_m[k.]áddem_) can only by persuasion and by promising to mediate between the suppliant and his pursuer induce the former to leave the place.[142] As is well known, this is not a custom restricted to Morocco. Among many peoples, at different stages of civilisation, sacred places give shelter to refugees.[143]

[Footnote 142: See Westermarck, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness_, p. 116 _sqq._]

[Footnote 143: See Andree, 'Die Asyle,' in _Globus_, xxxviii. 301 _sq._; Frazer, 'Origin of Totemism,' in _Fortnightly Review_, N. S. lxv. 650 _sqq._; Hellwig, _Das Asylrecht_, _passim_; Bulmerincq, _Das Asylrecht_, _passim_. Fuld, 'Das Asylrecht im Alterthum und Mittelalter,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ vii. p. 103 _sqq._]

Among the Central Australian Arunta there is in each local totem centre a spot called _ertnatulunga_, in the immediate neighbourhood of which everything is sacred and must on no account be hurt. The plants growing there are never interfered with in any way; animals which come there are safe {629} from the spear of the hunter; and a man who was being pursued by others would not be touched so long as he remained at this spot.[144] In Upolu, one of the Samoan Islands, a certain god, Vave, had his residence in an old tree, which served as an asylum for murderers and other great offenders; if that tree was reached by the criminal he was safe, and the avenger could pursue no farther, but had to wait for investigation and trial.[145] In the island of Hawaii there were two _puhonuas_, or cities of refuge, which afforded an inviolable sanctuary even to the vilest criminal who entered their precincts, and during war offered safe retreat to all the non-combatants of the neighbouring districts who flocked into them, as well as to the vanquished. As soon as the fugitive had entered, he repaired to the presence of the idol and made a short ejaculatory address, expressive of his obligations to him in reaching the place with security. The priests and their adherents would immediately put to death anyone who should have the temerity to follow or molest those who were once within the pale of the _pahu tabu_, and, as they put it, under the shade or protection of the spirit of Keave, the tutelary deity of the place. After a short period, probably not more than two or three days, the refugee was permitted to return unmolested to his home, the divine protection being supposed still to abide with him.[146] In Tahiti the _morais_, or holy places, likewise gave shelter to criminals of every kind.[147] At Maiva, in the South-Eastern part of New Guinea, "should a man be pursued by an enemy and take refuge in the _dubu_ [or temple], he is perfectly safe inside. Any one smiting another inside the _dubu_ would have his arms and legs shrivelled up, and he could do nothing but wish to die."[148]

[Footnote 144: Spencer and Gillen, _Native Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 133 _sqq._]

[Footnote 145: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 64 _sq._]

[Footnote 146: Ellis, _Tour through Hawaii_, p. 155 _sqq._ Jarves, _History of the Hawaiian Islands_, p. 28 _sq._]

[Footnote 147: Turnbull, _Voyage round the World_, p. 366. Wilson, _Missionary Voyage to the Southern Pacific Ocean_, p. 351.]

[Footnote 148: Chalmers and Gill, _Work and Adventure in New Guinea_, p. 186.]

In many North American tribes certain sacred places or whole villages served as asylums, in which those who were pursued by the tribe or even an enemy were safe as soon as they had obtained admission.[149] Among the Acagchemem Indians, in the valley and neighbourhood of San Juan Capistrano in California, a criminal who had fled to a _vanquech_, or place of worship, was secure not only as long as he remained there, but {630} also after he had left the sanctuary. It was not even lawful to mention his crime, but all that the avenger could do to him was to point at him and deride him, saying, "Lo, a coward, who has been forced to flee to Chinigchinich!" This flight, however, turned the punishment from the head of the criminal upon that of some of his relatives.[150]

[Footnote 149: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, pp. 158, 159, 416. Bradbury, _Travels in the Interior of America_, p. 165 _sq._ (Aricaras of the Missouri). Bourke, 'Medicine-Men of the Apache,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ix. 453. Kohl, _Kitchi-Gami_, p. 271 (Chippewas).]

[Footnote 150: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, iii. 167. Boscana, in [Robinson,] _Life in California_, p. 262 _sq._]

The South-Central African Barotse have a city of refuge. "Anyone incurring the king's wrath, or committing a crime, may find safety by fleeing to this town. The man in charge of it is expected to plead for him before the chief, and he can then return to his house in peace."[151] Among the same people the tombs of chiefs are sanctuaries or places of refuge,[152] and this is also the case among the Kafirs.[153] So, too, in the monarchical states of the Gallas homicides enjoy a legal right of asylum if they have succeeded in taking refuge in a hut near the burial-place of the king.[154] Among the Ovambo in South-Western Africa the village of a great chief is abandoned at his death, except by the members of a certain family, who remain there to prevent it from falling into utter decay. Condemned criminals who contrive to escape to one of these deserted villages are safe, at least for a time; for not even the chief himself may pursue a fugitive into the sacred place.[155] In Congo Français there are several sanctuaries:--"The great one in the Calabar district is at Omon. Thither mothers of twins, widows, thieves, and slaves fly, and if they reach it are safe."[156] In Ashantee a slave who flies to a temple and dashes himself against the fetish cannot easily be brought back to his master.[157] Among the Negroes of Accra criminals used to "seat themselves upon the fetish," that is, place themselves under its protection; but murderers who sought refuge with the fetish were always liable to be delivered up to their pursuers.[158] A traveller in the seventeenth century tells us that in Fetu, on the Gold Coast, a criminal who deserved death was pardoned by taking refuge in the hut of the high-priest.[159] Among the Krumen of the Grain Coast the house of the high-priest (_bodio_) "is a sanctum to which culprits {631} may betake themselves without the danger of being removed by anyone except by the _bodio_ himself."[160] In Usambara a murderer cannot be arrested at any of the four places where the great wizards of the country reside.[161]

[Footnote 151: Arnot, _Garenganze_, p. 77.]

[Footnote 152: Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 75.]

[Footnote 153: Rehme, 'Das Recht der Amaxosa,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ x. 51.]

[Footnote 154: Paulitschke, _Ethnographie Nordost-Afrikas, Die geistige Cultur der Danâkil, &c._ p. 157.]

[Footnote 155: Schinz, _Deutsch-Südwest-Afrika_, p. 312.]

[Footnote 156: Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 466.]

[Footnote 157: Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 265. _Cf._ Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 42.]

[Footnote 158: Monrad, _op. cit._ p. 89.]

[Footnote 159: Müller, _Die Africanische Landschafft Fetu_, p. 75.]

[Footnote 160: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 129.]

[Footnote 161: Krapf, _Reisen in Ost-Afrika_, ii. 132.]

In other Muhammedan countries besides Morocco the tombs of saints, as also the mosques, are or have been places of refuge.[162] In Persia the great number of such asylums proved so injurious to public safety, that about the middle of the nineteenth century only three mosques were left which were recognised by the government as affording protection to criminals of every description.[163] Among the Hebrews the right of asylum originally belonged to all altars,[164] but on the abolition of the local altars it was limited to certain cities of refuge.[165] According to the Old Testament manslayers could find shelter there only in the case of involuntary homicide; but this was undoubtedly a narrowing of the ancient custom. Many heathen sanctuaries of the Ph[oe]nicians and Syrians retained even in Roman times what seems to have been an unlimited right of asylum;[166] and at certain Arabian shrines the god likewise gave shelter to all fugitives without distinction, and even stray or stolen cattle that reached the holy ground could not be reclaimed by their owners.[167]

[Footnote 162: Goldziher, _Muhammedanische Studien_, i. 237 _sq._ Quatremère, 'Mémoire sur les asiles chez les Arabes,' in _Mémoires de l'Institut de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres_, xv. pt. ii. 313 _sq._]

[Footnote 163: Polak, _Persien_, ii. 83 _sqq._ Brugsch, _Im Lande der Sonne_, p. 246.]

[Footnote 164: _Exodus_, xxi. 13 _sq._ _Cf._ Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 148, n. 1.]

[Footnote 165: _Numbers_, xxxv. 11 _sqq._ _Deuteronomy_, iv. 41 _sqq._; xix. 2 _sqq._]

[Footnote 166: Robertson Smith, _op. cit._ p. 148.]

[Footnote 167: _Ibid._ p. 148 _sq._]

On the Coast of Malabar a certain temple situated to the south-east of Calicut affords protection to thieves and adulterous women belonging to the Brahmin caste, but this privilege is reckoned among the sixty-four _anatcharams_, or "abuses," which were introduced by Brahmanism.[168] Among the Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush there are several "cities of refuge," the largest being the village of Mergrom, which is almost entirely peopled by _chiles_, or descendants of persons who have slain some fellow tribesman.[169] In the Caucasus holy groves offer refuge to criminals, as also to animals, which cannot be shot there.[170]

[Footnote 168: Graul, _Reise nach Ostindien_, iii. 332, 335.]

[Footnote 169: Scott Robertson, _Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush_, p. 441.]

[Footnote 170: Hahn, _Kaukasische Reisen_, p. 122.]

In Greece many sanctuaries possessed the right of asylum down to the end of paganism, and any violation of this right {632} was supposed to be severely punished by the deity.[171] According to an old tradition, Romulus established a sanctuary, dedicated to some unknown god or spirit, on the slope of the Capitoline Hill, proclaiming that all who resorted to it, whether bond or free, should be safe.[172] This tradition, and also some other statements made by Latin writers,[173] seem to indicate that from ancient times certain sacred places in Rome gave shelter to refugees; but it was only in a comparatively late period of Roman history that the right of sanctuary, under Greek influence, became a recognised institution of some importance.[174] This right was expressly conferred upon the temple which in the year 42 B.C. was built in honour of Cæsar;[175] and other imperial temples, as also the statues of emperors, laid claim to the same privilege.[176] When Christianity became the religion of the State a similar claim was made by the churches; but a legal right of asylum was only granted to them by Honorius in the West and Theodosius in the East.[177] Subsequently it was restricted by Justinian, who decreed that all manslayers, adulterers, and kidnappers of women who fled to a church should be taken out of it.[178]

[Footnote 171: Tacitus, _Annales_, iii. 60 _sqq._ Farnell, _op. cit._ i. 73. Westcott, _op. cit._ p. 115. Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 285. Bulmerincq, _op. cit._ p. 35 _sqq._ Fuld, _loc. cit._ p. 118 _sqq._]

[Footnote 172: Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitates Romanæ_, ii. 15. Livy, i. 8. 5 _sq._ Plutarch, _Romulus_, ix. 5. Strabo, v. 3. 2, p. 230.]

[Footnote 173: Valerius Maximus, _Facta dictaque memorabilia_, viii. 9. 1. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitates Romanæ_, vi. 45. Cicero, _De lege agraria oratio secunda_, 14 (36). See also Hartung, _Die Religion der Römer_, ii. 58 _sq._]

[Footnote 174: See Tacitus, _Annales_, iii. 36; Plautus, _Rudens_, 723; Dio Cassius, _Historia Romana_, xlvii. 19; Bulmerincq, _op. cit._ p. 58 _sqq._; Mommsen, _Römisches Strafrecht_, p. 458 _sq._]

[Footnote 175: Dio Cassius, xlvii. 19.]

[Footnote 176: Tacitus, _Annales_, iv. 67. Suetonius, _Tiberius_, 53. Mommsen, _op. cit._ p. 460.]

[Footnote 177: Mommsen, _op. cit._ p. 461 _sq._]

[Footnote 178: _Novellæ_, xvii. 7.]

The right of sanctuary existed among the pagan Slavs, or some of them,[179] and probably also among the ancient Teutons.[180] After their conversion to Christianity the privilege of asylum within the church was recognised in most of their codes. In the Middle Ages and later, persons who fled to a church or to certain boundaries surrounding it were, for a time at least, safe from all persecution, it being considered treason against God, an offence beyond compensation, to force even the most flagrant criminal from His altar. The ordinary of the sacred place, or {633} his official, was the only one who could try to induce him to leave it, but if he failed, the utmost that could be done was to deny the refugee victuals so that he might go forth voluntarily.[181] In the 'Lex Baiuwariorum' it is asserted in the strongest terms that there is no crime which may not be pardoned from the fear of God and reverence for the saints.[182] But the right of sanctuary was gradually subjected to various restrictions both by secular legislation and by the Church.[183] Innocentius III. enjoined that refuge should not be given to a highway robber or to anybody who devastated cultivated fields at night;[184] and according to Beaumanoir's 'Coutumes du Beauvoisis,' dating from the thirteenth century, it was also denied to persons guilty of sacrilege or arson.[185] The Parliament of Scotland enacted that whoever took the protection of the Church for homicide should be required to come out and undergo an assize, that it might be found whether it was committed of "forethought felony" or in "chaudemelle"; and only in the latter case was he to be restored to the sanctuary, the sheriff being directed to give him security to that effect before requiring him to leave it.[186] In England, in the reign of Henry VIII., there were certain places which were allowed to be "places of tuition and privilege," in addition to churches and their precincts. They were in fact cities of permanent refuge for persons who should, according to ancient usage, have abjured the realm, after they had fled in the ordinary way to a church. There was a governor in each of these privileged places, charged with the duty of mustering every day his men, who were not to exceed twenty in each town and who had to wear a badge whenever they appeared out of doors. But when these regulations were made, the protection of sanctuary was taken away from persons guilty of murder, rape, burglary, highway robbery, or arson. The law of sanctuary was then left unchanged till the reign of James I., when, in theory, the privilege in question was altogether denied to criminals.[187] Yet {634} as a matter of fact, asylums continued to exist in England so late as the reign of George I., when that of St. Peter's at Westminster was demolished.[188] In the legislation of Sweden the last reference to the privilege of sanctuary is found in an enactment of 1528.[189] In France it was abolished by an _ordonnance_ of 1539.[190] In Spain it existed even in the nineteenth century.[191] Not long ago the most important churches in Abyssinia,[192] the monastery of Affaf Woira in the same country,[193] and the quarter in Gondar where the head of the Abyssinian clergy has his residence,[194] were reported to be asylums for criminals. And the same is the case with the old Christian churches among the Suanetians of the Caucasus.[195]

[Footnote 179: Helmold, _Chronik der Slaven_, i. 83, p. 170.]

[Footnote 180: Wilda, _Das Strafrecht der Germanen_, p. 248 _sq._ Stemann, _Den danske Retshistorie indtil Christian V.'s Lov_, p. 578. Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 610. Fuld, _loc. cit._ p. 138 _sq._ Frauenstädt, _Blutrache und Todtschlagsühne im Deutschen Mittelalter_, p. 51.]

[Footnote 181: Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, ii. 59. Bulmerincq, _op. cit._ p. 73 _sqq._ Fuld, _loc. cit._ p. 136 _sqq._ Bracton, _De legibus et consuetudinibus Angliæ_, fol. 136 b, vol. ii. 392 _sq._ Réville, 'L'abjuratio regni,' in _Revue historique_, l. 14 _sqq._ Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 590 _sq._ Innes, _Scotland in the Middle Ages_, p. 195 _sq._]

[Footnote 182: _Lex Baiuwariorum_, i. 7.]

[Footnote 183: Brunner, _op. cit._ ii. 611 _sq._ Bulmerincq, _op. cit._ p. 91 _sqq._ Fuld, _loc. cit._ p. 140 _sq._]

[Footnote 184: Gregory IX. _Decretales_, iii. 49. 6.]

[Footnote 185: Beaumanoir, _Coutumes du Beauvoisis_, xi. 15 _sqq._, vol. i. 164 _sq._]

[Footnote 186: Innes, _op. cit._ p. 198.]

[Footnote 187: Pike, _History of Crime in England_, ii. 253. Blackstone, _Commentaries on the Laws of England_, iv. 347, n. a.]

[Footnote 188: Jusserand, _English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages_, p. 166.]

[Footnote 189: Nordström, _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_, ii. 405.]

[Footnote 190: Du Boys, _Histoire du droit criminel des peuples modernes_, ii. 246.]

[Footnote 191: _Idem_, _Histoire du droit criminel de l'Espagne_, p. 227 _sq._]

[Footnote 192: Hellwig, _op. cit._ p. 52.]

[Footnote 193: Harris, _Highlands of Æthiopia_, ii. 93.]

[Footnote 194: Rüppell, _Reise in Abyssinien_, ii. 74, 81. von Heuglin, _Reise nach Abessinien_, p. 213.]

[Footnote 195: von Haxthausen, _Transcaucasia_, p. 160, n. *]

The right of sanctuary has been ascribed to various causes. Obviously erroneous is the suggestion that places of refuge were established with a view to protecting unintentional offenders from punishment or revenge.[196] The restriction of the privilege of sanctuary to cases of accidental injuries is not at all general, and where it occurs it is undoubtedly an innovation due to moral or social considerations. Very frequently this privilege has been attributed to a desire to give time for the first heat of resentment to pass over before the injured party could seek redress.[197] But although I admit that such a desire may have helped to preserve the right of asylum where it has once come into existence, I do not believe that it could account for the origin of this right. We should remember that the privilege of sanctuary not only affords {635} temporary protection to the refugee, but in many cases altogether exempts him from punishment or retaliation, and that shelter is given even to animals which have fled to a sacred place. And, if the theory referred to were correct, how could we explain the fact that the right of asylum is particularly attached to sanctuaries?

[Footnote 196: Hegel, _Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts_, § 117, p. 108. Powell, 'Outlines of Sociology,' in _Saturday Lectures_, p. 82.]

[Footnote 197: Meiners, _Geschichte der Menschheit_, p. 189. Nordström, _op. cit._ ii. 401. Pardessus, _Loi Salique_, p. 656. Bulmerincq, _op. cit._ pp. 34, 47. Fuld, _loc. cit._ pp. 102, 118, 119, 294 _sqq._ Kohler, _Shakespeare vor dem Forum der Jurisprudenz_, p. 185. Quatremère, _loc. cit._ p. 314. Mr. Mallery (_Israelite and Indian_, p. 33 _sq._), also, thinks that the original object of the right of sanctuary was to restrict vengeance and maintain peace, and that this right only subsequently appeared as a prerogative of religion.]

It has been said that the right of sanctuary bears testimony to the power of certain places to transmit their virtues to those who entered them.[198] But we have no evidence that the fugitive is supposed to partake of the sanctity of the place which shelters him. In Morocco persons who are permanently attached to mosques or the shrines of saints are generally regarded as more or less holy, but this is never the case with casual visitors or suppliants; hence it is hardly for fear of the refugee that his pursuer refrains from laying hands on him. Professor Robertson Smith has stated part of the truth in saying that "the assertion of a man's undoubted rights as against a fugitive at the sanctuary is regarded as an encroachment on its holiness."[199] There is an almost instinctive fear not only of shedding blood,[200] but of disturbing the peace in a holy place; and if it is improper to commit any act of violence in the house of another man,[201] it is naturally considered equally offensive, and also infinitely more dangerous, to do so in the homestead of a supernatural being. In the Tonga Islands, for instance, "it is forbidden {636} to quarrel or fight upon consecrated ground."[202] But this is only one aspect of the matter; another, equally important, still calls for an explanation. Why should the gods or saints themselves be so anxious to protect criminals who have sought refuge in their sanctuaries? Why do they not deliver them up to justice through their earthly representatives?

[Footnote 198: Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, p. 223 _sq._]

[Footnote 199: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 148.]

[Footnote 200: _Supra_, i. 380.]

[Footnote 201: Among the Barea and Kunáma in Eastern Africa a murderer who finds time to flee into another person's house cannot be seized, and it is considered a point of honour for the community to help him to escape abroad (Munzinger, _Ostafrikanische Studien_, p. 503). In the Pelew Islands "no enemy may be killed in a house, especially in the presence of the host" (Kubary, 'Die Palau-Inseln in der Südsee,' in _Jour. d. Museum Godeffroy_, iv. 25). In Europe the privilege of asylum went hand in hand with the sanctity of the homestead (Wilda, _op. cit._ pp. 242, 243, 538, 543; Nordström, _op. cit._ ii. 435; Fuld, _loc. cit._ p. 152; Frauenstädt, _op. cit._ p. 63 _sqq._); and the breach of a man's peace was proportionate to his rank. Whilst every man was entitled to peace in his own house, the great man's peace was of more importance than the common man's, the king's peace of more importance than the baron's, and in the spiritual order the peace of the Church commanded yet greater reverence (Pollock, 'The King's Peace,' in _Law Quarterly Review_, i. 40 _sq._).]

[Footnote 202: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 232. _Cf._ _ibid._ i. 227.]

The answer lies in certain ideas which refer to human as well as divine protectors of refugees. The god or saint is in exactly the same position as a man to whose house a person has fled for shelter. Among various peoples the domicile of the chief or king is an asylum for criminals;[203] nobody dares to attack a man who is sheltered by so mighty a personage, and from what has been said above, in connection with the rules of hospitality, it is also evident why the chief or king feels himself compelled to protect him. By being in close contact with his host, the suppliant is able to transfer to him a dangerous curse. Sometimes a criminal can in a similar way be a danger to the king even from a distance, or by meeting him, and must in consequence be pardoned. In Madagascar an offender escaped punishment if he could obtain sight of the sovereign, whether before or after conviction; hence criminals at work on the highroad were ordered to withdraw when the sovereign was known to be coming by.[204] Among the Bambaras "une fois la sentence prononcée, si le condamné parvient à cracher sur un {637} prince, non-seulement sa personne est sacrée, mais elle est nourrie, logée, etc., par le grand seigneur qui a eu l'imprudence de se tenir à portée de cet étrange projectile."[205] In Usambara even a murderer is safe as soon as he has touched the person of the king.[206] Among the Marutse and neighbouring tribes a person who is accused of any crime receives pardon if he lays a _cupa_--the fossilised base of a conical shell, which is the most highly valued of all their instruments--at the feet of his chief; and a miscreant likewise escapes punishment if he reaches and throws himself on the king's drums.[207] On the Slave Coast "criminals who are doomed to death are always gagged, because if a man should speak to the king he must be pardoned."[208] In Ashantee, if an offender should succeed in swearing on the king's life, he must be pardoned, because such an oath is believed to involve danger to the king; hence knives are driven through the cheeks from opposite sides, over the tongue, to prevent him from speaking.[209] So also among the Romans, according to an old Jewish writer, a person condemned to death was gagged to prevent him from cursing the king.[210] Fear of the curses pronounced by a dissatisfied refugee likewise, in all probability, underlay certain other customs which prevailed in Rome. A servant or slave who came and fell down at the feet of Jupiter's high-priest, taking hold of his knees, was for that day freed from the whip; and if a prisoner with irons and bolts at his feet succeeded in approaching the high-priest in his house, he was let loose and his fetters were thrown into the road, not through the door, but from the roof.[211] Moreover, if a criminal who had been sentenced to death accidentally met a Vestal virgin on his way to the place of execution, his {638} life was saved.[212] So sensitive to imprecations were both Jupiter's high-priest and the priestesses of Vesta, that the Praetor was never allowed to compel them to take an oath.[213] Now, as a refugee may by his curse force a king or a priest or any other man with whom he establishes some kind of contact to protect him, so he may in a similar manner constrain a god or saint as soon as he has entered his sanctuary. According to the Moorish expression he is then in the _[(]âr_ of the saint, and the saint is bound to protect him, just as a host is bound to protect his guest. It is not only men that have to fear the curses of dissatisfied refugees. Let us once more remember the words which Aeschylus puts into the mouth of Apollo, when he declares his intention to assist his suppliant, Orestes:--"Terrible both among men _and gods_ is the wrath of a refugee, when one abandons him with intent."[214]

[Footnote 203: Harmon, _Voyages and Travels in the Interior of North America_, p. 297 (Tacullies). Lewin, _Hill Tracts of Chittagong_, p. 100 (Kukis). Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, (Macassars and Bugis of Celebes). Tromp, 'Uit de Salasila van Koetei,' in _Bijdragen tot de taal- land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, xxxvii. 84 (natives of Koetei, a district of Borneo). Jung, quoted by Kohler, 'Recht der Marschallinsulaner,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ xiv. 447 (natives of Nauru in the Marshall Group). Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 334 (Samoans). Rautanen, in Steinmetz, _Rechtsverhältnisse_, p. 342 (Ondonga). Schinz, _op. cit._ p. 312 (Ovambo). Rehme, 'Das Recht der Amaxosa,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ x. 50. Merker, quoted by Kohler, 'Banturecht in Ostafrika,' _ibid._ xv. 55 (Wadshagga). Merker, _Die Masai_, p. 206. Among the Barotse the residences of the Queen and the Prime Minister are places of refuge (Decle, _op. cit._ p. 75).]

[Footnote 204: Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 376.]

[Footnote 205: Raffenel, _Nouveau voyage dans le pays des nègres_, i. 385.]

[Footnote 206: Krapf, _Reisen in Ost-Afrika_, ii. 132, n. * See also Schinz, _op. cit._ p. 312 (Ovambo).]

[Footnote 207: Gibbons, _Exploration in Central Africa_, p. 129. I am indebted to Mr. N. W. Thomas for drawing my attention to this statement.]

[Footnote 208: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 224.]

[Footnote 209: _Ibid._ p. 224.]

[Footnote 210: Quoted by Levias, 'Cursing,' in _Jewish Encyclopedia_, iv. 390.]

[Footnote 211: Plutarch, _Questiones Romanæ_, 111. Aulus Gellius, _Noctes Atticæ_, x. 15. 8, 10.]

[Footnote 212: Plutarch, _Numa_, x. 5.]

[Footnote 213: Aulus Gellius, _op. cit._ x. 15. 31.]

[Footnote 214: Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 232 _sqq._]

CHAPTER XLIX

DUTIES TO GODS (_concluded_)

SUPERNATURAL beings are widely believed to have a feeling of their worth and dignity. They are sensitive to insults and disrespect, they demand submissiveness and homage.

"The gods of the Gold Coast," says Major Ellis, "are jealous gods, jealous of their dignity, jealous of the adulation and offerings paid to them; and there is nothing they resent so much as any slight, whether intentional or accidental, which may be offered them. . . . There is nothing that offends them so deeply as to ignore them, or question their power, or laugh at them."[1] The wrath of Yahveh burst forth with vehemence whenever his honour or sanctity was in the least violated, however unintentionally.[2] Many peoples consider it insulting and dangerous merely to point at one of the celestial bodies;[3] and among the North American Indians it is a widespread belief that, if anybody points at the rainbow, the finger will wither or become misshapen.[4]

[Footnote 1: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 11.]

[Footnote 2: _Cf._ Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, pp. 38, 102.]

[Footnote 3: Liebrecht, _Zur Volkskunde_, p. 341, Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstitions_, p. 344 (Chippewas). Wuttke, _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_, § 11, p. 13 _sq._]

[Footnote 4: Mooney, 'Myths of the Cherokee,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xix. 257, 442.]

Nor is it to supernatural danger only that a person exposes himself by irreverence to a god, but in many cases he is also punished by his fellow men. On the Slave Coast insults to a god "are always resented and punished by the {640} priests and worshippers of that god, it being their duty to guard his honour."[5] Among the ancient Peruvians[6] and Hebrews,[7] as also among Christian nations up to comparatively recent times, blasphemy was a capital offence. In England, in the reign of Henry VIII., a boy of fifteen was burned because he had spoken, much after the fashion of a parrot, some idle words affecting the sacrament of the altar, which he had chanced to hear but of which he could not have understood the meaning.[8] According to Muhammedan law a person guilty of blasphemy is to be put to death without delay, even though he profess himself repentant, as adequate repentance for such a sin is deemed impossible.[9] These and similar laws are rooted in the idea that the god is personally offended by the insult. It was the Lord himself who made the law that he who blasphemed His name should be stoned to death by all the congregation.[10] "Blasphemy," says Thomas Aquinas, "as being an offence directly against God, outweighs murder, which is an offence against our neighbour . . . . The blasphemer intends to wound the honour of God."[11] That blasphemy is, or should be, punished not as a sin against the deity but as an offence against the religious feelings of men, is an idea of quite modern origin.

[Footnote 5: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 81.]

[Footnote 6: Prescott, _History of the Conquest of Peru_, i. 42.]

[Footnote 7: _Leviticus_, xxiv. 14 _sqq._]

[Footnote 8: Pike, _History of Crime in England_, ii. 56.]

[Footnote 9: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 123.]

[Footnote 10: _Leviticus_, xxiv. 16.]

[Footnote 11: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, ii.-ii. 13. 3. 1.]

In many cases it is considered offensive to a supernatural being merely to mention his name. Sometimes the name is tabooed on certain occasions only or in ordinary conversation, sometimes it is not to be pronounced at all.

In Morocco the _jnûn_ (_jinn_) must not be referred to by name in the afternoon and evening after the _[(]â[s.]ar_. If speaking of them at all, the people then make use of some circumlocution; the Berbers of Southern Morocco call them _w[=i]d-iá[d.]nin_, "those others," or _w[=i]d-ur[d.]-h[)e]r'nin_, "those unseen," or _w[=i]d-tntl-tísnt_, "those who shun salt." The Greenlanders dare not pronounce the name of a glacier {641} as they row past it, for fear lest it should be offended and throw off an iceberg.[12] Some North American Indians believe that if, when travelling, they mention the names of rocks or islands or rivers, they will have much rain or be wrecked or be devoured by some monster in the river.[13] The Omahas, again, "are very careful not to use names which they regard as sacred on ordinary occasions; and no one dares to sing sacred songs except the chiefs and old men at the proper times."[14] Some other Indians considered it a profanation to mention the name of their highest divinity.[15] Among certain Australian natives the elders of the tribe impart to the youth, on his initiation, the name of the god Tharam[=u]l[)u]n; but there is such a disinclination to pronounce his name that, in speaking of him, they generally use elliptical expressions, such as "He," "the man," or "the name I told you of," and the women only know him by the name of Papang (father).[16] The Marutse and allied tribes along the Zambesi shrink from mentioning the real name of their chief god Nyambe and therefore substitute for it the word _molemo_, which has a very comprehensive meaning, denoting, besides God, all kinds of good and evil spirits, medicines, poisons, and amulets.[17] According to Cicero, there was a god, a son of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians considered it a crime to pronounce;[18] and Herodotus is unwilling to mention the name of Osiris on two occasions when he is speaking of him.[19] The divine name of Indra was secret, the real name of Agni was unknown.[20] The gods of Brahmanism have mystic names, which nobody dares to speak.[21] The real name of Confucius is so sacred that it is a statutable offence in China to {642} pronounce it; and the name of the supreme god of the Chinese is equally tabooed. "_Tien_," they say, "means properly only the material heaven, but it also means Shang-Te (supreme ruler, God); for, as it is not lawful to use his name lightly, we name him by his residence, which is in _tien_."[22] The "great name" of Allah is a secret name, known only to prophets, and possibly to some great saints.[23] Yahveh said, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain";[24] and orthodox Jews avoid mentioning the word Yahveh altogether.[25] Among Christian nations, as Professor Nyrop observes, there is a common disinclination to use the word "God" or its equivalents in everyday speech. The English say _good_ instead of God ("good gracious," "my goodness," "thank goodness"); the Germans, _Potz_ instead of _Gotts_ ("Potz Welt," "Potz Wetter," "Potz Blitz"); the French, _bleu_ instead of _Dieu_ ("corbleu," "morbleu," "sambleu"); the Spaniards, _brios_ or _diez_ instead of _Dios_ ("voto á brios," "juro á brios," "par diez").[26]

[Footnote 12: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 233.]

[Footnote 13: Nyrop, 'Navnets magt,' in _Mindre Afhandlinger udgivne af det philologisk-historiske Samfund_, 1887, p. 28.]

[Footnote 14: Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 370.]

[Footnote 15: Adair, _History of the American Indians_, p. 54.]

[Footnote 16: Howitt, 'Some Australian Beliefs,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiii. 192. See also _Idem_, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, pp. 489, 495.]

[Footnote 17: Holub, _Seven Years in South Africa_, ii. 301.]

[Footnote 18: Cicero, _De natura deorum_, iii. 22 (56).]

[Footnote 19: Herodotus, ii. 132, 171.]

[Footnote 20: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, pp. 93, 111.]

[Footnote 21: _Ibid._ p. 184.]

[Footnote 22: Friend, 'Euphemism and Tabu in China,' in _Folk-Lore Record_, iv. 76. _Cf._ Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 72.]

[Footnote 23: Sell, _Faith of Islám_, p. 185. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 273.]

[Footnote 24: _Exodus_, xx. 7.]

[Footnote 25: Herzog-Plitt, _Real-Encyklopädie für protestantische Theologie_, vi. 501 _sq._]

[Footnote 26: Nyrop, _loc. cit._ p. 155 _sqq._]

These taboos have sprung from fear. There is, first, something uncanny in mentioning the name of a supernatural being, even apart from any definite ideas connected with the act. But to do so is also supposed to summon him or to attract his attention, and this may be considered dangerous, especially if he is looked upon as malevolent or irritable, as is generally the case with the Moorish _jnûn_. The uncanny feeling or the notion of danger readily leads to the belief that the supernatural being feels offended if his name is pronounced; we have noticed a similar association of thought in connection with the names of the dead. But a god may also have good reason for wishing that his name should not be used lightly or taken in vain. According {643} to primitive ideas a person's name is a part of his personality, hence the holiness of a god may be polluted by his name being mentioned in profane conversation. Moreover, it may be of great importance for him to prevent his name from being divulged, as magic may be wrought on a person through his name just as easily as through any part of his body. In early civilisation there is a common tendency to keep the real name of a human individual secret so that sorcerers may not make an evil use of it;[27] and it is similarly believed that gods must conceal their true names lest other gods or men should be able to conjure with them.[28] The great Egyptian god Râ declared that the name which his father and mother had given him remained hidden in his body since his birth, so that no magician might have magic power over him.[29] The list of divine names possessed by the Roman pontiffs in their _indigitamenta_ was a magical instrument which laid at their mercy all the forces of the spirit world;[30] and we are told that the Romans kept the name of their tutelary god secret in order to prevent their enemies from drawing him away by pronouncing it.[31] There is a Muhammedan tradition that whosoever calls upon Allah by his "great name" will obtain all his desires, being able merely by mentioning it to raise the dead to life, to kill the living, in fact to perform any miracle he pleases.[32]

[Footnote 27: Tylor, _Early History of Mankind_, p. 139 _sqq._ Andree, _Ethnographische Parallelen_, p. 179 _sqq._ Frazer, _Golden Bough_, i. 403 _sqq._ Clodd, _Tom Tit Tot_, pp. 53-55, 81 _sqq._ Haddon, _Magic and Fetishism_, p. 22 _sq._]

[Footnote 28: Tylor, _op. cit._ p. 124 _sq._ Frazer, _op. cit._ i. 443. Clodd, _op. cit._ p. 173. Haddon, _op. cit._ p. 23 _sqq._]

[Footnote 29: Frazer, _op. cit._ i. 444.]

[Footnote 30: Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, pp. 212, 277. _Cf._ Jevons, in Plutarch's _Romane Questions_, p. lvii.]

[Footnote 31: Plutarch, _Questiones Romanæ_, 61. Pliny, _Historia naturalis_, xxviii. 4. Macrobius, _Saturnalia_, iii. 9.]

[Footnote 32: Sell, _op. cit._ p. 185. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, p. 273.]

* * * * *

One of the greatest insults which can be offered a god is to deny his existence. Plutarch was astonished at people's saying that atheism is impiety, while at the same time they attribute to gods all kinds of less creditable qualities. "I for my part," he adds, "would much rather have men to say of me that there never was a {644} Plutarch, at all, nor is now, than to say that Plutarch is a man inconstant, fickle, easily moved to anger, revengeful for trifling provocations, vexed at small things."[33] But Plutarch seems to have forgotten that a person is always most sensitive on his weak points, and that the weakest point in a god is his existence. Religious intolerance is in a large measure the result of that feeling of uncertainty which can hardly be eradicated even by the strongest will to believe. It is a means of self-persuasion in a case where such persuasion is sorely needed. Moreover, a god who is not believed to exist can be no object of worship, and to be worshipped is commonly held to be the chief ambition of a god. But atheism is a sin of civilisation. Uncultured people are ready to believe that all supernatural beings they hear of also exist.

[Footnote 33: Plutarch, _De superstitione_, 10.]

Some gods are extremely ungenerous towards all those who do not recognise them, and only them, as _their_ gods. To believe in Ahura Mazda was the first duty which Zoroastrianism required of a man; it was Angra Mainyu, the evil spirit, that had countercreated the sin of unbelief.[34] Doubt destroyed even the effects of good actions;[35] indeed, only the true believer was to be regarded as a man.[36] The faithful were summoned to a war to the death against the opposing spirits, the Daevas, and their followers.[37] And to judge from ancient writers, the Persians, when they came into contact with nations of another religion, also carried into practice the intolerant spirit of their own.[38] Yahveh said:--"Thou shalt have no other gods before me. . . . Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God."[39] In the pre-prophetic period the existence of other gods was recognised,[40] but they were not {645} to be worshipped by Yahveh's people. Nor was any mercy to be shown to their followers, for Yahveh was "a man of war."[41] The God of Christianity inherited his jealousy. In the name of Christ wars were waged, not, it is true, for the purpose of exterminating unbelievers, but with a view to converting them to a faith which alone could save their souls from eternal perdition. So far as the aim of the persecution is concerned we can thus notice a distinct progress in humanity. But whilst the punishment which Yahveh inflicted upon the devotees of other gods was merely temporal and restricted to a comparatively small number of people--he took notice of such foreign nations only which came within his sphere of interests,--Christianity was a proselytising religion on a large scale, anxious to save but equally ready to condemn to everlasting torments all those who refused to accept it, nay even the milliards of men who had never heard of it. In this point Christianity was even more intolerant than the Koran itself, which does not absolutely confine salvation to the believers in Allah and his Prophet, but leaves some hope of it to Jews, Christians, and Sabæans, though all other infidels are hopelessly lost.[42]

[Footnote 34: _Vendîdâd_, i. 8. 16.]

[Footnote 35: Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 330, n. 4.]

[Footnote 36: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, xlii. 6 _sqq._]

[Footnote 37: See Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. p. lii.; Spiegel, _Erânische Alterthumskunde_, iii. 692.]

[Footnote 38: Spiegel, _op. cit._ iii. 708.]

[Footnote 39: _Exodus_, xx. 3, 5.]

[Footnote 40: Kuenen, _Hibbert Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions_, p. 119. Baudissin, _Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte_, i. 49 _sqq._]

[Footnote 41: _Exodus_, xv. 3.]

[Footnote 42: _Koran_, v. 73.]

That Muhammedanism has in course of time become the most fanatical of existing religions is due to political rather than religious causes. For a thousand years the Christian and Muhammedan world were engaged in a deadly contest, in which the former came off victorious. Most nations confessing Islam have either lost their independence or are on the verge of losing it. The memory of past defeats and cruelties, the present state of subjection or national weakness, the fear of the future--are all factors which must be taken into account when we judge of Moslem fanaticism. In its younger days Islam was undoubtedly, not only in theory but in practice, less intolerant than its great rival, Christian subjects of Muhammedan rulers being on the whole treated with {646} consideration.[43] Earlier travellers in Arabia also speak favourably of the tolerance of its inhabitants. Niebuhr was able to write:--"I never saw that the Arabs have any hatred for those of a different religion. They, however, regard them with much the same contempt with which Christians look upon the Jews in Europe . . . . The Mahometans in India appear to be even more tolerant than those of Arabia . . . . The Mussulmans in general do not persecute men of other religions, when they have nothing to fear from them, unless in the case of an intercourse of gallantry with a Mahometan woman."[44] In China the Muhammedans live amicably with the infidel, regarding their Buddhist neighbours "with a kindly feeling which it would be hard to find in a mixed community of Catholics and Evangelicals."[45] Muhammedanism looks upon the founder of Christianity with profound reverence, as one of the apostles of God, as the only man without sin. Christian writers, on the other hand, till the middle of the eighteenth century universally treated Muhammed as a false prophet and rank impostor. Luther called him "a devil, and a first-born child of Satan," whilst Melanchthon was inclined to see in him both Gog and Magog.[46]

[Footnote 43: See von Kremer, _Culturgeschichte des Orients_, ii. 166 _sq._]

[Footnote 44: Niebuhr, _Travels through Arabia_, ii. 192, 189 _sq._ _Cf._ d'Arvieux, _Travels in Arabia the Desart_, p. 123; Wallin, _Notes taken during a Journey through Northern Arabia_, p. 21.]

[Footnote 45: Lane-Poole, _Studies in a Mosque_, p. 298 _sq._]

[Footnote 46: [Deutsch,] 'Islam,' in _Quarterly Review_, cxxvii. 295 _sq._ Bosworth Smith, _Mohammed and Mohammedanism_, pp. 67, 69. Pool, _Studies in Mohammedanism_, p. 406.]

Equal in enormity with the sin of not believing in a certain god is sometimes the sin of having a false belief about him. It seems strange that a god should be so easily offended as to punish with the utmost severity those who hold erroneous notions regarding some attribute of his which in no way affects his honour or glory, or regarding some detail of ritual. Thomas Aquinas himself admits that the heretic _intends_ to take the word of Christ, although he fails "in the election of articles whereon to take that word." But it is in this election that his sin consists. {647} Instead of choosing those articles which are truly taught by Christ, he chooses those which his own mind suggests to him. Thus he perverts the doctrines of Christ, and in consequence deserves not only to be separated from the Church by excommunication, but to be banished from the world by death.[47] Moreover, the heretic is an apostate, a traitor who may be forced to pay the vow which he has once taken.[48] The extreme rigour of this sophistical argumentation can only be understood in connection with its historical surroundings. It presupposes a Church which not only regards itself as the sole possessor of divine truth, but whose cohesion and power depend upon a strict adherence to its doctrines.[49] Nor was it a religious motive only that induced Christian sovereigns to persecute heretics. Certain heresies, as Manichæism and Donatism, were expressly declared to affect the common welfare;[50] and the Frankish kings treated heretics not only as rebels against the Church, but as traitors to the State, as confederates of hostile Visigoths or Burgundians or Lombards.[51]

[Footnote 47: Thomas Aquinas, _op. cit._ ii.-ii. 11. 1, 3.]

[Footnote 48: _Ibid._ ii.-ii. 10. 8.]

[Footnote 49: _Cf._ Ritchie, _Natural Rights_, p. 183.]

[Footnote 50: Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, ii. 33.]

[Footnote 51: _Ibid._ ii. 61.]

Whilst intolerance is a characteristic of all monotheistic religions which attribute human passions and emotions to their godhead, polytheism is by nature tolerant. A god who is always used to share with other gods the worship of his believers cannot be a very jealous god. The pious Hennepin was struck by the fact that Red Indians were "incapable of taking away any person's life out of hatred to his religion."[52] Among the natives of the African Gold and Slave Coasts, though a man must show outward respect for the gods so as not to provoke calamities, he may worship many gods or none, just as he pleases. "There is perfect liberty of thought in matters of religion. . . . At this stage, man tolerates any form of religion that tolerates others; and as he thinks it perfectly {648} natural that different people should worship different gods, he does not attempt to force his own personal opinions upon anyone, or to establish conformity of ideas."[53] On the Slave Coast even a sacrilege committed by a European is usually regarded with indifference, as the gods of a country are supposed to be concerned about the actions of the people of that country only.[54] "The characteristics of Natural Religion," says Sir Alfred Lyall, "the conditions of its existence as we see it in India, are complete liberty and material tolerance; there is no monopoly either of divine powers or even of sacerdotal privilege."[55] In China the hatred of foreigners has not its root in religion. The Catholics residing there were left undisturbed until they began to meddle with the civil and social institutions of the country;[56] and the difficulty in persuading the Chinese to embrace Christianity is said by a missionary to be due to their notion that one religion is as good as another provided that it has a good moral code.[57] Among the early Greeks and Romans it was a principle that the religion of the State should be the religion of the people, as its welfare was supposed to depend upon a strict observance of the established cult; but the gods cared for external worship rather than for the beliefs of their worshippers, and evidently took little notice even of expressed opinions. Philosophers openly despised the very rites which they both defended and practised; and religion was more a pretext than a real motive for the persecutions of men like Anaxagoras, Protagoras, Socrates, and Aristotle.[58] So also the measures by which the Romans in earlier times repressed the introduction of new religions were largely suggested by worldly considerations; "they grew out of that intense national spirit which sacrificed every {649} other interest to the State, and resisted every form of innovation, whether secular or religious, that could impair the unity of the national type, and dissolve the discipline which the predominance of the military spirit and the stern government of the Republic had formed."[59] It has also been sufficiently proved that the persecutions of the Christians during the pagan Empire sprang from motives quite different from religious intolerance. Liberty of worship was a general principle of the Imperial rule. That it was denied the Christians was due to their own aggressiveness, as also to political suspicion. They grossly insulted the pagan cult, denouncing it as the worship of demons, and every calamity which fell upon the Empire was in consequence regarded by the populace as the righteous vengeance of the offended gods. Their proselytism disturbed the peace of families and towns. Their secret meetings aroused suspicion of political danger; and this suspicion was increased by the doctrines they professed. They considered the Roman Empire a manifestation of Antichrist, they looked forward with longing to its destruction, and many of them refused to take part in its defence. The greatest and best among the pagans spoke of the Christians as "enemies," or "haters of the human race."[60]

[Footnote 52: Hennepin, _New Discovery of a Vast Country in America_, ii. 70.]

[Footnote 53: Ellis, _Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 295. See also _Idem_, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 81; Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 28; Kubary, 'Die Verbrechen und das Strafverfahren auf den Pelau-Inseln,' in _Original-Mittheil. aus d. ethnol. Abtheil. d. königl. Museen zu Berlin_, i. 90.]

[Footnote 54: Ellis, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples_, p. 81.]

[Footnote 55: Lyall, _Natural Religion in India_, p. 52.]

[Footnote 56: Davis, _China_, ii. 7. _Cf._ Edkins, _op. cit._ p. 178.]

[Footnote 57: Edkins, _op. cit._ p. 75.]

[Footnote 58: See Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 24 _sqq._]

[Footnote 59: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 493. _Cf._ Dio Cassius, _Historia Romana_, lii. 36.]

[Footnote 60: Lecky, _op. cit._ i. 408 _sqq._ Ramsay, _The Church in the Roman Empire_, p. 346 _sqq._ See also _supra_, i. 345 _sq._; ii. 178 _sq._]

The same difference in toleration between monotheistic and polytheistic religions shows itself in their different attitudes towards witchcraft. A monotheistic religion is not necessarily averse from magic; its god may be supposed to have created magical as well as natural energy, and also to have given mankind permission to utilise it in a proper manner. Both Christianity in its earlier phases and Muhammedanism are full of magical practices expressly sanctioned by their theology--for instance, the use made of sacred words and of the relics of saints. But besides this sort of magic there is another kind--witchcraft, in the narrow sense of the term,--which is ascribed to the {650} assistance of exorcised spirits, regarded not as the willing agents but as the adversaries of God; and this practice is naturally looked upon as highly offensive to His feelings. In Christianity witchcraft was esteemed the most horrible form of impiety.[61] The religious law of the Hebrews--which generally prohibited all practices that savoured of idolatry, such as soothsaying and oracles--punished witches and wizards with death.[62] Islam disapproves of all magic which is practised with the assistance of evil spirits, or _jinn_, although such magic is very prevalent and popularly tolerated in Muhammedan countries.[63] Among polytheistic peoples, again, witchcraft is certainly in many cases treated with great severity; a large number of uncivilised races punish it with death,[64] and among some of them it is the only offence which is capital.[65] But then witchcraft is punished because it is considered destructive to human life or welfare.[66] "In Africa," says Mr. Rowley, "there is what is regarded as lawful as well as unlawful witchcraft, the lawful being practised professedly for the welfare of mankind, and in opposition to the unlawful, which is resorted to for man's injury." But "the purposes of witchcraft {651} are now generally wicked; its processes generally involve moral guilt; the spirits invoked are, for the most part, avowedly evil and maleficent."[67] Among the Gaika tribe of the Kafirs "witchcraft is supposed to be an influence for evil, possessed by one individual over another, or others."[68] Among the Bondeis "the meaning of witchcraft is simply murder."[69] That witchcraft, as a malicious practice, must be a grave and at the same time frequent offence among savages, is obvious from the common belief that death, disease, and misfortunes of every description are caused by it. From a similar point of view it is condemned by polytheistic nations of a higher type. Among the Aztecs of ancient Mexico anybody who employed sorcery or incantations for the purpose of doing harm to the community or to individuals was sacrificed to the gods.[70] The Chinese Penal Code punishes with death those who have been convicted of writing and editing books of sorcery, or of employing spells and incantations, "in order to agitate and influence the minds of the people."[71] But, according to Mr. Dennys, the hatred of witches and wizards cherished in the West does not seem to exist in China; "those reputed to possess magic powers are regarded with dread, but it is rare to hear of any of them coming to untimely end by mob violence."[72] The Laws of [Hv]ammurabi, the ancient Babylonian legislator, enjoin that "if a man weave a spell and put a ban upon a man, and has not justified himself, he that wove the spell upon him shall be put to death."[73] It is said in 'Vishnu Purâna' that he who practises magical rites "for the harm of others" is punished in the hell called Krimîsa.[74] Among the ancient Teutons not every kind of magic but only such as was considered of injurious nature was criminal.[75] {652} In Rome, also, what was deemed harmless magic was left undisturbed, whereas, according to the 'Law of the Twelve Tables,' "he who affects another by magical arts or with poisonous drugs" is to be put to death;[76] and during the Empire persons were severely persecuted for political astrology or divination practised with a view to discovering the successors to the throne.[77] Plato, writes in his 'Laws':--"He who seems to be the sort of man who injures others by magic knots or enchantments or incantations or any of the like practices, if he be a prophet or divine, let him die; and, if not being a prophet, he be convicted of witchcraft, as in the previous case, let the court fix what he ought to pay or suffer."[78] As Mr. Lecky justly remarks, both in Greece and Rome the measures taken against witchcraft seem to have been almost entirely free from religious fanaticism, the magician being punished because he injured man and not because he offended God.[79] Sometimes we find even among a polytheistic people that sorcery is particularly opposed by its priesthood;[80] but the reason for this is no doubt hatred of rivals rather than religious zeal. Miss Kingsley, however, does not think that the dislike of witchcraft in West Africa at large has originally anything to do with the priesthood.[81]

[Footnote 61: Lea, _History of the Inquisition_, iii. 422, 453. Pollock and Maitland, _History of English Law before the Time of Edward I._ ii. 552 _sqq._ Milman, _op. cit._ ix. 69. Lecky, _Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe_, i. 26. Keary, _Outlines of Primitive Belief among the Indo-European Races_, p. 511 _sqq._ Rogers, _Social Life in Scotland_, iii. 265, 268. Ralston, _Songs of the Russian People_, pp. 386, 416 _sq._]

[Footnote 62: _Exodus_, xxii. 18. _Leviticus_, xix. 26, 31; xx. 6, 27. _Deuteronomy_, xviii. 10 _sqq._]

[Footnote 63: Polak, _Persien_, i. 348. Lane, _Modern Egyptians_, i. 333.]

[Footnote 64: _Supra_, i. 189 _sq._ Cruickshank, _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast_, ii. 179. Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 260. Johnston, _British Central Africa_, p. 403 (Bakongo). Cunningham, _Uganda_, pp. 35 (Banyoro), 140 (Bavuma), 305 (Basukuma), Arnot, _Garenganze_, p. 75. Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 76 (Barotse). Casalis, _Basutos_, p. 229. Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 148 _sq._ Sibree, _The Great African Island_, p. 292 (Malagasy). Swettenham, _Malay Sketches_, p. 196 (Malays of Perak). Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, (Oraons). Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 123 _sq._ Krause, _Die Tlinkit-Indianer_, p. 293 _sq._ Jones, quoted by Kohler, 'Die Rechte der Urvölker Nordamerikas,' in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ xii. 412 (Chippewas). Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 330; Seaver, _Life of Mrs. Jemison_, p. 167 (Iroquois). Powell, 'Wyandot Government,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ i. 67. Stevenson, 'Sia,' _ibid._ xi. 19. Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, i. 325 (Tarahumares). Forbes, 'Aymara Indians of Bolivia and Peru,' in _Jour. Ethn. Soc._ N. S. ii. 236, n. *]

[Footnote 65: _Supra_, i. 189.]

[Footnote 66: _Cf._ Dorsey, 'Omaha Sociology,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ iii. 364.]

[Footnote 67: Rowley, _Religion of the Africans_, p. 125 _sq._ See also Kidd, _The Essential Kafir_, p. 148.]

[Footnote 68: Maclean, _Compendium of Kafir Laws_, p. 123.]

[Footnote 69: Dale, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxv. 223.]

[Footnote 70: Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, ii. 462.]

[Footnote 71: _Ta Tsing Leu Lee_, sec. cclvi. p. 273.]

[Footnote 72: Dennys, _Folk-Lore of China_, p. 80.]

[Footnote 73: _Laws of [Hv]ammurabi_, 1.]

[Footnote 74: _Vish['n]u Purá['n]a_, p. 208.]

[Footnote 75: Brunner, _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_, ii. 678.]

[Footnote 76: _Lex Duodecim Tabularum_, viii. 25.]

[Footnote 77: Lecky, _History of European Morals_, i. 420.]

[Footnote 78: Plato, _Leges_, xi. 933.]

[Footnote 79: Lecky, _Rationalism in Europe_, i. 18.]

[Footnote 80: Kingsley, _West African Studies_, p. 137. Rink, _Greenland_, p. 201.]

[Footnote 81: Kingsley, _West African Studies_, p. 135 _sq._]

The religious intolerance which has accompanied the rise of monotheism is, as we have just observed, the result of the nature attributed to its godhead. But the evolution of religion does not end with the triumph of a jealous and irritable heavenly despot. There is a later stage where men believe in a god or supernatural power which is absolutely free from all human weakness, and in such a religion intolerance has no place. It has been said that the tolerant spirit of Buddhism[82] is due to religious {653} indifference,[83] but the original cause of it seems to be the absence of a personal god; and the increasing tolerance of modern Christianity is undoubtedly connected with the more ethical view it takes of the Deity when compared with the opinions of earlier ages. It should be remembered, however, that religious toleration does not mean passive indifference with regard to dissenting religious ideas. The tolerant man may be a great propagandist. He may do his utmost to eradicate, by means of persuasion, what he considers to be a false belief. He may even resort to stronger measures against those who do mischief in the name of their religion. But he does not persecute anybody for the sake of his faith; nor does he believe in an intolerant and persecuting god.

[Footnote 82: Hardy, _Eastern Monachism_, p. 412. Monier-Williams, _Buddhism_, p. 126. Waddell, _Buddhism of Tibet_, p. 568. Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 127. Gutzlaff, _Sketch of Chinese History_, i. 70. Forbes, _British Burma_, p. 322 _sq._]

[Footnote 83: Forbes, _op. cit._ p. 322. _Cf._ Kuenen, _Hibbert Lectures on National and Universal Religions_, p. 290.]

* * * * *

Supernatural beings, according to the belief of many races, desire to be worshipped not only because they depend upon human care for their subsistence or comfort, but because worship is an act of homage. We have seen that sacrifice, after losing its original significance, still survives as a reverent offering. So also prayer is frequently a tribute to the self-regarding pride of the god to whom it is addressed. A supplication is an act of humility, more or less flattering to the person appealed to and especially gratifying where, as in the case of a god, the granting of the request entails no deprivation or loss, but on the contrary is rewarded by the worshipper. Moreover, the request is very commonly accompanied by reverential epithets or words of eulogy; and praise, nay even flattery, is just as pleasant to superhuman as to human ears. Gods are addressed as great or mighty, as lords or kings, as fathers or grandfathers.[84] A prayer of the ancient Peruvians began with the following words:--"O conquering Viracocha! Ever present Viracocha! Thou art in the ends of the earth without equal!"[85] {654} The ancient Egyptians flattered their gods,[86] the Vedic and Zoroastrian hymns are full of praise. Muhammedans invoke Allah by sentences such as, "God is great," "God is merciful," "God is he who seeth and heareth." Words of praise, as well as words of thanks, addressed to a god, may certainly be the expressions of unreflecting admiration or gratitude, free from all thought of pleasing him; but where laudation is demanded by the god as a price for good services, it is simply a tribute to his vanity. There is a Chinese story which amusingly illustrates this little weakness of so many gods:--At the hottest season of the year there was a heavy fall of snow at Soochow. The people, in their consternation, went to the temple of the Great Prince to pray. Then the spirit moved one of them to say, "You now address me as Your Honour. Make it Your Excellency, and, though I am but a lesser deity, it may be well worth your while to do so." Thereupon the people began to use the latter term, and the snow stopped at once.[87] The Hindus say that by praise a person may obtain from the gods whatever he desires.[88]

[Footnote 84: See Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 105.]

[Footnote 85: de Molina, 'Fables and Rites of the Yncas,' in _Narratives of the Rites and Laws of the Yncas_, p. 33.]

[Footnote 86: Amélineau, _L'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypte ancienne_, p. 214.]

[Footnote 87: Giles, _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_, ii. 294.]

[Footnote 88: Ward, _View of the History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindoos_, ii. 69.]

We have different means of gratifying a person's self-regarding pride: one is to praise him, another is to humiliate ourselves. Both have been adopted by men with reference to their gods. Besides hymns of praise there are hymns of penitence, the object of which is largely to appease the angry feelings of offended gods. Prayers for remission of sins form a whole literature among peoples like that of the Vedic age, the Chaldeans,[89] and the Hebrews, who commonly regarded calamities to which men were subject not as the result of an inexorable fate nor as the machinations of evil spirits, but as divine punishments. According to early ideas, as we have seen, sin is a substance charged with injurious {655} energy, from which the infected person tries to rid himself by mechanical means.[90] But at the same time the effect of sin is conceived as a divine punishment, and this suggests atonement. In the Rig-Veda we not only hear of the removal of sins by magical operations, but the gods are requested to free the sufferer from his sin.[91]

[Footnote 89: Zimmern, _Babylonische Busspsalmen_, _passim_. Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 38 _sq._ Delitzsch, _Wo lag das Paradies?_ p. 86. Hommel, _Die semitischen Völker und Sprachen_, p. 315 _sqq._ Meyer, _Geschichte des Alterthums_, i. 178.]

[Footnote 90: _Supra_, i. 52 _sqq._]

[Footnote 91: See Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, pp. 292, 296, 317 _sq._]

Gods are fond of prayers not only as expressions of humility or repentance but for other reasons as well. In early religion a prayer is commonly connected with an offering, since the god is not supposed to bestow his favours gratuitously.[92] By the call contained in it he is invited to partake of the offering, or his attention is drawn to it.[93] "Compassionate father!" says the Tanna priest when he offers first-fruits to a deified ancestor; "here is some food for you, eat it, and be kind to us on account of it!"[94] In one of the Pahlavi texts it is said that when the guardian spirits of the righteous are invited they accept the sacrifice, whereas if they are not invited "they go up the height of a spear and will remain."[95] Throughout the Yasts we hear of the claims of deities to be worshipped with sacrifices in which they are invoked by their own names and with the proper words.[96] Mithra complains, "If men would worship me with a sacrifice in which I were invoked by my own name, as they worship the other Yazatas with sacrifices in which they are invoked by their own names, then I would come to the faithful at the appointed time."[97] {656} According to Vedic and Zoroastrian texts the gods were purified, strengthened, and encouraged not only by offerings but by prayers, although it is difficult in this respect to distinguish between two elements in one and the same rite which are so closely interwoven with each other.[98] By his invocations man assists the gods in their combats with evil demons, he sends his prayer between the earth and the heavens there to smite the fiends.[99] In a Vedic hymn the people are exhorted to "sing to Indra a song very destructive to the demons."[100] By pronouncing the praise of Asha, Zarathustra brings the Daevas to naught;[101] by mentioning the name of Ahura Mazda their malice is most effectually destroyed.[102] Thus prayer may be a religious duty also on account of the magic efficacy ascribed to it, and the same is the case with incantations directed against evil spirits.

[Footnote 92: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 364 _sqq._ Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 272 (shamanistic peoples of Siberia). Maspero, _Études de mythologie et d'archéologie égyptiennes_, i. 163; _Idem_, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 124, n. 5 (ancient Egyptians). Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. (1st ed.) p. lxix. (Zoroastrians). Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 430 _sqq._; Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 34 (Vedic people). Donaldson, 'Expiatory and Substitutionary Sacrifices of the Greeks,' in _Trans. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xxvii. 430. Grimm, _Teutonic Mythology_, i. 29. Among the Kafirs of Natal "a soldier wounded in battle would only pray if his hurt were slight; but if it were serious, he would vow a sacrifice on his return, naming perhaps the particular beast" (Shooter, _Kafirs of Natal_, p. 164).]

[Footnote 93: _Cf._ Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 104.]

[Footnote 94: Turner, _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_, p. 88.]

[Footnote 95: _Shâyast Lâ-Shâyast_, ix. 12.]

[Footnote 96: _Yasts_, viii. 23 _sqq._; x. 30.]

[Footnote 97: _Ibid._ x. 55. _Cf._ _ibid._ x. 74.]

[Footnote 98: See Bergaigne, _La religion védique_, ii. 237, 250, 273 _sqq._; Zimmer, _Altindisches Leben_, p. 337 _sqq._; Oldenberg, _Religion des Veda_, p. 437; Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 60; Meyer, _Geschichte des Alterthums_, i. 534 _sq._ (Zoroastrianism).]

[Footnote 99: _Yasna_, xxviii. 7. _Yasts_, iii. 5. _Vendîdâd_, xix. 1, 2, 8 _sqq._ Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, pp. 101, 119, 131, 193. _Idem_, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. (1st ed.) p. lxix.]

[Footnote 100: _Rig-Veda_, viii. 78. 1.]

[Footnote 101: _Yasts_, xiii. 89. _Cf._ _ibid._ xiii. 90.]

[Footnote 102: _Ibid._ i. 3, 4, 10, 11, 19.]

In earlier chapters we have often noticed how curses gradually develop into genuine prayers, and _vice versa_ may a prayer develop into a curse or spell. Dr. Rivers observes that the formulæ used in Toda magic have the form of prayers.[103] So also Assyrian incantations are often dressed in the robe of supplication, and end with the formula, "Do so and so, and I shall gladden thine heart and worship thee in humility."[104] Vedic texts which were not originally meant as charms became so afterwards. Incantations are comparatively rare in the Rig-Veda, and seem even to be looked upon as objectionable, but towards the end of the Vedic period the reign of Brahma, the power of prayer, as the supreme god in the Indian Pantheon began to dawn.[105] {657}_Brahma_ is a force by which the gods act, by which they are born, and by which the world has been formed;[106] but it is also the prayer which ascends from the altar to heaven and by means of which man wrests from the gods the boon he demands[107]--"the prayer governs them."[108] This omnipresent force is personified in Brahma[n.]aspati, the lord of prayer, who resides in the highest heaven but of whom not only every separate god but the priest himself becomes a manifestation at the moment he pronounces the mantras or sacred texts.[109] It is a current saying in India that the whole universe is subject to the gods, that the gods are subject to the mantras, that the mantras are subject to the Brahmans, and that therefore the Brahmans are the real gods.[110] In Zoroastrianism prayers are not made efficacious by devotion and fervency, but to the words themselves belongs a mysterious power and the mere recitation of them, if correct and faultless, brings that power into action;[111] in the Yasts prayer is regarded as a goddess, as the daughter of Ahura Mazda.[112] In ancient Egypt, M. Maspero observes, "la prière n'était pas comme chez nous une petition que l'homme présente au dieu, et que le dieu est libre d'accepter ou de refuser à son gré: c'était une formule dont les terms ont une valeur impérative, et dont l'énonciation exacte oblige le dieu à concéder ce qu'on lui demande."[113] Greek literature supplies other instances of men conjuring their gods by incantations;[114] the word [Greek: a)ra/] means both prayer and curse.[115] And "in the Roman, as in the majority of the old Italian cults, prayer is a magic formula, producing its effect by its own inherent quality."[116]

[Footnote 103: Rivers, _Todas_, pp. 450, 453.]

[Footnote 104: Tallqvist, 'Die assyrische Beschwörungsserie Maqlû,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xx. 22.]

[Footnote 105: Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 311 _sqq._ Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 149. Roth, 'Brahma und die Brahmanen,' in _Zeitschr. d. Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ i. 67, 71. Darmesteter, _Essais orientaux_, p. 132.]

[Footnote 106: _Atharva-Veda_, xi. 5. 5. Barth, _op. cit._ p. 38.]

[Footnote 107: Roth, _loc. cit._ p. 66 _sqq._ Barth, _op. cit._ p. 38. Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 108: _Rig-Veda_, vi. 51. 8.]

[Footnote 109: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 15 _sq._ Roth, _loc. cit._ p. 71.]

[Footnote 110: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 201 _sq._]

[Footnote 111: See Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. 71.]

[Footnote 112: _Yasts_, xiii. 92; xvii. 16.]

[Footnote 113: Maspero, _Études de mythologie et archéologie égyptiennes_, i. 163.]

[Footnote 114: See Usener, _Götternamen_, p. 335 _sq._]

[Footnote 115: _Cf._ von Lasaulx, _Der Fluch bei Griechen und Römern_, p. 6. So also the Manx word _gwee_ means both prayer and curse (Rhys, _Celtic Folklore_, i. 349).]

[Footnote 116: Renan, _Hibbert Lectures on the Influence of the Institutions, &c. of Rome on Christianity_, p. 10 _sq._ _Cf._ Jevons, in Plutarch's _Romane Questions_, p. xxviii.; Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, p. 158.]

{658} Whilst an ordinary curse readily develops into a prayer when the name of a god is brought in for the purpose of giving magic efficacy to the curse, a prayer may contrariwise assume a magic character by being addressed to a god--just as a sacrifice becomes endowed with magic energy in consequence of its contact or communion with the supernatural being to which it is offered; and the constraining force in the prayer or sacrifice may then be directed even against the god himself. But there can be little doubt that the extreme importance which the magic element in the cult attained among the nations of ancient civilisation was chiefly due to the prevalence of a powerful priesthood or class of persons well versed in sacred texts. A successful incantation presupposes a certain knowledge in him who utters it. The words of the formulæ are fixed and may not suffer the slightest modification under penalty of losing their potency. Right intonation is equally important.[117] The Brahmanic mantras "must be pronounced according to certain mystic forms and with absolute accuracy, or their efficacy is destroyed"; nay, if in the repetition of a mantra the slightest mistake is made, either by omission of a syllable or defective pronunciation, the calamity which it was intended to bring down on an enemy will inevitably recoil on the head of the repeater.[118] The potency of the incantation largely lies in the voice, which is the magical instrument _par excellence_.[119] A Buddhist priest who was asked what advantage he could expect to derive from merely repeating a number of words with the sense of which he was entirely unacquainted, gave the answer that the advantage of often repeating the sounds was incalculable, infinite;[120] and a Muhammedan writer argues that prayers which are offered in any other language than {659} Arabic are profane and useless, because "the sounds of this language"--whether understood or not--"illuminate the darkness of men" and "purify the hearts of the faithful."[121] Ideas of this sort are of course most strongly advocated by those who derive the greatest profit from them--priests or scribes. And it is easy to understand that with their increasing influence among a superstitious and credulous people the magic significance which is so readily ascribed to a religious act also has a tendency to grow in importance.

[Footnote 117: Maspero, _Études_, i. 109; _Idem_, _Dawn of Civilization_, pp. 146, 213 (ancient Egyptians). Sayce, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Andent Babylonians_, p. 319. Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 9. Sell, _Faith of Islám_, pp. 53, 79, 334, 341.]

[Footnote 118: Monier-Williams, _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_, p. 199.]

[Footnote 119: _Yasts_, iv. 5. Maspero, _Études_, ii. 373 _sq._; _Idem_, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 146 (ancient Egyptians). Sell, _op. cit._ p. 318 (Muhammedans).]

[Footnote 120: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 145.]

[Footnote 121: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 146.]

* * * * *

Among all sins there is none which gods resent more severely than disobedience to their commandments. Mr. Macdonald says of the Efatese, in the New Hebrides, that no people under the sun is more obedient to what they regard as divine mandates than these savages, who believe that an offence against a spiritual being means calamity and death.[122] The Chaldeans had a lively sense of the risks entailed upon the sinner by disobedience to the gods.[123] According to the Bible disobedience was the first sin committed by man, and death was introduced into the world as its punishment. "Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry."[124] On the history of morals this demand of obedience has exercised considerable influence. It gives emphasis to moral rules which are looked upon as divine injunctions, and it helps to preserve such rules after the conditions from which they sprang have ceased to exist. The fact that they have become meaningless does not render them less binding; on the contrary, the mystery surrounding them often increases their sanctity. The commandments of a god must be obeyed independently of their contents, simply because disobedience to him is a sin. Acts totally different in character, crimes of the worst description and {660} practices by themselves perfectly harmless, are grouped together as almost equally offensive to the deity because they have been forbidden by him.[125] And moral progress is hampered by a number of precepts which, though rooted in obsolete superstitions or antiquated ideas about right and wrong, have an obstinate tendency to persist on account of their supposed divine origin.[126]

[Footnote 122: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 201.]

[Footnote 123: Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 682. Delitzsch, _Wo lag das Paradies?_ p. 86.]

[Footnote 124: _1 Samuel_, xv. 23. Schultz, _Old Testament Theology_, ii. 286. For other instances see _Rig-Veda_, vii. 89. 5; Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. p. li.; Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, ii. 51 _sq._]

[Footnote 125: _Cf._ _supra_, i. 193 _sqq._]

[Footnote 126: _Cf._ Pollock, _Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics_, p. 306 _sq._]

* * * * *

Duties to gods are in the first place based on prudential considerations. Supernatural beings, even when on the whole of a benevolent disposition, are no less resentful than men, and, owing to their superhuman power, much more dangerous. On the other hand, they may also bestow wonderful benefits upon those who please them. The general rule that prudence readily assumes a moral value holds particularly true of religious matters, where great individual interests are at stake. Waterland says in his Sermon on Self-love:--"The wisest course for any man to take is to secure an interest in the life to come. . . . He may love himself, in this instance, as highly and as tenderly as he pleases. There can be no excess of fondness, or self-indulgence, in respect of eternal happiness. This is loving himself in the best manner, and to the best purposes. All virtue and piety are thus resolvable into a principle of self-love. . . . It is with reference to ourselves, and for our own sakes, that we love even God himself."[127]

[Footnote 127: Waterland, 'On Self-Love,' in _The English Preacher_, i. 101 sq._ Cf._ Paley's definition of virtue in his _Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy_, i. 7 (_Complete Works_, ii. 38; _supra_, i. 300).]

At the same time it may be not only in people's own interests, but in the interests of their fellow men as well, for them to be on friendly terms with supernatural beings. These beings often visit the iniquity of fathers or forefathers upon children or descendants, or punish the community for the sins of one of its members;[128] and, on the other hand, they reward the whole family or group for the virtues of a single individual.[129] So also, when the {661} members of a community join in common acts of worship, each worshipper promotes not only his own welfare, but the welfare of his people. In early religion it is of the utmost importance for the tribe or nation that the established cult should be strictly observed. This is a fact which cannot be too much emphasised when we have to explain how conduct which is pleasing to a god has come to be regarded as a moral duty; for, if the latest stages of religious development be excepted, the relations between men and their gods are communal rather than individual in character. Ahura Mazda said, "If men sacrifice unto Verethraghna, made by Ahura, if the due sacrifice and prayer is offered unto him just as it ought to be performed in the perfection of holiness, never will a hostile horde enter the Aryan countries, nor any plague, nor leprosy, nor venomous plants, nor the chariot of a foe, nor the uplifted spear of a foe!"[130] Thus the duties to gods are at the same time social duties of the first order, owing to the intensely social character of religious relationships.

[Footnote 128: _Supra_, i. 48 _sqq._]

[Footnote 129: _Supra_, i. 96 _sqq._]

[Footnote 130: _Yasts_, xiv. 48.]

Another circumstance which has contributed to the moral condemnation of offences against gods is that people are anxious to punish such offences in order to prevent the divine wrath from turning against themselves;[131] for punishment, as we have seen, easily leads to moral disapproval. But although prudential considerations of some kind or other be the chief cause of the obligatory character attached to men's conduct towards their gods, they are not the only cause. We must also remember that gods are regarded with genuine reverence by their worshippers; and where this is the case offences against religion naturally excite sympathetic resentment in the latter, whilst great piety calls forth sympathetic approval and is praised as a virtue.

[Footnote 131: _Supra_, i. 194.]

I have here spoken of duties which men consider they owe to their gods, not of duties to supernatural beings in general. This distinction, though not always easy to {662} follow in detail, is yet of vital importance. People may no doubt be afraid to offend and even anxious to please other spirits besides their gods, but religious duties chiefly arise where there are established relationships between men and supernatural beings; indeed, it may even be a duty to refrain from worshipping or actually to persecute other spirits, as is the case in monotheistic religions. Men depend for their welfare on their gods more than on any other members of the spiritual world. They select as their gods those supernatural beings from whom they think they have most to fear or most to hope. Hence it is generally in the relations to them only that those factors, prudential and reverential, are to be found which lead to the establishment of religious duties.

CHAPTER L

GODS AS GUARDIANS OF MORALITY

AS men are concerned about the conduct of their fellow men towards their gods, so gods are in many cases concerned about men's conduct towards one another--disapproving of vice and punishing the wicked, approving of virtue and rewarding the good. But this is by no means a universal characteristic of gods. It is a quality attributed to certain deities only and, as it seems, in most instances slowly acquired.

We are told by competent observers that the supernatural beings of savage belief frequently display the utmost indifference to all questions of worldly morality. According to Messrs. Spencer and Gillen, the Central Australian natives, though they assume the existence of both friendly and mischievous spirits, "have not the vaguest idea of a personal individual other than an actual living member of the tribe who approves or disapproves of their conduct, so far as anything like what we call morality is concerned."[1] The Society Islanders maintained that "the only crimes that were visited by the displeasure of their deities were the neglect of some rite or ceremony."[2] The religious belief of the Gonds of Central India is said to be wholly unconnected with any idea of morality; a moral deity demanding righteous conduct from his creatures, our informant adds, is a religious {664} conception far beyond the present capacity either of the Indian savage or the ordinary Hindu.[3] Of the E[(w]e-, Yoruba-, and Tshi-speaking peoples of the West African Slave and Gold Coasts Major Ellis writes:--"Religion, at the stage of growth in which we find it among these three groups of tribes, has no connection with morals, or the relations of men to one another. It consists solely of ceremonial worship, and the gods are only offended when some rite or ceremony has been neglected or omitted. . . . Murder, theft, and all offences against the person or against property, are matters in which the gods have no immediate concern, and in which they take no interest, except in the case when, bribed by a valuable offering, they take up the quarrel in the interests of some faithful worshipper."[4] So also among the Bambala, a Bantu tribe in the Kasai, south of the River Congo, "there is no belief that the gods or spirits punish wrong-doing by afflicting the criminal or his family, nor are the acts of a man supposed to affect his condition after death."[5] The Indians of Guiana, says Sir E. F. Im Thurn, observe an admirable code of morality, which exists side by side with a simple animistic form of religion, but the two have absolutely no connection with one another.[6] With reference to the Tarahumares of Mexico Dr. Lumholtz states that the only wrong towards the gods of which an Indian may consider himself guilty is that he does not dance enough. "For this offence he asks pardon. Whatever bad thoughts or actions toward man he may have on his conscience are settled between himself and the person offended."[7] In the primitive Indian's conception of a god," Mr. Parkman observes, "the idea of moral good {665} has no part. His deity does not dispense justice for this world or the next."[8]

[Footnote 1: Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 491.]

[Footnote 2: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 397.]

[Footnote 3: Forsyth, _Highlands of Central India_, p. 145. See also Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 124 (Bódo and Dhimáls); Caldwell, _Tinnevelly Shanars_, p. 36; Lyall, _Asiatic Studies_, p. 45; Radloff, _Das Schamanenthum_, p. 13 (Turkish tribes of the Altai).]

[Footnote 4: Ellis, _Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 293. _Idem_, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 10. The E[(w]e god Mawu is represented as an exception to this rule (_infra_, p. 686).]

[Footnote 5: Torday and Joyce, 'Ethnography of the Ba-Mbala,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxv. 415.]

[Footnote 6: Im Thurn, _Indians of Guiana_, p. 342.]

[Footnote 7: Lumholtz, _Unknown Mexico_, i. 332.] [Footnote 8: Parkman, _Jesuits in North America_, p. lxxviii. See also Eastman, _Dacotah_, p. xx.; Schoolcraft, _Indian Tribes of the United States_, ii. 195 (Dacotahs).]

That many savage gods are so thoroughly selfish as to care about nothing else than what concerns their own interests, may also be inferred from the character attributed to them. We have seen that the altruistic sentiment is the chief source from which moral emotions spring, and of the gods of various uncivilised peoples we hear not only that they are totally destitute of benevolent feelings, but that they are of a malicious nature and mostly intent on doing harm to mankind.[9]

[Footnote 9: See Meiners, _Geschichte der Religionen_, i. 405; Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 329; Avebury, _Origin of Civilisation_, p. 232 _sqq._; Roskoff, _Geschichte des Teufels_, i. 20 _sq._; Frazer, _Golden Bough_, iii. 40 _sqq._; Karsten, _Origin of Worship_, p. 46 _sqq._]

The Maoris of New Zealand regarded their deities as the causes of pain, misery, and death, as mighty enemies from whom nobody ever thought of getting any aid or good, but who were to be rendered harmless by means of charms or spells or by sacrifices offered to appease their wrath.[10] The Tahitians "supposed their gods were powerful spiritual beings, in some degree acquainted with the events of this world, and generally governing its affairs; never exercising any thing like benevolence towards even their most devoted followers, but requiring homage and obedience, with constant offerings; denouncing their anger, and dispensing destruction on all who either refused or hesitated to comply."[11] The Fijians "formed no idea of any voluntary kindness on the part of their gods, except the planting of wild yams, and the wrecking of strange canoes and foreign vessels on their coast";[12] and that some of these beings were conceived as positively wicked is indicated by the names given them--"the adulterer," "the rioter," "the murderer," and so forth.[13] The people of Aneiteum, in the New Hebrides, maintained that "earth and air and ocean were filled with natmasses, spiritual beings, but all malignant, who ruled over everything that affected the human race. . . . Their deities, like themselves, were {666} all selfish and malignant; they breathed no spirit of benevolence."[14]

[Footnote 10: Taylor, _Te Ika a Maui_, pp. 104, 148. Colenso, _Maori Races of New Zealand_, p. 62. _Cf._ Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 118.]

[Footnote 11: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 336.]

[Footnote 12: Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 195.]

[Footnote 13: _Ibid._ p. 185.]

[Footnote 14: Inglis, _In the New Hebrides_, pp. 30, 32.]

The Santal of India believes in no god from whose benignity he may expect favour, but in "a multitude of demons and evil spirits, whose spite he endeavours by supplications to avert." Even his family god "represents the secret principle of evil, which no bolts can shut out, and which dwells in unseen but eternally malignant presence beside every hearth."[15] The Kamchadales do not seem to have hoped for anything good from their deities; Kutka himself, the creator of the universe and the greatest of the gods, was once caught in adultery and castrated.[16]

[Footnote 15: Hunter, _Annals of Rural Bengal_, i. 181 _sq._]

[Footnote 16: Klemm, _Cultur-Geschichte der Menschheit_, ii. 318 _sq._ Steller, _Beschreibung von Kamtschatka_, p. 264.]

According to the beliefs of the Koksoagmyut, or Hudson Bay Eskimo, all the minor spirits are under the control of the great spirit whose name is Tung ak, and this being "is nothing more or less than death, which ever seeks to torment and harass the lives of people that their spirits may go to dwell with him."[17] Nay, even the special guardian spirit by which each person is supposed to be attended is malignant in character and ever ready to seize upon the least occasion to work harm upon the individual whom it accompanies; its good offices can be obtained by propitiation only.[18] Among the Nenenot, or Indians of Hudson Bay, "the rule seems to be that all spirits are by nature bad, and must be propitiated to secure their favour."[19] Of various Brazilian tribes we are likewise told that they do not believe in the existence of any benevolent spirits. Thus the Coroado Indian acknowledges only an evil principle, which sometimes meets him in the form of a lizard or a crocodile or an ounce or a man with the feet of a stag, sometimes transforms itself into a swamp, and leads him astray, vexes him, brings him into difficulty and danger, and even kills him.[20] The Mundrucus of the Cuparí have no notion of a good supreme being, but believe in an evil spirit, regarded merely as a kind of hobgoblin, who is at the bottom of all their little failures and gives them troubles in fishing, hunting, and so forth.[21] The Uaupés, says Mr. Wallace, "appear to have no definite idea of a God. . . . They have much more definite ideas of a bad spirit, 'Juruparí,' or Devil, whom they fear and {667} endeavour through their _pagés_ [or medicine men] to propitiate. When it thunders, they say the 'Juruparí' is angry, and their idea of natural death is that the 'Juruparí' kills them."[22]

[Footnote 17: Turner, 'Ethnology of the Ungava District,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 272.]

[Footnote 18: _Ibid._ p. 194.]

[Footnote 19: _Ibid._ p. 193 _sq._]

[Footnote 20: von Spix and von Martius, _Travels in Brazil_, ii. 243.]

[Footnote 21: Bates, _The Naturalist on the River Amazons_, ii. 137.]

[Footnote 22: Wallace, _Travels on the Amazon_, p. 500.]

In Eastern Africa, according to Burton, "the sentiment generally elicited by a discourse upon the subject of the existence of a Deity is a desire to see him, in order to revenge upon him the deaths of relatives, friends, and cattle."[23] The only quality of a moral character which the Wanika are said to ascribe to the supreme being,

Mulungu, is that of vindictiveness and cruelty.[24] To the Matabele the idea of a benevolent deity is utterly foreign, but they have a vague notion of a number of evil spirits always ready to do harm, and the chief among these are the spirits of their ancestors.[25] All the good the Bechuanas enjoy they ascribe to rainmakers, but "all the evil that comes they attribute to a supernatural being";[26] of their principal god, Morimo, Mr. Moffat never once, in the course of twenty-five years spent in missionary labour, heard that he did good or was capable of doing so.[27] Among various other African peoples, travellers assure us, supernatural beings are supposed to exercise a potent influence for evil rather than for good, or beneficent spirits are, at any rate, almost unknown.[28] On the Gold Coast, according to Major Ellis, the majority of spirits are malignant, and every misfortune is ascribed to their action. "I believe," he adds, "that originally all were conceived as malignant, and that the indifference, or the beneficence (when propitiated by sacrifice and flattery), which are now believed to be characteristics of some of these beings, are later modifications of the original idea."[29]

[Footnote 23: Burton, _Lake Regions of Central Africa_, ii. 348.]

[Footnote 24: New, _Life, Wanderings, and Labours in Eastern Africa_, p. 103 _sq._]

[Footnote 25: Decle, _Three Years in Savage Africa_, p. 153.]

[Footnote 26: Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, ii. 204.]

[Footnote 27: Moffat, _Missionary Labours in Southern Africa_ (ed. 1842), p. 262.]

[Footnote 28: Rowley, _Religion of the Africans_, p. 55. Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 443. Mockler-Ferryman, _British Nigeria_, p. 255 _sq._]

[Footnote 29: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples_, pp. 12, 18, 20. _Cf._ Cruickshank, _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast_, ii. 134.]

Of many savages it is reported that they have notions of good, as well as of evil spirits, but that they chiefly or exclusively worship the evil ones, since the others are supposed to be so good that they require no offerings or homage.[30] But adoration of supernatural beings which are {668} considered at least occasionally beneficent is also very prevalent among uncivilised peoples.[31] The gods of the pagan Lapps were all good, although they took revenge upon those who offended them.[32] Among the Navaho Indians of New Mexico "the gods who are supposed to love and help men the most receive the greatest honour"; whereas the evil spirits are not worshipped except, rumour says, by the witches.[33] The belief in guardian or tutelary spirits of tribes, clans, villages, families, or individuals, is extremely widespread.[34] These spirits may be exacting enough--they are often greatly feared by their own worshippers, and sometimes described as distinctly malignant {669} by nature;[35] but their general function is nevertheless to afford assistance to the person or persons with whom they are associated. At the same time it should be noticed that the goodness of many savage gods only consists in their readiness to help those who please them by offerings or adoration; and in no case does their benevolence prove that they take an active interest in morality at large. A friendly supernatural being is not necessarily a guardian of men's behaviour towards their fellow men. In Morocco the patron saint of a town, village, or tribe is not in the least concerned about any kind of conduct which has not immediate reference to himself.[36] It is believed that even the robber may, by invoking a dead saint, secure his assistance in an unlawful enterprise.

[Footnote 30: Wilken, _Het Animisme bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel_, p. 207 _sq._ Perham, 'Sea Dyak Religion,' in _Jour. Straits Branch Roy. Asiatic Soc._ no. 10, p. 220; St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 69 _sq._ (Sea Dyaks). Blumentritt, 'Der Ahnencultus und die religiösen Anschauungen der Malaien des Philippinen-Archipels,' in _Mittheil. d. kais. u. kön. Geograph. Gesellsch. in Wien_, xxv. 166 _sqq._ Prain, 'Angami Nagas,' in _Revue coloniale internationale_, v. 489. Forsyth, _op. cit._ pp. 141, 143 (Gonds). Hooker, _Himalayan Journals_, i. 126 (Lepchas). Robertson, _History of America_, i. 383; Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, pp. 150, 151, 232, 260; Dorman, _Origin of Primitive Superstition_, p. 30 (American Indians). Sproat, _Scenes and Studies of Savage Life_, p. 212 (Ahts). Falkner, _Description of Patagonia_, p. 116; Prichard, _Through the Heart of Patagonia_, p. 97.]

[Footnote 31: See _supra_, ii. 615 _sq._]

[Footnote 32: von Düben, _Lappland_, pp. 227, 285. Friis, _Lappisk Mythologi_, p. 106. Jessen, _Norske Finners og Lappers Hedenske Religion_, p. 33.]

[Footnote 33: Matthews, _Navaho Legends_, p. 40. See also _ibid._ p. 33.]

[Footnote 34: Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, pp. 17, 18, 77, 92. _Idem_, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 75. Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 387 (Mpongwe). Tuckey, _River Zaire_, p. 375. Ellis, _History of Madagascar_, i. 395 _sq._ Ratzel, _History of Mankind_, i. 321 (various South Sea Islanders). Turner, _Samoa_, p. 17 _sq._ Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 185 _sq._ Inglis, _op. cit._ p. 30 (people of Aneiteum). Christian, _Caroline Islands_, p. 75. Wilken, _Het Animisme_, pp. 231 _sqq._ (Minahassers, Macassars, and Bugis of Celebes), 243 (Javanese). Selenka, _Sonnige Welten_, p. 103 _sq._ (Dyaks). Forbes, _Insulinde_, p. 203 (natives of Tenimber). von Brenner, _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_, p. 221 (Bataks). Mason, 'Religion, &c. among the Karens,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxiv. 196. Hunter, _Annals of Rural Bengal_, i. 182, 186 _sq._ (Santals). Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 128 (Bódo and Dhimáls). Bailey, 'Veddahs of Ceylon,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. ii. 301; Nevill, 'Vaeddas of Ceylon,' in _Taprobanian_, i. 194. Schmidt, _Ceylon_, p. 291 _sq._ (Tamils). Bergmann, _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_, iii. 182 _sq._ Abercromby, _Pre- and Proto-historic Finns_, i. 160 (Ostiaks). Buch, 'Die Wotjaken,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xii. 595 _sq._ Castrén, _Nordiska resor och forskningar_, iii. 106, 107, 174 _sq._ (Finnish tribes). Boas, 'Central Eskimo,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi. 591. Turner, _ibid._ xi. 193 _sq._ (Hudson Bay Eskimo), 272 (Hudson Bay Indians). Hoffman, 'Menomini Indians,' _ibid._ xiv. 65. McGee, 'Siouan Indians,' _ibid._ xv. 179; Parkman, _op. cit._ p. lxx; Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 227 (North American Indians). Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, pp. 72 (North American Indians), 171

(Indians of the Great Antilles). Couto de Magalhães, _Trabalho preparatorio para aproveitamento do selvagem no Brazil--O selvagem_, p. 128 _sqq._ Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 199 _sqq._]

[Footnote 35: Schmidt, _Ceylon_, p. 291 _sq._ (Tamils). Turner, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 193 _sq._ (Hudson Bay Eskimo), 272 (Hudson Bay Indians). McGee, _ibid._ xv. 179; Müller, _op. cit._ p. 72 (North American Indians).]

[Footnote 36: For a singular exception to this rule see _supra_, ii. 67 _sq._]

On the other hand, instances are not wanting in which savage gods are supposed to punish the transgression of rules relating to worldly morality. Occasionally, as we have noticed above, such gods are represented as avengers of some special kind of wrong-doing--murder,[37] theft,[38] niggardliness,[39] want of hospitality,[40] or lying.[41] Of certain Negro tribes we are told that, "when a man is about to commit a crime, or do that which his conscience tells him he ought not to do, he lays aside his fetiche, and covers up his deity, that he may not be privy to the deed."[42] The Tonga Islanders "firmly believe that the gods approve of virtue, and are displeased with vice; that every man has his tutelar deity, who will protect him as long as he conducts himself as he ought to do; but, if he does not, will leave him to the approaches of misfortune, disease, and death. . . . All rewards for virtue or punishments for vice happen to men in this world only, {670} and come immediately from the gods."[43] The Ainu of Japan are heard to say, "We could not go contrary to the customs of our ancestors without bringing down upon us the wrath of the gods."[44] And of various savages we are told that they believe in the existence of a supreme being who is a moral lawgiver or judge.

[Footnote 37: _Supra_, i. 378 _sq._]

[Footnote 38: _Supra_, ii. 59 _sq._]

[Footnote 39: _Supra_, i. 561 _sq._]

[Footnote 40: _Supra_, i. 578.]

[Footnote 41: _Supra_, ii. 114 _sq._]

[Footnote 42: Tuckey, _op. cit._ p. 377. _Cf._ Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 27, n. *]

[Footnote 43: Mariner, _Natives of the Tonga Islands_, ii. 149, 107.]

[Footnote 44: Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 243 _sq._]

In Australia, especially in New South Wales and Victoria but also in other parts of the continent, many of the native tribes have the notion of an "All-father," called Baiame, Daramulun, Mungan-ngalla, Bunjil, Nurelli, Nurundere, or by some other name.[45] He is represented as an anthropomorphic, supernatural being and as the father of the race or the maker of everything, who at one time dwelt on the earth but afterwards ascended to a land beyond the sky, where he still remains. He is of a kindly disposition, and requires no worship; in a very few cases only we meet with some faint traces of a cult offered him.[46] {671} He is frequently believed to have instituted the initiation ceremonies,[47] and to have given the people their laws.[48] Thus Nurundere is said to have taught the Narrinyeri all the rites and ceremonies whether connected with life or death; on inquiry why they adhere to any custom, the reply is that Nurundere commanded it.[49] At the _boorah_, or initiation, of the Euahlayi tribe, Byamee is proclaimed as "Father of All, whose laws the tribes are now obeying"; and in one of their myths he is described as the original source of all the totems and of the law that persons of the same totem may not intermarry.[50] Bunjil taught the Kulin the arts of life, and told them to divide themselves into two intermarrying classes so as to prevent marriages between kindred.[51] Daramulun instructed the Yuin what to do and gave them laws which the old people have handed down from father to son to the present time.[52] And in several instances the Australian "All-father" is represented as a guardian of morality who punishes the wicked and rewards the good. Bunjil "very frequently sent his sons to destroy bad men and bad women . . . who had killed and eaten blacks."[53] Daramulun, or Tharamulun, who from his residence in the sky watches the actions of men, "is very angry when they do things that they ought not to do, as when they eat forbidden food."[54] The natives of the Herbert River, in Queensland, believe that anybody who takes a wife from the prohibited sub-class, or who does not wear the morning necklace for the prescribed period, or who eats forbidden food, will sooner or later die in consequence, since his behaviour is offensive to Kohin, a supernatural being who is supposed to have his dwelling in the Milky Way but to roam about at night on earth as a gigantic warrior killing those whom he meets.[55] Most commonly, however, the retribution is said to come after death. {672} The tribes about Maryborough, in Queensland, maintain that the ghosts of those who are good or those who have a high degree of excellence in any particular line--fishing, hunting, fighting, dancing, and so forth--are directed by Birral to an island in the Far North, where he resides.[56] Among the Cape River tribes, "when a Blackfellow dies whose actions during life have been what they hold to be good, he is said to ascend to Boorala (_i.e._, to the Creator, literally 'good'), where he lives much as he did on earth, less the usual terrestrial discomforts"; whereas to the man who has led a bad life death is thought to be simple annihilation.[57] The Kulin said that when they die they will be subjected to a sort of trial by Binbeal, "the good being rewarded in a better land, the bad driven away, but where they seemed to have no idea."[58] According to another account, again, Binbeal, after he has subjected the spirits of the deceased to an ordeal of fire to try whether they are good or bad, liberates the good at once, whereas the bad are confined and punished.[59] The Illawarra, who lived from thirty to a hundred miles south of Sidney, believed that when people die they are brought up to a large tree where Mirirul, the supreme ruler, examines and judges them. The good he takes up to the sky, the bad he sends to another place to be punished. The women said to their children when they were naughty, "Mirirul will not allow it."[60] Among the Wathiwathi, in New South Wales, the belief prevails that if the spirit of a bad man escapes the traps which are set for it on its course in the sky, it is sure to fall into the hell of fire. The good spirit, on the other hand, is received by two old women who take care of it till it becomes accustomed to its new abode; and after a time the great God, Tha-tha-puli, comes with a host of spirits to see the newcomer and try his strength.[61] According to a report written by Archdeacon

Günther in 1839, Baiame is supposed to like the blacks who are good; and "there is also an idea entertained by the more thoughtful that good natives will go to Baiame when they die."[62] Later authorities state that Baiame is believed not only to reward the good after death, but also to punish the wicked--that is, persons who tell lies or kill men by striking them secretly or who are unkind towards the old and sick or, generally, who break his laws.[63] A very elaborate {673} theory of retribution is communicated by Mr. Manning, whose notes date from 1844 or 1845. Boyma (Baiame) is said to be seated far away in the north-east on an immense throne made of transparent crystal and standing in a great lake. He has a son, Grogoragally, equal with him in omniscience, who acts as mediator for the souls to the Great God. His office is to watch over the actions of mankind and to bring to life the dead to appear before the judgment-seat of his Father, who alone pronounces the judgment of eternal happiness in heaven or eternal misery in a hell of everlasting fire. Women and boys dying before the initiation, however, do not go to heaven; the men have a vague idea that another world is reserved for them. There is also a third person, half human, half divine, called Moodgeegally, who makes Boyma's will known to mankind and is the avowed enemy of all wicked people, transmitting their misdeeds to Grogoragally.[64]

[Footnote 45: Henderson, _Colonies of New South Wales_, p. 147. de Strzelecki, _New South Wales_, p. 339. Manning, 'Aborigines of New Holland,' in _Jour. and Proceed. Roy. Soc. N.S. Wales_, xvi. 157 _sqq._ Ridley, _Kámilarói_, p. 135 _sqq._ Cameron, 'Some Tribes of New South Wales,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiv. 364 _sq._ Langloh Parker, _Euahlayi Tribe_, p. 4 _sqq._ Threlkeld, _An Australian Language as spoken by the Awabakal_, p. 47. Mathews, _Aboriginal Tribes of New South Wales and Victoria_, p. 138 _sqq._ Mathew, _Eagle-hawk and Crow_, p. 146 _sqq._ Fountain and Ward, _Rambles of an Australian Naturalist_, p. 296. _Missions-Blatt aus der Brüdergemeine_, xvi. 101, 143; Parker, _Aborigines of Australia_, p. 24; Dawson, _Australian Aborigines_, p. 49 (tribes in Victoria). Brough Smyth, _Aborigines of Victoria_, i. 423 _sqq._ Taplin, 'Narrinyeri,' in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_, p. 55 _sqq._ Howitt, _Native Tribes of South-East Australia_, p. 489 _sqq._ Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 498 _sq._ (Kaitish). Strehlow, quoted by Thomas, 'Religious Ideas of the Arunta,' in _Folk-Lore_, xvi. 429 _sq._ _Idem_, quoted by von Leonhardi, 'Religiöse und totemistische Vorstellungen der Aranda und Loritja in Zentralaustralien,' in _Globus_, xci. 286 _sq._ Curr, _The Australian Race_, i. 253 (Larrak[=i]a); ii. 465, 475 (some Cape River natives). Lang, _Cooksland_, p. 459 _sq._; _Idem_, _Queensland_, p. 379 _sq._ Roth, _Ethnol. Studies among the North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_, pp. 16, 153. 158. Salvado, _Mémoires historiques sur l'Australie_, p. 258 (natives of West Australia).]

[Footnote 46: When the natives of Cooksland, in North-Eastern Australia, rob a wild bees' hive they generally leave a little of the honey for Buddai, the supernatural ancestor of their race (Lang, _Cooksland_, p. 460; _Idem_, _Queensland_, p. 380). Mrs. Langloh Parker (_op. cit._ pp. 8, 9, 79, 89) was told that in the Euahlayi tribe prayers are addressed to Byamee at funerals for the souls of the dead, and that at some initiatory rites the oldest medicine-man present addresses a prayer to him asking him to give the people long life as they have kept his law; but they do not profess to pray or to have prayed to Byamee on any other occasions (_cf._ Manning, _loc. cit._ p. 164). The natives inhabiting the neighbourhood of Lake Boga in Victoria have to placate Pei-a-mei by dances (_Missions-Blatt aus der Brüdergemeine_, xvi. 143). Of the South-Eastern Australian Daramulun Mr. Howitt says (_op. cit._ p. 507 _sq._) that, although there is no worship of him, "the dances round the figure of clay and the invocating of his name by the medicine-men certainly might have led up to it."]

[Footnote 47: Manning, _loc. cit._ p. 165; Ridley, _op. cit._ pp. 141, 155; Langloh Parker, _op. cit._ p. 7 (Boyma, Baiame, Byamee). Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 495 (Daramulun). M'Kinlay, quoted _ibid._ p. 496. Mr. Threlkeld says (_op. cit._ p. 47) that Koin, an imaginary male being who has the appearance of a black, is supposed to precede the coming of the natives from distant parts when they assemble to celebrate certain of their ceremonies.]

[Footnote 48: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 489 (Nurelli of the Wiimbaio). M'Kinlay, quoted _ibid._ p. 496.]

[Footnote 49: Taplin, in Woods, _op. cit._ p. 55.]

[Footnote 50: Langloh Parker, _op. cit._ p. 7 _sq._]

[Footnote 51: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 491.]

[Footnote 52: _Ibid._ p. 495.]

[Footnote 53: Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ i. 423.]

[Footnote 54: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 495.]

[Footnote 55: _Ibid._ p. 499.]

[Footnote 56: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 498.]

[Footnote 57: Curr, _op. cit._ ii. 475.]

[Footnote 58: Parker, _Aborigines of Australia_, p. 24.]

[Footnote 59: Ridley, _op. cit._ p. 137.]

[Footnote 60: _Ibid._ p. 137.]

[Footnote 61: Cameron, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xiv. 364 _sq._]

[Footnote 62: Günther, quoted by Thomas, in _Man_, 1905, p. 51.]

[Footnote 63: Ridley, _op. cit._ pp. 135, 136, 140. Langloh Parker, _op. cit._ p. 70.]

[Footnote 64: Manning, _loc. cit._ p. 159 _sqq._]

It seems probable that these statements represent a mixture of Christian ideas and genuine aboriginal beliefs. There is reason to believe that the Australian notion of an "All-father" is not in the first instance due to missionary influence;[65] we have records of it from a comparatively early date, it is spread over a wide area, it has been found among natives who live in a state of great isolation, and the multitude of different names by which the "All-father" is called in different tribes does not suggest a recent origin from a common source. He may very well be a mythical ancestor. Mr. Howitt observes that the master in the sky-country represents the Australian idea of a headman--"a man who is skilful in the use of weapons of offence and defence, all-powerful in magic, but generous and liberal to his people, who does no injury or violence to any one, yet treats with severity any breaches of custom or morality."[66] But he may also be a personification of supernatural force in general, or a being who has been invented to account for all kinds of marvellous phenomena. The word _altjira_, by which the Arunta call their great god, is apparently not a proper name; according to Kempe, it is applied to five gods, whose names he gives, as also to the sun, moon, and remarkable things generally.[67] And Mulkari, who figures in the beliefs of some Queensland tribes, is described not only as "a benevolent, omnipresent, supernatural being," but as "anything incomprehensible," as {674} the supernatural power who makes everything which the blacks cannot otherwise account for.[68] On the other hand, it is hardly possible to doubt that in various instances Christian conceptions have been infused into the aboriginal belief either by the natives themselves or by our informants.[69] Biblical traits are conspicuous in some of the legends. Bishop Salvado tells us that, according to West Australian beliefs, the Creator, Motogon, "employa ces paroles: 'Terre, parais dehors': et il souffla, et la terre fut créée. 'Eau, parais dehors'; et il souffla, et l'eau fut créée."[70] The believers in Nourelle give the following account of the origin of death:--The first created man and woman were told not to go near a certain tree in which a bat was living, as the bat was not to be disturbed. But one day the woman, while gathering firewood, went near the forbidden tree; the bat flew away and after that came death.[71] And the same natives also believe that Nourelle created a great serpent, to which he gave power over all created things.[72] So also the doctrine of a hell with everlasting fire has almost certainly a foreign origin; and in some other points the genuineness of the Australian theories of retribution is at least open to doubt, even though the function of a judge cannot be regarded as incompatible with the notion of a mythical headman in the sky. Messrs. Spencer and Gillen observe that it would be a very easy matter indeed to form, as the result of a general statement such as might be made by any individual native in reply to a question, a perfectly wrong impression with regard to the native's idea as to the existence of anything like a supreme being inculcating moral rules.[73] Of the Central Australian aborigines they say:--"Any such idea as that of a future life of happiness or the reverse, as a reward for meritorious or as a punishment for blameworthy conduct, is quite foreign to them. . . . We know of no tribe in which there is a belief of any kind in a supreme being who rewards or punishes the individual according to his moral behaviour, using the word moral in the native sense."[74] So far as the Arunta are concerned, this statement is confirmed by Mr. Strehlow. He writes that their god Altjira, who lives in the sky and shows himself to man in the lightning, is a {675} good god who never inflicts any punishments on human beings.[75]

[Footnote 65: See especially Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 504 _sqq._; Lang, _Magic and Religion_, p. 25 _sqq._; Thomas, in _Man_, p. 50 _sqq._; von Leonhardi, in _Globus_, xci. 287.]

[Footnote 66: Howitt, _op. cit._ p. 507. See also _ibid._ p. 501.]

[Footnote 67: Thomas, in _Folk-Lore_, xvi. 431.]

[Footnote 68: Roth, _op. cit._ pp. 36, 153.]

[Footnote 69: Mr. J. D. Lang (_Queensland_, p. 379 _sq._; _Cooksland_, p. 459 _sq._) even suspects Asiatic influence in the case of Buddai, or Budjah, the mythical ancestor of certain Queensland aborigines. Not only does his name remind of Buddha, but a story told of him is remarkably similar to an Eastern legend.]

[Footnote 70: Salvado, _op. cit._ p. 258.]

[Footnote 71: Brough Smyth, _op. cit._ i. 428.]

[Footnote 72: _Ibid._ i. 423.]

[Footnote 73: Spencer and Gillen, _Northern Tribes of Central Australia_, p. 492 _sqq._]

[Footnote 74: _Ibid._ p. 491.]

[Footnote 75: Strehlow, quoted by Thomas, in _Folk-Lore_, xvi. 429 _sq._ _Idem_, quoted by von Leonhardi, in _Globus_, xci. 287.]

From various Polynesian and Melanesian islands we hear of a supreme being--called Io by the Maoris,[76] Tangaroa by the Samoans,[77] Taaroa by the Society Islanders,[78] and so forth[79]--who has made everything, but who is too remote and indistinct to be an object of worship and takes no interest in the morals of men. In some instances at least he seems to be a very shadowy deification of the forces of nature. Thus Io is described as "the great originator, the All-Father, who pervades space, has no residence, and cannot be localised"; and the conception of Tangaroa is equally abstract.[80] Mr. Guppy learned that the natives of Treasury Island and the Shortlands, in the Solomon Group, believe in a Good Spirit who lives in a pleasant land, whither all men who have led good lives go after death; whereas all bad people are transported to the crater of Bagana, the burning volcano of Bougainville, which is the home of the Evil Spirit and his companion spirits.[81] But this belief savours too much of a Christian hell to be accepted as genuine without further evidence.

[Footnote 76: Gudgeon, 'Maori Religion,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xiv. 108 _sq._]

[Footnote 77: _Ibid._ p. 108 _sq._]

[Footnote 78: Ellis, _Polynesian Researches_, i. 323 _sqq._]

[Footnote 79: Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 344 _sqq._ Hoffmann, _La notion de l'Être suprême chez les peuples non civilisés_, p. 70 _sqq._]

[Footnote 80: Gudgeon, in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ xiv. 108.]

[Footnote 81: Guppy, _Solomon Islands_, p. 53.]

The Sea Dyaks of Borneo have a great good god called Batara, or Petara, who created the world and rules over it, and is the cause of every blessing. He is not susceptible to human influence, and therefore receives no worship. But he approves of industry, honesty, purity of speech, and skill in word and work. He punishes theft, injustice, disrespect for old persons, and adultery; and immorality among the unmarried is supposed to bring a plague of rain upon the earth as a punishment inflicted by Petara. In general, says Mr. Perham, he is against man's sin; but over and above moral offences many sins have been invented which are simply the infringement of _pemate_, or _tabu_.[82] Like many other great gods of savages, Petara is lacking in individuality. He is at all events not now supposed to be one supreme god, but the general belief is that there are many Petaras--in fact as many Petaras as men. Each man, the people say, has his own peculiar Petara, his own tutelary deity, and if a {676} person is miserable it is because his Petara is miserable.[83] This account, however, loses much of its interest when we find that the name Batara or Petara has obviously been borrowed from Sanscrit, where the word _bha[t.][t.]âra_ means "lord" or "master."[84] The great gods of some other peoples in the Malay Archipelago, again, have names which are derived from Arabic--Lahatala, Latala, or Hatalla, from _Allah ta[(]âla_. Hence when the Alfura of Bura are heard to say that their highest god, Opo-geba-snulat or Lahatala, writes down in a book the actions of men so as to be able to reward the virtuous and punish the wicked as they deserve, there is every reason to think of influence from Muhammedanism.[85]

[Footnote 82: Perham, 'Petara,' in _Jour. Straits Branch Roy. Asiatic Soc._ no. 8, p. 149 _sq._ St. John, _Life in the Forests of the Far East_, i. 69 _sq._ Selenka, _op. cit._ p. 97 _sqq._]

[Footnote 83: Perham, in _Jour. Straits Branch Roy. Asiatic Soc._ no. 8, p. 134 _sq._]

[Footnote 84: _Ibid._ p. 133. Wilken, _Het Animisme_, p. 162.]

[Footnote 85: Wilken, _op. cit._ pp. 162, 240 _sq._]

The Andaman Islanders are reported to believe in a supreme being, P[=u]luga, who was never born and is immortal, who has created the world and all its objects, who is omniscient when it is day, knowing even the thoughts of their hearts. Whilst pitiful to those in distress, he is angered by the commission of certain sins--falsehood, theft, grave assault, murder, adultery, and burning wax. He is the judge from whom each soul receives its sentence after death. The "spirits" of the departed are sent by him to a place comprising the whole area under the earth, to await the resurrection. The "souls" of the departed, again, pass either into paradise or to another place which might be described as purgatory, a place of punishment for those who have been guilty of heinous sins, such as murder. At the resurrection the soul (from which evil emanates) and the spirit (from which all good emanates) will be reunited and will henceforth live permanently on the new earth, since the souls of the wicked will then have been reformed by the punishments inflicted on them during their residence in the "purgatory."[86] Mr. Man, who has given us this account, thinks it is extremely improbable that the legends about P[=u]luga, about the powers of good and evil, and about a world beyond the grave, are the result of the teaching of missionaries or others.[87] But his assumption that they are indigenous seems hardly justified by the very scanty knowledge we possess of the past history of these islanders. Considering their low state of culture, the metaphysical subtlety in some of the notions recorded by Mr. Man would certainly be more astonishing if India were not so near.

[Footnote 86: Man, 'Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xii. 112, 157, 158, 161 _sq._]

[Footnote 87: _Ibid._ p. 156.]

{677}Among the Karens of Burma the belief is held that Hades has a king or judge who stands at the door to admit or reject those who apply for admission into his kingdom. He decides the future of each. Those who have performed meritorious works are sent to the regions of happiness above; those who have done wickedness, such as striking father or mother, are delivered over to the king of hell who is in waiting; whilst those who have neither performed deeds of merit nor are guilty of great crimes are allotted a place in Hades.[88] At the same time the Karens' ideas of a future state are described as confused, indefinite, and contradictory. Mr. Mason writes:--"They seem to be a melee of different systems. That which appears to me indigenous Karen . . . represents the future world as a counterpart of this, located under the earth, where the inhabitants are employed precisely as they are here."[89] The Paháriás of the Rájmahal Hills believe that the souls of those who have been disobedient to the commands of Bedo Gosain will be condemned either to inhabit some portion of the vegetable kingdom for a certain number of years, or to be cast into a pit of fire, where the offender will suffer eternal punishment or be regenerated in the shape of a dog or a cat. Those who have led a good life, on the other hand, will be rewarded, first by enjoying a short but happy residence with Bedo Gosain in heaven, and subsequently by being born a second time on earth of women and being exalted to posts of great honour, as also by possessing an abundance of worldly goods.[90] In these notions our chief informant, Lieutenant Shaw, sees traces of Hinduism.[91] Lack of detailed information makes it impossible to decide whether the belief in a creator and heavenly judge which has been found in some other uncivilised tribes in India might be traced to a similar influence. The Munda Kols in Central Bengal maintain that the good and almighty Singbonga, who lives in the sky and is connected with the sun, has made everything. Being so far away he occupies himself very little with earthly matters, and is only in exceptional cases an object of worship; but he sees everything which happens, and is said to punish theft and insincerity.[92] So also the Kukis recognise a benevolent and all-powerful god {678} and creator, called Puthén, who is the judge of all mortals and awards punishments to the wicked both in this world and in the next.[93]

[Footnote 88: Mason, in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxxiv. 196.]

[Footnote 89: _Ibid._ p. 195.]

[Footnote 90: Shaw, 'Inhabitants of the Hills near Rájamahall,' in _Asiatick Researches_, iv. 48 _sqq._ Sherwill, 'Tour through the Rájmahal Hills,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xx. 556.]

[Footnote 91: Shaw, in _Asiatick Researches_, iv. 46.]

[Footnote 92: Jellinghaus, 'Sagen, Sitten und Gebräuche der Munda-Kolhs in Chota Nagpore,' in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnologie_, iii. 330 _sq._]

[Footnote 93: Stewart, 'Northern Cachar,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 628.]

The Ainu of Japan believe in a great god or creator who bestows blessings upon the good and visits the bad with disease, unless they repent. They also say that good people go after death to the "island of the Great Spirit," or to the "kingdom of God," to lead a happy life; whereas bad people go to the "bad island," or to the "wet underground world," in which they suffer discomfort or, according to some, are burned in everlasting fires.[94] Of the pagan Samoyedes we are told that they regard the great Num as the creator of the universe, as an all-powerful and omniscient being, who protects the innocent, rewards the virtuous, and punishes the wicked.[95] But the primitive Num, who was simply the sky, was too far removed from the nomads who wandered across the frozen plain, to interfere to prevent catastrophe or accomplish their well-being; and in the provident actions and overseeing which some of the Samoyedes now ascribe to him, "we can clearly enough trace the influence of the missionary and the suggestion of the Christian faith."[96]

[Footnote 94: von Siebold, _Die Aino auf der Insel Yesso_, p. 24. Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, pp. 199, 235 _sqq._ Howard, _Life with Trans-Siberian Savages_, p. 193.]

[Footnote 95: Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 14.]

[Footnote 96: Jackson, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxiv. 398. See also Castrén, _op. cit._ iii. 14-16, 182 _sqq._]

Dr. Rink asserts that the Greenlanders considered Tornarsuk as the supreme being on whom they were dependent for any supernatural aid, and in whose abodes in the depth of the earth all such persons as had striven and suffered for the benefit of their fellow men should find a happy existence after death.[97] Dr. Nansen, however, is of opinion that Tornarsuk owes a great deal to missionary influence.[98] That he was not so superior a being as is commonly stated is evident from Captain Holm's description of the Angmagsaliks in Eastern Greenland, where he is represented as a monster living in the sea, of about the same length as a big seal, but thicker.[99] And to judge from Egede's description dating from the earlier part of the eighteenth century, Tornarsuk's notions of justice, if he had any, must in olden times have been very limited, as he took to his subterranean paradise only women that died in labour and men that perished at sea.[100]

[Footnote 97: Rink, _Greenland_, p. 141.]

[Footnote 98: Nansen, _Eskimo Life_, p. 242.]

[Footnote 99: Holm, 'Ethnologisk Skizze af Angmagsalikerne,' in _Meddelelser om Grönland_, x. 115.]

[Footnote 100: Egede, _Description of Greenland_, p. 197.]

{679} The "Great Spirit" so often referred to in accounts of North American Indians, is described as a being too elevated and remote to take much interest in the destinies and actions of men and too benevolent by nature to require propitiation or worship. Schoolcraft asserts that in their oral traditions there is no attempt "to make man accountable to him, here or hereafter, for aberrations from virtue, good will, truth, or any form of moral right. With benevolence and pity as prime attributes the Great Transcendental Spirit of the Indian does not take upon himself a righteous administration of the world's affairs, but, on the contrary, leaves it to be filled, and its affairs, in reality, governed, by demons and fiends in human form."[101] Yet there are instances in which he is represented in a different light. The most essential moral precepts of the Iroquois "were taught as the will of the Great Spirit, and obedience to their requirements as acceptable in his sight";[102] but whilst highly gratified with their virtues, he detested their vices, and punished them for their bad conduct not only in this world but in a future state of existence.[103] The Potawatomis considered that rape was visited by the anger of the Great Spirit.[104] Ti-ra'-wa, the supreme being of the Pawnees, applauds valour, abhors theft, and punishes the wicked by annihilation, whilst the good dwell with him in his heavenly home.[105] The Indians of Alabama told Bossu that those who behave themselves foolishly and disregard the supreme being will after death go to a barren land full of thorns and briars, with no hunting and no wives, whereas those who neither rob nor kill nor take other men's wives will occupy a very fertile country and live there a happy life.[106] Keating states that, according to the beliefs of the Dacotahs, men go to the residence of the Great Spirit if they have been good and peaceable, or if they died by the hand of their enemy, but that their souls are doomed to the residence of the Evil Spirit if they perish in a broil with their own countrymen.[107] This statement, however, is not supported by other authorities. Prescott writes of the same Indians:--"They have very little notion of punishment for crime hereafter in eternity: indeed, they know very little about whether the Great Spirit has anything to do with their affairs, present or future."[108] {680} And among the Omaha and Ponka, who are branches of the same people, the old men used to say to their fellow tribesmen, "If you are good, you will go to the good ghosts; if you are bad you will go to the bad ghosts." But nothing was ever said of going to dwell with Wakanda, or with demons.[109] As regards the origin of the North American notion of the Great Spirit different opinions have been expressed. On the one hand we are told that it is essentially only "the Indian's conception of the white man's god," which belongs not to the untutored but to the tutored mind of the savage.[110] On the other hand it is argued that the belief in the Great Spirit must be a native product, since it is reported to have occurred already before the arrival of the earliest Jesuit missionaries.[111] Unfortunately, however, we cannot be sure that our informants have accurately interpreted the beliefs of the Indians. Mr. Dorsey has pointed out that a fruitful source of error has been a misunderstanding of their terms and phrases.[112] The Dacotah word _wakanda_, which has been rendered into "Great Spirit," simply means "mystery," or "mysterious," and signifies rather a quality than a definite entity. Among many tribes the sun is wakanda, among the same tribes the moon is wakanda, and so are thunder, lightning, the stars, the winds, as also various animals, trees, and inanimate objects or places of a striking character; even a man, especially a medicine-man, may be considered wakanda.[113] So, too, the Menomini term _mashä' ma' nid[=o]_, or "great unknown," is not to be understood as implying a belief in one supreme being; there are several manidos, each supreme in his own realm, as well as many lesser mysteries, or deities, or spirits.[114] Mr.

Dorsey also observes that in many cases Indians have been quick to adopt the phrases of civilisation in communicating with white people, whilst in speaking to one another they use their own terms.[115] At the same time it seems to me that if the notion of a Great Spirit had altogether a Christian origin we might expect to find an idea of moral retribution more commonly associated with it than the {681} statements imply. It may be that among the North American Indians also, as among some other peoples, a vague conception of something like a supreme being has arisen through a personification of the mysteries in nature.[116] But if this be the case the interest which the Great Spirit in rare instances takes in human conduct may all the same be due to missionary influence. It is certainly not an original characteristic of his nature. Among the Iroquois and Pawnees, who attribute to their great god the function of a moral judge, he also receives offerings--[117] a circumstance which indicates that he cannot be regarded as a typical representative of his class.

[Footnote 101: Schoolcraft, _op. cit._ i. 35.]

[Footnote 102: Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 172.]

[Footnote 103: Seaver, _Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Jemison_, p. 155.]

[Footnote 104: Keating, _Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_, i. 127.]

[Footnote 105: Grinnell, _Pawnee Hero Stories_, p. 355. Lang, _Making of Religion_, p. 257.]

[Footnote 106: Bossu, _Travels through Louisiana_, i. 256 _sq._]

[Footnote 107: Keating, _op. cit._ i. 393 _sq._]

[Footnote 108: Schoolcraft, _op. cit._ ii. 195. _Cf._ _ibid._ iii. 229.]

[Footnote 109: Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 419.]

[Footnote 110: Smith, 'Myths of the Iroquois,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ ii. 112. Tylor, 'Limits of Savage Religion,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxi. 284. Boyle, 'Paganism of the Civilised Iroquois,' _ibid._ xxx. 266.]

[Footnote 111: Lang, _Making of Religion_, p. 251 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Magic and Religion_, p. 19 _sqq._ Hoffmann, _op. cit._ p. 86 _sq._]

[Footnote 112: Dorsey, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 365 _sq._]

[Footnote 113: _Ibid._ p. 366. McGee, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xv. 181 _sqq._ _Cf._ James, _Expedition to the Rocky Mountains_, i. 268; Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 343.]

[Footnote 114: Hoffman, 'Menomini Indians,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xiv. 39, n. 1. _Cf._ Parkman, _Jesuits in North America_, p. lxxix.]

[Footnote 115: Dorsey, in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 365. See also Smith, _ibid._ ii. 112.]

[Footnote 116: The Great Spirit is represented by Schoolcraft (_op. cit._ i. 15) as a "Soul of the Universe which inhabits and animates every thing," and is supposed to exist under every possible form in the world, animate and inanimate. Of Ti-ra'-wa it is said that he "is in and of everything" (_supra_, i. 448).]

[Footnote 117: Seaver, _op. cit._ p. 155. _Supra_ i. 448.]

In South America, too, several tribes have been found to believe in a benevolent Great Spirit, who is indifferent to men's behaviour and is not worshipped by them.[118] Of the Passés, however, we are told by a Portuguese official who travelled in Brazil in 1774-75 that they have the idea of a creator who rewards good people by allowing their souls to stay with him and punishes the wicked by turning their souls into evil spirits.[119] But according to Mr. Bates "these notions are so far in advance of the ideas of all other tribes of Indians . . . that we must suppose them to have been derived by the docile Passés from some early missionary or traveller."[120] Of the Fuegians, again, Admiral Fitzroy writes:--"A great black man is supposed to be always wandering about the woods and mountains, who is certain of knowing every word and every action; who cannot be escaped, and who influences the weather according to men's conduct." Of this influence our informant gives the following instance. A native related a story of his brother who once killed a man--one of those very wild men who wander about in the woods supporting themselves by theft--because he stole from him a bird. Afterwards he was very sorry for what he had done, particularly when it began to blow hard. In telling the story, the brother said:--"Rain come down--snow come down--hail come down--wind blow--blow--very much blow. Very bad to kill man. Big man in woods no like it, he very angry." The same native also reproached the surgeon {682} of the Beagle for shooting some young ducks with the old bird:--"Very bad to shoot little duck--come wind--come rain--blow--very much blow."[121] In the latter case, however, no mention was made of the black man in the woods. From Admiral Fitzroy's account Mr. Andrew Lang draws the conclusion that the Fuegians have evolved the idea of a high deity, an ethical judge, who "makes for righteousness," who searches the heart, who almost literally "marks the sparrow's fall," and whose morality is so much above the ordinary savage standard that he regards the slaying of a stranger and an enemy, caught redhanded in robbery, as a sin.[122] This statement may serve as a specimen of the spirit in which its author deals with the subject of supreme beings in savage beliefs. There is after all some difference between a high moral god and a mythical weather doctor who lives in the woods and sends bad weather if a wild man, who also lives in the woods, is killed. Mr. Bridges, our most trustworthy authority on the Fuegians, says nothing of the black man, but states that nearly all the old men among the Fuegians are medicine-men, and that these wizards make frequent incantations in which they seem to address themselves to a mysterious being called Aïapakal. And they also believe in another spirit, named Hoakils, from whom they pretend to obtain a supernatural power over life and death.[123]

[Footnote 118: Bernau, _Missionary Labours in British Guiana_, p. 49. Hoffmann, _op. cit._ p. 90 _sqq._]

[Footnote 119: Ribeiro de Sampaio, _Diario da viagem_, p. 79.]

[Footnote 120: Bates, _The Naturalist on the River Amazons_, ii. 244. _Cf._ _ibid._ ii. 162; Dobrizhofter, _Account of the Abipones_, ii. 57 _sq._; Müller, _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_, p. 289.]

[Footnote 121: King and Fitzroy, _Voyages of the "Adventure" and "Beagle,"_ ii. 180.]

[Footnote 122: Lang, _Making of Religion_, pp. 188, 198. The same description of the Fuegian black man is repeated by M. Hoffmann (_op. cit._ p. 40).]

[Footnote 123: Bridges, quoted by Hyades and Deniker, _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn_, vii. 256.]

The South African Bushmans, another very backward people, are likewise represented by Mr. Lang and M. Hoffmann as believers in a supreme being.[124] A native said to Mr. Orpen that Cagn made all things, and that the people prayed to him:--"O Cagn! O Cagn! are we not your children, do you not see our hunger? Give us food." And he gave them what they asked for both hands full. But although he was at first very good and nice, he afterwards "got spoilt through fighting so many things."[125] However, according to another statement, made by a person who from childhood had much intercourse with Bushmans and knew their language, they did not believe in a God or the great father of men, but in a devil who made everything with his left hand.[126] The Hottentots spoke of Tsui-goab as "the giver of all blessings, the Father on high, All-father, the {683} avenger, who fought daily the battle for his people." They thus identified him with the ancestor of the tribe, but Tsui-goab was also the name by which they called the Infinite.[127] Among the pagans of Africa there is, in fact, a very widespread belief in a benevolent supreme deity, a creator or maker of things, who lives in or above the sky, who generally takes no concern whatever in the affairs of mankind, who mostly receives no worship, and is, as a rule, totally indifferent to good or evil.[128] In some rare instances only he is described as a judge of human conduct. Thus some of the Bechuanas believe that a being who is vaguely called by the name of Lord and Master of things, Mongalinto, punishes thieves by striking them with the lightning.[129] According to an old writer, Father Santos, the natives of Sofala in South-Eastern Africa acknowledge a god, called Molungo, "who both in this and the world to come they fancy measures retribution for the good and evil done in this." They believe in the existence of twenty-seven paradises, where everyone enjoys a pleasure proportionate to the merits of his life; while those who have passed their lives in wickedness are supposed to be condemned to a privation from the sight of the holy presence of Molungo, and to suffer torments in one of the thirteen hells they assume to exist, each according to the evil he has done.[130] The Baluba, a Bantu people of Equatorial Africa, have the notion of a creator, named Fidi-Mukullu, who punishes the souls of the wicked before they are reborn on earth, whereas the good return to life again, in the shape of chiefs or other important persons, immediately after they have died.[131] The Awemba, {684} another Bantu people, who inhabit the stretch of country lying between Lake Tanganyika and Lake Bangweolo, acknowledge a supreme being, Leza, who "is the Judge of the dead, and condemns thieves, adulterers and murderers to the state of Vibanda, or Viwa (evil spirits), exalting the good to the rank of _mipashi_, or benevolent spirits."[132] Other natives in the neighbourhood of Lake Tanganyika recognise a creator called Kabesa, who lives in the sky and admits to his abode the souls of good people after death, but turns away the souls of the wicked.[133] The Akikuyu of British East Africa recognise three gods all of whom are called Ngai. One of them, however, is considered the supreme deity. "If a man is good this Ngai can give him much property. If he does wrong the same power can strike him down with disease and cause his livestock to dwindle away. . . . The sudden death of a man, for instance by lightning, is ascribed to some evil act of his life being punished by Ngai."[134] Proyart tells us that the Negroes of Loango believed in a supreme being, Zambi, who had created all that is good in the world, who was himself good and loved justice in others, and who severely punished fraud and perjury.[135] It is of course impossible to say exactly how far the statements referring to African supreme beings represent unadulterated native beliefs. In criticising Kolb's account of the supreme and perfect god of the Hottentots, Bishop Callaway observes, "Nothing is more easy than to enquire of heathen savages the character of their creed, and during the conversation to impart to them . . . ideas which they never heard before, and presently to have these come back again as articles of their own original faith, when in reality they are but the echoes of one's own thoughts."[136] With reference to the West African native Miss Kingsley likewise remarks that he has a wonderful power of assimilating foreign forms of belief, and that when he once has got hold of a new idea it remains in his mind long after the missionaries who put it there have passed away.[137] And besides the teaching of missionaries there are in Africa several factors which for centuries have tended to introduce foreign conceptions, namely, intercourse with European settlers, the operations of the slave trade, and the influence of Muhammedanism.[138] But at the same {685} time it seems exceedingly probable that the African belief in a supreme being has a native substratum. In many cases he is apparently the heaven god;[139] but he may also be a mythical ancestor, as the Hottentot god Tsui-goab and the Zulu god Unkulunkulu; or a personification of the supernatural, as is suggested by such names as the Masai Ng[)a]i, the Monbuttu Kilima, and the Malagasy Andriamanitra;[140] or the assumed cause of anything which particularly fills the savage mind with wonder or awe. Among the natives of Northern Guinea, according to Mr. Wilson, "every thing which transpires in the natural world beyond the power of man, or of spirits, who are supposed to occupy a place somewhat higher than man, is at once and spontaneously ascribed to the agency of God."[141] Nay, for reasons which will be stated immediately, I am even of opinion that the function of a moral judge, occasionally attributed to the great god of African pagans, has in some instances an independent origin.

[Footnote 124: Lang, _Making of Religion_, p. 210. Hoffmann, _op. cit._ p. 40 _sq._]

[Footnote 125: Orpen, 'Glimpse into the Mythology of the Maluti Bushmen,' in _The Cape Monthly Magazine_, N.S. ix. 2.]

[Footnote 126: Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, i. 29.]

[Footnote 127: Hahn, _The Supreme Being of the Khoi-Khoi_, pp. 122, 126 _sq._]

[Footnote 128: Livingstone, _Missionary Travels_, p. 641 (tribes of the Zambesi). Rattray, _Stories and Songs in Chinyanja_, p. 198 (natives of Central Angoniland). Stigand, 'Natives of Nyassaland,' in _Jour. Roy. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvii. 130. Roscoe, 'Bahima,' _ibid._ xxxvii. 108 _sq._ Wilson and Felkin, _Uganda_, i. 206. Beltrame, _Il

Fiume Bianco e i Dénka_, pp. 191, 192, 276 _sq._ Kingsley, 'Fetish View of the Human Soul,' in _Folk-Lore_, viii. 142 _sq._; _Idem_, _Travels in West Africa_, pp. 442, 508. Parkinson, 'Asaba People of the Niger,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 312. Bosman, _Description of the Coast of Guinea_, pp. 121 _sq._ (Gold Coast natives), 348 (Slave Coast natives). Cruickshank, _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast_, ii. 126 _sq._ Ellis, _Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast_, p. 26 _sqq._ _Idem_, _E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast_, p. 33 _sq._ Winterbottom, _Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_, i. 222. Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 209 (natives of Northern Guinea). Rowley, _Religion of the Africans_, pp. 15, 16, 54. Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 347 _sqq._ Lang, _Making of Religion_, p. 230 _sqq._ Hoffmann, _op. cit._ p. 45 _sqq._]

[Footnote 129: Arbousset and Daumas, _Exploratory Tour to the North-East of the Colony of Good Hope_, p. 322 _sq._]

[Footnote 130: Santos, 'History of Eastern Ethiopia,' in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, xvi. 687.]

[Footnote 131: Wissmann, Wolf, &c., _Im Innern Afrikas_, p. 158. Wissmann, _Quer durch Afrika_, p. 379.]

[Footnote 132: Sheane, 'Awemba Religion,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 150 _sq._]

[Footnote 133: Schneider, _Die Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 84.]

[Footnote 134: Tate, 'Kikuyu Tribe,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxiv. 263.]

[Footnote 135: Proyart, 'History of Loango,' in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, xvi. 594.]

[Footnote 136: Callaway, _Religious System of the Amazulu_, p. 105 _sq._]

[Footnote 137: Kingsley, in _Folk-Lore_, viii. 150.]

[Footnote 138: _Cf._ Rowley, _Religion of the Africans_, pp. 28, 90; Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 229 _sq._; Cruickshank, _op. cit._ ii. 126.]

[Footnote 139: See Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 347 _sqq._]

[Footnote 140: See _supra_, ii. 586 _sq._]

[Footnote 141: Wilson, _op. cit._ p. 209. See also Livingstone, _Expedition to the Zambesi_, p. 521 _sq._, quoted _supra_, ii. 594.]

Generally speaking, then, it seems that the All-father, supreme being, or high god of savage belief may be traced to several different sources. When not a "loan-god" of foreign extraction, he may be a mythical ancestor or headman; or a deification of the sky or some large and remote object of nature, like the sun; or a personification or personified cause of the mysteries or forces of nature. The argument that the belief in such a being is "irreducible" because it prevails among savages who worship neither ancestors nor nature,[142] can carry no weight in consideration of the fact that he himself, as a general rule, is no object of worship. In various instances we have reason to suppose that even though the notion of a supreme being is fundamentally of native origin, foreign conceptions have been engrafted upon it; and to these belongs in particular the idea of a heavenly judge who in the after-life punishes the wicked and rewards the good. But we are not entitled to assume that the idea of moral retribution as a function of the great god has in every case been adopted {686} from people of a higher culture. A mythical ancestor or headman may of his own accord approve of virtue and disapprove of vice; and, besides, justice readily becomes the attribute of a god who is habitually appealed to in curses or oaths. That the supreme being of savages is thus invoked, is in some cases directly stated by our authorities. In making solemn treatises, the Hurons called on Oki, the heaven god.[143] The Negroes of Loango, who believed that Zambi, the supreme being, punished fraud and perjury, took his name in testimony of the truth.[144] Among the Awemba the supreme god Leza, who is believed to reward the good and to punish thieves, adulterers, and murderers, is invoked both in blessings and curses, the injured man praying that Leza will send a lion to devour the evildoer.[145] In the E[(w]e-speaking Ho tribe on the Slave Coast the great god Mawu, who is said to inflict punishment on the wicked, is frequently appealed to in law-cases, by the judge as well as by the plaintiff and the accused.[146] In Northern Guinea the name of the supreme being is solemnly called on three times at the ratification of an important treaty, or when a person is condemned to undergo the "red-water ordeal."[147] Of the Mpongwe we are told that "when a covenant is about to be formed among the different tribes, Mwetyi [the supreme being] is always invoked as a witness, and is commissioned with the duty of visiting vengeance upon the party who shall violate the engagement. Without this their national treaties would have little or no force. When a law is passed which the people wish to be especially binding, they invoke the vengeance of Mwetyi upon every transgressor, and this, as a general thing, is ample guarantee for its observance."[148] Among the East African Wakamba, when the supposed criminal is to undergo the ordeal of the hatchet, a magician makes him repeat the following words:--"If I have stolen the property of so and so, or committed this crime, let {687} Mulungu respond for me; but if I have not stolen, nor done this wickedness, may he save me." The magician then passes the red-hot iron four times over the flat hand of the accused; and the people believe that if he is guilty, his hand will be burned, but that, if innocent, he will suffer no injury.[149] Among the Masai a person who is accused of cattle-lifting and on that account subjected to the ordeal of drinking a mixture of blood and milk, has first to swear, "O God, I drink this blood, if I have stolen the cattle this blood will kill me." Should he not die within a fortnight he is considered innocent.[150] The Madi of Central Africa have various means of trial by ordeal, through which it is believed that the guilt of a suspected individual can be detected; and "before any of these trials the men look up and solemnly invoke some invisible being to punish him if guilty, or help him if innocent."[151] Of the natives of the Zambesi, all of whom have an idea of a supreme being, Livingstone states that, when undergoing an ordeal, "they hold up their hands to the Ruler of Heaven, as if appealing to him to assert their innocence."[152]

[Footnote 142: Lang, _Magic and Religion_, p. 42. Hoffmann, _op. cit._ pp. 122, 126, 131.]

[Footnote 143: Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 342.]

[Footnote 144: Proyart, _loc. cit._ p. 594.]

[Footnote 145: Sheane, in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxxvi. 151.]

[Footnote 146: Spieth, _Die E[(w]e-Stämme_, p. 415.]

[Footnote 147: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 210.]

[Footnote 148: _Ibid._ p. 392.]

[Footnote 149: Krapf, _Travels in Eastern Africa_, p. 173.]

[Footnote 150: Marker, _Die Masai_, p. 211.]

[Footnote 151: Felkin, 'Notes on the Madi,' in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, xii. 334.]

[Footnote 152: Livingstone, _Missionary Travels_, p. 641 _sq._]

It has often been said that the oath and ordeal involve a belief in the gods as vindicators of truth and justice, that they are "appeals to the moral nature of the Divinity."[153] If this were true, moral retribution would certainly be an exceedingly common function of savage gods. But, as we have noticed before,[154] the efficacy ascribed to an oath is originally of a magic character, and if it contains an appeal to a god he is, according to primitive notions, a mere tool in the hand of the person invoking him. So also the ordeal is essentially a magical ceremony. In many cases at least, it contains a curse or an oath which has reference to the guilt or innocence of a suspected person, and the {688} proper object of the ordeal is then to give reality to the imprecation for the purpose of establishing the validity or invalidity of the suspicion.

[Footnote 153: Tiele, _Elements of the Science of Religion_, i. 86. Réville, _Les religions des peuples non-civilisés_, i. 103. Brinton, _Religions of Primitive Peoples_, p. 225. Schneider, _Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_, p. 255. Hodgson, _Miscellaneous Essays_, i. 126. Dahn, _Bausteine_, ii. 21, 24. Gummere, _Germanic Origins_, p. 183.]

[Footnote 154: _Supra_, ii. 118 _sqq._]

Thus in West Africa the common ordeal which consists in drinking a certain draught or "eating the fetish" is regularly accompanied by an oath or a curse.[155] In the Calabar the accused person, before swallowing the ju-ju drink _mbiam_, which is made of filth and blood, recites an oath beginning with the words, "If I have been guilty of this crime," and ending with the words, "Then, Mbiam, Thou deal with me!" And whenever this ordeal is used the greatest care is taken that the oath shall be recited in full.[156] Of the Negroes of the Gold Coast Bosman states that "if any person is suspected of thievery, and the indictment is not clearly made out, he is obliged to clear himself by drinking the oath-draught, and to use the imprecation, that the Fetiche may kill him if he be guilty of thievery."[157] In Ashantee, "when any one denies a theft, an aggry bead is placed in a small vessel, with some water, the person holding it puts his right foot against the right foot of the accused, who invokes the power of the bead to kill him if he is guilty, and then takes it into his mouth with a little of the water."[158] Among the Negroes of Northern Guinea, in the case of the "red-water ordeal," the accused "invokes the name of God three times, and imprecates his wrath in case he is guilty of the particular crime laid to his charge." He then steps forward and drinks freely of the "red water"--that is, a decoction made from the inner bark of a tree of the mimosa family. If it nauseates and makes him vomit freely, he is at once pronounced innocent, whereas, if it causes vertigo and he loses self-control, it is regarded as evidence of guilt.[159] According to an old account, the Negroes of Sierra Leone have a "water of cursing," boiled of barks and herbs. The witch-doctor puts his divining-staff into the pot and drops or presses the water out of it upon the arm or leg of the suspected person, muttering over it these words:--"Is he guilty of this, or hath he done this or that; if yea, then let it scald or burn him, till the very skin come off." If the person remains unhurt they hold him innocent, and proceed to {689} the trial of another, till the guilty is discovered.[160] Among the Wadshagga of Eastern Africa the medicine-man gives to the accused a poisonous draught with the words, "If you fall down, you have committed the crime and told a lie, if you remain standing we recognise that you have spoken the truth."[161]

[Footnote 155: See, besides the references below, Monrad, _Skildring af Guinea-Kysten_, p. 35 _sq._ (Negroes of Accra); Beecham, _Ashantee_, p. 215 _sqq._; Ratzel, _op. cit._ iii. 130.]

[Footnote 156: Kingsley, _Travels in West Africa_, p. 465.]

[Footnote 157: Bosman, _op. cit._ p. 125.]

[Footnote 158: Bowdich, _Mission to Ashantee_, p. 267.]

[Footnote 159: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 225 _sq._]

[Footnote 160: Dapper, _Africa_, p. 405.]

[Footnote 161: Volkens, _Der Kilimandscharo_, p. 249.]

Among the Hawaiians, in the ordeal called _wai haalulu_, "prayer was offered by the priest" while a large dish of water was placed before the culprit, who was required to hold his hands over the fluid; and if it shook, his fate was sealed.[162] Among the Tinguianes in the district of El Abra in Luzon, if a man is accused of a crime and denies it, the headman of the village, who is also the judge, causes a handful of straw to be burned in his presence. The accused then holds up an earthern pot and says, "May my belly be changed to a pot like this if I am guilty of the crime of which I am accused." If he remains unchanged in body, the judge declares him innocent.[163] The following ordeal is in use among the Tunguses of Siberia. A fire is made and a scaffold erected near the hut of the accused. A dog's throat is then cut and the blood received in a vessel. The body is put on the wood of the fire, but in such a position that it does not burn. The accused passes over the fire, and drinks two mouthfuls of the blood, the rest whereof is thrown into the fire; and the body of the dog is placed on the scaffold. Then the accused says:--"As the dog's blood burns in the fire, so may what I have drunk burn in my body; and as the dog put on the scaffold will be consumed, so may I be consumed at the same time if I be guilty."[164]

[Footnote 162: Jarves, _History of the Hawaiian Islands_, p. 20.]

[Footnote 163: Lala, _Philippine Islands_, p. 100.]

[Footnote 164: Hartland, _Legend of Perseus_, ii. 85 _sq._]

The "trial of jealousy" mentioned in the Old Testament involved a curse pronounced by the priest to the effect that the holy water which the woman suspected of adultery had to drink should cause her belly to swell and her thigh to rot.[165] In India the ordeal was expressly regarded as a form of the oath, the same word, _[s.]apatha_, being used to denote both.[166] We have seen above that in the Middle Ages every judicial combat was necessarily preceded by an oath, which essentially decided the issue of the fight and the question of guilt.[167] So also at the moment when the hot iron was raised and the accused took {690} it into his hand, the Deity was invoked to manifest the truth.[168] The ordeal of the Eucharist involved the following formula recited by the victim:--"Et si aliter est quam dixi et juravi, tunc hoc Domini nostri Jesu Christi corpus non pertranseat gutur meum, sed hæreat in faucibus meis, strangulet me suffocet me ac interficiat me statim in momento."[169]

[Footnote 165: _Numbers_, v. 20 _sqq._]

[Footnote 166: Jolly, 'Beiträge zur indischen Rechtsgeschichte,' in _Zeitschr. d. Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ xliv. 346. Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 510, n. 1. See also Patetta, _Le ordalie_, p. 14.]

[Footnote 167: _Supra_, i. 505.]

[Footnote 168: Beames, in his _Translation of Glanville_, p. 351 _sq._]

[Footnote 169: Dahn, _op. cit._ ii. 16.]

To the list of ordeals which contain an oath or a curse as their governing element many other instances might probably be added in which no imprecation has been expressly mentioned by our authorities in their short descriptions of the ceremonies. This is all the more likely to be the case as magical practices often imply imprecations which are not formally expressed.[170] But there may also be ordeals which have a different origin. Thus the custom of swimming witches seems to have arisen from the notion that everything unholy is repelled by water and unable to sink into its depths;[171] and the ordeal of touching the corpse of a murdered person no doubt originated in the belief that the soul of such a person lingered about the body until appeased by the shedding of the murderer's blood and that "by the murderer's approach, and especially by his polluted touch, the soul was excited to an instant manifestation of its indignation, by appearing in the form in which it was supposed to subsist, viz. in that of blood."[172] However, even though all ordeals have not the same foundation, it seems highly improbable that any people, in the first instance, resorted to this method of discovering innocence and guilt from a belief in a god who is by his nature a guardian of truth and justice.

[Footnote 170: See, for instance, Westermarck, '_L-[(]âr_, or the Transference of Conditional Curses in Morocco,' in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_, p. 361 _sqq._]

[Footnote 171: Binsfeldius, _Tractatus de confessionibus maleficorum et sagarum_, p. 315. In the North-East of Scotland it was believed that, if a person committed suicide by drowning, the body did not sink, but floated on the surface (Gregor, _Folk-Lore of the North-East of Scotland_, p. 208).]

[Footnote 172: Pitcairn, _Criminal Trials in Scotland_, iii. 187.]

Nor must we make any inference as to the moral character of gods from the mere prevalence of a belief in {691} a future world where men are in some way or other punished or rewarded for their conduct during their life. Such a belief is said to be fairly common among uncivilised races;[173] and, although in several cases it is undoubtedly due to Christian or other foreign influence,[174] I agree with Dr. Steinmetz that we are not entitled to {692} assume that it is so in all.[175] It seems that the savage mind may by itself, in various ways, come to the idea of some kind of moral retribution after death. First, the condition of the dead man is often supposed to depend upon the attentions bestowed on him by the survivors. Mr. Turner was told that, in the belief of the St. Augustine Islanders in Polynesia, the souls of the departed "if good" went to a land of brightness and clear weather in the heavens, but "if bad" were sent to mud and darkness; and the answer to his next question informed him that in this case "goodness" meant that the friends of the deceased had given him a good funeral feast, and that "badness" meant that his stingy friends had provided nothing at all.[176] Although Mr. Turner sees no moral distinction in these terms, there may be one nevertheless. Speaking of the Efatese, in the New Hebrides, Mr. Macdonald observes:--"A man's condition in the future would be, to some extent, happy or miserable according to his life here. Supposing he were a worthless fellow, very scanty worship would be rendered to him at his death and few animals slain to accompany him to the spirit world; and thus he would occupy an inferior position there corresponding to his social worthlessness here. This belief," our informant adds, "has undoubtedly great influence in making men strive to live so as to obtain the good opinion of their fellows, and leave an honourable memory behind them at death."[177] The Bushmans, who maintain that the dead will ultimately go to a land abounding in excellent food, put a spear by the side of a departed friend in order that, when he arises, he may have something to defend himself with and procure a living; but, if they hate the person, they deposit no spear, so that on his resurrection he may either be murdered or starved.[178] The dead may also have to suffer from the curses of those whom they injured while alive. At Motlav, in the {693} Banks Islands, relatives "watch the grave of a man whose life was bad, lest some man wronged by him should come at night and beat with a stone upon the grave, cursing him."[179] At Gaua, in the same group, "when a great man died his friends would not make it known, lest those whom he had oppressed should come and spit at him after his death, or _govgov_ him, stand bickering at him with crooked fingers and drawing in the lips, by way of curse."[180] The Maoris were careful to prevent the bones of their dead relatives from falling into the hands of their enemies, "who would dreadfully desecrate and ill-use them, with many bitter jeers and curses."[181] A person may, moreover, himself during his lifetime directly provide for his comfort in the life to come, and if the act by which he does so is apt to call forth approval its result is easily interpreted as its reward. Thus the Kukis of India believe that all enemies whom a person has killed will in his future abode be in attendance on him as slaves;[182] and this belief probably accounts for their opinion that nothing more certainly ensures future happiness than destroying a number of enemies.[183] We have further to notice the common idea that a person's character after his death remains more or less as it was during his life. Hence the souls of bad people are supposed to reappear in the shape of obnoxious animals[184] or become evil spirits,[185] and this may lead to the notion that they have to do so as a punishment for their wickedness.[186] And as the revengeful feelings of men likewise are believed to last beyond death, offenders may in the {694} other world have to suffer from the hands of those whom they injured in this.[187] Some of the Nagas of Central India maintain that "a murdered man's soul receives that of his murderer in the spirit world and makes him his slave."[188] The Chippewas think that in the land of the dead "the souls of bad men are haunted by the phantoms of the persons or things they have injured."[189] In Aurora, in the New Hebrides, the belief prevails that the ghosts of those whom a man has wronged in this world take a full revenge upon him after death.[190] According to the Banks Islanders, if a person has killed a good man without cause, the good man's ghost withstands his murderer, when the latter after death wants to enter into Panoi, the good place; but if one man has killed another in fair fight he will not be withstood by the person whom he slew.[191] And not only the offended party but the other dead as well may, from dislike or fear, be anxious to refuse the souls of bad people admittance to their company. In the belief of the Pentecost Islanders, when the soul of a murdered man comes to the land of ghosts with the instrument of death upon him, he tells who killed him, and when the murderer arrives the ghostly people will not receive him, but he has to stay apart with other murderers.[192] The Iroquois allot separate villages even to the souls of those who have died in war and of those who have committed suicide, because the other dead are afraid of their presence.[193] Among the Negroes of Northern Guinea, according to Mr. Wilson, "the only idea of a future state of retribution is implied in the use of a separate burial-place for those who have died 'by the red-water ordeal' or who have been guilty of grossly wicked deeds";[194] and if a person's body is buried apart, his soul will naturally remain equally isolated.[195] That the frequent idea of the bad being separated {695} from the good after death is largely due to the assumed unwillingness of the latter to associate with dangerous or disreputable souls, seems probable from the fact that, in the beliefs of the lower races, paradise generally plays a much more prominent part than hell, the lot of the wicked being to suffer want rather than to be subjected to torments.[196] But, finally, it must also be remembered that the other world is a creation of men's fancy, and may therefore be formed in accordance with their hopes and wishes. Beyond the gloom of death they imagine a paradise where life is much happier than here on earth.[197] Why, then, might not their moral feelings, only too often ungratified in the reality of the present, occasionally seek satisfaction in the dreams of the future?

[Footnote 173: Thomson, _Savage Island_, p. 94. Percy Smith, 'Futuna,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 39. Seemann, _Viti_, p. 400; Williams and Calvert, _Fiji_, p. 208. Codrington, _Melanesians_, p. 274 _sq._ (Banks' Islanders). Inglis, _New Hebrides_, p. 31; Turner, _Samoa_, p. 326 (people of Aneiteum). Campbell, _A Year in the New

Hebrides_, p. 169 (people of Tana). Schwaner, _Borneo_, i. 183 (natives of the Barito district). Selenka, _op. cit._ pp. 88, 94, 112 (Dyaks). von Brenner, _op. cit._ p. 240 (Bataks of Sumatra), de Mas, _Informe sobre el estado de las Islas Filipinas_, 'Orijen, &c.' p. 14. Best, 'Prehistoric Civilisation in the Philippines,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 200 (Tagalo-Bisaya tribes). Worcester, _Philippine Islands_, p. 110 (Tagbanuas of Palawan). Smeaton, _Loyal Karens of Burma_, p. 186 _sq._ Anderson, _Mandalay to Momien_, p. 146 (Kakhyens). Lewin, _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_, p. 243 _sq._ (Pankhos and Bunjogees). Hunter, _Rural Bengal_, i. 210 (Santals). Macrae, 'Account of the Kookies,' in _Asiatick Researches_, vii. 195; Butler, _Travels in Assam_, p. 88 (Kukis). Stewart, 'Notes on Northern Cachar,' in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, xxiv. 620 (Old Kukis), 632 (Nagas). Macpherson, _Memorials of Service in India_, p. 92 _sqq._ (Kandhs). Thurston, 'Todas of the Nilgiris,' in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, i. 166 _sq._ Breeks, _Tribes and Monuments of the N[=i]lagiris_, p. 28 (Todas and Badagas). Radloff, _op. cit._ p. 11 _sq._ (Turkish tribes of the Altai). Georgi, _Russia_, i. 106 (Chuvashes). Cranz, _History of Greenland_, i. 186. Hall, _Arctic Researches among the Esquimaux_, p. 571 _sq._ Lyon, _Private Journal_, p. 372 _sqq._ (Eskimo of Igloolik). Boas, 'Central Eskimo,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi. 590. Nelson, 'Eskimo about Bering Strait,' _ibid._ xviii. 423. Douglas, quoted by Petroff, _Report on Alaska_, p. 177 (Thlinkets). Harrison, 'Religion and Family among the Haidas,' in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ xxi. 17 _sqq._ Duncan, quoted by Mayne, _Four Years in British Columbia_, p. 293 _sq._ (Coast Indians of British Columbia). Mackenzie, _Voyages to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans_, p. cxix. (Chippewyans). Morgan, _League of the Iroquois_, p. 168 _sqq._ Harmon, _Journal of Voyages in the Interior of North America_, p. 364 _sq._ (Indians on the East side of the Rocky Mountains). Keating, _op. cit._ i. 110 _sq._ (Potawatomis); ii. 158 _sq._ (Chippewas). Say, quoted by Dorsey, 'Siouan Cults,' in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ xi. 422 (Kansas). Stevenson, 'Sia,' _ibid._ xi. 145 _sq._ Bartram, in _Trans. American Ethn. Soc._ iii. pt. i. 27 (Creek and Cherokee Indians). Powers, _Tribes of California_, pp. 34, 58, 59, 91, 110, 144, 155, 161. Buchanan, _North American Indians_, p. 235 _sqq._; Heriot, _Travels through the Canadas_, pp. 362, 536; Catlin, _North American Indians_, i. 156, and ii. 243; Domenech, _Great Deserts of North America_, ii. 380 (various Indian tribes of North America), von Martius, _Beiträge zur Ethnographie Amerika's_, i. 247 (Guatós). von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 435 (Paressi). de Azara, _Voyages dans l'Amérique méridionale_, ii. 138 (Payaguás). Bosman, _op. cit._ p. 424 (people of Benin). Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 217 (Negroes of Northern Guinea). Reade, _Savage Africa_, p. 539 (Ibos). Mungo Park, _Travels in the Interior of Africa_, p. 250 (Mandingoes). Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 83 _sqq._ Marillier, _La survivance de l'âme et l'idée de justice chez les peuples non civilisés_, p. 33 _sqq._ Steinmetz, _Ethnologische Studien zur ersten Entwicklung der Strafe_, ii. 368 _sqq._]

[Footnote 174: _Cf._ Tylor, _op. cit._ ii. 84, 91 _sqq._; Marillier, _loc. cit._ p. 32 _sq._]

[Footnote 175: Steinmetz, _Studien_, ii. 366 _sqq._ _Idem_, 'Continuität oder Lohn und Strafe im Jenseits der Wilden,' in _Archiv f. Anthropologie_, xxiv. 577 _sqq._]

[Footnote 176: Turner, _Samoa_, p. 292 _sq._]

[Footnote 177: Macdonald, _Oceania_, p. 209.]

[Footnote 178: Campbell, _Second Journey in the Interior of South Africa_, i. 29.]

[Footnote 179: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 269.]

[Footnote 180: _Ibid._ p. 269.]

[Footnote 181: Colenso, _Maori Races_, p. 28.]

[Footnote 182: Dalton, _Ethnology of Bengal_, p. 46.]

[Footnote 183: Macrae, 'Account of the Kookies,' in _Asiatick Researches_, vii. 195.]

[Footnote 184: Hill and Thornton, _Aborigines of New South Wales_, p. 4. Ratzel, _op. cit._ i. 317 (Solomon Islanders). Junghuhn, _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_, ii. 338 (natives of Bali and Lombok). Cross, quoted by Mac Mahon, _Far Cathay and Farther India_, p. 203 (Karens). Waitz, _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_, ii. 419 (Maravi). Southey, _History of Brazil_, iii. 392 (Guaycurus). Powers, _Tribes of California_, pp. 144 (Tatu), 155 (Kato Pomo).]

[Footnote 185: Bailey, 'Wild Tribes of the Veddahs,' in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ N.S. ii. 302, n. [double dagger] (Sinhalese), von den Steinen, _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_, p. 349 (Bakaïri).]

[Footnote 186: See Steinmetz, _Studien_, ii. 376; _Idem_, in _Archiv für Anthropologie_, xxiv. 603 _sq._]

[Footnote 187: _Cf._ Marillier, _loc. cit._ p. 44 _sq._]

[Footnote 188: Fytche, _Burma_, i. 354.]

[Footnote 189: Keating, _op. cit._ ii. 158 _sq._]

[Footnote 190: Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 279 _sq._]

[Footnote 191: _Ibid._ p. 274.]

[Footnote 192: _Ibid._ p. 288.]

[Footnote 193: Brebeuf, 'Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans le pays des Hurons,' in _Relations des Jésuites_, 1636, p. 104 _sq._ Hewitt, 'The Iroquoian Concept of the Soul,' in _Jour. of American Folk-Lore_, viii. 109.]

[Footnote 194: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 210.]

[Footnote 195: See _supra_, ii. 236 _sqq._]

[Footnote 196: This is especially the case among the Indians of North America (_cf._ Brinton, _Myths of the New World_, p. 242 _sq._; Dorman, _op. cit._ p. 33; Steinmetz, in _Archiv f. Anthrop._ xxiv. 591). See also Codrington, _op. cit._ p. 274 _sq._ (Banks' Islanders).]

[Footnote 197: Dove, 'Aborigines of Tasmania.' in _Tasmanian Jour. Natural Science_, i. 253. Polack, _Manners and Customs (of the New Zealanders_, i. 254; Dieffenbach, _Travels in New Zealand_, ii. 118. Percy Smith, 'Futuna,' in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ i. 39. Batchelor, _Ainu of Japan_, p. 225. Steller, _op. cit._ p. 269 (Kamchadales). Cranz, _op. cit._ i. 186 (Greenlanders). Robertson, _History of America_, ii. 202. Arbousset and Daumas, _op. cit._ p. 343 (Bechuanas).]

The belief in a moral retribution after death may thus originate in various ways, quite independently of any notion of a god who acts as a judge of human conduct. When such a belief is said to prevail among a savage people it is by no means the rule that the rewards or punishments are associated with the activity of a divine being. And when, as is sometimes the case, the fate of the dead is supposed to depend upon the will of a high god, the notions held about the other world, and especially about the place reserved for the wicked, in several instances suggest influence from a more advanced religion. But on the other hand it is not an idea which seems incompatible with genuine savage thought that, in cases where the souls of men are believed to go to live with gods, the latter select their companions and, like the human inhabitants of the other world, refuse admittance to undesirable individuals.

Religious ideas have no doubt already at the savage {696} stage begun to influence the moral consciousness even in points which have no direct bearing upon the personal interests of gods; but this influence is not known to have been so great as it has often been represented to be. I can find no solid foundation for the statements made by recent writers, that "the historical beginning of all morality is to be found in religion";[198] that even in the earliest period of human history "religion and morality are necessary correlates of each other";[199] that "all moral commandments originally have the character of religious commandments";[200] that in ancient society "all morality--as morality was then understood--was consecrated and enforced by religious motives and sanctions";[201] that the clan-god was the guardian of the tribal morality.[202] From various facts stated in this and earlier chapters I have been led to the conclusion that among uncivilised races the moral ideas relating to men's conduct towards one another have been much more influenced by the belief in magic forces which may be utilised by man, than by the belief in the free activity of gods.

[Footnote 198: Pfleiderer, _Philosophy and Development of Religion_, iv. 230.]

[Footnote 199: Caird, _Evolution of Religion_, i. 237.]

[Footnote 200: Wundt, _Ethik_, p. 99.]

[Footnote 201: Robertson Smith, _Religion of the Semites_, p. 267. _Cf._ _ibid._ p. 53.]

[Footnote 202: Jevons, _Introduction to the History of Religion_, pp. 112. 177.]

CHAPTER LI

GODS AS GUARDIANS OF MORALITY (_continued_)

FROM the gods of savage races we shall now pass to consider the attitudes of more civilised gods towards matters of worldly morality.

The deities of ancient Mexico were generally clothed with terror, and delighted in vengeance and human sacrifices. But there was also the god Quetzalcoatl, generous of gifts, mild and gentle, and so averse from such sacrifices that he shut his ears with both hands when they were mentioned.[1] The god Tezcatlipoca, again, was looked upon as the austere guardian of law and morals; but, as Sir E. B. Tylor observes, the remarkable Aztec formulas collected by Sahagun, in which this deity is so prominent a figure, show traces of Christian admixture in their material, as well as of Christian influence in their style.[2] It seems that the Mexicans had reached no fixed or systematic conclusions as to the relation of the moral to the religious life.[3] They held that departed souls attained different degrees of felicity or of wretchedness according to their different modes of death. Warriors who died on the battle-field or in the hands of the enemy's priests, and merchants who died on their journey, went to the house of the sun; those who were killed by lightning, who were drowned, {698} or who died from some incurable disease went to a terrestrial paradise; and those who died of old age or any ordinary disease went to a land of darkness and desolation, where they after a time sunk in a sleep which knew no waking.[4]

[Footnote 1: Brinton, _Myths of the New World_, p. 294 _sq._ Bancroft, _Native Races of the Pacific States_, iii. 259.]

[Footnote 2: Tylor, _Primitive Culture_, ii. 344.]

[Footnote 3: Réville, _Hibbert Lectures on the Native Religions of Mexico and Peru_, p. 104 _sq._]

[Footnote 4: Bancroft, _op. cit._ iii. 532 _sqq._ Clavigero, _History of Mexico_, i. 242 _sq._]

Among the ancient Peruvians morality obtained a religious sanction through the divinity ascribed to their rulers. "They considered every mere order of the king to be a divine decree," says Garcilasso de la Vega; "how much more would they venerate the special laws instituted for the common good. They said that the sun had ordered these laws to be made, and had revealed them to his child the Ynca; and hence a man who broke them was held to be guilty of sacrilege."[5] According to the beliefs of the higher classes the Incas were after death transported to the mansion of the Sun, their father, where they still lived together as his family. The nobles would either follow them there or would live beneath the earth under the sceptre of Supay, the god of the dead. There was no idea of positive suffering inflicted on the wicked under his direction, but the subterranean abode was gloomy and dismal. Exceptional considerations of birth, rank, or valour in war determined the passage of chosen souls to heaven, where their lot would be far happier than that of the souls who remained in the regions below. The common people, on the other hand, thought of the future life as a continuation, pure and simple, of the present existence.[6]

[Footnote 5: Garcilasso de la Vega, _Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, i. 148.]

[Footnote 6: Réville, _op. cit._ p. 236 _sqq._]

The great gods of ancient Egypt were mostly conceived as friendly beings.[7] Amon Râ, "the king of the gods," was, in his character of the sun god, the creator, preserver, and supporter of all living things. He it is who makes pasture for the herds and fruit trees for men, on his account the Nile comes and mankind lives. He is verily {699} of kindly heart: "when men call to him he delivers the fearful from the insolent." He is "the vizier of the poor, who takes no bribes," and who does not corrupt witnesses; and to him officials pray for promotion.[8] Thoth, the moon god, was also the god of all wisdom and learning, who gave men "speech and writing," who discovered the written characters, and by his arithmetic enabled gods and men to keep account of their possessions.[9] Osiris ruled over the whole of Egypt as king, and instructed its inhabitants in all that was good--in agriculture as well as in the true religion--and gave them laws.[10] After a long and blessed reign, however, he fell a prey to the machinations of his brother Set, and, having been slain, was constrained to descend into the Underworld, where he evermore lived and reigned as judge and king of the dead. But the wicked god Set was also an object of worship; for he was strong and mighty, a terror to gods and men, and kings were anxious to secure his favour.[11] We have noticed above that certain Egyptian gods were believed to be guardians of truth;[12] and closely connected with this function was their love of justice. Thoth, who was called to witness by him who wished to give assurance of his honesty and good faith,[13] was styled "the judge in heaven";[14] while his wife Ma[=a], or Maat, was the goddess of both truth and justice, and her priests were the supreme judges.[15] But it seems that the Egyptian gods after all chiefly took notice of such acts as concerned their own wellbeing. {700} This is true even of Osiris, "the great god, the lord of justice,"[16] in whose presence the judgment of the dead was given which decided upon their admission into his kingdom. In thousands upon thousands of funerary inscriptions we read words like these:--"May a royal offering be given to Osiris, that he may grant all manner of good things, food and drink to the soul of the deceased."[17] And whilst the living paid him his dues in sacrifices repeated from year to year at regular intervals, the dead were not allowed to receive directly the sepulchral meals or offerings of kindred on feast-days, but all that was addressed to them must first pass through the hands of the god.[18] In the "Negative Confession," which the worshippers of Osiris taught to their dead, great importance was attached to religious offences, such as to snare the birds of the gods, to catch the fish in their lakes, to injure the herds in the temple domains, to diminish the food in the temples, to revile the god. At the same time the list of offences which excluded the dead from Osiris' kingdom contained very many of a social character--murder, oppression, stealing, robbing minors, fraud, lying, slander, reviling, adultery.[19] But the meaning of this seems to have been not so much that the god was animated by a righteous desire to punish the wicked and reward the good, as, rather, that he did not like to have any rascals among his vassals. As to the fate of the non-justified dead very little is said, and the punishment devised for them seems to have been a comparatively modern invention.[20] Nay, the virtuous dead themselves depended for their welfare {701} upon their knowledge of magic words and formulas, upon amulets laid in their tombs, and upon the offerings made to them by their kindred. Ignorant souls, or those ill prepared for the struggle, were overcome by hunger and thirst, were attacked by demons and poisonous animals in traversing the regions of the Underworld, and, when in Osiris' kingdom, had to work and till the land and earn their own living if the offerings ceased.[21] The Book of the Dead is itself essentially a collection of spells intended to secure to the dead victory over evil demons and protection from the gods; and the "Negative Confession" is a later addition, which shows that originally the conduct of earthly life was not considered at all.[22] So also in the book of Am Dûat the whole doctrine of a future life is based upon a belief in the power of magic, with the single exception that nobody can look forward to possessing fields in Dûat who in life has been an enemy of the god Râ.[23]

[Footnote 7: On Egyptian gods as guardians of morality see, generally, Gardiner, 'Egyptian Ethics and Morality,' in Hastings, _Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics_, v. 479 _sq._]

[Footnote 8: Erman, _Handbook of Egyptian Religion_, pp. 58-60, 83. Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 114.]

[Footnote 9: Erman, _op. cit._ p. 11. Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, p. 220.]

[Footnote 10: Erman, _op. cit._ p. 32. _Idem_, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 270. Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 174. Plutarch, _De Iside et Osiride_, 13. Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_, i. 14, 15, 25. Kaibel, _Epigrammata Græca_, p. xxi.]

[Footnote 11: It is probable that Set originally was the divine protector of the kings of Upper Egypt, while Osiris' son Horus, who defeated him, was the protector of the kings of Lower Egypt (Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 19 _sq._).]

[Footnote 12: _Supra_, ii. 115.]

[Footnote 13: _Supra_, ii. 121.]

[Footnote 14: Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 11.]

[Footnote 15: _Supra_, ii. 115. Wiedemann, _op. cit._ p. 142. Amélineau, _L'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypte ancienne_, pp. 182, 187. Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 21.]

[Footnote 16: Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 17: Wiedemann, _op. cit._ p. 217.]

[Footnote 18: Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 117.]

[Footnote 19: Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 103 _sqq._]

[Footnote 20: Wiedemann, _op. cit._ p. 95 _sq._ _Idem_, _Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul_, p. 55. Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 105. In the Pyramid texts we read that, if among the deceased there is one of whom it can be said, "There is no evil which he hath done," the saying penetrates to the sun god, and he receives him kindly in heaven. The deceased also profits with regard to his reception there if he has never spoken evil of the king nor slighted the gods. But, as a rule, it is rather bodily cleanliness which the gods demand of their new companion in heaven, and they themselves help to purify him (Erman, p. 94).]

[Footnote 21: Erman, _Life in Ancient Egypt_, p. 315 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 99 _sq._ Maspero, _op. cit._ p. 185 _sq._ _Idem_, _Études de mythologie et d'archéologie égyptiennes_, i. 347. Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, pp. 279, 296. _Idem_, _Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul_, p. 60 _sq._]

[Footnote 22: Maspero, _Études_, i. 348. Amélineau, _op. cit._ p. 243. Renouf, in _Book of the Dead_, p. 220. Erman, _Egyptian Religion_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 23: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 94 _sq._ Maspero, _Études_, ii. 163.]

The religion of the Chaldeans was a religion of dread. Everywhere they felt themselves surrounded by hostile demons; feared above all were the seven evil spirits, who were everywhere and yet invisible, who slipped through bolts and doorposts and sockets, and who had power even to bewitch the gods.[24] In their incessant warfare against these fiends men were assisted by the more propitious among the deities: by Marduk, the "merciful" god, the god of the youthful sun of spring and early morning;[25] {702} by Ea, the "good" god, the god of the waters of the deep and the source of wisdom;[26] by Gibil-Nusku, the lord of fire, who put to flight the demons of night when the fire was kindled on the household hearth, and who in the flame carried to the other gods the sacrifices offered them;[27] as also by the tutelary deities of each individual, household, and city.[28] The gods were on the whole favourably disposed towards man. But they helped only those who piously observed the prescribed rites, who recited the conventional prayers and offered them sacrifices; on such persons they bestowed a happy old age and a numerous posterity. On the other hand, he who did not fear his god would be cut down like a reed; and by neglecting the slightest ceremonial detail the king excited the anger of the deities against himself and his subjects.[29] During the whole of their lives the Chaldeans were haunted by the dread of offending their gods, and they continually implored pardon for their sins.[30] But the sinner became conscious of his guilt only as a conclusion drawn from the fact that he was suffering from some misfortune, which he interpreted as a punishment sent by an offended god. It mattered little what had called forth the wrath of the god or whether the deity was acting in accordance with just ideas;[31] and in none of the penitential psalms known to us is there any indication that the notion of sin comprised offences against fellow men. It is true that in the incantation series 'Shurpu' not only offences against gods and ceremonial transgressions, but a large number of wrongs of a social character, are included in the list of possible causes of the suffering which the incantation is intended to remove. On behalf of the afflicted individual the exorciser asks:--"Has he sinned against a god, Is his {703} guilt against a goddess, Is it a wrongful deed against his master, Hatred towards his elder brother, Has he despised father or mother, Insulted his elder sister, Has he given too little,[32] Has he withheld too much, For 'no' said 'yes,' For 'yes' said 'no'? . . . Has he fixed a false boundary, Not fixed a just boundary, Has he removed a boundary, a limit, or a territory, Has he possessed himself of his neighbour's house, Has he approached his neighbour's wife, Has he shed the blood of his neighbour, Robbed his neighbour's dress?" and so forth.[33] But I fail to see any legitimate ground for the conclusion which Schrader and Zimmern have drawn from these passages, to wit, that the gods were believed to be angry with persons guilty of any of the offences enumerated.[34] It seems to me quite obvious that the evils which were hypothetically associated with injuries inflicted upon fellow men were ascribed, not to the avenging activity of a god, but to the curses of the injured party. The gods are expressly invoked to relieve the unhappy individual from the curses under which he is suffering, whether he has been cursed by his father, mother, elder brother, elder sister, friend, master, king, or god, or has approached an accursed person, or slept in such a person's bed, or sat on his chair, or eaten from his dish or drunk from his cup.[35] In these incantations there is no plea for forgiveness; the possible causes for the suffering are enumerated simply because the mention of the real cause is supposed to go a long way towards expelling the evil.[36] Some of the gods, however, are invoked as judges. This is frequently the case with Shamash, the sun god, "the supreme judge of heaven and earth," who, seated on a throne in the chamber of judgment, receives the supplications of men.[37] Of the moon god Sin it is said in a hymn {704} dedicated to him that his "word produces truth and justice, so that men speak the truth."[38] And the lord of fire is addressed as a judge, who burns the evildoers and annihilates the bad,[39] and is exhorted by the conjurer to help him to his right;[40] but this probably means little more than the invocation, "Eat my enemies, destroy those who have done harm to me."[41] Of a moral retribution after death there is no trace in the Chaldean religion. Those who have obtained the goodwill of the gods receive their reward in this world, by a life of happiness and of good health, but the moment that death ensues the control of the gods comes to an end. All mankind, kings and subjects, virtuous and wicked, go to Aralû, the gloomy subterranean realm presided over by Allatu and her consort Nergal, where the dead are doomed to everlasting sojourn or imprisonment in a state of joyless inactivity. A kind of judgment is spoken of, but nothing indicates that it is based on moral considerations.[42] According to the Gilgamesh epic, however, the fortunes awaiting those who die are not all alike. Those who fall in battle seem to enjoy special privileges, provided that they are properly buried and there is someone to make them comfortable in their last hour and to look after them when dead. But he whose corpse remains in the field has no rest in the earth, and he whose spirit is not cared for by any one is consumed by gnawing hunger.[43]

[Footnote 24: Jastrow, _Religion of Babylonia and Assyria_, p. 260 _sqq._ Smith, _Chaldean Account of Genesis_, pp. 87, 88, 106 _sq._ _Idem_, _Chaldäische Genesis_, edited by Delitzsch, pp. 83, 306 _sq._]

[Footnote 25: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 31. Sayce, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Babylonians_, p. 98. King, _Babylonian Magic and Sorcery_, p. 52 _sqq._ Jensen, _Die Kosmologie der Babylonier_, pp. 87, 88, 249 _sq._ Schrader-Zimmern, _Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament_, p. 372 _sq._]

[Footnote 26: Hommel, _Die semitischen Völker und Sprachen_, i. 374 _sqq._ Mürdter-Delitzsch, _op. cit._ p. 27. Sayce, _op. cit._ pp. 131, 140.]

[Footnote 27: Tallqvist, 'Die assyrische Beschwörungsserie Maqlû,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xx. 25, 28 _sq._]

[Footnote 28: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _op. cit._ p. 37 _sq._ Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, pp. 643, 674, 682 _sq._]

[Footnote 29: Jeremias, _Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode_, p. 46 _sq._ Maspero, _Dawn of Civilization_, pp. 697, 705.]

[Footnote 30: See Zimmern, _Babylonische Busspsalmen_, _passim_.]

[Footnote 31: _Cf._ Jastrow, _op. cit._ p. 313 _sqq._]

[Footnote 32: In mercantile transactions (Jastrow, _op. cit._ p. 291, n. 2).]

[Footnote 33: Zimmern, _Beiträge zur Kenntnis der babylonischen Religion_, 'Die Beschwörungstafeln [vS]urpu,' p. 3 _sqq._]

[Footnote 34: _Idem_, in Schrader, _Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament_, p. 612.]

[Footnote 35: Zimmern, _Die Beschwörungstafeln [vS]urpu_, ii. 89-93, 99-104, pp. 7, 23.]

[Footnote 36: See Jastrow, _op. cit._ p. 292.]

[Footnote 37: Tallqvist, _Maqlû_, ii. 94. Zimmern, _[vS]urpu_, ii. 130, p. 9. _Idem_, _Babylonische Hymnen und Gebete_, p. 13. Mürdter-Delitzsch, _op. cit._ p. 28. Schrader-Zimmern, _op. cit._ p. 368. Jastrow, _op. cit._ pp. 71, 120, 209 _sqq._]

[Footnote 38: Zimmern, _Babylonische Hymnen und Gebete_, p. 12.]

[Footnote 39: Tallqvist, _Maqlû_, i. 95; ii. 70, 89, 116, 130, 131, 184.]

[Footnote 40: _Ibid._ i. 114.]

[Footnote 41: _Ibid._ i. 116; ii. 120.]

[Footnote 42: Jeremias, _op. cit._ _passim_. Schrader-Zimmern, _op. cit._ p. 636 _sq._ Jastrow, _op. cit._ p. 565 _sqq._ Jensen, _op. cit._ p. 217 _sqq._]

[Footnote 43: Haupt, 'Die zwölfte Tafel des babylonischen Nimrod-Epos,' in _Beiträge zur Assyriologie_, i. 69 _sq._ Jensen, 'Das Gilgamí[vs] (Nimrod)-Epos,' xii. 6, in _Assyrisch-Babylonische Mythen und Epen_, p. 265.]

In a still higher degree than the Chaldean religion Zoroastrianism represents an incessant struggle against evil spirits. Here everything in heaven and on earth is engaged in the conflict; it is a war between two mighty sovereigns, Ahura Mazda and Angra Mainyu, and their respective forces.[44] Whatever works for the good of man comes from {705} and strives for Ahura Mazda, whatever works for the harm of man comes from and strives for Angra Mainyu. There can be no doubt that the powers of goodness will absolutely triumph in the end; but though Angra Mainyu and his band have been defeated, the battle is still raging. Ahura Mazda, being the originator of everything good in the world, is also the founder of the order of the universe, "the creator of the righteous order."[45] In the Vendîdâd he is asked about the rules of life, and he is pleased to answer;[46] M. Darmesteter observes that the Avesta and the Pentateuch are the only two religious books known in which legislation descends from the heavens to the earth in a series of conversations between the lawgiver and his god.[47] The sacred law of Zoroastrianism enjoins charity[48] and industry,[49] it condemns the murder of a believer,[50] abortion,[51] theft,[52] non-payment of debts,[53] and, with special emphasis, falsehood and breach of faith,[54] and unnatural intercourse.[55] But the "good thoughts, words, and deeds" most urgently insisted upon are orthodoxy, prayer, and sacrifice; whilst the greatest sins are apostasy, transgressions of the rules of ceremonial cleanliness, and offences against sacred beings. It is less criminal to kill a man than to serve bad food to a shepherd's dog; for the manslayer gets off with ninety stripes, whereas the bad master will receive two hundred.[56] And the killing of a water dog is punished with ten thousand stripes.[57] Offenders will be liable to penalties not only here below, but in the next world as well, where Ahura Mazda, "the discerning arbiter,"[58] establishes "evil for the evil, and happy blessings for the good."[59] The views accepted in regard to the future life, {706} whilst incomplete in the Gathas, are expanded in the Younger Avesta, and fully given in the Pahlavi books.[60] The man who has lived for Ahura Mazda will have a seat near him in heaven, and there he remains undecaying and immortal, unalarmed and undistressed, full of glory and delight; whereas the wicked soul will be tormented in the darkness of hell, "the dwelling of the demons."[61] The good deeds of the virtuous and the bad deeds of the wicked, in the form of maidens, come to meet them on their roads to paradise or hell.[62] But the fate of the dead is not merely influenced by their conduct towards their fellow men while alive. It is said that "he who wishes to seize the heavenly reward, will seize it by giving gifts to him who holds up the Law."[63] And the soul of him who recites the prayer Ahuna Vairya in the manner prescribed crosses over the bridge which separates this world from the next, and reaches the highest paradise.[64]

[Footnote 44: According to the _Vendîdâd_ (i. 3 _sqq._) Angra Mainyu constantly countercreated the creations of Ahura Mazda. But this idea is not yet to be found in the Gathas, where the wickedness of Ako Mainyu is only represented as an attempt to destroy the good creation (see Lehmann, _Zarathustra_, ii. 75, 165).]

[Footnote 45: _Yasna_, xxxi. 7. Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, pp. 19, 24, 88, &c.]

[Footnote 46: _Vendîdâd_, xviii. 13 _sqq._]

[Footnote 47: Darmesteter, in _Sacred Books of the East_, iv. (2nd edit.) p. lviii.]

[Footnote 48: _Supra_, i. 551.]

[Footnote 49: _Supra_, ii. 275.]

[Footnote 50: _Vendîdâd_, iii. 41; v. 14.]

[Footnote 51: _Ibid._ xv. 9 _sqq._]

[Footnote 52: _Supra_, ii. 60. _Yasna_, xi. 3.]

[Footnote 53: _Vendîdâd_, iv. 1.]

[Footnote 54: _Supra_, ii. 93.]

[Footnote 55: _Supra_, ii. 479 _sq._]

[Footnote 56: _Vendîdâd_, iv. 40; xiii. 24; xv. 3.]

[Footnote 57: _Ibid._ xiv. 1 _sq._]

[Footnote 58: _Yasna_, xxix. 4.]

[Footnote 59: _Ibid._ xliii. 5.]

[Footnote 60: _Cf._ Jackson, _Avesta Grammar_, i. p. xxviii.]

[Footnote 61: _Vendîdâd_, xix. 28 _sqq._ _Yasts_, xxii. _Bundahis_, ch. xxx. _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_ ii. 123 _sqq._ ch. vii. _Ardâ Vîrâf_, ch. xvii. _Cf._ Geiger, _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians_, i. 101.]

[Footnote 62: _Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad_, ii. 125, 167 _sqq._]

[Footnote 63: _Yasts_, xxiv. 30.]

[Footnote 64: Geiger, _op. cit._ i. 73. See also _Yasts_, xii. 335; xxiv. 39, 47 _sq._; Darmesteter, _Ormazd et Ahriman_, p. 28.]

In Vedic religion we likewise meet with a conflict between gods and demons, but the struggle is too unequal to result in anything like the Zoroastrian dualism.[65] Various misfortunes are attributed to the ill-will of evil spirits, but their power is comparatively slight, and the greater demons, like V[r.]tra, are represented as defeated or destroyed by the gods.[66] On the other hand there is among the great gods themselves one who has a distinctly malevolent character, namely Rudra, a god of storm,[67] "terrible like a wild beast";[68] but though the hymns {707} addressed to him chiefly express fear of his dreadful shafts and deprecations of his wrath, he is also sometimes supplicated to confer blessings upon man and beast.[69] With this exception the great gods are all beneficent beings,[70] though of course liable to punish those who offend them. Varuna has established heaven and earth,[71] has made the celestial bodies to shine[72] and the rivers to flow.[73] He rules over nature by laws which are fixed and immutable, and which must be followed by the gods themselves.[74] He sees and knows everything, because he is the infinite light and the sun is his eye;[75] and in connection with Mithra he is said to dispel and punish falsehood.[76] Varuna has even been represented as "the supreme moral ruler," but it seems to me that scholars have generally credited him with a somewhat more comprehensive sense of justice than the hymns imply.[77] Every hymn to Varuna contains a prayer for forgiveness, but there is no indication that the sins which excite his wrath include ordinary moral wrongdoing. That sin and moral guilt are not identical conceptions in the Rig-Veda is fairly obvious from the fact that forgiveness of sin is also sought from Indra,[78] whose favour is only won by those who contribute to his wellbeing or who destroy persons neglectful of his worship.[79] The Vedic religion is pre-emiently ritualistic. The pious man _par préférence_ is he who makes the _soma_ flow in abundance and whose hands are always full of butter, the reprobate man is he who is penurious towards the gods;[80] and just like the other gods, {708} Varuna visits with disease those who neglect him,[81] and is appeased by sacrifices and prayers.[82] After death the souls of those who have practised rigorous penance,[83] of those who have risked their lives in battle,[84] and above all of those who have bestowed liberal sacrificial gifts,[85] go with the smoke arising from the funeral pile to the heavenly world, where the Fathers dwell with Yama--the first man who died[86]--and Varuna, the two kings who reign in bliss.[87] There they enjoy an endless felicity among the gods, clothed in glorious bodies and drinking the celestial _soma_, which renders them immortal.[88] Yet there are different degrees of happiness in this heavenly mansion. The performance of rites in honour of the manes causes the souls to ascend from a lower to a higher state; indeed, if no such offerings are made they do not go to heaven at all.[89] Another source of happiness for the dead is their own pious conduct during their lifetime; for in the abode of bliss they are united with what they have sacrificed and given, especially reaping the reward of their gifts to priests.[90] Unworthy souls, on the other hand, are kept out of this abode by Yama's dogs, which guard the road to his kingdom.[91] As to the destiny in store for those who are not admitted to heaven, the hymns have little to tell. Zimmer and others erroneously argue that a race who believe in future rewards for the good must logically believe in future punishments for the wicked.[92] So far as I can see, all the traces of such a belief which are to be found in the Vedic literature are requests made to gods, {709} or simply curses, to the effect that evil-doers may be thrown into deep and dismal pits under the earth.[93] They do not imply that gods of their own accord punish wicked people after death.

[Footnote 65: _Cf._ Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 13.]

[Footnote 66: Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 281. Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 18.]

[Footnote 67: Muir, _Original Sanskrit Texts_, v. 147. Barth, _op. cit._ p. 14. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 77.]

[Footnote 68: Oldenberg, _op. cit._ pp. 63, 281, 284. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 18. Bergaigne, _La religion védique_, iii. 152 _sqq._]

[Footnote 69: Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 75 _sq._]

[Footnote 70: Oldenberg, _op. cit._ pp. 60, 281. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 18.]

[Footnote 71: _Rig-Veda_, viii. 42. 1.]

[Footnote 72: _Ibid._ i. 24. 10; vii. 87. 5.]

[Footnote 73: _Ibid._ ii. 28. 4.]

[Footnote 74: _Ibid._ viii. 41. 7. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 26. Bohnenberger, _Der altindische Gott Varu[n.]a_, p. 38 _sqq._]

[Footnote 75: _Supra_, ii. 598. Darmesteter, _Essais orientaux_, p. 126.]

[Footnote 76: Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 26.]

[Footnote 77: Macdonell, _op. cit._ pp. 20, 26. Whitney, 'On the main Results of the later Vedic Researches in Germany,' in _Jour. American Oriental Soc._ iii. 326. Roth, 'On the Morality of the Veda,' _ibid._ iii. 340 _sq._ Bergaigne, _op. cit._ iii. 156.

Darmesteter, _Essais orientaux_, p. 111. Bohnenberger, _op. cit._ p. 49 _sqq._]

[Footnote 78: Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 299.]

[Footnote 79: _Ibid._ pp. 282, 283, 300.]

[Footnote 80: _Rig-Veda_, viii. 31. See Barth, _op. cit._ p. 34; Kaegi, _Rigveda_, p. 29; Muir, _op. cit._ v. 20; Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 18.]

[Footnote 81: _Rig-Veda_, i. 122. 9.]

[Footnote 82: _Ibid._ i. 24. 14.]

[Footnote 83: _Ibid._ x. 154. 2.]

[Footnote 84: _Ibid._ x. 154. 3.]

[Footnote 85: _Ibid._ i. 125. 5 _sq._; x. 107. 2; x. 154. 3. Muir, _op. cit._ v. 285. Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 536. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 167.]

[Footnote 86: Muir, _op. cit._ v. 301.]

[Footnote 87: _Rig-Veda_, x. 14. 7 _sq._ Barth, _op. cit._ p. 22 _sq._ Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 165 _sqq._]

[Footnote 88: Zimmer, _Altindisches Leben_, p. 410 _sqq._ Barth, _op. cit._ p. 23. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 167 _sq._]

[Footnote 89: Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 155. Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 535.]

[Footnote 90: _Rig-Veda_, x. 14. 8; x. 154. 3. Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 535. Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 168.]

[Footnote 91: _Rig-Veda_, x. 14. 10 _sqq._ _Cf._ Zimmer, _op. cit._ p. 421; Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 147.]

[Footnote 92: Zimmer, _op. cit._ p. 418. Scherman, _Indische Visionslitteratur_, p. 123. _Idem_, 'Eine Art visionärer Höllenschilderung aus dem indischen Mittelalter,' in _Romanische Forschungen_, v. 569. Oldenberg, _op. cit._ p. 537.]

[Footnote 93: _Rig-Veda_, iv. 5. 5; vii. 104. 3, 11, 17. _Atharva-Veda_, v. 19. 3, 12 _sqq._; xii. 4. 3, 36.]

In post-Vedic times ritualism grew more important still. Sometimes the gods are represented as beings indifferent to every moral distinction, and the most indelicate stories are unscrupulously related of them.[94] In the Taittirîya Samhitâ of the Yajur Veda we are told that if anybody wishes to injure another, he need only say to Sûrya, one of the most important among the solar deities,[95] "Smite such a one, and I will give you an offering," and Sûrya, to get the offering, will smite him.[96] Çiva, who is connected with the Vedic god Rudra, is in the Mahabharata clothed in terrible "forms," being armed with the trident and wearing a necklace of skulls; he exacts a bloody cultus, and is the chief of the mischievous spirits and vampires that frequent places of execution and burial grounds.[97] Vishnu, the other great god of Hinduism, though less fierce than Çiva, is nevertheless, on one side of his character, an inexorable god;[98] and Krishna, as accepted by Vishnuism, is a crafty hero of a singularly doubtful moral character.[99] In Brahmanism religion is largely replaced by magic, the rites themselves are raised to the rank of divinities, the priests become the gods of gods.[100] And the point of view from which these man-gods look upon human conduct is expressed in the Satapatha Brâhmana, where it is said that fees paid to priests are like sacrifices offered to other gods--those who gratify them are placed in a state of bliss.[101] Ritual observances are essential for a man's wellbeing both in this life and in the life to come, where paradise, hell, or transmigration {710} awaits the dead. In the Brâhmanas immortality, or at least longevity, is promised to those who rightly understand and practise the rites of sacrifice, whilst those who are deficient in this respect depart before their natural term of life to the next world, where they are weighed in a balance and receive good or evil according to their deeds.[102] To repeat sacred texts a certain number of times is also laid down as a condition of salvation,[103] and the doctrine is gradually developed that a single invocation of the divine name cancels a whole life of iniquity and crime. Hence the importance attached--as early as the Bhagavad Gîtâ--to the last thought before death, and the idea of attaining complete possession of this thought by an act of suicide.[104] According to the Purânas it is sufficient even in the case of the vilest criminal, when at the point of death, to pronounce by chance some syllables of the names Vishnu or Çiva in order to obtain salvation;[105] and in the preface to the Prem Sâgar, which displays the religion of the Hindus at the present day, it is said that those who even ignorantly sing the praises of the greatness of Krishn Chand are rewarded with final beatitude, just as a person would acquire eternal life by partaking of the drink of immortality though he did not know what he was drinking.[106] On the other hand, "according to the Hindu Scriptures, whatever a man's life may have been, if he do not die near some holy stream, if his body is not burned on its banks, or at any rate near some water as a representative of the stream; or where this is impracticable, if some portion of his body be not thrown into it--his spirit must wander in misery, unable to obtain the bliss for which he has done and suffered so much in life."[107] At the same time we also find a great variety of social duties {711} inculcated in the sacred books of India--humanity even to enemies[108] and slaves,[109] filial piety,[110] charity,[111] hospitality,[112] veracity;[113] and in the Sûtras the doctrine appears that in order to obtain the chief fruit of sacrifice it is necessary to practise the moral virtues in addition to the rite.[114] But this doctrine is singularly free from any reference to the justice of gods. In the Upanishads and Buddhistic books it is distinctly formulated in the idea of _karma_, according to which each act of the soul, good or bad, inevitably and naturally works out its full effect to the sweet or bitter end without the intervention of any deity to apportion the reward or punishment.[115]

[Footnote 94: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 46 _sq._ Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 76.]

[Footnote 95: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 20.]

[Footnote 96: _Taittirîya Samhitâ_, vi. 4 _sqq._, quoted by Goblet d'Alviella, _Hibbert Lectures on the Origin and Growth of the Conception of God_, p. 85.]

[Footnote 97: Barth, _op. cit._ pp. 159, 164.]

[Footnote 98: _Ibid._ p. 174.]

[Footnote 99: _Ibid._ p. 172.]

[Footnote 100: _Supra_, ii. 657.]

[Footnote 101: _Satapatha Brâhmana_, ii. 2. 2. 6.]

[Footnote 102: Weber, 'Eine Legende des Çatapatha-Brâhma[n.]a über die strafende Vergeltung nach dem Tode,' in _Zeitschr. d. Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ ix. 238 _sq._ See also Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 168; Hopkins, _op. cit._ pp. 190, 193; _Vish['n]u Purá['n]a_, p. 44.]

[Footnote 103: _Aitareya Brahmanam_, ii. 17.]

[Footnote 104: _Bhagavad Gîtâ_, ch. 8. Barth, _op. cit._ p. 228.]

[Footnote 105: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 228.]

[Footnote 106: _Prem Ságar_, p. 56. _Cf._ Wilson, in _Vish['n]u Purá['n]a_, p. 210, n. 13; _Idem_, 'Religious Sects of the Hindus,' in _Asiatic Researches_, xvi. 115.]

[Footnote 107: Wilkins, _Modern Hinduism_, p. 439 _sq._]

[Footnote 108: _Supra_, i. 342.]

[Footnote 109: _Supra_, i. 689.]

[Footnote 110: _Supra_, i. 612.]

[Footnote 111: _Supra_, i. 550 _sq._]

[Footnote 112: _Supra_, i. 578 _sq._]

[Footnote 113: _Supra_, ii. 91.]

[Footnote 114: Barth, _op. cit._ p. 49. See, _e.g._, _Âpastamba_, i. 7. 20. 1 _sqq._; i. 8. 23. 6.]

[Footnote 115: Barth, _op. cit._ pp. 77, 78, 115 _sq._ Müller, _Anthropological Religion_, p. 301. _Dhammapada_, i. 1 _sq._ Rhys Davids, _Hibbert Lectures on the History of Buddhism_, p. 85. Oldenberg, _Buddha_, p. 289. Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 319 _sq._]

Buddha did not base his system on any belief in gods, hence there is no place in it for a ritual nor for sin in the sense of offending a supernatural being. He that is pure in heart is the true priest, not he that knows the Vedas; the Vedas are nothing, the priests are of no account, save as they be morally of repute.[116] If the genuine Buddhist can be said to worship any higher power, it is the moral order which never fails to assert itself in the law of cause and effect. But Buddha's followers were less metaphysical, and "the clouds returned after the rain." The old gods of Brahmanism came back, Buddha himself was deified as an omniscient and everlasting god, and Buddhism incorporated most of the local deities and demons of those nations it sought to convert.[117] From being originally a metaphysical and ethical doctrine, it was thus transformed into a religion full of ritualism, and, it should be added, profusely mixed with magic. In Lamaism, especially, {712} ritual is elevated to the front rank of importance; we find there pompous services closely resembling those of the Church of Rome, litanies and chants, offerings and sacrifice.[118] And the muttering of certain mystic formulas and short prayers is alleged to be far more efficacious than mere moral virtue as a means of gaining the glorious heaven of eternal bliss, the paradise of the fabulous Buddha of boundless light.[119] So also in China the teachers of Buddhism "were by no means rigorous in enforcing the obligations of men to morality. To expiate sins, offerings to the idols and to the priests were sufficient. A temple built in honour of F[)o], and richly endowed, would suffice to blot out every stain of guilt, and serve as a portal to the blessed mansions of Buddha."[120]

[Footnote 116: Hopkins, _op. cit._ p. 319.]

[Footnote 117: Waddell, _Buddhism in Tibet_, pp. 126, 325 _sq._ Griffis, _Religions of Japan_, pp. 187, 207. Davis, _China_, ii. 51.]

[Footnote 118: Waddell, _op. cit._ 421, 476.]

[Footnote 119: _Ibid._ pp. 142, 148, 573.]

[Footnote 120: Gutzlaff, quoted by Davis, _op. cit._ ii. 51. _Cf._ Edkins, _Religion in China_, p. 150.]

In the national religion of China the heaven god, Shang-te, is the supreme being, the creator and sovereign ruler of the universe, whose power knows no bounds, and whose sight equally comprehends the past, the present, and the future, penetrating even to the remotest recesses of the heart.[121] He is the author and upholder not only of the physical but of the moral order of the world, watching over the conduct of men, rewarding the good, and punishing the wicked.[122] Sometimes he appears to array himself in terrors, as in the case of public calamities and the irregularity of the seasons; but these are only salutary warnings intended to call men to repentance.[123] The cult which is offered Shang-te is frigid and ceremonial. The rules of ceremony have their origin in heaven, and the movement of them {713} reaches to earth; their abandonment leads to "the ruin of states, the destruction of families, and the perishing of individuals."[124] The Chinese are inclined to place ritualism on an equality with social morality. Confucius himself humbly submitted to the rules of ceremony, although he denounced hypocrisy. But to him morality was infinitely more important than religion. He altogether avoided the personal term God, and made only use of the abstract term Heaven. He admitted that spiritual beings exist, and even sacrificed to them,[125] but when questioned about matters relating to religion he was systematically silent.[126] Religious duties occupy a very insignificant place in his system. "To give one's self earnestly to the duties due to men, and, while respecting spiritual beings, to keep aloof from them, may be called wisdom."[127] Prayer is unnecessary because Heaven does not actively interfere with the soul of man; it has endowed him at his birth with goodness, which, if he will, may become his nature, and the reward or punishment is only the natural or providential result of his conduct.[128] Of punishments in a future life Confucius says nothing, though he maintains that there are rewards and dignity for the good after death.[129] The belief of the Chinese in _post mortem_ punishments comes from Buddhism.[130]

[Footnote 121: Legge, _Notions of the Chinese concerning God_, pp. 33, 34, 100 _sq._ _Idem_, _Chinese Classics_, i. 98. Staunton, _Inquiry into the proper Mode of rendering the Word "God" in translating the Sacred Scriptures into the Chinese Language_, p. 8 _sq._ Douglas, _Confucianism and Taouism_, pp. 77, 82.]

[Footnote 122: Doolittle, _Social Life of the Chinese_, ii. 272. Legge, _Chinese Classics_, i. 98; iii. 46. Smith, _Proverbs of the Chinese_, p. 40. Boone, _Essay on the proper rendering of the Words Elohim and [Greek: The/os] into the Chinese Language_, p. 55. _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, i. 162. Davis, _op. cit._ ii. 26, 34. Douglas, _op. cit._ pp. 77, 78, 83.]

[Footnote 123: Staunton, _op. cit._ p. 9. Legge, _Chinese Classics_, iii. 46 _sq._]

[Footnote 124: _Lî Kî_, vii. 4. 5 _sq._]

[Footnote 125: _Lun Yü_, iii. 12. 1; x. 8. 10.]

[Footnote 126: _Ibid._ vii. 20. _Cf._ Réville, _La religion chinoise_, p. 326.]

[Footnote 127: _Lun Yü_, vi. 20.]

[Footnote 128: Douglas, _op. cit._ p. 78. Legge, _Religions of China_, p. 300. Réville, _op. cit._ p. 645.]

[Footnote 129: Legge, _Religions of China_, pp. 115, 299 _sq._ Réville, _op. cit._ p. 345.]

[Footnote 130: _Indo-Chinese Gleaner_, iii. 288. Edkins, _op. cit._ pp. 83, 87 _sqq._ Smith, _Proverbs of the Chinese_, p. 227.]

The gods of ancient Greece were on the whole beneficent beings, who conferred blessings upon those who secured their goodwill. Zeus protects the life of the family, city, and nation; he is a god of victory and victorious peace, who gathers the hosts against Troy, and saves Greece from Persia; he brings the ships to land; he is "the warder off of evil."[131] But neither he nor the other gods bestow their {714} favours for nothing; Xenophon says that they assist with good advice those who worship them regularly,[132] but take revenge on those who neglect them.[133] They punish severely even offences committed against them accidentally,[134] and not infrequently they display actual malevolence towards men by seducing them into sin[135] or inflicting harm upon them out of sheer envy.[136] In other respects, also, they are by no means models of morality; but this does not prevent them from acting as administrators of justice any more than, among men, a judge is supposed to lose all regard for justice because he himself transgresses the rules of morality in some particular of private life.[137] "For great crimes," says Herodotus, "great punishments at the hands of the gods are in store."[138] Dike, or Justice, the terrible virgin "who breathes against her enemies a destructive wrath,"[139] is represented sometimes as the daughter, sometimes as the companion of the all-seeing Zeus;[140] and, as Welcker observes, Zeus was not only a god among other gods, but also the deity solely and abstractedly.[141] We have noticed above that from ancient times the murder of a kinsman was an offence against Zeus and under the ban of the Erinyes, and that later on all bloodshed, if the victim had any rights at all within the city, became a sin which needed purification.[142] Zeus protected guests and suppliants,[143] he punished children who reproached their aged parents,[144] he was a guardian of the family property,[145] he protected boundaries,[146] he was no friend of falsehood,[147] he punished perjury.[148] According to earlier beliefs retribution was exclusively restricted {715} to this earthly existence, and if the guilty person himself escaped the punishment for his deed it fell on some of his descendants.[149] The transference of Menelaus to the Elysian plain, spoken of in the Odyssey,[150] was not a reward for his virtue--indeed, he was not particularly conspicuous for any of the Homeric virtues--but a privilege resulting from his being married to Zeus' daughter Helena;[151] and if the perjurer was tortured in Hades[152] the simple reason was that he had called down upon himself such torture in his oath.[153] In later times we meet with the doctrine of retribution after death, not only in the speculations of isolated philosophers, but as a popular belief;[154] but this belief seems to have been quite unconnected with any notion of Olympian justice.[155] The souls in the world beyond the grave are sentenced by special judges;[156] Aeschylus expressly says that it is another Zeus that administers justice there.[157] For him Hades with the powers by which it is governed exists only as a place where the guilty are punished, whereas for the virtuous he has no word of true hope;[158] and other writers also have much more to tell about future punishments than about future rewards.[159] Particularly prominent among the offences which are punished in Hades are, besides perjury,[160] injuries to parents[161] and guests,[162] that is, offences which in this world are visited with the most powerful curses.[163] According to Aeschylus, the retribution which the Erinyes--personifications of curses--have begun on earth is completed in the nether world, and according to Pythagoras unpurified souls are kept chained there by the Erinyes without any hope of escape.[164] We are, moreover, told that painters used to represent "allegorical figures of curses in connection with their {716} images of wicked dead.[165] From all these facts I conclude that the notion of punishments in Hades did not arise from a belief in the justice of gods, but from the idea that the efficacy of a curse may extend beyond the grave--an idea which we have already met with both in Vedic texts and among certain savages, and of which the supposed punishment of perjury in Hades is only a particular instance.[166] As for the gods it should be added that the vulgar opinion of their character was not shared by all. Euripides affirms that the legends about them which tend to confuse human ideas as to right and wrong are not literally true.[167] "I think," he says, "that none of the gods is bad";[168] "if the gods do aught that is base, they are not gods."[169] Plato opposes the popular views that the deity induces men to commit crimes,[170] that he is capable of feeling envy,[171] and that evil-doers may avert divine punishments by sacrifices offered to the gods as bribes.[172] God is good, he is never the author of evil to any one, and if the wicked are miserable the reason is that they require to be punished and are benefited by receiving punishment from God.[173] Plutarch likewise asserts in the strongest terms that God is perfectly good and least of all wanting in justice and love, "the most beautiful of virtues and the best befitting the Godhead."[174]

[Footnote 131: Farnell, _Cults of the Greek States_, i. 59-61, 83, 107. Vischer, _Kleine Schriften_, ii. 352 _sq._ Preller, _Griechische Mythologie_, i. 146 _sqq._]

[Footnote 132: Xenophon, _Hipparchicus_, ix. 9. _Idem_, _Cyropædia_, i. 6. 46.]

[Footnote 133: _Idem_, _Anabasis_, v. 3. 13; vii. 8. 4.]

[Footnote 134: Nägelsbach, _Die nachhomerische Theologie des griechischen Volksglaubens_, p. 331 _sqq._]

[Footnote 135: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, i. 231 _sqq._]

[Footnote 136: _Ibid._ i. 79 _sqq._]

[Footnote 137: _Cf._ Nägelsbach, _Homerische Theologie_, pp. 288, 317 _sqq._; Schmidt, _op. cit._ i. 48 _sqq._; Maury, _Histoire des religions de la Grèce antique_, i. 342; Gladstone, _Studies on Homer_, ii. 384.]

[Footnote 138: Herodotus, ii. 120.]

[Footnote 139: Aeschylus, _Choephor[oe]_, 949 _sqq._]

[Footnote 140: _Ibid._ 949. Hesiod, _Opera et dies_, 256 (254). Usener, _Götternamen_, p. 197. Farnell, _op. cit._ i. 71, Darmesteter, _Essais orientaux_, p. 106 _sq._]

[Footnote 141: Welcker, _Griechische Götterlehre_, i. 181.]

[Footnote 142: _Supra_, i. 379.]

[Footnote 143: _Supra_, i. 579, 585.]

[Footnote 144: _Supra_, i. 624.]

[Footnote 145: _Supra_, ii. 60.]

[Footnote 146: _Supra_, ii. 61.]

[Footnote 147: _Supra_, ii. 116.]

[Footnote 148: _Supra_, ii. 121.]

[Footnote 149: _Supra_, i. 49 _sq._]

[Footnote 150: _Odyssey_, iv. 561 _sqq._]

[Footnote 151: _Cf._ Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 74.]

[Footnote 152: _Iliad_, iii. 278 _sq._; xix. 259 _sq._]

[Footnote 153: _Cf._ Rohde, _op. cit._ p. 60.]

[Footnote 154: Schmidt, _op. cit._ i. 99 _sqq._ Nägelsbach, _Nachhomerische Theologie_, p. 35 _sq._]

[Footnote 155: _Cf._ Schmidt, _op. cit._ i. 104.]

[Footnote 156: _Ibid._ i. 101.]

[Footnote 157: Aeschylus, _Supplices_, 230 _sq._]

[Footnote 158: _Cf._ Westcott, _Essays in the History of Religious Thought_, p. 87.]

[Footnote 159: Schmidt, _op. cit._ i. 101 _sq._]

[Footnote 160: Aristophanes, _Ranæ_, 150, 275.]

[Footnote 161: Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 175, 267 _sqq._, 335 _sqq._ Pausanias, x. 28. 4 _sq._ Aristophanes, _Ranæ_, 147-150, 274.]

[Footnote 162: Aeschylus, _Eumenides_, 269 _sq._ Aristophanes, _Ranæ_, 147 _sq._]

[Footnote 163: See _supra_, i. 584 _sqq._, 621 _sqq._]

[Footnote 164: Diogenes Laertius, _De vitis philosophorum_, viii. 1. 31.]

[Footnote 165: Demosthenes (?), _Contra Aristogitonem oratio I._ 52.]

[Footnote 166: The Arabs of the Ulád Bu [(]Azîz in Southern Morocco maintain that there are three classes of persons who are infallibly doomed to hell, namely, those who have been cursed by their parents, those who have been guilty of unlawful homicide, and those who have burned corn. They say that every grain curses him who burns it.]

[Footnote 167: _Cf._ Westcott, _op. cit._ p. 104.]

[Footnote 168: Euripides, _Iphigenia in Tauris_, 391.]

[Footnote 169: _Idem_, _Bellerophon_, 17 (_Fragmenta_, 300).]

[Footnote 170: Plato, _Respublica_, ii. 379 _sq._]

[Footnote 171: _Idem_, _Phædrus_, p. 247. _Idem_, _Timæus_, p. 29.]

[Footnote 172: _Idem_, _Respublica_, ii. 364 _sqq._ _Idem_, _Leges_, x. 905 _sqq._; xii. 948.]

[Footnote 173: _Idem_, _Respublica_, ii. 379 _sq._ _Cf._ Aeschylus, _Agamemnon_, 176 _sqq._]

[Footnote 174: Plutarch, _De defectu oraculorum_, See also _Idem_, _De adulatore et amico_, 22.]

The gods of the Romans were on the whole unsympathetic and lifeless beings, some of them even actually pernicious, as the god of Fever, who had a temple on the Palatine hill, and the god of Ill-Fortune, who had an altar on the Esquiline hill.[175] The relations between the gods {717} and their worshippers were cold, ceremonial, legal. The chief thing was not to break "the peace of the gods," or, when it was broken, to restore it.[176] They were rendered propitious by "sanctity" and "piety."[177] But sanctity was defined as "the knowledge of how we ought to worship them," and piety was only "justice towards the gods," the return for benefits received; Cicero asks, "What piety is due to a being from whom you receive nothing?"[178] The divine law, _fas_, was distinguished from the human law, _jus_. To the former belonged not only the religious rites but the duties to the dead, as also the duties to certain living individuals.[179] Offences against parents were avenged by the _divi parentum_;[180] the duty of hospitality was enforced by the _dii hospitales_ and Jupiter;[181] boundaries were protected by Jupiter Terminalis and Terminus;[182] and Jupiter, Dius Fidius, and Fides, were the guardians of sworn faith.[183]

[Footnote 175: Cicero, _De natura deorum_, iii. 25.]

[Footnote 176: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 219 _sqq._ Granger, _Worship of the Romans_, p. 217.]

[Footnote 177: Cicero, _De officiis_, ii. 3.]

[Footnote 178: _Idem_, _De natura deorum_, i. 41.]

[Footnote 179: On the distinction between _fas_ and _jus_ see von Jhering, _Geist des römischen Rechts_, i. 258.]

[Footnote 180: _Supra_, i. 624.]

[Footnote 181: _Supra_, i. 580.]

[Footnote 182: _Supra_, ii. 61.]

[Footnote 183: _Supra_, ii. 96, 121 _sq._ Wissowa, _Religion und Kultus der Römer_, pp. 48, 103, 104, 123 _sq._]

The god of Israel was a powerful protector of his chosen people, but he was a severe master who inspired more fear than love. In the pre-prophetic period at least, he was no model of goodness. He had unaccountable moods, his wrath often resembled "rather the insensate violence of angered nature, than the reasonable indignation of a moralised personality"[184]--as appears, for instance, from the suggestion of David that Saul's undeserved enmity might be due to the incitement of God.[185] At the same time his severity was also a guardian of human relationships. It turned against children who were disrespectful to their parents, against murderers, adulterers, thieves, false witnesses--indeed, the whole criminal law was a revelation of the Lord. He was moreover a protector of {718} the poor and needy,[186] and a preserver of strangers.[187] But offences against God were, in the Ten Commandments, mentioned before offences against man; religious rites were put on the same level with the rules of social morality; neglect of circumcision, or disregard of the precepts of ceremonial cleanliness, or sabbath-breaking, was punished with the same severity as the greatest crimes.[188] "To the ordinary man," says Wellhausen, "it was not moral but liturgical acts that seemed to be truly religious."[189] A different opinion, however, was expressed by the Prophets. They opposed the vice of the heart to the outward service of the ritual.[190] God was said by them to desire not sacrifice but mercy,[191] and to hate the hypocritical service of Israel with its feast-days and solemn assemblies;[192] and the true fast was declared to consist in moral welldoing.[193] To them righteousness was the fundamental virtue of Yahveh, and if he punished Israel his anger was no longer a merely fitful outburst, unrelated to Israel's own wrongdoing, but an essential element of his righteousness.[194] However, as M. Halévy observes, the truly national conceptions of the Hebrews were not those which the Prophets maintained, but those which they opposed.[195] The importance of ritual was more than ever emphasised in the post-prophetic priestly code.

[Footnote 184: Montefiore, _Hibbert Lectures on the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_, p. 38.]

[Footnote 185: _1 Samuel_, xxvi. 19.]

[Footnote 186: _Supra_, i. 552, 565.]

[Footnote 187: _Supra_, i. 580.]

[Footnote 188: Montefiore, _op. cit._ pp. 327, 470. Kuenen, _Religion of Israel_, ii. 276.]

[Footnote 189: Wellhausen, _Prolegomena to the History of Israel_, p. 468.]

[Footnote 190: _Cf._ Caird, _Evolution of Religion_, ii. 119.]

[Footnote 191: _Hosea_, vi. 6.]

[Footnote 192: _Amos_, v. 21 _sqq._]

[Footnote 193: _Isaiah_, lviii. 6 _sqq._]

[Footnote 194: _Cf._ Montefiore, _op. cit._ p. 122 _sq._]

[Footnote 195: Halévy, _Mélanges de critique et d'histoire relatifs aux peuples sémitiques_, p. 371.]

The opposition against ritualism which was started by the Prophets reached its height in Christ. Men are defiled not by external uncleanness, but by evil thoughts and evil deeds.[196] "It is lawful to do well on the sabbath days."[197] Those whose righteousness does not exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.[198] The first and great commandment is that which {719} enjoins love to God, but the second, according to which a man shall love his neighbour as himself, "is like unto it."[199] At the same time there are in the New Testament passages in which God's judgment of men seems to be represented as determined by theological dogma.[200] The only sin which can never be forgiven either in this world or in the world to come, is blasphemy against the Holy Ghost;[201] and the belief in Jesus is laid down as indispensable for salvation.[202] According to St. Paul, a man is justified by faith alone, without the deeds of the law.[203] This doctrine, which makes man's salvation dependent upon his acceptance of the Messiahship of Jesus, has had a lasting influence upon Christian theology, and has, together with certain other dogmas, led to that singular discrepancy between the notions of divine and human justice which has up to the present day characterised the chief branches of the Christian Church.

[Footnote 196: _St. Matthew_, xv. 19 _sq._ _St. Mark_, vii. 6 _sqq._]

[Footnote 197: _St. Matthew_, xii. 12.]

[Footnote 198: _Ibid._ v. 20.]

[Footnote 199: _St. Matthew_, xxii. 37 _sqq._]

[Footnote 200: Toy, _Judaism and Christianity_, p. 82 _sq._]

[Footnote 201: _St. Matthew_, xii. 31 _sq._ _St. Mark_, iii. 28 _sq._]

[Footnote 202: _St. Mark_, xvi. 16. _St. John_, iii. 18, 36; viii. 24.]

[Footnote 203: _Romans_, iii. 28.]

Some of the early Fathers maintained that the interference and suffering of Christ, in itself, unconditionally saved all souls and emptied hell for ever;[204] but this theory never became popular. According to St. Augustine and, subsequently, Calvinian theology, the benefits of the atonement are limited to those whom God, of his sovereign pleasure, has from eternity arbitrarily elected, the effect of faith and conversion being not to save the soul, but simply to convince the soul that it is saved. A third theory--that of Pelagius, Armenius, and Luther--attributes to the sufferings of Christ a conditional efficacy, depending upon personal faith in his vicarious atonement, whereas those who for some reason or other do not possess such faith are excluded from salvation. A fourth doctrine, which early began to be constructed by the Fathers and was adopted by the Roman Catholic and the consistent portion of the Episcopalian Church, declares that by Christ's vicarious {720} suffering power is given to the Church, a priestly hierarchy, to save those who confess her authority and observe her rites, whilst all others are lost. Certain sectarians, like the Unitarians, or those "liberal Christians" who do not feel themselves tied by the dogmas of any special creed, are the only ones among whom we meet with the opinion that a free soul, who by the immutable laws which the Creator has established may choose between good and evil, is saved or lost just so far and so long as it partakes of either the former or the latter.[205]

[Footnote 204: Alger, _History of the Doctrine of a Future Life_, pp. 550-552, 563. Farrar, _Mercy and Judgment_, p. 58 _sq._]

[Footnote 205: Alger, _op. cit._ p. 553 _sqq._]

According to the leading doctrines of Christianity, then, the fates of men beyond the grave are determined by quite other circumstances than what the moral consciousness by itself recognises as virtue or vice. They are all doomed to death and hell in consequence of Adam's sin, and their salvation, if not absolutely predestined, can only be effected by sincere faith in the atonement of Christ or by valid reception of sacramental grace at the hands of a priest. Persons who on intellectual or moral grounds are unable to accept the dogma of atonement or to acknowledge the authority of an exacting hierarchy, are subject to the most awful penalties for a sin committed by their earliest ancestor, and so are the countless millions of heathen who never even had an opportunity to embrace the Christian religion. Luther was considered to have shown an exceptional boldness when he expressed the hope that "our dear God would be merciful to Cicero, and to others like him."[206] In the Westminster Confession of Faith the Divines declared the opinion that men not professing Christianity may be saved to be "very pernicious, and to be detested";[207] and in their Larger Catechism they expressly said that "they who, having never heard the gospel, know not Jesus Christ, and believe not in him, cannot be saved, be they never so diligent to frame their lives according to the light of nature, or the laws of that religion which they profess."[208] This doctrine has had many {721} adherents up to the present time,[209] although a more liberal view in favour of virtuous heathen has obviously been gaining ground.[210] Even in the case of Christians errors in belief on such subjects as church government, the Trinity, transubstantiation, original sin, and predestination, have been declared to expose the guilty to eternal damnation.[211] In the seventeenth century it was a common theme of certain Roman Catholic writers that "Protestancy unrepented destroys salvation,"[212] while the Protestants on their part taxed Du Moulin with culpable laxity for admitting that some Roman Catholics might escape the torments of hell.[213] Nathanael Emmons, the sage of Franklin, tells us that "it is absolutely necessary to approve of the doctrine of reprobation in order to be saved."[214]

[Footnote 206: Farrar, _op. cit._ p. 146.]

[Footnote 207: _Confession of Faith_, x. 4.]

[Footnote 208: _Larger Catechism_, Answer to Question 60.]

[Footnote 209: Farrar, _op. cit._ p. 146 _sq._]

[Footnote 210: Prentiss, 'Infant Salvation,' in _Presbyterian Review_, iv. 576. For earlier instances of this opinion see Abbot, 'Literature of the Doctrine of a Future Life,' forming an Appendix to Alger's _History of the Doctrine of a Future Life_, pp. 859, 863, 865.]

[Footnote 211: Abbot, _loc. cit._ p. 863.]

[Footnote 212: Wilson, _Charity Mistaken, with the Want whereof Catholickes are unjustly charged, for affirming . . . that Protestancy unrepented destroys Salvation_.]

[Footnote 213: Abbot, _loc. cit._ p. 860.]

[Footnote 214: Emmons, _Works_, iv. 336.]

Besides the heathen there is another large class of people whom Christian theology has condemned to hell for no fault of theirs, namely, infants who have died unbaptised. From a very early age the water of baptism was believed by the Christians to possess a magic power to wipe away sin,[215] and since the days of St. Augustine it was deemed so indispensable for salvation that any child dying without "the bath of regeneration" was regarded as lost for ever.[216] St. Augustine admitted that the punishment of such children was of the mildest sort,[217] but other writers were more severe; St. Fulgentius condemned to "everlasting punishment in eternal fire" even infants who died in their mother's womb.[218] However, {722} the notion that unbaptised children will be tormented, gradually gave way to a more humane opinion. In the middle of the twelfth century Peter Lombard determined that the proper punishment of original sin, when no actual sin is added to it, is "the punishment of loss," that is, loss of heaven and the sight of God, but not "the punishment of sense," that is, positive torment. This doctrine was confirmed by Innocentius III. and shared by the large majority of the schoolmen, who assumed the existence of a place called _limbus_, or _infernus puerorum_, where unbaptised infants will dwell without being subject to torture.[219] But the older view was again set up by the Protestants, who generally maintained that the due punishment of original sin is, in strictness, damnation in hell, although many of them were inclined to think that if a child dies by misfortune before it is baptised the parents' sincere intention of baptising it, together with their prayers, will be accepted with God for the deed.[220] In the Confession of Augsburg the Anabaptistic doctrine is emphatically condemned;[221] and although Zwingli rejected the dogma that infants dying without baptism are lost, and Calvin, in harmony with his theory of election, refused to tie the salvation of infants to an outward rite, the necessity of baptism as the ordinary channel of receiving grace appears to have been a general belief in the Reformed churches throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.[222] The damnation of infants was in fact an acknowledged doctrine of Calvinism,[223] though an exception was made for the children of pious parents.[224] But in the latter part of the eighteenth century Toplady, who was a vehement Calvinist, avowed {723} his belief in the universal salvation of all departed infants, whether baptised or unbaptised.[225] And a hundred years later Dr. Hodge thought he was justified in stating that the common opinion of evangelical Protestants was that "all who die in infancy are saved."[226] The accuracy of this statement, however, seems somewhat doubtful. In 1883 Mr. Prentiss wrote of the doctrine of infant salvation independently of baptism:--"My own impression is that, had it been taught as unequivocally in the Presbyterian Church even a third of a century ago, by a theologian less eminent than Dr. Hodge for orthodoxy, piety, and weight of character, it would have called forth an immediate protest from some of the more conservative, old-fashioned Calvinists."[227]

[Footnote 215: Tertullian, _De baptismo_, 1 _sqq._ (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, i. 1197 _sqq._). Harnack, _History of Dogma_, i. 206 _sq._; ii. 227. Stanley, _Christian Institutions_, p. 16. Lewis, _Paganism surviving in Christianity_, pp. 72, 73, 129, 144 _sq._]

[Footnote 216: Bingham, _Works_, iii. 488 _sqq._ Prentiss, _loc. cit._ p. 549.]

[Footnote 217: St. Augustine, _De peccatorum meritis et remissione_, i. 16 (Migne, _op. cit._ xliv. 16).]

[Footnote 218: St. Fulgentius, _De fide_, 27 (Migne, _op. cit._ lxv. 701).]

[Footnote 219: Wall, _History of Infant-Baptism_, i. 460 _sq._]

[Footnote 220: _Ibid._ i. 462, 468. Luther and his followers, however, speak more doubtfully about the efficacy of the parents' unrealised intention, and lay much stress on actual baptism (_ibid._ i. 469).]

[Footnote 221: _Augsburg Confession_, i. 9.]

[Footnote 222: Prentiss, _loc. cit._ p. 550.]

[Footnote 223: Calvin, _Institutio Christiana religionis_, iv. 15. 10, vol. ii. 371. Norton, _Tracts concerning Christianity_, p. 179 _sqq._]

[Footnote 224: Calvin, _op. cit._ iv. 16. 9, vol. ii. 383 _sq._ Wall, _op. cit._ i. 469. Anderson, 'Introductory Essay,' to Logan's _Words of Comfort for Parents bereaved of Little Children_, p. xxi.]

[Footnote 225: Toplady, _Works_, p. 645 _sq._]

[Footnote 226: Hodge, _Systematic Theology_, i. 26 _sq._]

[Footnote 227: Prentiss, _loc. cit._ p. 559. See also Anderson, _loc. cit._ p. xxiii.]

In order fully to realise the true import of the dogma of damnation it is necessary to consider the punishment in store for the condemned. The immense bulk of the Christians have always regarded hell and its agonies as material facts.[228] Origen, who was a Platonist and an heretic on many points, was severely censured for saying that the fire of hell was inward and of the conscience rather than outward and of the body;[229] and in the later Middle Ages Scotus Erigena showed unusual audacity in questioning the locality of hell and the material tortures of the condemned.[230] The punishment is burning--a penalty which even in the most barbaric codes is reserved for the very gravest crimes; and some great divines, like Jeremy Taylor and Jonathan Edwards, have been anxious to point out that the fire of hell is infinitely more painful than any fire on earth, being "fierce enough to melt the very rocks and elements."[231] This awful punishment also exceeds in dreadfulness anything which even the most vivid imagination can conceive, because it will last not for a passing moment, {724} nor for a year or a hundred, thousand, million, or milliard years, but for ever and ever. In case any doubt should arise as regards the physical capacity of the damned to withstand the heat, we are assured by some modern theologians that their bodies will be annealed like glass or asbestos-like or of the nature of salamanders.[232] This, then, is the future state of the large majority of men, quite independently of any fault of their own, or of the degree of their "guilt."[233] It would seem that even the felicity of the few who are saved must be seriously impaired by their contemplation of this endless and undescribable misery, but we are told that the case is just the reverse. They become as merciless as their god. Thomas Aquinas says that a perfect sight of the punishment of the damned is granted to them that they "may enjoy their beatitude and the grace of God more richly."[234] And the Puritans, especially, have revelled in the idea that "the sight of hell torments will exalt the happiness of the saints for ever," as a sense of the opposite misery always increases the relish of any pleasure.[235]

[Footnote 228: Alger, _op. cit._ p. 516.]

[Footnote 229: _Ibid._ p. 516.]

[Footnote 230: Milman, _History of Latin Christianity_, ix. 88, n. k.]

[Footnote 231: Alger, _op. cit._ p. 516 _sq._]

[Footnote 232: Alger, _op. cit._ pp. 518, 520. _Cf._ St. Augustine, _De Civitate Dei_, xxi. 2 _sqq._]

[Footnote 233: For the numbers of souls supposed to be lost see Alger, _op. cit._ p. 530 _sqq._ St. Chrysostom (_In Acta Apostolorum Homil. XXIV._ 4 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Graeca, lx. 189]) doubted whether out of the many thousands of souls constituting the Christian population of Antioch in his day one hundred would be saved. And at the end of the seventeenth century a History Professor at Oxford published a book to prove "that not one in a hundred thousand (nay probably not one in a million) from Adam down to our times, shall be saved" (Du-Moulin, _Moral Reflections upon the Number of the Elect_, title page).]

[Footnote 234: Thomas Aquinas, _Summa theologica_, iii. Supplementum, qu. xciv. 1. 2 (Migne, _op. cit._ Ser. Secunda, iv. 1393).]

[Footnote 235: Jonathan Edwards, _Works_, vii. 480. Alger, _op. cit._ p. 541.]

In the present times there is a distinct tendency among Christian theologians to humanise somewhat the doctrines of the future life.[236] But if Christianity is to be judged from the dogmas which almost from its beginning until quite recent times have been recognised by the immense majority of its adherents, it must be admitted that its {725} conception of a heavenly Father and Judge has been utterly inconsistent with all ordinary notions of goodness and justice. Calvin himself avowed that the decree according to which the fall of Adam involved, without remedy, in eternal death so many nations together with their infant children, was a "horrible" one. "But," he adds, "no one can deny that God foreknew the future final fate of man before he created him, and that he did foreknow it because it was appointed by his own decree."[237]

[Footnote 236: Thus the doctrine of endless torments is opposed by a considerable number of theologians (Alger, _op. cit._ p. 546), and, "if held, is not practically taught by the vast majority of the English clergy" (Stanley, _op. cit._ p. 94).]

[Footnote 237: Calvin, _op. cit._ iii. 23. 7, vol. ii. 151.]

Like Christianity, Muhammedanism adorns its godhead with the highest moral attributes and at the same time ascribes to him decrees and actions which flatly contradict even the most elementary notions of human justice. The god of Islam is addressed as the compassionate and merciful; but his love is restricted to "those who fear,"[238] and his mercy can only be gained by that submissiveness or self-surrender which is indicated by the very name of Islam. He demands a righteous life, he punishes the wrongdoer and rewards the charitable.[239] Through his Prophet he has revealed to mankind both the rules of morality and the elements of a social system containing minute regulations for a man's conduct in various circumstances of life, with due rewards or penalties according to his fulfilment of these regulations.[240] The whole constitution of the State has on it a divine stamp; as an Arab proverb says, "country and religion are twins."[241] But foremost among duties is to believe in God and his Prophet. "God," it is said, "does not pardon polytheism and infidelity, but He can, if He willeth, pardon other crimes."[242] And the "pillars of religion" are the five duties of reciting the Kalimah or creed, of performing the five stated daily prayers, of fasting--especially in the month of Rama[d.]ân,--of giving the legal alms, and of making the pilgrimage to Mecca.[243] These duties are based on clear {726} sentences of the Koran, but the traditions have raised the most trivial ceremonial observances into duties of the greatest importance. It is true that hypocrisy and formalism without devotion were strongly condemned by Muhammed. "Righteousness," he said, "is not that ye turn your faces towards the East or the West, but righteousness is, one who believes in God, and the last day, and the angels, and the Book, and the prophets, and who gives wealth for His love to kindred, and orphans, and the poor, and the son of the road, and beggars, and those in captivity; and who is steadfast in prayer, and gives alms; and those who are sure of their covenant when they make a covenant; and the patient in poverty, and distress, and in time of violence; these are they who are true, and these are those who fear."[244] Yet in Muhammedanism, as in other ritualistic religions, the chief importance is practically attached to the punctual performance of outward ceremonies, and the virtue of prayer is made dependent upon an ablution.[245] In the future life the felicity or suffering of each person will be proportionate to his merits or demerits,[246] but the admittance into paradise depends in the first place on faith. "Those who believe, and act righteously, and are steadfast in prayer, and give alms, theirs is their hire with their Lord."[247] Those who have acknowledged the faith of Islam and yet acted wickedly will be punished in hell for a certain period, but will finally enter paradise.[248] As regards the future state of certain infidels the Koran contains contradictory statements. In one place it is said, "Verily, whether it be of those who believe, or those who are Jews or Christians or Sabaeans, whosoever believe in God and {727} the last day and act aright, they have their reward at their Lord's hand, and there is no fear for them, nor shall they grieve."[249] But this passage is considered to have been abrogated by another where it is stated that whoso desires any other religion than Islam shall in the next world be among the lost.[250] The punishments inflicted upon unbelievers are no less horrible than the torments of the Christian hell. Yet in one point the Muhammedan doctrine of the future life is more merciful than the dogmas of Christianity. The children of believers will all go to paradise, and the children of unbelievers are generally supposed to escape hell. Some think they will be in A[(]ráf, a place situated between heaven and hell; whilst others maintain that they will be servants to the true believers in paradise.[251]

[Footnote 238: _Koran_, iii. 70.]

[Footnote 239: _Supra_, i. 553.]

[Footnote 240: _Cf._ Muir, _Life of Mahomet_, iii. 295 _sq._; Lane-Poole, _Studies in a Mosque_, p. 101.]

[Footnote 241: Sell, _Faith of Islám_, pp. 19, 39.]

[Footnote 242: _Ibid._ p. 241.]

[Footnote 243: _Ibid._ p. 251.]

[Footnote 244: _Koran_, ii. 172.]

[Footnote 245: _Cf._ Polak, _Persien_, i. 9; Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iv. 284 _sq._; Sell, _op. cit._ p. 256.]

[Footnote 246: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, i. 95 _sq._ Sell, _op. cit._ p. 231. Lane-Poole, _Studies in a Mosque_, p. 319.]

[Footnote 247: _Koran_, ii. 277.]

[Footnote 248: Lane, _op. cit._ i. 95. Sell, _op. cit._ p. 228. The Mu[(]tazilas, however, teach that the Muslim who enters hell will remain there for ever. They maintain that the person who, having committed great sins, dies unrepentant, though not an infidel, ceases to be a believer, and hence suffers as the infidels do, though the punishment is lighter than that which an infidel receives (Sell, _op. cit._ pp. 229, 241).]

[Footnote 249: _Koran_, ii. 59.]

[Footnote 250: _Ibid._ iii. 79. Sell, _op. cit._ p. 359 _sq._]

[Footnote 251: Sell, _op. cit._ p. 204 _sq._]

The formalism of Muhammedan orthodoxy has from time to time called forth protests from minds with deeper aspirations. The earlier Muhammedan mystics sought to impart life to the rigid ritual;[252] and in the nineteenth century Bábíism revolted against orthodox Islam, opposing bigotry and enjoining friendly intercourse with persons of all religions.[253] At present there are some liberal Muhammedans who set aside the scholastic tradition, maintain the right of private interpretation of the Koran, and warmly uphold the adaptability of Islam to the most advanced ideas of civilisation.[254] To them Muhammed's mission was chiefly that of a moral reformer. "In Islam," says Syed Ameer Ali, "the service of man and the good of humanity constitute pre-eminently the service and worship of God."[255]

[Footnote 252: _Ibid._ p. 110.]

[Footnote 253: _Ibid._ p. 136 _sqq._]

[Footnote 254: Ameer Ali, _Life and Teachings of Mohammed_, _passim_. _Idem_, _Ethics of Islâm_, _passim_. _Cf._ Lane-Poole, _Studies in a Mosque_, p. 324; Sell, _op. cit._ p. 198 _sq._]

[Footnote 255: Ameer Ali, _Ethics of Islâm_, p. 3 _sq._ _Idem_, _Life and Teachings of Mohammed_, p. 274.]

In the next chapter I shall try to explain the chief facts now set forth relating to gods as guardians of worldly morality.

CHAPTER LII

GODS AS GUARDIANS OF MORALITY (_concluded_)

WE have seen that the gods of uncivilised races are to a very large extent of a malevolent character, that they as a rule take little interest in any kind of human conduct which does not affect their own welfare, and that, if they show any signs of moral feelings, they may be guardians either of tribal customs in general or only of some special branch of morality. Among peoples of a higher culture, again, the gods are on the whole benevolent to mankind, when duly propitiated. They by preference resent offences committed against themselves personally; but they also avenge social wrongs of various kinds, they are superintendents of human justice, and are even represented as the originators and sustainers of the whole moral order of the world. The gods have thus experienced a gradual change for the better; until at last they are described as ideals of moral perfection, even though, when more closely scrutinised, their goodness and notions of justice are found to differ materially from what is deemed good and just in the case of men.

The malevolence of savage gods is in accordance with the theory that religion is born of fear. The assumed originators of misfortunes were naturally regarded as enemies to be propitiated, whilst fortunate events, if attracting sufficient attention and appearing sufficiently marvellous to suggest a supernatural cause, were commonly ascribed to beings who were too good to require {729} worship. But growing reflection has a tendency to attribute more amiable qualities to the gods. The religious consciousness of men becomes less exclusively occupied with the hurts they suffer, and comes more and more to reflect upon the benefits they enjoy. The activity of a god which displays itself in a certain phenomenon, or group of phenomena, appears to them on some occasions as a source of evil, but on other occasions as a source of good; hence the god is regarded as partly malevolent, partly benevolent, and in all circumstances as a being who must not be neglected. Moreover, a god who is by nature harmless or good may by proper worship be induced to assist man in his struggle against evil spirits.[1] This protective function of gods becomes particularly important when the god is more or less disassociated from the natural phenomenon in which he originally manifested himself. Nothing, indeed, seems to have contributed more towards the improvement of nature gods than the expansion of their sphere of activity. When supernatural beings can exert their power in the various departments of life, men naturally choose for their gods those among them who with great power combine the greatest benevolence. Men have selected their gods according to their usefulness. Among the Maoris "a mere trifle, or natural casualty, will induce a native (or a whole tribe) to change his Atua."[2] The negro, when disappointed in some of his speculations, or overtaken by some sad calamity, throws away his fetish, and selects a new one.[3] When hard-pressed, the Samoyede, after invoking his own deities in vain, addresses himself to the Russian god, promising to become his worshipper if he relieves him from his distress; and in most cases he is said to be faithful to his promise, though he may still try to keep on good terms with his former gods by occasionally {730} offering them a sacrifice in secret.[4] North American Indians attribute all their good or bad luck to their Manitou, and "if the Manitou has not been favourable to them, they quit him without any ceremony, and take another."[5] Among many of the ancient Indians of Central America there was a regular and systematical selection of gods. Father Blas Valera says that their gods had annual rotations and were changed each year in accordance with the superstitions of the people. "The old gods were forsaken as infamous, or because they had been of no use, and other gods and demons were elected. . . . Sons when they inherited, either accepted or repudiated the gods of their fathers, for they were not allowed to hold their pre-eminence against the will of the heir. Old men worshipped other greater deities, but they likewise dethroned them, and set up others in their places when the year was over, or the age of the world, as the Indians had it. Such were the gods which all the nations of Mexico, Chiapa, and Guatemala worshipped, as well as those of Vera Paz, and many other Indians. They thought that the gods selected by themselves were the greatest and most powerful of all the gods."[6] These are crude instances of a process which in some form or other must have been an important motive force in religious evolution by making the gods better suited to meet the wants of their believers.

[Footnote 1: von Rosenberg, _Der malayische Archipel_, p. 162 (Niase). Howard, _Life with Trans-Siberian Savages_, p. 192 (Ainu). Georgi, _Russia_, iii. 273 _sq._ (shamanistic peoples of Siberia). Buch, 'Die Wotjaken,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xii. 633. _Supra_, ii. 701, 702, 704 _sq._]

[Footnote 2: Polack, _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_, i. 233.]

[Footnote 3: Wilson, _Western Africa_, p. 212.]

[Footnote 4: Ahlqvist, 'Unter Wogulen und Ostjaken,' in _Acta Soc. Scient. Fennicæ_, xiv. 240.]

[Footnote 5: Bossu, _Travels through Louisiana_, p. 103. Frazer, _Totemism_, p. 55.]

[Footnote 6: Blas Valera, quoted by Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_, i. 124 _sq._]

But men not only select as their gods such supernatural beings as may be most useful to them in their struggle for life, they also magnify their good qualities in worshipping them. Praise and exaggerating eulogy are common in the mouth of a devout worshipper. In ancient Egypt the god of each petty state was within it held to be the ruler of the gods, the creator of the world, and the giver of all good things.[7] So also in Chaldea the god of {731} a town was addressed by its inhabitants with the most exalted epithets, as the master or king of all the gods.[8] The Vedic poets were engrossed in the praise of the particular deity they happened to be invoking, exaggerating his attributes to the point of inconsistency.[9] "Every virtue, every excellence," says Hume, "must be ascribed to the divinity, and no exaggeration will be deemed sufficient to reach those perfections with which he is endowed."[10] The tendency of the worshipper to extol his god beyond all measure is largely due to the idea that the god is fond of praise,[11] but it may also be rooted in a sincere will to believe or in genuine admiration. That nations of a higher culture have especially a strong faith in the power and benevolence of their gods is easy to understand when we consider that these are exactly the peoples who have been most successful in their national endeavours.[12] As the Greeks attributed their victory over the Persians to the assistance of Zeus,[13] so the Romans maintained that the grandeur of their city was the work of the gods whom they had propitiated by sacrifices.[14]

[Footnote 7: Wiedemann, _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_, p. 11.]

[Footnote 8: Mürdter-Delitzsch, _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_, p. 24.]

[Footnote 9: Macdonell, _Vedic Mythology_, p. 16 _sq._ Barth, _Religions of India_, p. 26. Hopkins, _Religions of India_, p. 139.]

[Footnote 10: Hume, _Philosophical Works_, iv. 353.]

[Footnote 11: See _supra_, ii. 653 _sq._]

[Footnote 12: _Cf._ Oldenberg, _Die Religion des Veda_, p. 281; Macdonell, _op. cit._ p. 18.]

[Footnote 13: _Supra_, ii. 713.]

[Footnote 14: Cicero, _De natura deorum_, iii. 2.]

The benevolence of a god, however, does not imply that he acts as a moral judge. A friendly god is not generally supposed to bestow his favours gratuitously; it is hardly probable, then, that he should meddle with matters of social morality out of sheer kindliness and of his own accord. But by an invocation he may be induced to reward virtue and punish vice. We have often noticed how closely the retributive activity of gods is connected with the blessings and curses of men. In order to give efficacy to their good or evil wishes men appeal to some god, or simply bring in his name when they pronounce a blessing or a curse; and if this is regularly done in connection with some particular kind of conduct, the idea may grow up that the god rewards or punishes it even independently of {732} any human invocation. Moreover, powerful curses, as those uttered by parents or strangers, may be personified as supernatural beings, like the Greek Erinyes; or the magic energy inherent in a blessing or a curse may become an attribute of the chief god, owing to the tendency of such a god to attract supernatural forces which are in harmony with his general nature.[15] So also, the notion of a persecuting ghost may be changed into the notion of an avenging god.[16] Various departments of social morality have thus come to be placed under the supervision of gods: the rights of life[17] and property,[18] charity[19] and hospitality,[20] the submissiveness of children,[21] truthspeaking and fidelity to a given promise.[22] That gods are so frequently looked upon as guardians of truth and good faith is, as we have seen, mainly a result of the common practice of confirming a statement or promise by an oath; and where the oath is an essential element in the judicial proceedings, as was the case in the archaic State,[23] the consequence is that the guardianship of gods is extended to the whole sphere of justice. Truth and justice are repeatedly mentioned hand in hand as matters of divine concern. We have seen how frequently the same gods as are appealed to in oaths or ordeals are described as judges of human conduct.[24] "En Égypte," says M. Amélineau, "la vérité et la justice n'avaient qu'un seul et même nom, _Mât_, qui veut aussi bien dire vérité que justice, et justice que vérité."[25] Zeus presided over assemblies and trials;[26] according to a law of Solon, the judges of Athens had to swear by him.[27] And the Erinyes, the personifications of oaths and curses, are sometimes represented by poets and philosophers as guardians of right in general.[28]

[Footnote 15: See _supra_, ii. 68.]

[Footnote 16: _Supra_, i. 378 _sq._]

[Footnote 17: _Supra_, i. 379 _sqq._]

[Footnote 18: _Supra_, ii. 59 _sqq._]

[Footnote 19: _Supra_, i. 561 _sqq._]

[Footnote 20: _Supra_, i. 578 _sqq._]

[Footnote 21: _Supra_, i. 621 _sqq._]

[Footnote 22: _Supra_, ii. 114 _sqq._]

[Footnote 23: Leist, _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_, p. 228.]

[Footnote 24: _Supra_, ii. 115, 116, 121, 122, 686, 687, 699.]

[Footnote 25: Amélineau, _L'évolution des idées morales dans l'Égypte ancienne_, p. 187. See also _supra_, ii. 115, 699.]

[Footnote 26: Farnell, _Cults of the Greek States_, i. 58.]

[Footnote 27: Pollux, _Onomasticum_, viii. 12. 142.]

[Footnote 28: Rohde, _Psyche_, p. 246.]

{733} It has been said that when men ascribe to their gods a mental constitution similar to their own they also _eo ipso_ consider them to approve of virtue and disapprove of vice.[29] But this conclusion is certainly not true in general. Malevolent gods cannot be supposed to feel emotions which essentially presuppose altruistic sentiments; and, as we have just noticed, an invocation is frequently required to induce benevolent gods to interfere with the worldly affairs of men. Moreover, where the system of private retaliation prevails, not even the extension of human analogies to the world of supernatural beings would lead to the idea of a god who of his own accord punishes social wrongs. But it is quite probable that such analogies have in some cases made gods guardians of morality at large, especially ancestor gods who may readily be supposed not only to preserve their old feelings with regard to virtue and vice but also to take a more active interest in the morals of the living, and who are notoriously opposed to any deviation from ancient custom.[30] I also admit that the conception of a great or supreme god may perhaps, independently of his origin, involve retributive justice as a natural consequence of his power and benevolence towards his people. Yet it is obvious that even a god like Zeus was more influenced by the invocation of a suppliant than by his sense of justice. Dr. Farnell points out that the epithets which designate him as the god to whom those stricken with guilt can appeal are far more in vogue in actual Greek cult than those which attribute to him the function of vengeance and retribution.[31] Hermes was addressed by thieves as their patron.[32] According to the Talmud "the thief invokes God while he breaks into the house."[33] And the Italian bandit begs the Virgin herself to bless his endeavours.

[Footnote 29: Adam Smith, _Theory of Moral Sentiments_, p. 232 _sq._ Darwin, _Descent of Man_, p. 95. Tiele, _Elements of the Science of Religion_, i. 92 _sq._]

[Footnote 30: See _supra_, ii. 519 _sq._ _Cf._ Tylor, _Anthropology_, p. 369; Macdonald, _Religion and Myth_, p. 229.]

[Footnote 31: Farnell, _op. cit._ i. 66 _sq._]

[Footnote 32: Schmidt, _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_, i. 136.]

[Footnote 33: Deutsch, _Literary Remains_, p. 57.]

At the same time we must again remember that men {734} ascribe to their gods not only ordinary human qualities but excellences of various kinds, and among these may also be a strong desire to punish wickedness and to reward virtue. The gods of monotheistic religions in particular have such a multitude of the most elevated attributes that it would be highly astonishing if they had remained unconcerned about the morals of mankind. If flattery and admiration make the deity all-wise, all-powerful, all-good, they also make him the supreme judge of human conduct. And there is yet another reason for investing him with the moral government of the world. The claims of justice are not fully satisfied on this earth, where it only too often happens that virtue is left unrewarded and vice escapes unpunished, that right succumbs and wrong triumphs; hence persons with deep moral feelings and a religious or philosophical bent of mind are apt to look for a future adjustment through the intervention of the deity, who alone can repair the evils and injustices of the present. This demand of final retribution is sometimes so strongly developed that it even leads to the belief in a deity when no other proof of his existence is found convincing. Kant maintained that we must postulate a future life in which everybody's happiness is proportionate to his virtue, and that such a postulate involves the belief in a God of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness who governs the moral as well as the physical world. Not even Voltaire could rid himself of the notion of a rewarding and avenging deity, whom, if he did not exist, "it would be necessary to invent."

The belief in a god who acts as a guardian of worldly morality undoubtedly gives emphasis to its rules. To the social and legal sanctions a new one is added, which derives particular strength from the supernatural power and knowledge of the deity. The divine avenger can punish those who are beyond the reach of human justice and those whose secret wrongs even escape the censure of their fellow men. But on the other hand there are also certain circumstances which considerably detract from the {735} influence of the religious sanction when compared with other sanctions of morality. The supposed punishments and rewards of the future life have the disadvantage of being conceived as very remote; and fear and hope decrease in inverse ratio to the distance of their objects. Men commonly live in the happy illusion that death is far off, even though it in reality is very near, hence also the retribution after death appears distant and unreal and is comparatively little thought of by the majority of people who believe in it. Moreover, there seems always to be time left for penance and repentance. Manzoni himself admitted, in his defence of Roman Catholicism, that many people think it an easy matter to procure that feeling of contrition by which, according to the doctrine of the Church, sins may be cancelled, and therefore encourage themselves in the commission of crime through the facility of pardon. The frequent assumption that the moral law would hardly command obedience without the belief in retribution beyond the grave is contradicted by an overwhelming array of facts. We hear from trustworthy witnesses that unadulterated savages follow their own rules of morality no less strictly, or perhaps more strictly, than civilised people follow theirs. Nay, it is a common experience that contact with a higher civilisation exercises a deteriorating influence upon the conduct of uncultured races, although we may be sure that Christian missionaries do not fail to impart the doctrine of hell to their savage converts.

It has also been noticed that a high degree of religious devotion is frequently accompanied by great laxity of morals. Of the Bedouins Mr. Blunt writes that, with one or two exceptions, "the practice of religion may be taken as the sure index of low morality in a tribe."[34] Wallin, who had an intimate and extensive knowledge of Muhammedan peoples, often found that those Muslims who attended to their prayers most regularly were the greatest scoundrels.[35] "One of the most remarkable traits {736} in the character of the Copts," says Lane, "is their bigotry"; and at the same time they are represented as "deceitful, faithless, and abandoned to the pursuit of worldly gain, and to indulgence in sensual pleasure."[36] Among two hundred Italian murderers Ferri did not find one who was irreligious; and Naples, which has the worst record of any European city for crimes against the person, is also the most religious city in Europe.[37] On the other hand, according to Dr. Havelock Ellis, "it seems extremely rare to find intelligently irreligious men in prison";[38] and Laing, who himself was anything but sceptical, observed that there was no country in Europe where there was so much morality and so little religion as Switzerland.[39] Most religions contain an element which constitutes a real peril to the morality of their votaries. They have introduced a new kind of duties--duties towards gods;--and, as we have noticed above, even where religion has entered into close union with worldly morality, much greater importance has been attached to ceremonies or worship or the niceties of belief than to good behaviour towards fellow men. People think that they may make up for lack of the latter by orthodoxy or pious performances. A Christian bishop of the seventh century, who was canonised by the Church of Rome, described a good Christian as a man "who comes frequently to church; who presents the oblation which is offered to God upon the altar; who doth not taste of the fruits of his own industry until he has consecrated a part of them to God; who, when the holy festivals approach, lives chastely even with his own wife during several days, that with a safe conscience he may draw near the altar of God; and who, in the last place, can repeat the Creed and the Lord's Prayer."[40] A scrupulous observance of external ceremonies--that is all which in this description is required {737} of a good Christian. And since then popular ideas on the subject have undergone but little change. Smollett observes in his 'Travels into Italy' that it is held more infamous to transgress the slightest ceremonial institution of the Church of Rome than to transgress any moral duty; that a murderer or adulterer will be easily absolved by the Church, and even maintain his character in society; but that a man who eats a pigeon on a Saturday is abhorred as a monster of reprobation.[41] In the nineteenth century Simonde de Sismondi could write:--"Plus chaque homme vicieux a été régulier à observer les commandemens de l'Église, plus il se sent dans son c[oe]ur dispensé de l'observation de cette morale céleste, à laquelle il faudroit sacrifier ses penchans dépravés."[42] And how many a Protestant does not imagine that by going to church on Sundays he can sin more freely on the six days between.

[Footnote 34: Mr. Blunt, in Lady Anne Blunt's _Bedouin Tribes of the Euphrates_, ii. 217.]

[Footnote 35: Wallin, _Reseanteckningar från Orienten_, iii. 166.]

[Footnote 36: Lane, _Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_, p. 551.]

[Footnote 37: Havelock Ellis, _The Criminal_, p. 156.]

[Footnote 38: _Ibid._ p. 159.]

[Footnote 39: Laing, _Notes of a Traveller_, pp. 323, 324, 333.]

[Footnote 40: Robertson, _History of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V._ i. 282 _sq._]

[Footnote 41: Smollett, quoted by Kames, _Sketches of the History of Man_, iv. 380.]

[Footnote 42: Simonde de Sismondi, _Histoire des républiques italiennes du moyen-âge_, xvi. 419.]

It should also be remembered that the religious sanction of moral rules only too often leads to an external observance of these rules from purely selfish motives. Christianity itself has, essentially, been regarded as a means of gaining a blessed hereafter. As for its influence upon the moral life of its adherents I agree with Professor Hobhouse that its chief strength lies not in its abstract doctrines but in the simple personal following of Christ.[43] In moral education example plays a more important part than precept. But even in this respect Christianity has unfortunately little reason to boast of its achievements.

[Footnote 43: Hobhouse, _Morals in Evolution_, ii. 159.]

CHAPTER LIII

CONCLUSION

WE have completed our task. Only a few words will be added to emphasise the leading features of our theory of the moral consciousness and to point out some general conclusions which may be drawn as regards its evolution.

Our study of the origin and development of the moral ideas was divided into three main sections. As moral ideas are expressed in moral judgments, we had to examine the general nature of both the predicates and the subjects of such judgments, as well as the moral valuation of the chief branches of conduct with which the moral consciousness of mankind concerns itself. And in each case our aim was not only to describe or analyse but also to explain the phenomena which came under our observation.

The theory was laid down that the moral concepts, which form the predicates of moral judgments, are ultimately based on moral emotions, that they are essentially generalisations of tendencies in certain phenomena to call forth either indignation or approval. It was therefore necessary for us to investigate the nature and origin of these emotions, and subsequently to consider their relations to the various moral concepts.

We found that the moral emotions belong to a wider class of emotions, which may be described as retributive; that moral disapproval is a kind of resentment, akin to {739} anger and revenge, and that moral approval is a kind of retributive kindly emotion, akin to gratitude. At the same time they differ from kindred non-moral emotions by their disinterestedness, apparent impartiality, and flavour of generality. As for the origin of the retributive emotions, we may assume that they have been acquired by means of natural selection in the struggle for existence; both resentment and retributive kindly emotion are states of mind which have a tendency to promote the interests of the individuals who feel them. This explanation also applies to the moral emotions in so far as they are retributive: it accounts for the hostile attitude of moral disapproval towards the cause of pain, and for the friendly attitude of moral approval towards the cause of pleasure. Our retributive emotions are always reactions against pain or pleasure felt by ourselves; this holds true of the moral emotions as well as of revenge and gratitude. But how shall we explain those elements in the moral emotions by which they are distinguished from other, non-moral retributive emotions? First, why should we, quite disinterestedly, feel pain evoking indignation because our neighbour is hurt, and pleasure calling forth approval because he is benefited?

We noticed that sympathy aided by the altruistic sentiment--sympathy in the common sense of the word--tends to produce disinterested retributive emotions. In all animal species which possess the altruistic sentiment in some form or other we may be sure to find sympathetic resentment as its accompaniment. And this sentiment may also give rise to disinterested retributive kindly emotion, even though it is more readily moved by the sight of pain than by the sight of pleasure and though sympathetic retributive kindliness has a powerful rival in the feeling of envy. Moreover, sympathetic retributive emotions may not only be reactions against sympathetic pain or pleasure, but may also be directly produced by the cognition of the signs of resentment or of the signs of retributive kindliness. Punishments and {740} rewards tend to reproduce the emotions from which they sprang, and language communicates retributive emotions by terms of condemnation and by terms of praise. Finally, there are cases of disinterested retributive emotions into which sympathy does not enter at all--sentimental antipathies and likings quite disinterested in character.

There are thus various ways in which disinterested retributive emotions may originate. But how shall we explain the fact that disinterestedness together with apparent impartiality and the flavour of generality have become characteristics by which the so-called moral emotions are distinguished from other retributive emotions? To this question the following answer was given:--Society is the birthplace of the moral consciousness. The first moral judgments expressed not the private emotions of isolated individuals but emotions which were felt by the community at large. Public indignation is the prototype of moral disapproval and public approval the prototype of moral approbation. And these public emotions are characterised by generality, individual disinterestedness, and apparent impartiality.

The moral emotions give rise to a variety of moral concepts, which are in different ways connected with the emotions from which they were derived. Thus moral disapproval is at the bottom of the concepts bad, vice, and wrong, ought and duty, right and rights, justice and injustice; whilst moral approval has led to the concepts good, virtue, and merit. It has, in particular, been of fundamental importance for the whole of our investigation to recognise the true contents of the notions of ought and duty. If these concepts were unanalysable, as they have often been represented to be, any attempt to explain the origin and development of the moral ideas would, in my opinion, be a hopeless failure.

From the predicates of moral judgments we proceeded to consider their subjects. Generally speaking, such judgments are passed on conduct or character, and {741} allowance is made for the various elements of which conduct and character are composed in proportion as the moral judgment is scrutinising and enlightened. It is only owing to ignorance or lack of due reflection if, as is often the case, moral estimates are influenced by external events which are entirely independent of the agent's will; if individuals who are incapable of recognising any act of theirs as right or wrong are treated as responsible beings; if motives are completely or partially disregarded; if little cognisance is taken of forbearances in comparison with acts; if want of foresight or want of self-restraint is overlooked when the effect produced by it is sufficiently remote. We were also able to explain _why_ moral judgments are passed on conduct and character. This is due to the facts that moral judgments spring from moral emotions; that the moral emotions are retributive emotions; that a retributive emotion is a reactive attitude of mind, either kindly or hostile, towards a living being (or something looked upon in the light of a living being), regarded as a cause of pleasure or as a cause of pain; and that a living being is regarded as a true cause of pleasure or pain only in so far as this feeling is assumed to be caused by its will. It is a circumstance of the greatest importance that not only moral emotions but non-moral retributive emotions are felt with reference to phenomena exactly similar in their general nature to those on which moral judgments are passed. How could we account for this remarkable coincidence unless the moral judgments were based on emotions and the moral emotions were retributive emotions akin to gratitude and revenge?

Our theory as to the nature of the moral concepts and emotions is further supported by another and very comprehensive set of facts. In our discussion of the particular modes of conduct which are subject to moral valuation and of the judgments passed on them by different peoples and in different ages, this theory has constantly been called in to explain the data before us. It is noteworthy that the very acts, forbearances, and omissions {742} which are condemned as wrong are also apt to call forth anger and revenge, and that the acts and forbearances which are praised as morally good are apt to call forth gratitude. This coincidence, again, undoubtedly bears testimony both to the emotional basis of the moral concepts and to the retributive character of the moral emotions. Thus the conclusions arrived at in the first section of the work, while helping to explain the facts mentioned in the two other sections, are at the same time greatly strengthened by these facts. Any attempt to discover the nature and origin of the moral consciousness must necessarily take into account the moral ideas of mankind at large. And though painfully conscious of the incompleteness of the present treatise, I think I may confidently ask, with reference to its fundamental thesis, whether any other theory of the moral consciousness has ever been subjected to an equally comprehensive test.

The general uniformity of human nature accounts for the great similarities which characterise the moral ideas of mankind. But at the same time these ideas also present radical differences. A mode of conduct which among one people is condemned as wrong is among another people viewed with indifference or regarded as praiseworthy or enjoined as a duty. One reason for these variations lies in different external conditions. Hardships of life may lead to the killing of infants or abandoning of aged parents or eating of human bodies; and necessity and the force of habit may deprive these actions of the stigma which would otherwise be attached to them. Economic conditions have influenced moral ideas relating, for instance, to slavery, labour, and cleanliness; whilst the form of marriage and the opinions concerning it have been largely determined by such a factor as the numerical proportion between the sexes. But the most common differences of moral estimates have undoubtedly a psychical origin.

When we examine the moral rules of uncivilised races we find that they in a very large measure resemble those prevalent among nations of culture. In every savage {743} community homicide is prohibited by custom, and so is theft. Savages also regard charity as a duty and praise generosity as a virtue--indeed, their customs concerning mutual aid are often much more stringent than our own; and many uncivilised peoples are conspicuous for their aversion to telling lies. But at the same time there is a considerable difference between the regard for life, property, truth, and the general wellbeing of a neighbour, which displays itself in primitive rules of morality and that which is found among ourselves. Savages' prohibitions of murder, theft, and deceit, as also their injunctions of charity and kind behaviour, have, broadly speaking, reference only to members of the same community or tribe. They carefully distinguish between an act of homicide committed among their own people and one where the victim is a stranger; whilst the former is in ordinary circumstances disapproved of, the latter is in most cases allowed and often considered worthy of praise. And the same thing holds true of theft and lying and other injuries. Apart from the privileges which are granted to guests, and which are always of very short duration, a stranger is in early society devoid of all rights. This is the case not only among savages but among nations of archaic culture as well. When we from the lower races pass to peoples more advanced in civilisation we find that the social unit has grown larger, that the nation has taken the place of the tribe, and that the circle of persons within which the infliction of injuries is prohibited has extended accordingly. But the old distinction between offences against compatriots and harm done to foreigners remains. Nay, it survives to some extent even among ourselves, as appears from the prevailing attitude towards war and the readiness with which wars are waged. But although the difference between a fellow countryman and a foreigner has not ceased to affect the moral feelings of men even in the midst of modern civilisation, its influence has certainly been decreasing. The doctrine has been set forth, and has been gradually gaining ground, that our duties towards our {744} fellow men are universal duties, not restricted by the limits of country or race. Those who recognise the emotional origin of the rules of duty find no difficulty in explaining all these facts. The expansion of the commandments relating to neighbours coincides with the expansion of the altruistic sentiment. And the cause of this coincidence at once becomes clear when we consider that such commandments mainly spring from the emotion of sympathetic resentment, and that sympathetic resentment is rooted in the altruistic sentiment.

Besides the extension of duties towards neighbours so as to embrace wider and wider circles of men, there is another point in which the moral ideas of mankind have undergone an important change on the upward path from savagery and barbarism to civilisation. They have become more enlightened. Though moral ideas are based upon emotions, though all moral concepts are essentially generalisations of tendencies in certain phenomena to call forth moral approval or disapproval, the influence of intellectual considerations upon moral judgments is naturally very great. All higher emotions are determined by cognitions--sensations or ideas; they therefore vary according as the cognitions vary, and the nature of a cognition may very largely depend upon reflection or insight. If a person tells us an untruth we are apt to feel indignant; but if, on due reflection, we find that his motive was benevolent, for instance a desire to save the life of the person to whom the untruth was told, our indignation ceases, and may even be succeeded by approval. The change of cognitions, or ideas, has thus produced a change of emotions. Now, the evolution of the moral consciousness partly consists in its development from the unreflecting to the reflecting stage, from the unenlightened to the enlightened. This appears from the decreasing influence of external events upon moral judgments and from the growing discrimination with reference to motives, negligence, and other factors in conduct which are carefully considered by a scrupulous judge. More penetrating reflection has also reduced {745} the part played by disinterested likes and dislikes in the formation of moral ideas. When we clearly realise that a certain act is productive of no real harm but is condemned simply because it causes aversion or disgust, we can hardly look upon it as a proper object of moral censure--unless, indeed, its commission is considered to imply a blamable disregard for other persons' sensibilities. Deliberate resentment, whether moral or non-moral, is too much concerned with the will of the agent to be felt towards a person who obviously neither intends to offend anybody nor is guilty of culpable oversight. Nay, even when the agent knows that his behaviour is repulsive to others, he may be considered justified in acting as he does. Some degree of reflection easily leads to the notion that sentimental antipathies are no sufficient ground for interfering with other individuals' liberty of action either by punishing them or by subjecting them to moral censure, provided of course that they do not in an indelicate manner shock their neighbours' feelings. Hence many persons have recourse to utilitarian pretexts to support moral opinions or legal enactments which have originated in mere aversions; thus making futile attempts to reconcile old ideas with the requirements of a moral consciousness which is duly influenced by reflection.

In innumerable cases the variations of moral estimates are due to differences of beliefs. Almost every chapter of this work has borne witness to the enormous influence which the belief in supernatural forces or beings or in a future state has exercised upon the moral ideas of mankind, and has at the same time shown how exceedingly varied this influence has been. Religion, or superstition (as the case may be), has on the one hand stigmatised murder and suicide, on the other hand it has commended human sacrifice and certain cases of voluntary self-destruction. It has inculcated humanity and charity, but has also led to cruel persecutions of persons embracing another creed. It has emphasised the duty of truthspeaking, and has itself been a cause of pious fraud. It has promoted {746} both cleanly habits and filthiness. It has enjoined labour and abstinence from labour, sobriety and drunkenness, marriage and celibacy, chastity and temple prostitution. It has introduced a great variety of new duties and virtues, quite different from those which are recognised by the moral consciousness when left to itself, but nevertheless in many cases considered more important than any other duties or virtues. It seems that the moral ideas of uncivilised men are more affected by magic than by religion, and that the religious influence has reached its greatest extension at certain stages of culture which, though comparatively advanced, do not include the highest stage. Increasing knowledge lessens the sphere of the supernatural, and the ascription of a perfectly ethical character to the godhead does away with moral estimates which have sprung from less elevated religious conceptions.

I have here pointed out only the most general changes to which the moral ideas have been subject in the course of progressive civilisation; the details have been dealt with each in their separate place. There can be no doubt that changes also will take place in the future, and that similar causes will produce similar effects. We have every reason to believe that the altruistic sentiment will continue to expand, and that those moral commandments which are based on it will undergo a corresponding expansion; that the influence of reflection upon moral judgments will steadily increase; that the influence of sentimental antipathies and likings will diminish; and that in its relation to morality religion will be increasingly restricted to emphasising ordinary moral rules, and less preoccupied with inculcating special duties to the deity.

ADDITIONAL NOTES TO VOL. II

P. 287, _n._ 6.--The connection between the Hebrew Sabbath and the moon has been fully discussed by Professor Webster in his recent book, _Rest Days_, ch. viii.

P. 377, _n._ 1.--In his book, _Totemism and Exogamy_, Sir J. G. Frazer has definitely separated exogamy from totemism and thereby, it is to be hoped, saved us from further speculations about the totemic origin of the exogamous rules. Like myself, Frazer thinks (iv. 105 _sqq._) that these rules have sprung from an aversion to the marriages of near kin. But whilst my own belief is that the aversion to such marriages through an association of ideas led to the prohibitions of marriage between members of the same clan on account of the notion of intimacy connected with a common descent and a common name, Frazer is of opinion that exogamy was deliberately instituted for the purpose of preventing the sexual unions of near kin. To me it seems almost inconceivable that the extensive, cumbersome, and sometimes very complicated institution of exogamy should have been invented simply as a precaution against unions between the nearest relatives.

Granting the prevalence of an aversion to the marriages of near kin, Frazer is confronted with the question how it has originated. His answer is, "We do not know and it is difficult even to guess." Yet he makes a cautious attempt to solve the riddle. He observes (iv. 156 _sqq._) that the great severity with which incest is generally punished by savages seems to show that they believe it to be a crime which endangers the whole community. It may have been thought to render the women of the tribe sterile and to prevent animals and plants from multiplying; such beliefs, Frazer remarks, appear in point of fact to have been held by many races in different parts of the world. But he admits himself that all the peoples who are known to hold them seem to be agricultural, and that incest is in particular supposed to have a sterilising effect on the crops. It is indeed a poor argument to conjecture that a careful search among the most primitive exogamous peoples now surviving, especially among the Australian aborigines, might still reveal the existence of a belief in the sterilising or injurious effects of incest "upon women generally and particularly upon edible animals and plants." It may also be asked if it really is reasonable to presume that an aversion which had originated in the superstition mentioned could have remained unimpaired among all the civilised nations of the world. Moreover, if this superstition were the root of the aversion to incest, we should still have to explain the origin of the superstition itself, and this Frazer has not even attempted to do. If, on the other hand, the abhorrence of incest has originated in the way I have suggested, the superstition which he is inclined to regard as the cause of that feeling is a very natural result of it or of the prohibition to which it gave rise. That this is the case is all the more probable because the same injurious effects as are attributed to incest are supposed to result from other sexual irregularities as well, such as adultery and fornication (_cf._ _supra_, ii. 417).

Sir J. G. Frazer also subjects my theory to a detailed criticism (iv. 96 _sqq._). He admits that there seems to be some ground for believing in the existence of "a natural aversion to, or at least a want of inclination for, sexual intercourse between persons who have been brought up closely together {748} from early youth"; but he finds it difficult to understand how this could have been changed into an aversion to sexual intercourse with persons near of kin, and maintains that, till I explain this satisfactorily, the chain of reasoning by which I support my theory breaks down entirely at the crucial point. For my own part I think that the transition which Frazer finds so difficult to understand is not only possible and natural, but well-nigh proved by an exactly analogous case of equally world-wide occurrence and of still greater social importance, namely, the process which has led to the association of all kinds of social rights and duties with kinship. As I have pointed out above (ch. xxxiv.), the maternal and paternal sentiments, which largely are at the bottom of parental duties and rights, cannot in their simplest forms be based on a knowledge of blood relationship, but respond to stimuli derived from other circumstances, notably the proximity of the helpless young, that is, the external relationship in which the offspring from the beginning stand to the parents. Nor is the so-called filial love in the first instance rooted in considerations of kinship; it is essentially retributive, the agreeable feeling produced by benefits received making the individual look with pleasure and kindliness upon the giver. Here again the affection is ultimately due to close living together, and is further strengthened by it, as appears from the cooling effect of long separation of children from their parents. So also fraternal love and the duties and rights which have sprung from it depend in the first place on other circumstances than the idea of a common blood; and the same may be said of the tie which binds together relatives more remotely allied. Its social force is ultimately derived from near relatives' habit of living together. "Men became gregarious by remaining in the circle where they were born; if, instead of keeping together with their kindred, they had preferred to isolate themselves or to unite with strangers, there would certainly be no blood-bond at all. The mutual attachment and the social rights and duties which resulted from this gregarious condition were associated with the relation in which members of the group stood to one another--the relation of kinship as expressed by a common name--and these associations might last even after the local tie was broken," being kept up by the common name (_supra_, ii. 203).

Here we have an immense group of facts which, though ultimately depending upon close living together, have been interpreted in terms of kinship. Why, then, could not the same have been the case with the aversion to incest and the prohibitory rules resulting from it? They really present a most striking analogy to the instances just mentioned. They have been associated with kinship because near relatives normally live together. They have come to include relatives more remotely allied who do not live together, owing to an association of ideas, especially through the influence of a common name; clan exogamy has its counterpart, for instance, in the blood feud as a duty incumbent on the whole clan. But there are also cases in which marriages between unrelated persons who have been brought up together in the same family, or who belong to the same local group, are held blamable or are actually prohibited; and so there are, even in early society, social rights and duties which are associated not with a common descent but with close living together. Frazer asks: "If the root of the whole matter is a horror of marriage between persons who have always lived with each other, how comes it that at the present day that horror has been weakened into a mere general preference for marriage with persons whose attractions have not been blunted by long familiarity? . . . Why should the marriage of a brother with a sister, or of a mother with a son, excite the deepest detestation, . . . while the origin of it all, the marriage between housemates, should excite at most a mild surprise too slight probably to suggest even a subject for a farce, and should be as legitimate in the eye of the law among all civilised nations as any other marriage?" For my own part, I believe that marriage between a man and his foster-daughter or between a foster-brother {749} and a foster-sister, in case the social relations between them have been exactly similar to those of blood-relatives of corresponding degrees, would cause more than a mild surprise, and appear unnatural and objectionable. As I have said above (ii. 375), I do not deny that unions between the nearest blood-relatives inspire a horror of their own, but it seems quite natural that they should do so considering that from earliest times the aversion to sexual intercourse between persons living closely together has been expressed in prohibitions against unions between kindred. Nor can it be a matter of surprise that the prohibitory rules so commonly refer to marriages of kindred alone. Law only takes into account general and well-defined cases, and hence relationships of some kind or other between persons who are nearly always kindred are defined in terms of blood-relationship. This is true not only of the prohibitions of incest, but of many duties and rights inside the family circle.

Sir J. G. Frazer raises another objection to my theory. He argues that, if exogamy resulted from a natural instinct, there would be no need to reinforce that instinct by legal pains and penalties; the law only forbids men to do what their instincts incline them to do, and hence we may always safely assume that crimes forbidden by law are crimes which many men have a natural propensity to commit. I must confess that this argument greatly surprises me. Of course, where there is no transgression there is no law. But Frazer cannot be ignorant of the variability of instincts and of the great variability of the sexual instinct; nor should he forget that there are circumstances in which a natural sentiment may be blunted and overcome. Would he maintain that there can be no deep natural aversion to bestiality because bestiality is forbidden by law, and that the exceptional severity with which parricide is treated by many law books proves that a large number of men have a natural propensity to kill their parents? The law expresses the feelings of the majority and punishes acts that shock them.

Sir J. G. Frazer accuses me of having extended Darwin's methods to subjects which only partially admit of such treatment, because my theory of the origin of exogamy attempts to explain the growth of a human institution "too exclusively from physical and biological causes without taking into account the factors of intelligence, deliberation, and will." This, he adds, is "not science, but a bastard imitation of it." What have I done to incur so severe an accusation? I have suggested that the instinctive aversion to sexual intercourse between persons who have been living very closely together from early youth may be the result of natural selection. I am inclined to think--and so is Frazer--that consanguineous marriages are in some way or other detrimental to the species. This fact would lead to the development of a sentiment which would be powerful enough, as a rule, to prevent injurious unions--a sentiment which would not, of course, show itself as an innate aversion to sexual connections with near relatives as such, but as an aversion on the part of individuals to union with others with whom they lived closely together from early childhood. These, as a matter of fact, would be blood-relations, and the result would consequently be the survival of the fittest. All that I have done, then, is to appeal to natural selection to explain the origin of a primeval instinctive sentiment; and I can never believe that this is to transgress the legitimate boundaries of Darwinism.

Sir J. G. Frazer himself thinks that "we may safely conclude that infertility is an inevitable consequence of inbreeding continued through many generations in the same place and under the same conditions," and in support of this view he quotes the valuable opinions of Mr. Walter Heape and Mr. F. H. A. Marshall. He thus finds that the principles of exogamy present "a curious resemblance" to the principles of scientific breeding, but he rightly assumes that this analogy cannot be due to any exact knowledge or farseeing care on the part of its savage founders. How then shall we explain this analogy? Frazer's answer is that "it must be an accidental {750} result of a superstition, an unconscious mimicry of science." In prohibiting incest the poor savages "blindly obeyed the impulse of the great evolutionary forces which in the physical world are constantly educing higher out of lower forms of existence and in the moral world civilisation out of savagery. If that is so, exogamy has been an instrument in the hands of that unknown power, the masked wizard of history, who by some mysterious process, some subtle alchemy, so often transmutes in the crucible of suffering the dross of folly and evil into the fine gold of wisdom and good." I hope it will not be considered uncalled-for impertinence on my part to ask if this reasoning is a specimen of what Frazer regards as science proper in contradistinction to my own "bastard imitation of it"?

In any attempt to explain the origin of exogamy there are, in my opinion, three parallel groups of facts of general occurrence which necessarily must be taken into consideration:--Firstly, the prohibitions of incest and rules of exogamy themselves; secondly, the aversion to sexual intercourse between persons living together from early youth; thirdly, the injurious consequences of inbreeding. As for the facts of the first group, Frazer and I agree that they all have the same root, exogamy being in some way or other derived from an aversion to the marriages of near kin. As for the facts of the second group, Frazer at all events admits that "there seems to be some ground" for believing in them. As for the facts of the third group, there is complete agreement between us. I ask: Is it reasonable to think that there is no causal connection between these three groups of facts? Is it right to ignore the second group altogether, as does Frazer, and to look upon the coincidence of the first and the third as accidental? I gratefully acknowledge that Frazer's chapter on the Origin of Exogamy has only strengthened my belief in my own theory.

Other objections to my theory have recently been made by Messrs. Hose and McDougall in their work on _The Pagan Tribes of Borneo_, vol. ii., p. 197, note. They observe that intercourse between a youth and his sister-by-adoption is not regarded as incest in these tribes, and that they know at least one instance of marriage between two young Kenyahs brought up together as adopted brother and sister. "This occurrence of incest between couples brought up in the same household," they say, "is, of course, difficult to reconcile with Professor Westermarck's well-known theory of the ground of the almost universal feeling against incest, namely, that it depends upon sexual aversion or indifference engendered by close proximity during childhood." They moreover maintain that "the occurrence of incest between brothers and sisters, and the strong feeling of the Sea Dyaks against incest between nephew and aunt (who often are members of distinct communities)," are facts which are fatal to this theory.

In my attempt to explain the rules against incest I certainly did not overlook the fact that these rules very frequently have reference to persons who are, or may be, members of different communities, and I found no difficulty in accounting for it (see _supra_, ii. 369; _History of Human Marriage_, p. 330 _sq._). Curiously enough Messrs. Hose and McDougall's own attempt to solve the problem is, if I understand them rightly, based on the supposition that the prohibitions of intermarriage originally referred to persons who belonged to the same community. They write:--"If we accept some such view of the constitution of primitive society as has been suggested by Messrs. Atkinson and Lang (_Primal Law_), namely, that the social group consisted of a single patriarch and a group of wives and daughters, over all of whom he exercised unrestricted power or rights; we shall see that the first step towards the constitution of a higher form of society must have been the strict limitation of his rights over certain of the women, in order that younger males might be incorporated in the society and enjoy the undisputed possession of them. The patriarch, having accepted this limitation of his rights over his daughters for the sake of the greater security and strength of the band given by the inclusion of a {751} certain number of young males, would enforce all the more strictly upon them his prohibition against any tampering with the females of the senior generation. Thus very strict prohibitions and severe penalties against the consorting of the patriarch with the younger generation of females, _i.e._ his daughters, and against intercourse between the young males admitted to membership of the group and the wives of the patriarch, would be the essential conditions of advance of social organisation. The enforcement of these penalties would engender a traditional sentiment against such unions, and these would be the unions primitively regarded as incestuous. The persistency of the tendency of the patriarch's jealousy to drive his sons out of the family group as they attained puberty would render the extension of this sentiment to brother-and-sister unions easy and almost inevitable. For the young male admitted to the group would be one who came with a price in his hand to offer in return for the bride he sought. Such a price could only be exacted by the patriarch on the condition that he maintained an absolute prohibition on sexual relations between his offspring so long as the young sons remained under his roof." I should like to know how Messrs. Hose and McDougall, on the basis of this theory, would explain "the strong feeling of the Sea Dyaks against incest between nephew and aunt (who often are members of distinct communities)," and, generally speaking, the rules prohibiting the intermarriage of persons belonging to different local groups. For the rest, I must confess that the assumptions on which their whole theory rests seem to me extremely arbitrary. Brothers are prohibited from marrying their sisters because the old patriarch drove away his grown-up sons out of jealousy; but his jealousy was not strong enough to prevent other young males from joining the band. On the contrary, he allowed them to be incorporated in it, because they added to its strength; nay, he gave them his own daughters in marriage, and refrained henceforth himself from intercourse with these young women so rigorously that ever since a father has been prohibited from marrying his daughter. But the young men had to pay a price for their wives. It may be asked: Why did not the old patriarch accept a price from his own sons or let them work for him, instead of mercilessly turning them out of their old home, although they would have been just as good protectors of it as anybody else? And why did he give the young men his _daughters_? He might have kept the young women for himself and let the young men have the old ones. This is what is done by the old men in Australia, where the young girls are, as a rule, allotted to old men, and the boys, whenever they are allowed to marry, get old _lubras_ as wives (Malinowski, _The Family among the Australian Aborigines_, p. 259 _sqq._). Yet, in spite of this custom, there is no country where incest has been more strictly prohibited than in Australia.

Messrs. Hose and McDougall maintain that the occurrence of incest between brothers and sisters and the feeling of the Sea Dyaks against incest between nephew and aunt are facts which seem "to point strongly to the view that the sentiment has a purely conventional or customary source." I ask: Is it reasonable to suppose that, if this were the case, the feeling against sexual intercourse between the nearest relatives could have so long survived the conditions from which it sprang without showing any signs of decay? As I have pointed out above, the prohibited degrees are very differently defined in the customs or laws of different peoples, generally being more numerous among peoples unaffected by modern civilisation than they are in more advanced communities; and it appears that the extent to which relatives are prohibited from intermarrying is closely connected with the intimacy of their social relations. Whilst among ourselves cousins are allowed to intermarry, there is still a strong sentiment against intercourse between parents and children and between brothers and sisters, who in normal cases belong to the same family circle. Why should the feeling against incest have survived in this case but not in others, if it had a purely conventional origin? And how could any law {752} based on convention alone account for the normal absence of erotic feelings in the relation between parents and children and brothers and sisters? It is true that cases of intercourse between the nearest relatives do occur, but they are certainly quite exceptional. Messrs. Hose and McDougall say themselves (p. 198) that "incest of any form is very infrequent" among the tribes of Borneo, and they seem to know of only one instance of marriage between young Kenyahs brought up together as adopted brother and sister, although such marriages are allowed. To maintain that cases of this kind are fatal to my theory seems to me as illogical as it would be to assume that the occurrence of a _horror feminæ_ in many men disproves the general prevalence of a feeling of love between the sexes.

P. 396, _n._ 1.--In his recent work, _The Family among the Australian Aborigines_, Dr. Malinowski has come to the same conclusion. He observes that the individual family plays a foremost part in the social life of those aborigines; it has a very firm basis in their customs and ideas, and "by no means bears the features of anything like recent innovation, or a subordinate form subservient to the idea of group marriage." The Australian husband had generally a definite sexual "over-right" over his wife, which secured to him the privilege of disposing of her, or at least of exercising a certain control over her conduct in sexual matters, even though this "over-right" did not, as a rule, amount to an exclusive right. There were customs like wife-lending, exchange of wives, ceremonial defloration of girls by old men, the different forms of licence practised at large tribal gatherings, and especially the _Pirrauru_ relationship found in several of the southern central tribes. But all this does not constitute group _marriage_, the complete content of which does not consist in sexual relations alone. Dr. Malinowski emphasises the fact that marriage cannot be detached from family life; "it is defined in all its aspects by the problems of the economic unity of the family, of the bonds created by common life in one wurley, through the common rearing of, and affection towards, the offspring." In nearly all these respects even the _Pirrauru_ relationship essentially differs from marriage, and cannot, therefore, seriously encroach upon the individual family. Nor can we regard this relationship as a survival of previous group marriage. Dr. Malinowski also points out (p. 89 _sq._) how highly objectionable it is that "our best informants (especially Howitt and Spencer and Gillen) describe the facts of sexual life of to-day in terms of their hypothetical assumptions."

P. 419, _n._ 5.--For Moorish beliefs relating to contact between sexual uncleanness and holiness see my essays, _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_, p. 123 _sqq._, and _Ceremonies and Beliefs connected with Agriculture, certain Dates of the Solar Year, and the Weather in Morocco_, pp. 17, 22, 23, 28, 46, 47, 54.

P. 463, _n._ 8.--During the years that have passed since the first edition of this book was issued, the study of homosexuality has been carried on with remarkable activity. The following books are exclusively devoted to this subject:--_Das gleichgeschlechtliche Leben der Naturvölker_, by F. Karsch-Haack (1911), _Intermediate Types among Primitive Folk_, by Edward Carpenter (1914), and _Die Homosexualität des Mannes und des Weibes_, by Magnus Hirschfeld (1914). Carpenter's book chiefly deals with the invert in early religion and in warfare. Hirschfeld's work is a veritable encyclopædia of homosexuality--according to Dr. Havelock Ellis, "not only the largest but the most precise, detailed, and comprehensive--even the most condensed--work which has yet appeared on the subject." In 1915 Dr. Havelock Ellis issued a third, revised and enlarged, edition of his _Sexual Inversion_.

P. 485, _n._ 1.--This passage and, generally, the suggestion that there is a certain relationship between the social reaction against homosexuality {753} and against infanticide, have been excluded from the last edition of Dr. Havelock Ellis's book.

P. 584, _n._ 1.--There is hardly any subject which during the last four or five years has been more eagerly discussed by students of social anthropology than the relation between religion and magic. It has been dealt with, _e.g._, by Sir J. G. Frazer in _The Magic Art_, by Professor Durkheim in _Les formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse_, by Dr. Marett in _The Threshold of Religion_ and other writings, by Dr. Irving King in _The Development of Religion_, by Professor Leuba in _A Psychological Study of Religion_, by Mr. Sidney Hartland in _Ritual and Belief_, and by the present Archbishop of Sweden, Nathan Söderblom, in his book _Gudstrons uppkomst_. According to the French school of sociologists, religion is social in its aims and magic antisocial; and this distinction has lately been accepted by Dr. Marett, who writes (_Anthropology_, p. 209 _sq._): "Magic I take to include all bad ways, and religion all good ways, of dealing with the supernormal--bad and good, of course, not as we may happen to judge them, but as the society concerned judges them." But this use of the terms is neither in agreement with traditional usage nor, in my opinion, suitable for the purpose of scientific classification. Besides black magic, or witchcraft, there is also white magic; even a medieval theologian like Albertus Magnus asserts that "magical science is not evil, since through knowledge of it evil can be avoided and good attained." The French distinction between magic and religion implies that a prayer to a god for the destruction of an enemy must be classified as religion if it is offered in a cause which is considered just by the community, but as magic if it is disapproved of. If a man makes a girl drink a love-potion in order to gain her favour, it is religion if their union is desirable from the society's point of view, but if he gives the same drink to another man's wife it is magic. The best part of what has been hitherto called imitative or hom[oe]opathic magic no longer remains magic at all; if water is poured out for the purpose of producing rain it is hom[oe]opathic magic only in case rain is not wanted by the community, but if it is done during a drought it is religion. Thus the very same practices are qualified as religious or magical according as they have social or antisocial ends; and, as Mr. Hartland rightly asks (_Ritual and Belief_, p. 76): "How shall we define these ends?"

It should be added, however, that the definition of religion which I have given in the text has reference only to religion in the abstract, not to the various religions. In the popular sense of the word, a religion may include many practices which are what I have called magical. As I have said above (p. 649), "both Christianity in its earlier phases and Muhammedanism are full of magical practices expressly sanctioned by their theology." Although the magical and the strictly religious attitude differ from each other, they are not irreconcilable, and may therefore very well form parts of one and the same religion; there is no such thing as a magic being opposed to a religion. By a religion is generally understood a system of beliefs and rules of behaviour which have reference to men's relations to one or several supernatural beings whom they call their god or gods, that is, supernatural beings who are the objects of a regular cult and between whom and their worshippers there are established and permanent relationships. If it be admitted that the word religion may be thus legitimately used in two different senses, I think there is little ground left for further controversy on the subject. After all, sociologists may more profitably occupy their time than by continuous quarrelling about the meaning of terms.

P. 608, _n._ 4.--In _The Dying God_, p. 204, _n._ 1, Sir J. G. Frazer writes: "There is a good deal to be said in favour of Dr. Westermarck's theory, which is supported in particular by the sanctity attributed to the regalia. But on the whole I see no sufficient reason to abandon the view adopted {754} in the text, and I am confirmed in it by the Shilluk evidence, which was unknown to Dr. Westermarck when he propounded his theory."

According to Professor C. G. Seligman to whom Frazer is indebted for detailed information on the subject (_op. cit._ p. 17 _sqq._) it is a fundamental article of the Shilluk creed that the spirit of Nyakang, the divine or semi-divine hero who settled the Shilluk in their present territory and founded the dynasty of their kings, is incarnate in the reigning king, who is accordingly himself invested to some extent with the character of a divinity. But while the Shilluk hold their kings in high, indeed religious, reverence and take every precaution against their accidental death, nevertheless they cherish the conviction that the king must not be allowed to become ill or senile, lest with his diminishing vigour the cattle should sicken and fail to bear their increase, the crops should rot in the fields, and man, stricken with disease, should die in ever-increasing numbers. To prevent these calamities it used to be the regular custom with the Shilluk to put the king to death whenever he showed signs of ill-health or failing strength. Nay, from Dr. Seligman's enquiries it appears that even while the king was yet in the prime of health and strength he might at any time be attacked by a rival and have to defend his crown in a combat to the death. According to the common Shilluk tradition any son of a king had the right thus to fight the king in possession and, if he succeeded in killing him, to reign in his stead. Now "an important part of the solemnities attending the accession of a Shilluk king appears to be intended to convey to the new monarch the divine spirit of Nyakang, which has been transmitted from the founder of the dynasty to all his successors on the throne. For this purpose a sacred four-legged stool and a mysterious object which bears the name of Nyakang himself are brought with much solemnity from the shrine of Nyakang at Akurwa to the small village of Kwom near Fashoda, where the king elect and the chiefs await their arrival. The thing called Nyakang is said to be of cylindrical shape, some two or three feet long by six inches broad. The chief of Akurwa informed Dr. Seligman that the object in question is a rude wooden figure of a man, which was fashioned long ago at the command of Nyakang in person. We may suppose that it represents the divine king himself and that it is, or was formerly, supposed to house his spirit, though the chief of Akurwa denied to Dr. Seligman that it does so now. . . . The image of Nyakang is placed on the stool; the king elect holds one leg of the stool and an important chief holds another. . . . A bullock is killed and its flesh eaten by the men of certain families called _ororo_, who are said to be descended from the third of the Shilluk kings. Then the Akurwa men carry the image of Nyakang into the shrine, and the _ororo_ men place the king elect on the sacred stool, where he remains seated for some time, apparently till sunset. When he rises, the Akurwa men carry the stool back into the shrine, and the king is escorted to three new huts, where he stays in seclusion for three days. On the fourth night he is conducted quietly, almost stealthily, to his royal residence at Fashoda, and next day he shows himself publicly to his subjects."

As regards this so-called evidence it should, first, be noticed that it is only Dr. Seligman's own conjecture that the mysterious object called Nyakang is or has been supposed to contain the spirit of the holy founder of the dynasty, and that this conjecture is expressly said to be opposed to the present beliefs of the natives. On the other hand it is obvious that the object in question is regarded as a holy object, and that its holiness, or a particle of it, is supposed to be transmitted to the new king through material contact--an idea which well agrees with my own theory. But even if the Shilluk had once believed that their king was a reincarnation of the spirit of Nyakang, that belief could hardly be regarded as a direct proof of the idea that the soul of the slain man-god is transmitted to his royal successor. The Shilluk believe that Nyakang, unlike his royal descendants of more recent times, did not die but simply disappeared.

AUTHORITIES QUOTED[1]

[Footnote 1: Of articles in periodicals only some of the more important have been included in this list.]

A Voice for South America. London.

Aas (Einar), _Sjaeleliv og intelligens hos dyr_. Kristiania, 1893.

Abbot (Ezra), 'Literature of the Doctrine of a Future Life'; in Alger, _A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life_. Philadelphia, 1864.

[(]Abd-Allatif, _Relation de l'Égypte_. Trans. by S. de Sacy. Paris, 1810.

[(]Abd-es-Salâm Shabeeny, _An Account of Timbuctoo and Housa_. Ed. by J. G. Jackson. London, 1820.

Abegg (J. F. H.), _Die verschiedenen Strafrechtstheorieen_. Neustadt a.d.O., 1835.

Abel (Charles W.), _Savage Life in New Guinea_. London, [1901].

Abercromby (John), _The Pre- and Proto-Historic Finns_. 2 vols. London, 1898.

Abreu de Galindo (Juan de), _The History of the Discovery and Conquest of the Canary Islands_. Trans. London, 1764.

Academy (The). London.

Achelis (Th.), 'Animal Worship'; in _The Open Court_, vol. xi. Chicago, 1897.

---- _Moderne Völkerkunde_. Stuttgart, 1896.

Achery (L. d'), _Spicilegium sive collectio veterum aliquot scriptorum qui in Galliæ bibliothecis delituerant_. 3 vols. Parisiis, 1723.

Acosta (Joseph de), _The Natural and Moral History of the Indies_. Trans. ed. by C. R. Markham. 2 vols. London, 1880.

Acta Societatis Scientiarum Fennicæ. Helsingfors.

Adair (James), _The History of the American Indians_. London, 1775.

Adalbero, 'Carmen ad Rotbertum regem Francorum'; in Bouquet, _Recueil des historiens des Gaules et de la France_, vol. x. Paris, 1760.

Adam of Bremen, 'Gesta Hammaburgensis ecclesiæ pontificum'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus completus_, vol. cxlvi. Parisiis, 1853.

Adams (John), _Sketches taken during Ten Voyages to Africa, Between the Years 1786 and 1800_. London, [1825].

Addis (W. E.) and Arnold (Thomas), _A Catholic Dictionary_. London, 1903.

Addosio (Carlo d'), _Bestie delinquenti_. Napoli, 1892.

Aelian, _De natura animalium, Varia historia, &c._ Ed. by R. Hercher. Parisiis, 1858.

Aeschines, 'Orationes'; in _Oratores Attici_, ed. by C. Müller, vol. ii. Parisiis, 1858.

Aeschylus, _Trag[oe]diæ et fragmenta_. Ed. by E. A. J. Ahrens. Parisiis, 1842.

Aethelbirht (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

{756} Aethelstan (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Afzelius (A. A.), _Swenska Folkets Sago-Häfder_. 11 vols. Stockholm, 1839-70.

Agathias, 'Historiarum libri quinque'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. lxxxviii. Parisiis, 1860.

Ahlqvist (A.), 'Unter Wogulen und Ostjaken'; in _Acta Societatis Scientiarum Fennicæ_, vol. xiv. Helsingfors, 1885.

Ahrens (Heinrich), _Naturrecht_. 2 vols. Wien, 1870-71.

Aitareya Brahmanam of the Rigveda (The). Ed. and trans. by M. Haug. 2 vols. Bombay, 1863.

Alabaster (Chal.), 'The Law of Inheritance'; in _The China Review_, vol. v. Hongkong, 1876-77.

Alabaster (Ernest), _Notes and Commentaries on Chinese Criminal Law_. London, 1899.

Alabaster (Henry), _The Wheel of the Law_. London, 1871.

Alagona (Petrus), _Compendium manualis D. Navarri_. Lugduni, 1603.

Alard (Paul), _Condition et droits des enfants naturels_. Paris, 1896.

Albericus, _Visio_. Ed. by Catello de Vivo. Ariano, 1899.

Alberti (L.), _De Kaffers aan de Zuidkust van Afrika_. Amsterdam, 1810.

Alden (T. J. Fox) and Hoesen (J. A. van), _A Digest of the Laws of Mississippi_. New York, 1839.

Alexander (S.), _Moral Order and Progress_. London, 1896.

Alfonso de' Liguori, _Theologia moralis_. 3 vols. Bassani, 1822.

Alfred (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Alger (W. R.), _A Critical History of the Doctrine of a Future Life_. Philadelphia, 1864.

Alienist and Neurologist (The). St. Louis.

Allard (Paul), _Les esclaves chrétiens depuis les premiers temps de l'Église jusqu'à la fin de la domination romaine en Occident_. Paris, 1876.

Allardt (Anders), _Nyländska folkseder och bruk_. (_Nyland_, vol. iv.) Helsingfors, 1889.

Allen (Grant), _The Evolution of the Idea of God_. London, 1897.

Allen (John), _Modern Judaism._ London, 1830.

Allen (W.) and Thomson (T. R. H.), _A Narrative of the Expedition sent by Her Majesty's Government to the River Niger, in 1841_. 2 vols. London, 1848.

Am Ur-Quell. Monatsschrift für Volkskunde. Ed. by F. S. Krauss. Lunden.

Amadori-Virgilj (Giovanni), _L'Istituto famigliare nelle Società primordiali_. Bari, 1903.

Ambrose (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. xiv.-xvii.) Parisiis, 1845.

Ameer Ali (Syed), _The Ethics of Islâm_. Calcutta, 1893.

---- _The Life and Teachings of Mohammed or the Spirit of Islâm_. London, 1891.

Amélineau (E.), _Essai sur l'évolution historique et philosophique des idées morales dans l'Égypte ancienne_. Paris, 1895.

American Anthropologist (The). Washington.

American Antiquarian and Oriental Journal (The). Chicago.

American Journal of Psychology (The). Worcester.

American Journal of Theology (The). Chicago.

American Naturalist (The). Philadelphia.

{757} Amira (Karl von), _Nordgermanisches Obligationenrecht_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1882-95.

---- 'Recht'; in Paul, _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_, vol. ii. Strassburg, 1893.

---- _Thierstrafen und Thierprocesse_. Innsbruck, 1891.

Ammianus Marcellinus. See Marcellinus (A.).

Amos (Andrew), _Ruins of Time exemplified in Sir Matthew Hale's History of the Pleas of the Crown_. London, 1856.

'Ancien Coutumier de Bourgogne,' ed. by A.-J. Marnier; in _Revue historique de droit français et étranger_, vol. iii. Paris, 1857.

Ancient Laws and Institutes of England. London, 1840.

Ancient Laws and Institutes of Ireland. 4 vols. Dublin & London, 1865-79.

Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales. London, 1841.

Ancient Sea-Laws of Oleron, Wisby, and the Hanse-Towns (The). Trans. London, 1686.

Ancona (A. d'), _Origini del teatro italiano_. 2 vols. Torino, 1891.

Anderson (John), _Mandalay to Momien_. London, 1876.

Anderson (John W.), _Notes of Travel in Fiji and New Caledonia_. London, 1880.

Andersson (C. J.), _Lake Ngami_. London, 1856.

---- _Notes on Travel in South Africa_. London, 1875.

André (Tony), _L'esclavage chez les anciens Hébreux_. Paris, 1892.

Andree (Richard), _Die Anthropophagie_. Leipzig, 1887.

---- 'Ethnographische Bemerkungen zu einigen Rechtsgebräuchen. I. Jagdrecht. II. Die Asyle'; in _Globus_, vol. xxxviii. Braunschweig, 1880.

---- _Ethnographische Parallelen und Vergleiche_. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1878-89.

---- _Zur Volkskunde der Juden_. Bielefeld & Leipzig, 1881.

Andrews (William), _Old-Time Punishments_. Hull & London, 1890.

Angas (G. F.), _Polynesia_. London, [1866].

---- _Savage Life and Scenes in Australia and New Zealand_. London, 1850.

Annales du Musée Guimet. Paris.

Année sociologique (L'). Ed. by É. Durkheim. Paris.

Annual Reports of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, Washington.

Annual Reports of the Bureau of Ethnology. Washington.

Anrich (G.), _Das antike Mysterienwesen in seinem Einfluss auf das Christentum_. Göttingen, 1894.

Antananarivo Annual and Madagascar Magazine. Antananarivo.

Ante-Nicene Christian Library. Ed. by A. Roberts and J. Donaldson. 24 vols. Edinburgh, 1867-72.

Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor. Oxford, 1907.

Anthropologie (L'). Paris.

Antiquary (The). London.

'Anugitâ (The),' trans. by K. T. Telang; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. viii. Oxford, 1898.

'Âpastamba,' trans. by G. Bühler; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. ii. Oxford, 1897.

Apocryphal Books (The). Trans. London, 1880.

Apollodorus Atheniensis, _Bibliotheca_. Lipsiae, 1854.

Apollonius Rhodius, _Argonautica_. Ed. by F. S. Lehrs. Parisiis, 1840.

{758} Apuleius (L.), _Opera omnia_. 7 vols. Londini, 1825.

Arbois de Jubainville (H. d'), 'Des attributions judiciaires de l'autorité publique chez les Celtes'; in _Revue Celtique_, vol. vii. Paris, 1886.

---- _La civilisation des Celtes et celle de l'épopée Homérique_. Paris, 1899.

Arbousset (T.) and Daumas (F.), _Narrative of an Exploratory Tour to the North-East of the Colony of the Cape of Good Hope_. Trans. London, 1852.

Archilochus, _Reliquiæ_. Ed. by I. Liebel. Lipsiae, 1818.

Archiv für Anthropologie. Braunschweig.

---- _für Religionswissenschaft_. Leipzig.

---- _für wissenschaftliche Kunde von Russland_. Ed. by A. Erman. Berlin.

Archives d'anthropologie criminelle. Paris.

Archives de Neurologie. Paris.

Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia. Firenze.

Archivio per lo studio delle tradizioni popolari. Palermo.

Arda Viraf. Ed. and trans. by M. Haug and E. W. West. Bombay & London, 1872.

Argentré (Bertrand d'), _L'histoire de Bretaigne_. Paris, 1618.

Aristophanes, _Com[oe]diæ_. Parisiis, 1838.

Aristotle, _De republica Atheniensium_. Ed. by J. E. Sandys. London, 1893.

---- The same work. Trans. by E. Poste. London, 1891.

---- _Opera omnia_. 5 vols. Parisiis, 1848-74.

---- _Politica et [OE]conomica_. 2 vols. Oxonii, 1810.

---- _The Politics_. Trans. by B. Jowett. 2 vols. Oxford, 1885.

Armstrong (Alex.), _A Personal Narrative of the Discovery of the North-West Passage_. London, 1857.

Arnesen (John), _Historisk Indledning til den gamle og nye Islandske Rættergang_. Kiöbenhavn, 1762.

Arnobius, 'Disputationum adversus gentes libri septem'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. v. Parisiis, 1844.

Arnold (Thomas), _Fragment on the Church_. London, 1845.

Arnold (Wilhelm), _Deutsche Urzeit_. Gotha, 1879.

Arnot (Fred.), _Garenganze; or, Seven Years' Pioneer Mission Work in Central Africa_. London, [1889].

Arrian, _Anabasis et Indica_. Ed. by Fr. Dübner. Parisiis, 1846.

Arvieux (_Chevalier_ d'), _Travels in Arabia the Desart_. Trans. London, 1718.

Ashe (R. P.), _Two Kings of Uganda_. London, 1889.

Asiatic(k) Researches. Calcutta.

Atharva-Veda, Hymns of the. Trans. by M. Bloomfield. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xlii.). Oxford, 1897.

Athenaeus, _Dipnosophistarum libri quindecim_. Ed. by G. Kaibel. 3 vols. Lipsiae, 1887-90.

Athenagoras, 'Legatio pro Christianis'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. vi. Parisiis, 1857.

Atkinson (E. T.), 'Notes on the History of Religion in the Himálaya of the N.W. Provinces'; in _Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal_, vol. liii. pt. i. Calcutta, 1884.

Atkinson (J. C.), _Forty Years in a Moorland Parish_. London, 1891.

Atkinson (J. J.), 'The Natives of New Caledonia'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. xiv. London, 1903.

---- _Primal Law_. London, 1903.

Augustana Confessio. Lipsiae, 1730.

{759} Augustine (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. 16 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. xxxii.-xlvii.) Parisiis, 1845-49.

Aurelius Victor (Sextus), _Libri de Romanæ gentis origine, Viris illustribus, Imperatoribus, Epitome_. Lipsiae & Francofurti, 1704.

Ausland (Das). Stuttgart & Augsburg.

Aust (Emil), _Die Religion der Römer_. Münster i. W., 1899.

Austin (John), _Lectures on Jurisprudence_. 2 vols. London, 1873.

Avebury (_Lord_), _The Origin of Civilisation_. London, 1902.

Ayala (Balthazar), _De jure et officiis bellicis et disciplina militari, libri III._ Duaci, 1582.

Ayrault (Pierre), _Des procez faicts au cadaver, aux cendres, a la mémoire, aux bestes brutes, &c._ Angers, 1591.

Azara (F. de), _Voyages dans l'Amérique méridionale_. 4 vols. Paris, 1809.

Baarda (M. J. van), 'Fabelen, verhalen en overleveringen der Galelareezen'; in _Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, vol. xlv. (ser. vi. vol. i.). 's-Gravenhage, 1895.

Babington (Churchill), _The Influence of Christianity in promoting the Abolition of Slavery in Europe_. Cambridge, 1846.

Bachofen (J. J.), _Das Mutterrecht_. Stuttgart, 1861.

Bacon (_Lord_), _Works_. Ed. by J. Spedding, R. L. Ellis, and D. D. Heath. 14 vols. London, 1857-74.

Baden-Powell (B. H.), _The Indian Village Community_. London, 1896.

Bagehot (Walter), _Physics and Politics_. London, 1873.

Bailey (John), 'An Account of the Wild Tribes of the Veddahs of Ceylon'; in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ new ser. vol. ii. London, 1863.

Bain (Alex.), _The Emotions and the Will_. London, 1880.

Baker (_Sir_ S. W.), _The Albert N'yanza_. 2 vols. London, 1866.

---- _Ismailïa_. London, 1879.

---- _The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia_. London, 1871.

Baldwin (J. M.), _Social and Ethical Interpretations in Mental Development_. New York, 1897.

Balfour (A. J.), _The Foundations of Belief_. London, 1895.

Balfour (Edward), _The Cyclopædia of India, and Eastern and Southern Asia_. 3 vols. London, 1885.

Ball (C. J.), 'Glimpses of Babylonian Religion'; in _Proceed. Soc. Biblical Archæology_, vol. xiv. London, 1892.

Ball (J. Dyer), _Things Chinese_. London, 1900.

Ball (W. McK.) and Roane (S. C.), _Revised Statutes of the State of Arkansas_. Boston, 1838.

Balmes (_Don_ Jaime), _El Protestantismo comparado con el Catolicismo en sus relaciones con la civilizacion Europea_. 4 vols. Barcelona, 1844-45.

Baluze (Stephen), _Capitularia Regum Francorum_. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1677.

Bancroft (H. H.), _The Native Races of the Pacific States of North America_. 5 vols. New York, 1875-76.

Bar (L. von), _Die Grundlagen des Strafrechts_. Leipzig, 1869.

Barbeyrac (Jean), _Traité de la morale des Pères de l'Église_. Amsterdam, 1728.

Baring-Gould (S.), _The Origin and Development of Religious Belief_. 2 vols. London, 1892.

---- _Strange Survivals_. London, 1892.

{760} Barnes (Albert), _The Church and Slavery_. Philadelphia, 1857.

Baronius (C.), _Annales Ecclesiastici_. 38 vols. Lucae, 1738-59.

Barrington (George), _The History of New South Wales_. London, 1810.

Barrow (John), _An Account of Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa, in the Years 1797 and 1798_. 2 vols. London, 1801-04.

Bartels (Max), _Die Medicin der Naturvölker_. Leipzig, 1893.

Barth (A.), _The Religions of India_. Trans. London, 1882.

Barth (Heinrich), _Reisen und Entdeckungen in Nord- und Central-Afrika_. 5 vols. Gotha, 1857-58.

Bartholinus (Thomas), _Antiquitates Danicæ_. Hafniae, 1690.

Bartram (William), 'Observations on the Creek and Cherokee Indians'; in _Trans. American Ethn. Soc._ vol. iii. pt. i. New York, 1853.

Basil (_Saint_), _Opera_. 4 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. xxix.-xxxii.) Parisiis, 1857.

Bastian (A.), _Afrikanische Reisen. Ein Besuch in San Salvador_. Bremen, 1859.

---- _Allerlei aus Volks- und Menschenkunde_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1888.

---- _Die deutsche Expedition an der Loango-Küste_. 2 vols. Jena, 1874-75.

---- _Der Mensch in der Geschichte_. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1860.

Batchelor (John), _The Ainu and their Folk-Lore_. London, 1901.

---- _The Ainu of Japan_. London, 1892.

---- 'Notes on the Ainu'; in _Trans. Asiatic Soc. Japan_, vol. x. Yokohama, 1882.

Bates (H. W.), _The Naturalist on the River Amazons_. 2 vols. London, 1863.

'Baudhâyana,' trans. by G. Bühler; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xiv. Oxford, 1882.

Baudissin (W. W.), _Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1876-78.

Baumann (Oscar), 'Conträre Sexual-Erscheinungen bei der Neger-Bevölkerung Zanzibars'; in _Verhandl. der Berliner Gesellsch. für Anthropologie_, 1899.

---- _Durch Massailand zur Nilquelle_. Berlin, 1894.

---- _Usambara_. Berlin, 1891.

Baur (F. Chr.), _Das Manichäische Religionssystem_. Tübingen, 1831.

Bax (E. B.), _The Ethics of Socialism_. London, 1893.

Bayle (P.), _Dictionnaire historique et critique_. 16 vols. Paris, 1820.

Baynes (Herbert), _The Idea of God and the Moral Sense in the Light of Language_. London, 1895.

Beardmore (E.), 'The Natives of Mowat, Daudai, New Guinea'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xix. London, 1890.

Beauchamp (W. M.), 'The Iroquois White Dog Feast'; in _The American Antiquarian and Oriental Journal_, vol. vii. Chicago, 1885.

Beaumanoir (Philippe de), _Les coutumes du Beauvoisis_. 2 vols. Paris, 1842.

Beccaria Bonesana (Cesare), _Opere_. 2 vols. Milano, 1821-22.

Becker (W. A.), _Charikles_. Ed. by H. Göll. 3 vols. Berlin, 1877-78.

Beecham (John), _Ashantee and the Gold Coast_. London, 1841.

Beechey (F. W.), _Narrative of a Voyage to the Pacific and Behring's Strait_. 2 vols. London, 1831.

Beltrame (A. G.), _Il Fiume Bianco e i Dénka_. Verona, 1881.

---- _Il Sénnaar e lo Sciangàllah_. 2 vols. Verona & Padova, 1879.

Benedict (_Saint_), _Regula monachorum_. Ed. by E. Woelfflin. Lipsiae, 1895.

{761} Benny (Ph. Berger), _The Criminal Code of the Jews according to the Talmud Massecheth Synhedrin_. London, 1880.

Bent (J. Theodore), _The Cyclades_. London, 1885.

Bentham (Jeremy), _Deontology_. Ed. by J. Bowring. 2 vols. London & Edinburgh, 1834.

---- _An Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation_. Oxford, 1879.

---- _The Rationale of Punishment_. London, 1830.

---- _Theory of Legislation_. Trans. from the French of E. Dumont. London 1882.

---- _The Works of_. 11 vols. Edinburgh, 1838-43.

'Berakhoth'; in _Le Talmud de Jérusalem_, trans. by M. Schwab, vol. i. Paris, 1871.

Bergaigne (Abel), _La religion védique_. 3 vols. Paris, 1878-83.

Bergemann (P.), _Die Verbreitung der Anthropophagie über die Erde_. Bunzlau, 1893.

Bergmann (B.), _Nomadische Streifereien unter den Kalmüken_. 4 vols. Riga, 1804-05.

Bernard (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1719.

Bernard (Montague), 'The Growth of Laws and Usages of War'; in _Oxford Essays, 1856_. London, [1856].

Bernau (J. H.), _Missionary Labours in British Guiana_. London, 1847.

Berner (A. F.), _Lehrbuch des Deutschen Strafrechtes_. Leipzig, 1881.

Bertholet (Alfred), _Die Stellung der Israeliten und der Juden zu den Fremden_. Freiburg i.B. & Leipzig, 1896.

Best (Elsdon), 'The Lore of the Whare-Kohanga'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. xiv. Wellington, 1905.

---- 'Notes on the Art of War, as conducted by the Maori of New Zealand'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. xi. Wellington, 1902.

---- 'Pre-historic Civilisation in the Philippines'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. i. Wellington, 1892.

---- 'Tuhoe Land'; in _Trans. and Proceed. New Zealand Institute_, vol. xxx., 1897. Wellington, 1898.

Bethune-Baker (J. F.), _The Influence of Christianity on War_. Cambridge, 1888.

'Bhagavadgîtâ (The)', trans. by K. T. Telang; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. viii. Oxford, 1898.

Bible (The Holy). Appointed to be read in Churches.

Bickmore (A. S.), _Travels in the East Indian Archipelago_. London, 1868.

Biener (F. A.), _Das englische Geschwornengericht_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1852.

Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië. 's-Gravenhage.

Bindemann (C.), _Der heilige Augustinus_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1844-55.

Binding (Karl), _Die Normen und ihre Übertretung_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1872-77.

Bingham (J.), _Works_. Ed. by R. Bingham. 10 vols. Oxford, 1855.

Binsfeldius (P.), _Tractatus de confessionibus maleficorum et sagarum recognitus_. Augustae Trevirorum, 1591.

Biot (Édouard), _De l'abolition de l'esclavage ancien en Occident_. Paris, 1840.

---- 'Mémoire sur la condition des esclaves et des serviteurs gagés en Chine'; in _Journal Asiatique_, ser. iii. vol. iii. Paris, 1837.

Bird (Isabella L.), _Unbeaten Tracks in Japan_. 2 vols. London, 1880.

Birney (J. G.), _Letter to the Churches_ [on the subject of Slavery]. _S.l._, 1834.

---- _Second Letter_ [on the same subject]. _S.l._, [1834?].

{762} Bishop (J. P.), _Commentaries on the Criminal Law_. 2 vols. Boston, 1877.

Black (J. S.), 'Fasting'; in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, vol. ix. Edinburgh, 1879.

Blackstone (William), _The Commentaries on the Laws of England_. Adapted to the present State of the Law, by R. M. Kerr. 4 vols. London, 1876.

Blakey (Robert), _The Temporal Benefits of Christianity_. London, 1849.

Bledsoe (A. T.), _An Essay on Liberty and Slavery_. Philadelphia, 1857.

Block (Maurice), _Dictionnaire général de la politique_. 2 vols. Paris, 1873-74.

Blümner (Heinrich), _Ueber die Idee des Schicksals in den Tragödien des Aischylos_. Leipzig, 1814.

Blümner (Hugo), _The Home Life of the Ancient Greeks_. Trans. London, 1893.

Blumentritt (Ferd.), 'Der Ahnencultus und die religiösen Anschauungen der Malaien des Philippinen-Archipels'; in _Mittheilungen der kais. und kön. Geographischen Gesellschaft in Wien_, vol. xxv. Wien, 1882.

---- 'Die Sitten und Bräuche der alten Tagalen'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. xxv. Berlin, 1893.

---- _Versuch einer Ethnographie der Philippinen_. Gotha, 1882.

Blunt (_Lady_ Anne), _Bedouin Tribes of the Euphrates_. 2 vols. London, 1879.

Bluntschli (J. C.), _Le droit international codifié_. Trans. Paris, 1886.

Boas (Franz), 'The Central Eskimo'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vi., 1884-85. Washington, 1888.

---- 'First General Report on the Indians of British Columbia'; in _Fifth Report on the North-Western Tribes of Canada_. (Reprinted from the Report of the British Association for 1889.) London.

---- 'The Social Organization and the Secret Societies of the Kwakiutl Indians'; in _Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, 1895_. Washington, 1897.

Bock (Carl), _The Head-Hunters of Borneo_. London, 1881.

Bodenschatz (J. Chr. G.), _Kirchliche Verfassung der heutigen Juden_. 4 vols. Erlang, 1748-49.

Bodin (Jean), _De republica_. Ursellis, 1601.

Boeckh (A.), _Gesammelte kleine Schriften_. 7 vols. Leipzig, 1858-72.

Bogle (George), _Narrative of the Mission of, to Tibet, &c._ Ed. by C. R. Markham. London, 1876.

Bohnenberger (K.), _Der altindische Gott Varu[n.]a_. Tübingen, 1893.

Boissier (Gaston), _La religion romaine d'Auguste aux Antonins_. 2 vols. Paris, 1874.

Boller (H. A.), _Among the Indians_. Philadelphia, 1868.

Bonaventura (_Saint_), _Opera_. 13 vols. Venetiis, 1751-56.

Bonet (Honoré), _L'arbre des batailles_. Ed. by E. Nys. Bruxelles & Leipzig, 1883.

Bonfanti (M.), 'L'incivilimento dei negri nell' Africa intertropicale'; in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, vol. xv. Firenze, 1885.

Bonney (F.), 'On some Customs of the Aborigines of the River Darling'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xiii. London, 1884.

Bonwick (James), _Daily Life and Origin of the Tasmanians_. London, 1870.

Book of the Dead. Trans. by Sir P. le Page Renouf. (Reprinted from the _Proceed. Soc. Biblical Archæology_, vols. xiv.-xix.) London, 1892-97.

Book of the Ordre of Chyualry or Knyghthode (The). Trans. by W. Caxton. [Westminster, 1484?]

{763} Boone (W. J.), _An Essay, on the proper Rendering of the Words Elohim and [Greek: Theos] into the Chinese Language_. Canton, 1848.

Bory de St. Vincent (J. B. G. M.), _Essais sur les Isles Fortunées_. Paris, 1803.

Bose (Shib Chunder), _The Hindoos as they are_. London & Calcutta, 1881.

Bosman (William), _A New and Accurate Description of the Coast of Guinea_. Trans. London, 1721.

Bosquett (A.), _Treatise on Duelling_. London, _s.d._

Bossu (--), _Travels through that Part of North America formerly called Louisiana_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1771.

Boston Journal of Natural History. Boston.

Boston Review (The). Devoted to Theology and Literature. Boston.

Bouche (P.), _Sept ans en Afrique occidentale. La Côté des Esclaves et Le Dahomey_. Paris, 1885.

Boulainvilliers (_Count_ de), _Histoire de l'ancien gouvernement de la France_. 3 vols. La Haye & Amsterdam, 1727.

Bouquet (Martin) and others, _Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France_. 24 vols. Paris, 1738-1904.

Bourke (J. G.), 'The Medicine-Men of the Apache'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. ix. Washington, 1892.

---- _The Snake-Dance of the Moquis of Arizona_. London, 1884.

Bourquelot (Félix), 'Recherches sur les opinions et la legislation en matière de mort volontaire pendant le moyen âge'; in _Bibliothèque de l'École des Chartes_, vols. iii.-iv. Paris, 1841-43.

Bouvier (J.-B.), _Institutiones philosophicæ_. Parisiis, 1844.

Bove (Giacomo), _Patagonia. Terra del Fuoco. Mari Australi_. Genova, 1883.

Bowdich (T. E.), _Mission from Cape Coast Castle to Ashantee_. London, 1819.

Bowring (_Sir_ John), _The Kingdom and People of Siam_. 2 vols. London, 1857.

---- _A Visit to the Philippine Islands_. London, 1859.

Boyle (D.), 'On the Paganism of the Civilised Iroquois of Ontario'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxx. London, 1900.

Boyle (Fred.), _Adventures among the Dyaks of Borneo_. London, 1865.

Brace (C. Loring), _Gesta Christi_. London, 1890.

Bracton (Henricus de), _De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ_. Ed. by Sir Travers Twiss. 2 vols. London, 1878-79.

Bradbury (John), _Travels in the Interior of America, in the Years 1809-1811_. Liverpool, 1817.

Bradley (F. H.), _Ethical Studies_. London, 1876.

Bradley-Birt (F. B.), _Chota Nagpore_. London, 1903.

Brainne (Ch.), _La Nouvelle-Calédonie_. Paris, 1854.

Brandt (A. J. H. W.), _Die Mandäische Religion_. Leipzig, 1889.

---- _Mandäische Schriften übersetzt und erläutert_. Göttingen, 1893.

Brebeuf (Jean de), 'Relation de ce qui s'est passé dans le pays des Hurons, en l'année 1636'; in _Relations des Jésuites_, vol. i. Quebec, 1858.

Breeks (J. Wilkinson), _An Account of the Primitive Tribes of the N[=i]lagiris_. London, 1873.

Brehm (A. E.), _From North Pole to Equator_. Trans. London, 1896.

---- _Thierleben_. 10 vols. Leipzig, 1877-80.

Brenchley (J. L.), _Jottings during the Cruise of H.M.S. Curaçoa among the South Sea Islands in 1865_. London, 1873.

Brenner (J. von), _Besuch bei den Kannibalen Sumatras_. Würzburg, 1894.

Breton (W. H.), _Excursions in New South Wales, &c._ London, 1833.

{764} Brett (W. H.), _The Indian Tribes of Guiana_. London, 1868.

Brevard (Joseph), _An Alphabetical Digest of the Public Statute Law of South Carolina_. 3 vols. Charleston (S. C.), 1814.

Bridel (Louis), _Le droit des femmes et le mariage_. Paris, 1893.

Bridges (Thomas), [Letter referring to the Fuegians,] in _The South American Missionary Magazine_, vol. xiii. London, 1879.

---- 'Manners and Customs of the Firelanders'; in _A Voice for South America_, vol. xiii. London, 1866.

'Brihaspati,' trans. by J. Jolly; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxxiii. Oxford, 1889.

Brinton (D. G.), _American Hero-Myths_. Philadelphia, 1882.

---- _The Myths of the New World_. New York, 1868.

---- _Religions of Primitive Peoples_. New York & London, 1899.

Brissonius (B.), _De regio Persarum principatu_. Argentorati, 1710.

Britton, [On the Laws of England]. Ed. and trans. by F. M. Nichols. 2 vols. Oxford, 1865.

Brooke (Charles), _Ten Years in Saráwak_. 2 vols. London, 1866.

Brown (Thomas), _Lectures on the Philosophy of the Human Mind_. Edinburgh, 1834.

Browne (E. H.), _An Exposition of the Thirty-Nine Articles_. London, 1887.

Browne (_Sir_ Thomas), _Christian Morals_. Cambridge, 1716.

Bruce (James), _Travels to discover the Source of the Nile_. 8 vols. Edinburgh, 1805.

Brugsch (Heinrich), _Die Ægyptologie_. Leipzig, 1891.

---- _A History of Egypt under the Pharaohs_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1881.

---- _Im Lande der Sonne_. Berlin, 1886.

Brunner (Heinrich), _Deutsche Rechtsgeschichte_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1887-92.

---- _Forschungen zur Geschichte des deutschen und französischen Rechtes_. Stuttgart, 1894.

Bruns (C. G.), _Fontes juris romani antiqui_. Ed. by Th. Mommsen and O. Gradenwitz. Friburgi i. B. & Lipsiae, 1893.

Brunus (Conradus), _De Legationibus libri quinque_. Moguntiae, 1548.

Brussel (N.), _Nouvel examen de l'usage général des fiefs en France, pendant les onzième, douzième, treizième et quatorzième siècles_. 2 vols. Paris, 1750.

Bry (Theodor de), _Narrative of Le Moyne, an Artist who accompanied the French Expedition to Florida under Laudonnière, 1564_. Trans. Boston, 1875.

Bryce (James), _Studies in History and Jurisprudence_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1901.

Buch (M.), 'Die Wotjaken'; in _Acta Soc. Scientiarum Fennicæ_, vol. xii. Helsingfors, 1883.

Buchanan (James), _Sketches of the History, Manners, and Customs of the North American Indians_. London, 1824.

Buchner (Max), _Kamerun_. Leipzig, 1887.

Buckle (H. T.), _History of Civilization in England_. 3 vols. London, 1894.

---- _Miscellaneous and Posthumous Works_. 3 vols. London, 1872.

Bücher (Karl), _Die Entstehung der Volkswirtschaft_. Tübingen, 1904.

Bühler (J. G.), _Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie und Altertumskunde_. Ed. by J. G. B. Strassburg, 1896, &c.

Bulletins de la Société d'Anthropologie de Paris.

Bulmerincq (A.), _Das Asylrecht und die Auslieferung flüchtiger Verbrecher_. Dorpat, 1853.

{765}'Bundahis (The),' trans. by E. W. West; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. v. Oxford, 1880.

Bunsen (C. C. J.), _Analecta Ante-Nicæna_. 3 vols. London, 1854.

---- _Christianity and Mankind_. 7 vols. London, 1854.

---- _De jure hereditario Atheniensium_. Gottingae, 1813.

Buonafede (A.), _Istoria critica e filosofica del suicidio_. Venezia, 1788.

Burchell (W. J.), _Travels in the Interior of Southern Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1822-24.

Burckhardt (J. L.), _Arabic Proverbs_. London, 1830.

---- _Notes on the Bedouins and Wahábys_. London, 1830.

---- _Travels in Arabia_. 2 vols. London, 1829.

---- _Travels in Nubia_. London, 1822.

Buret (F.), _La syphilis aujourd'hui et chez les anciens_. Paris, 1890.

---- _Syphilis in the Middle Ages and in Modern Times_. Trans. Philadelphia, 1895.

Burns (Robert), 'The Kayans of the North-West of Borneo'; in _The Journal of the Indian Archipelago and Eastern Asia_, vol. iii. Singapore, 1849.

Burrows (Guy), _The Land of the Pigmies_. London, 1898.

Burton (R. F.), _Abeokuta and the Camaroons Mountains_. 2 vols. London, 1863.

---- _The Book of the Thousand Nights and a Night_. 10 vols. London, 1885-86. (Quoted in ch. xliii.)

---- The same work. 12 vols. London, 1894.

---- _The City of the Saints_. London, 1861.

---- _First Footsteps in East Africa_. London, 1856.

---- _The Highlands of the Brazil_. 2 vols. London, 1869.

---- _The Lake Regions of Central Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1860.

---- _A Mission to Gelele, King of Dahome_. 2 vols. London, 1864.

---- _Personal Narrative of a Pilgrimage to Al-Madinah & Meccah_. 2 vols. London, 1898.

---- _Sind Revisited_. 2 vols. London, 1877.

---- _Sindh_. London, 1851.

---- _Two Trips to Gorilla Land and the Cataracts of the Congo_. 2 vols. London, 1876.

---- _Wit and Wisdom from West Africa_. London, 1865.

---- _Zanzibar_. 2 vols. London, 1872.

---- and Drake (Ch. F. Tyrwhitt), _Unexplored Syria_. 2 vols. London, 1872.

Butler (John), _Travels and Adventures in the Province of Assam_. London, 1855.

Butler (Joseph), _The Analogy of Religion, Dissertations, and Sermons_. London, 1893.

Buxtorf (J.), _Synagoga Judaica_. Basileæ, 1680.

Bynkershoek (C. van), _Observationum Juris Romani libri quatuor_. Lugduni Batavorum, 1710.

---- _Quæstionum juris publici libri duo_. Lugduni Batavorum, 1737.

Caesar (C. J.), _Opera omnia_. 5 vols. London, 1819.

Caillié (Réné), _Travels through Central Africa to Timbuctoo_. 2 vols. London, 1830.

Caird (Edward), _The Evolution of Religion._ 2 vols. Glasgow, 1894.

{766} Caland (W.), _Die Altindischen Todten- und Bestattungsgebräuche_. Amsterdam, 1896.

Calcutta Review (The). Calcutta.

Caldwell (R.), _The Tinnevelly Shanars_. Madras, 1849.

Callaway (Henry), _The Religious System of the Amazulu_. Natal, 1868-70.

Calvert (A. F.), _The Aborigines of Western Australia_. London, 1894.

Calvin (J.), _Institutio Christianæ religionis_. 2 vols. Berolini, 1834-35.

Cameron (A. L. P.), 'Notes on some Tribes of New South Wales'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xiv. London, 1885.

Campbell (F. A.), _A Year in the New Hebrides, Loyalty Islands, and New Caledonia_. Geelong & Melbourne, [1873].

Campbell (John), _A Personal Narrative of Thirteen Years' Service amongst the Wild Tribes of Khondistan_. London, 1864.

Campbell (John), _Travels in South Africa_. London, 1815.

---- _Travels in South Africa, being a Narrative of a Second Journey in the Interior of that Country_. 2 vols. London, 1822.

Candelier (H.), _Rio-Hacha et les Indiens Goajires_. Paris, 1893.

Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent (The). Trans. by J. Waterworth. London, 1848.

'Canons enacted under King Edgar'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Cape Monthly Magazine (The). Cape Town.

'Capitularium Caroli Magni et Ludovici Pii libri VII.'; in Georgisch, _Corpus juris Germanici antiqui_. Halae Magdeburgicae, 1738.

Cardi (Le Comte C. N. de), 'Ju-ju Laws and Customs in the Niger Delta'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxix. London, 1899.

Carmichael (Alexander), _Carmina Gadelica_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1900.

Carpenter (Edward), _Intermediate Types among Primitive Folk_. London, 1914.

Carrington (F. A.) and Payne (J.), _Reports of Cases argued and ruled at Nisi Prius, in the Courts of King's Bench, Common Pleas, & Exchequer_. 9 vols. London, 1825-41.

Caruthers (R. L.) and Nicholson (A. O. P.), _A Compilation of the Statutes of Tennessee_. Nashville (Tenn.), 1836.

Carver (J.), _Travels through the Interior Parts of North America_. London, 1781.

Casalis (E.), _The Basutos_. London, 1861.

Casati (G.), _Ten Years in Equatoria_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1891.

Castelnau (F. de), _Expédition dans les parties centrales de l'Amérique du Sud_. 7 vols. Paris, 1850-59.

Castrén (M. A.), _Nordiska resor och forskningar_. 5 vols. Helsingfors, 1852-58.

Catechism of the Council of Trent (The). Trans. by Th. A. Buckley. London, 1852.

Catlin (George), _Illustrations of the Manners, Customs, and Condition of the North American Indians_. 2 vols. London, 1876.

Catullus (C. V.), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. Londini, 1822.

Cauvet (J.), 'De l'organisation de la famille à Athènes'; in _Revue de legislation et de jurisprudence_, vol. xxiv. Paris, 1845.

Celtic Magazine (The). Inverness.

Certeux (A.) and Carnoy (E. H.), _L'Algérie traditionnelle_. Paris & Alger, 1884.

{767} Chaikin (A.), _Apologie des Juifs_. Paris, 1887.

Chalmers (--), 'Cruelty to Animals'; in _The Methodist Magazine_, vol. ix. New York, 1826.

Chalmers (James), _Pioneer Life and Work in New Guinea 1877-1894_. London, 1895.

---- _Pioneering in New Guinea_. London, 1887.

---- and Gill (W. W.), _Work and Adventure in New Guinea_. London, 1885.

Chalmers (John), 'Chinese Natural Theology'; in _The China Review_, vol. v. Hongkong, 1876-77.

Chamberlain (A. F.), _The Child and Childhood in Folk-Thought_. New York, 1896.

Chamberlain (B. H.), _Things Japanese_. London, 1902.

Chambers (R.), _The Book of Days_. 2 vols. London & Edinburgh, [1862-64].

Chambers's Edinburgh Journal. Edinburgh & London.

Chanler (W. A.), _Through Jungle and Desert_. London & New York, 1896.

Chapelain (J.), _De la lecture des vieux romans_. Ed. by A. Feillet. Paris, 1870.

Chapman (J.), _Travels in the Interior of South Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1868.

Charlemagne, _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. xcvii.-xcviii.) Parisiis, 1851.

Charles V. (_Emperor_), _Die Peinliche Gerichtsordnung_. Ed. by H. Zoepfl. Heidelberg, 1842.

Charlevoix (P. F. X. de), _The History of Paraguay_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1769.

---- _A Voyage to North-America_. Trans. 2 vols. Dublin, 1766.

Chasseb[oe]uf de Volney (C. F.), _Travels through Syria and Egypt, in the Years 1783-1785_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1788.

Chauveau (A.) and Helie (F.), _Théorie du Code pénal_. 8 vols. Paris, 1852.

Chavanne (J.), _Die Sahara_. Wien, &c., 1879.

Cherry (R. R.), _Lectures on the Growth of Criminal Law in Ancient Communities_. London, 1890.

Chevalier (J.), _L'inversion sexuelle_. Lyon & Paris, 1893.

Chevers (Norman), _A Manual of Medical Jurisprudence for India_. Calcutta, 1870.

Cheyne (T. K.) and Black (J. S.), _Encyclopædia Biblica_. 4 vols. London, 1899-1903.

Childers (R. C.), _A Dictionary of the Pali Language_. London, 1875.

China Review (The). Hongkong.

Chinese Repository (The). Canton.

Chitty (Joseph), _A Treatise on the Laws of Commerce and Manufactures_. 4 vols. London, 1820-24.

Chlotar II. (_King_), 'Edictum de Synodo Parisiensi'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. lxxx. Paris, 1850.

Christian (F. W.), _The Caroline Islands_. London, 1899.

Christian Review (The). Rochester (N.Y.).

Chrysostom (_Saint_ J.), _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. xlvii.-lxiv.) Parisiis, 1858-60.

'Chung Yung'; in Legge, _The Chinese Classics_, vol. i. Oxford, 1893.

Church Missionary Intelligencer (The). London.

Churchill (Ch. H.), _Mount Lebanon_. 3 vols. London, 1853.

Chwolsohn (D.), _Die Ssabier und der Ssabismus_. 2 vols. St. Petersburg, 1856.

Cibrario (Luigi), _Delia economia politica del media eve_. 2 vols. Torino, 1861.

---- _Della schiavitù e del servaggio_. 2 vols. Milano, 1868.

{768} Cicero (M. Tullius), _Opera_. 17 vols. Londini, 1830.

Cieza de Leon (P. de), 'La Crónica del Perú [parte primera]'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol. xxvi. Madrid, 1853.

---- _Segunda parte de la Crónica del Perú_. Madrid, 1880.

Clark (C.) and Finnelly (W.), _Reports of Cases decided in the House of Lords, on Appeals and Writs of Error_. London, 1835-47.

Clark (E. C.), _An Analysis of Criminal Liability_. Cambridge, 1880.

Clarke (R. F.), 'On Cruelty to Animals in its Moral Aspect'; in _The Month and Catholic Review_, vol. xxv. London, 1875.

Clarke (Samuel), _A Discourse concerning the Being and Attributes of God, the Obligations of Natural Religion, and the Truth and Certainty of the Christian Revelation_. London, 1738.

Clarkson (Thomas), _An Essay on the Slavery and Commerce of the Human Species_. London, 1788.

Clarus (Julius), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. Genevae, 1739.

Clavigero (F. S.), _The History of Mexico_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1807.

Clay (C. C.), _A Digest of the Laws of the State of Alabama_. Tuskaloosa, 1843.

Clay (W. Lowe), _The Prison Chaplain_. Cambridge, 1861.

Cleffelius (J. Chr.), _Antiquitates Germanorum potissimum septentrionalium_. Francofurti & Lipsiae, 1733.

Clement of Alexandria, _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. viii.-ix.) Parisiis, 1857.

Clement I. of Rome (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. i.-ii.) Parisiis, 1857.

Cleveland (A. R.), _Woman under the English Law_. London, 1896.

Clifford (W. K.), _Lectures and Essays_. Ed. by Leslie Stephen and Frederick Pollock. London, 1886.

Clodd (Edward), _Tom Tit Tot_. London, 1898.

Cnut (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Cobb (Th. R. R.), _An Inquiry into the Law of Negro Slavery in the United States of America_. Philadelphia & Savannah, 1858.

Cobbe (Frances P.), _The Modern Rack. Papers on Vivisection_. London, 1889.

Cochin (A.), _L'abolition de l'esclavage_. 2 vols. Paris, 1861.

Code Civil. Ed. by G. Griolet and Ch. Vergé. Paris, 1907.

Code Napoléon. Paris, 1853.

Code Noir (Le). Paris, 1767.

Code of Virginia (The). 2 vols. Richmond, 1849.

Code Pénal. 2 vols. Paris, 1810.

Codex Justinianus. See Justinian.

Codex Theodosianus. Ed. by G. Haenel. Bonnae, 1842.

Codice Penale per il Regno d'Italia (II). Ed. by G. Crivellari. Torino, 1889.

Codigo Penal dos Estados Unidos do Brazil. Ed. by M. G. d Alencastro Autran. Rio de Janeiro, 1892.

Código Penal reformado. Madrid, 1870.

Codrington (R. H.), _The Melanesians_. Oxford, 1891.

Cohn (L.), _Zur Lehre vom versuchten und unvollendeten Verbrechen_. Breslau, 1880.

Coke (Edward), _The Third Part of the Institutes of the Laws of England_. London, 1680.

Cole (H.), 'Notes on the Wagogo of German East Africa'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxii. London, 1902.

{769} Colebrooke (T. E.), _Miscellaneous Essays_. 3 vols. London, 1873.

Colenso (William), _On the Maori Races of New Zealand_. _S. l._, [1865].

Collins (David), _An Account of the English Colony in New South Wales_. 2 vols. London, 1798-1802.

Colquhoun (A. R.), _Amongst the Shans_. London, 1885.

Compayré (G.), _L'évolution intellectuelle et morale de l'enfant_. Paris, 1893.

Comte (Auguste), _Cours de philosophie positive_. 6 vols. Paris, 1830-42.

Conférence de Bruxelles. La Haye, 1890.

Conférence internationale de la paix. La Haye 18 Mai-29 Juillet 1899. 4 parts. La Haye, 1899.

Confession of Faith (The), together with The Larger and Shorter Catechisms, composed by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster. London, 1717.

Connolly (R. M.), 'Social Life in Fanti-land'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxvi. London, 1897.

Constant (Benjamin), _De la religion_. 6 vols. Paris, 1824-32.

'Constitutiones Apostolicae'; in Bunsen, _Christianity and Mankind_, vol. vi. London, 1854.

Constitutiones Neapolitanæ sive Siculæ. See Frederick II.

Contemporary Review (The). London.

Convention signed at Geneva, August 22, 1864, for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded in Armies in the Field. (Appendix No. VI. in Lorimer, _The Institutes of the Law of Nations_, vol. ii.) Edinburgh, 1884.

Cook (F. C.), _The Holy Bible_, ed. by F. C. C. 10 vols. London, 1871-81.

Cook (James), _A Journal of a Voyage round the World . . . in the Years 1768-71_. London, 1771.

---- _A Voyage to the Pacific Ocean . . . in the Years 1776-80_. 3 vols. London, 1875.

Cooke (G. Wingrove), _China_. London, 1858.

Cooper (T. T.), _The Mishmee Hills_. London, 1873.

Coquilhat (C.), _Sur le Haut-Congo_. Paris, 1888.

Coreal (F.), _Voyages aux Indes Occidentales_. Trans. 3 vols. Amsterdam, 1722.

Cosmos. Ed. by G. Cora. Torino.

Coudreau (H. A.), _La France équinoxiale_. 2 vols. Paris, 1887.

Couto de Magalhães (J. V.), _Trabalho preparatorio para aproveitamento do selvagem e do solo por elle occupado no Brazil. O selvagem_. Rio de Janeiro, 1876.

Couty (Louis), _L'esclavage au Brésil_. Paris, 1881.

Covarruvias a Leyva (D. de), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. Antverpiæ, 1638.

Coxe (William), _Account of the Russian Discoveries between Asia and America_. London, 1804.

Cranz (David), _The History of Greenland_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1820.

Crawfurd (John), _History of the Indian Archipelago_. 3 vols. Edinburgh, 1820.

Crawley (Ernest), _The Mystic Rose_. London, 1902.

Crell (J.), _Ethica Christiana_. Selenoburgi, [1663?].

Cremony (J. C.), _Life among the Apaches_. San Francisco, 1868.

Crooke (W.), _The North-Western Provinces of India_. London, 1897.

---- _The Popular Religion and Folk-Lore of Northern India_. 2 vols. Westminster, 1896.

---- _Things Indian_. London, 1906.

---- _The Tribes and Castes of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh_. 4 vols. Calcutta, 1896.

{770} Crowther (S.) and Taylor (J. C.), _The Gospel on the Banks of the Niger_. London, 1859.

Crozals (J. de), _Histoire de la civilisation_. 2 vols. Paris, 1887.

Crozet (--), _Voyage to Tasmania, &c. in the Years 1771-2_. Trans. London, 1891.

'Cruelty to Animals in Naples'; in _The Saturday Review_, vol. lix. London, 1885.

Cruickshank (B.), _Eighteen Years on the Gold Coast of Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1853.

Cumming (C. F. Gordon), _In the Himalayas and on the Indian Plains_. London, 1884.

Cunningham (J. F.), _Uganda and its Peoples_. London, 1905.

Cunow (H.), _Die Verwandtschafts-Organisationen der Australneger_. Stuttgart, 1894.

Curr (E. M.), _The Australian Race_. 4 vols. Melbourne & London, 1886-87.

---- _Recollections of Squatting in Victoria_. Melbourne, &c., 1883.

Curtiss (S. I.), _Primitive Semitic Religion To-day_. London, 1902.

Curtius Rufus (Quintus), _De gestis Alexandri Magni_. Ed. by E. Foss. Lipsiae, 1862.

Cusack (M. F.), _A History of the Irish Nation_. London, 1876.

Cyprian (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. iv.) Parisiis 1844.

'Dâdistân-î Dînîk (The),' trans. by E. W. West; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xviii. Oxford, 1882.

Dahn (Felix), _Bausteine_. Berlin, 1879, &c.

Dalager (Lars), _Grønlandske Relationer_. Kiøbenhavn, _s.d._

Dale (G.), 'An Account of the Principal Customs and Habits of the Natives inhabiting the Bondei Country'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxv. London, 1896.

Dall (W. H.), _Alaska and its Resources_. London, 1870.

Dalton (E. T.), _Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal_. Calcutta, 1872.

Damhouder (J. de), _Praxis rerum criminalium_. Antverpiæ, 1570.

Dandini (J.), 'A Voyage to Mount Libanus'; in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, vol. x. London, 1811.

Dapper (O.), _Africa_. Trans. London, 1670.

Dareste (R.), _Études d'histoire du droit_. Paris, 1889.

---- _Nouvelles Études d'histoire du droit_. Paris, 1902.

Dargun (L.), _Mutterrecht und Vaterrecht_. Leipzig, 1892.

---- 'Ursprung und Entwicklungs-Geschichte des Eigenthums'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. v. Stuttgart, 1884.

Darmesteter (James), _Essais orientaux_. Paris, 1883.

---- 'Introduction to the Vendîdâd'; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. iv. Oxford, 1880.

---- _Ormazd et Ahriman_. Paris, 1877.

Darwin (Charles), 'Biographical Sketch of an Infant'; in _Mind_, vol. ii. London, 1877.

---- _The Descent of Man_. London, 1890.

---- _Journal of Researches into the Geology and Natural History of the Various Countries visited by H.M.S. Beagle_. London, 1839.

Daumas (E.), _La vie arabe et la société musulmane_. Paris, 1869.

{771} Dautremer (J.), 'The Vendetta or Legal Revenge in Japan'; in _Trans. Asiatic Soc. Japan_, vol. xiii. Yokohama, 1885.

Davids (T. W. Rhys), _Hibbert Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion as illustrated by some Points in the History of Indian Buddhism_. London, 1881.

Davis (_Sir_ John Francis), _China_. 2 vols. London, 1857.

Davis (W. W. H.), _El Gringo_. New York, 1857.

Dawson (James), _Australian Aborigines_. Melbourne, &c., 1881.

Decle (Lionel), _Three Years in Savage Africa_. London, 1898.

Decrusy (--) and others, _Recueil général des Anciennes Lois Françaises_. 29 vols. Paris, 1822-33.

Delécluze (E. J.), _Roland ou la Chevalerie_. 2 vols. Paris, 1845.

Delepierre (J. O.), _L'enfer décrit par ceux qui l'ont vu_. 2 pts. London [1864-65].

Delitzsch (Friedrich), _Wo lag das Paradies?_ Leipzig, 1881.

Demangeat (Charles), _Histoire de la condition civile des étrangers en France dans l'ancien et dans le nouveau droit_. Paris, 1844.

Demidoff (E.), _A Shooting Trip to Kamchatka_. London, 1904.

Demosthenes, _Opera_. Ed. by J. T. V[oe]melius. Parisiis, 1843.

Denham (Dixon) and Clapperton (Hugh), _Narrative of Travels and Discoveries in Northern and Central Africa_. London, 1826.

Denis (J.), _Histoire des théories et des idées morales dans l'antiquité._ 2 vols. Paris, 1856.

Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Wien.

Dennett (R. E.), 'Laws and Customs of the Fjort or Bavili Family'; in _Jour. African Soc._ vol. i. London, 1902.

---- _Notes on the Folklore of the Fjort (French Congo)_. London, 1898.

Dennys (N. B.), _The Folk-Lore of China_. London, 1876.

Descartes (René), _Meditationes de prima philosophia_. Amstelodami, 1678.

Deschamps (É.), _Carnet d'un voyageur--Au pays des Veddas_. Paris 1892.

Desmaze (Charles), _Les pénalités anciennes_. Paris, 1866.

Dessoir (Max), 'Zur Psychologie der Vita sexualis'; in _Allgemeine Zeitschrift für Psychiatrie und psychisch-gerichtliche Medicin_, vol. l. Berlin 1893-94.

Deutsch (E.), 'Islam'; in _The Quarterly Review_, vol. cxxvii. London, 1869.

---- _Literary Remains._ London, 1874.

Deutsche Rundschau für Geographie und Statistik. Wien, &c.

Dewey (John), _The Study of Ethics_. Ann Arbor (Mich.), 1897.

Dhammapada (The). Trans. by F. Max Müller. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. x.) Oxford, 1898.

Diaz del Castillo (Bernal), 'Verdadera historia de los sucesos de la conquista de la Nueva-España'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol. xxvi. Madrid, 1853.

Dickinson (G. Lowes), _The Greek View of Life_. London, 1896.

Diderot (Denis), _[OE]uvres_. 7 vols. Paris, 1818-19.

Dieffenbach (E.), _Travels in New Zealand_. 2 vols. London, 1843.

Diels (Hermann), 'Ein orphischer Demeterhymnus'; in _Festschrift Theodor Gomperz dargebracht_. Wien, 1902.

Digby (K. H.), _Mores Catholici_. 3 vols. London, 1845-47.

Digesta. See Justinian.

{772}'Dimetian Code (The)'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales_. London, 1841.

Dimitroff (Z.), _Die Geringschätzung des menschlichen Lebens und ihre Ursachen bei den Naturvölkern_. Leipzig-Reudnitz, 1891.

'Dînâ-î Maînôg-î Khirad,' trans. by E. W. West; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxiv. Oxford, 1885.

Dio Cassius, _Historia Romana_. 4 vols. Lipsiae, 1863-64.

Dio Chrysostom, _Opera Græca_. 2 vols. Brunsvigae, 1844.

Diodorus Siculus, _Bibliotheca historica_. Ed. by C. Müllerus. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1842-44.

Diogenes Laertius, _De clarorum philosophorum vitis libri decem_. Ed. by C. G. Cobet. Parisiis, 1850.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus, _Antiquitatum Romanarum quæ supersunt_. Parisiis, 1886.

Dirksen (H. E.), _Civilistische Abhandlungen_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1820.

Dithmar of Merseburg, 'Chronicon'; in Pertz, _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_, vol. v. Hannoverae, 1839.

Dixon (W. H.), _New America_. Eighth edit. London, _s.d._

Dobell (Peter), _Travels in Kamtschatka and Siberia_. 2 vols. London, 1830.

Dobrizhoffer (M.), _An Account of the Abipones_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1822.

Dodge (R. Irving), _Our Wild Indians_. Hartford, 1882.

Döllinger (J. J. I.), _The Gentile and the Jew in the Courts of the Temple of Christ_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1862.

Domenech (E.), _Seven Years' Residence in the Great Deserts of North America_. 2 vols. London, 1860.

Donaldson (James), 'On the Expiatory and Substitutionary Sacrifices of the Greeks'; in _Trans. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, vol. xxvii. Edinburgh, 1876.

---- 'The Position of Women among the Early Christians'; in _The Contemporary Review_, vol. lvi. London, 1889.

Donne (John), _Biathanatos_. London, 1648.

Doolittle (J.), _Social Life of the Chinese_. 2 vols. New York, 1867.

Dorman (R. M.), _The Origin of Primitive Superstitions_. Philadelphia, 1881.

Dorner (I. A.), _A System of Christian Doctrine_. Trans. 4 vols. Edinburgh, 1880-82.

Dorsey (J. Owen), 'Mourning and War Customs of the Kansas'; in _The American Naturalist_, vol. xix. Philadelphia, 1885.

---- 'Omaha Sociology'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. iii. Washington, 1884.

---- 'Siouan Folk-Lore'; in _The American Antiquarian_, vol. vii. Chicago, 1885.

---- 'Siouan Sociology'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xv. Washington, 1897.

---- 'A Study of Siouan Cults'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xi. Washington, 1894.

Doughty (C. M.), _Travels in Arabia Deserta_. 2 vols. Cambridge, 1888.

Douglas (R. K.), _Confucianism and Taouism_. London, 1889.

---- _Society in China_. London, 1894.

Dove (T.), 'Moral and Social Characteristics of the Aborigines of Tasmania'; in _The Tasmanian Journal of Natural Science, &c._ vol. i. Hobart Town, 1842.

Dreyer (I. C. H.), _Specimen juris publici Lubecensis_. Lubecae, 1761.

{773} Driver (S. R.), _A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy_. Edinburgh, 1895.

Drury (Rob.), _Journal during Fifteen Years' Captivity on the Island of Madagascar_. London, 1890.

Dublin Review (The). London.

Dubois (Félix), _Timbuctoo_. Trans. London, 1897.

Dubois (J. A.), _Description of the Character, Manners, and Customs of the People of India_. Trans. London, 1817.

Du Boys (Albert), _Histoire du droit criminel de l'Espagne_. Paris, 1870.

---- _Histoire du droit criminel des peuples modernes_. 3 vols. Paris, 1854-60.

Du Cange (C. Dufresne), 'Dissertations ou Réflexions sur l'histoire de S. Louys, du Sire de Joinville'; in Petitot, _Collection des Mémoires relatifs à l'histoire de France_, vol. iii. Paris, 1824.

---- _Glossarium ad scriptores mediæ et infimæ Latinitatis_. 6 vols. Parisiis, 1733-36.

Du Chaillu (P. B.), _Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa_. London, 1861.

---- _A Journey to Ashango-Land_. London, 1867.

Duchesne (L.), _Christian Worship_. Trans. London, 1904.

Düben (G. von), _Om Lappland och Lapparne_. Stockholm, 1873.

Dümmler (Ernst), _Geschichte des Ostfränkischen Reichs_. 3 vols. Berlin, Leipzig, 1862-88.

Dufour (Pierre), _Histoire de la Prostitution_. 6 vols. Bruxelles, 1851-54.

Dumont (J.), _Corps universal diplomatique du droit des gens_. 8 vols. Amsterdam, 1726-31.

Dumont d'Urville (J. S. C.), _Voyage pittoresque autour du monde_. 2 vols. Paris, 1834-35.

Du-Moulin (Lewis), _Moral Reflections upon the Number of the Elect_. London, 1680.

Dunbar (J. B.), 'The Pawnee Indians'; in _The Magazine of American History_, vols. iv., v., viii. New York & Chicago, 1880, 1882.

Dunham (S. A.), _A History of the Germanic Empire_. 3 vols. London, 1834-35.

Durkheim (Émile), _De la division du travail social_. Paris, 1893.

---- 'Deux lois de l'évolution pénale; in _L'année sociologique_, vol. iv., 1899-1900. Paris, 1901.

---- _Les formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse_. Paris, 1912.

---- 'La prohibition de l'inceste et ses origines'; in _L'année sociologique_, vol. i., 1896-97. Paris, 1898.

---- _Le suicide_. Paris, 1897.

Du Tertre (J. B.), _Histoire générale des Antilles_. 4 vols. Paris, 1667-71.

Duveyrier (Henri), _Exploration du Sahara_. Paris, 1864.

Dyer (T. F. Thiselton), _The Ghost World_. London, 1893.

Dymond (J.), _Essays on the Principles of Morality_. London, 1851.

Earl (G. W.), _Papuans_. London, 1853.

Eastman (Mary), _Dacotah_. New York, 1849.

Eclectic Magazine of Foreign Literature, Science, and Art (The). New York.

Edda Snorra Sturlusonar. See Snorri Sturluson.

Eden (_Sir_ F. M.), _The State of the Poor; or, an History of the Labouring Classes in England_. 3 vols. London, 1797.

Edinburgh Review (The). London.

{774} Edkins (J.), _Religion in China_. London, 1878.

Edmund (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Edward the Confessor (_King_), 'Leges'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Edwards (Bryan), _The History of the British West Indies_. 5 vols. London, 1819.

Edwards (Jonathan), _Works_. 8 vols. London, 1817.

Egede (Hans), _A Description of Greenland_. Trans. London, 1845.

Eicken (H. von), _Geschichte und System der mittelalterlichen Weltanschauung_. Stuttgart, 1887.

Ellinger (G.), _Das Verhältniss der öffentlichen Meinung zu Wahrheit und Lüge im 10. 11. und 12. Jahrhundert_. Sondershausen, 1884.

Elliot (_Sir_ Henry M.), _Memoirs on the History, Folk-Lore, and Distribution of the Races of the North Western Provinces of India_. 2 vols. London, 1869.

Elliot (_Sir_ W.), 'On the Characteristics of the Population of Central and Southern India'; in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, new ser. vol. i. London, 1869.

Elliott (Henry W.), _Our Arctic Province Alaska and the Seal Islands_. New York, 1886.

---- 'Report on the Seal Islands of Alaska'; in _Tenth Census of the United States_. Washington, 1884.

Ellis (A. B.), _The E[(w]e-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa_. London, 1890.

---- _The Land of Fetish_. London, 1883.

---- _The Tshi-speaking Peoples of the Gold Coast of West Africa_. London 1887.

---- _The Yoruba-speaking Peoples of the Slave Coast of West Africa_. London 1894.

Ellis (Havelock), _The Criminal_. London, 1895.

---- _Man and Woman_. London, 1904.

---- _Studies in the Psychology of Sex_. 5 vols. Philadelphia, 1901-06. (The third edition of vol. i., 'Sexual Inversion,' published in 1915, referred to in the Additional Notes.)

---- _Ursprung und Entwicklung der Prostitution._ (Reprinted from _Mutterschutz_, vol. iii.) _S. l. & d._

---- and Symonds (J. A.), _Das konträre Geschlechtsgefühl_. Trans. Leipzig, 1896.

Ellis (W. Gilmore), 'The Amok of the Malays'; in _The Journal of Mental Science_, vol. xxxix. London, 1893.

Ellis (William), _History of Madagascar_. 2 vols. London, 1838.

---- _Narrative of a Tour through Hawaii_. London, 1827.

---- _Polynesian Researches_. 2 vols. London, 1829.

---- The same work. 4 vols. London, 1859. (This edition referred to, if not indicated otherwise.)

Elphinstone (Mountstuart), _An Account of the Kingdom of Caubul_. 2 vols. London, 1839.

---- _The History of India_. 2 vols. London, 1843.

---- The same work. Ed. by E. B. Cowell. London, 1866.

Elton (Ch. I.), _Origins of English History_. London, 1890.

Elton (F.), 'Notes on Natives of the Solomon Islands'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xvii. London, 1888.

{775}_Emin Pasha in Central Africa_. Trans. London, 1888.

Emmons (Nathanael), _Works_. Ed. by J. Ide. 6 vols. Boston, 1842.

Encyclopædia Britannica. Ninth edition. Edinburgh, 1875, &c.

Encyclopédie Méthodique. 167 vols. Paris, 1782-1832.

Epictetus, _Dissertationum libri IV, Enchiridion et Fragmenta_. 5 vols. Lipsiae, 1799-1800.

Erasmus (Desiderius), _Adagiorum chiliades quatuor_. Coloniae Allobrogum, 1612.

Erman (Adolf), _A Handbook of Egyptian Religion_. Trans. London, 1907.

---- _Life in Ancient Egypt_. Trans. London, 1894.

Erman (G. A.), _Reise um die Erde_. 3 vols. Berlin, 1833-48.

Erskine (J. E.), _Journal of a Cruise among the Islands of the Western Pacific_. London, 1853.

Erskine of Carnock (John), _Principles of the Law of Scotland_. Ed. by J. Rankine. Edinburgh, 1890.

Escayrac de Lauture (--d'), _Die afrikanische Wüste_. Trans. Leipzig, 1867.

Eschwege (L. W. von), _Brasilien_. 2 vols. Braunschweig, 1830.

Esmein (A.), _Cours élémentaire d'histoire du droit français_. Paris, 1898.

---- _Histoire de la procédure criminelle en France_. Paris, 1882.

Esquirol (E.), _Des maladies mentales_. 2 vols. Paris, 1838.

Ethelred (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Euripides, _Fabulæ_. Ed. by T. Fix. Parisiis, 1843.

---- _Fragmenta_. Ed. by F. G. Wagner. Parisiis, 1846.

Eusebius, _Opera_. 6 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. xix-xxiv.) Parisiis, 1857.

Evans (E. P.), 'Ethical Relations between Man and Beast'; in _The Popular Science Monthly_, vol. xlv. New York, 1894.

Ewald (G. H. A. von), _The Antiquities of Israel_. Trans. London, 1876.

Ewers (J. Ph. G.), _Das älteste Recht der Russen_. Dorpat & Hamburg, 1826.

Eyre (E. J.), _Journals of Expeditions of Discovery into Central Australia_. 2 vols. London, 1845.

Faber (Ernst), _A Systematical Digest of the Doctrines of Confucius_. Hongkong, 1875.

Fabrice (H. von), _Die Lehre von der Kindsabtreibung und vom Kindsmord_. Erlangen, 1868.

Falkner (Thomas), _A Description of Patagonia_. Hereford, 1774.

Farnell (L. R.), _The Cults of the Greek States_. Oxford, 1896, &c. _In progress_.

---- 'Sociological Hypotheses concerning the Position of Women in Ancient Religion'; in _Archiv für Religionswissenschaft_, vol. vii. Leipzig, 1904.

Farrar (F. W.), _Mercy and Judgment_. London, 1881.

Farrer (J. A.), _Military Manners and Customs_. London, 1885.

---- _Paganism and Christianity_. London & Edinburgh, 1891.

---- _Primitive Manners and Customs_, London, 1879.

Favyn (André), _The Theater of Honour and Knight-Hood_. Trans. London, 1623.

Fawcett (F.), 'The Nâyars of Malabar'; in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, vol. iii. Madras, 1901.

---- _On the Saoras_. (Reprinted from _The Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay_, vol. i.) Bombay, 1888.

{776} Featherman (A.), _Social History of the Races of Mankind_. 7 vols. London, 1881-91.

Felkin (R. W.), 'Notes on the For Tribe of Central Africa'; in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, vol. xiii. Edinburgh, 1886.

---- 'Notes on the Madi or Moru Tribe of Central Africa'; in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, vol. xii. Edinburgh, 1884.

---- 'Notes on the Waganda Tribe of Central Africa'; in _Proceed. Roy. Soc. Edinburgh_, vol. xiii. Edinburgh, 1886.

Ferrero (G.), 'Les formes primitives du travail'; in _Revue scientifique_, ser. iv. vol. v. Paris, 1896.

Ferri (Enrico), _Criminal Sociology_. London, 1895.

Festus (S. Pompejus), _De verborum significatione quæ supersunt_. Ed. by C. O. Muellerus. Lipsiae, 1839.

Feuerbach (P. J. A. von), _Aktenmässige Darstellung merkwürdiger Verbrechen_. 2 vols. Giessen, 1828-29.

---- _Caspar Hauser_. Trans. London, 1834.

---- _Kritik des Kleinschrodischen Entwurfs zu einem peinlichen Gesetzbuche für die Chur-Pfalz-Bayrischen Staaten_. 2 vols. Giesen, 1804.

---- _Lehrbuch des gemeinen in Deutschland gültigen Peinlichen Rechts_. Ed. by C. J. A. Mittermaier. Giessen, 1847.

---- _Ueber die Strafe als Sicherungsmittel vor künftigen Beleidigungen des Verbrechers_. Chemnitz, 1800.

---- _Ueber die Unterdrückung und Wiederbefreiung Europens_. [München & Leipzig], 1813.

Feyfer (D. de), _Verhandeling over den Kindermoord_. Utrecht, 1866.

Fichte (J. G.), _Reden an die deutsche Nation_. Leipzig, 1824.

---- _The Science of Ethics_. Trans. London, 1897.

---- _Das System der Sittenlehre_. Jena & Leipzig, 1798.

---- _Ueber den Begriff des wahrhaften Krieges in Bezug auf den Krieg im Jahre 1813_. Tübingen, 1815.

Fielding Hall (H.), _The Soul of a People_. London, 1902.

Filangieri (Gaetano), _La scienza della legislazione_. 6 vols. Milano, 1822.

Finck (H. T.), _Primitive Love and Love-Stories_. New York, 1899.

Finger (A.), _Compendium des Oesterreichischen Rechtes--Das Strafrecht_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1894-95.

Finsch (Otto), _Neu-Guinea_. Bremen, 1865.

Fischer (Chr. A.), _Bergreisen_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1804-05.

Fischer (J.), 'Notes sur l'intelligence des singes'; in _Revue scientifique_, vol. xxxiii. (ser. iii. vol. vii.). Paris, 1884.

Fisher (_Captain_), 'Memoir of Sylhet, Kachar, &c.'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. ix. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1840.

Fiske (John), _Outlines of Cosmic Philosophy_. 2 vols. London, 1874.

Fison (L.) and Howitt (A. W.), _Kamilaroi and Kurnai_. Melbourne & Sydney, 1880.

Flacourt (É. de), _Histoire de la grande isle Madagascar_. Paris, 1661.

Fleming (William), _A Manual of Moral Philosophy_. London, 1867.

Fleta, seu Commentarius Juris Anglicani. London, 1735.

Fleury (C.), _An Historical Account of the Manners and Behaviour of the Christians_. Trans. London, 1698.

Flügel (G.), _Mani_. Leipzig, 1862.

Folk-Lore. London.

Folk-Lore Journal (The). London,

{777}_Folk-Lore Record (The)_. London.

Fonseca (L. A. da), _A escravidão, o clero e o abolicionismo_. Bahia, 1887.

Forbes (Anna), _Insulinde_. Edinburgh & London, 1887.

Forbes (C. J. F. S.), _British Burma and its People_. London, 1878.

Forbes (David), 'On the Aymara Indians of Bolivia and Peru'; in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, new ser. vol. ii. London, 1870.

Forbes (F. E.), _Dahomey and the Dahomans_. 2 vols. London, 1851.

Forbes (H. O.), _A Naturalist's Wanderings in the Eastern Archipelago_. London, 1885.

Foreman (John), _The Philippine Islands_. London, 1890.

Fornander (Abraham), _An Account of the Polynesian Race_. 3 vols. London, 1878-85.

Forsman (J.), _Bidrag till läran om skadestånd i brottmål enligt finsk räit_. Helsingfors, 1893.

Forster (G.), _A Voyage round the World_. 2 vols. London, 1777.

Forsyth (J.), _The Highlands of Central India_. London, 1871.

Fortnightly Review (The). London.

Foster (Michael), _A Report of . . . Crown Cases_. London, 1776.

Foucart (P.), _Des associations religieuses chez les Grecs_. Paris, 1873.

Fountain (P.) and Ward (Thomas), _Rambles of an Australian Naturalist_. London, 1907.

Fowler (Thomas), _Progressive Morality_. London, 1895.

---- See Wilson (J. M.) and Fowler.

Fowler (W. Warde), _The Roman Festivals of the Period of the Republic_. London, 1899.

Franciscus a Victoria, _Relectiones Theologicæ_. Lugduni, 1587.

Franois (H. von), _Nama und Damara Deutsch-Süd-West-Afrika_. Magdeburg, [1896].

Frank (J. P.), _System einer vollständigen medicinischen Polizey_. 9 vols. Mannheim, &c., 1784-1827.

Frankel (Z.), _Grundlinien des mosaisch-talmudischen Eherechts_. Leipzig, 1860.

Franklin (B.), _Works_. Ed. by J. Sparks. 10 vols. Boston, 1836-40.

Franklin (John), _Narrative of a Journey to the Shores of the Polar Sea_. London, 1823.

Fraser (J. B.), _Journal of a Tour through Part of the Snowy Range of the Him[=a]l[=a] Mountains_. London, 1820.

Fraser (John), _The Aborigines of New South Wales_. Sydney, 1892.

Frauenstadt (Paul), _Blutrache und Todtschlagsühne im Deutschen Mittelalter_. Leipzig, 1881.

Frazer (_Sir_ J. G.), _Adonis Attis Osiris_. London, 1906.

---- 'Certain Burial Customs as illustrative of the Primitive Theory of the Soul'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xv. London, 1886.

---- _The Dying God_. London, 1911.

---- 'Folk-Lore in the Old Testament'; in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_. Oxford, 1907.

---- _The Golden Bough_. 3 vols. London, 1900.

---- _Lectures on the Early History of the Kingship_. London, 1905.

---- _The Magic Art_. 2 vols. London, 1911.

---- 'The Origin of Totemism'; in _The Fortnightly Review_, new ser. vol. lxv. London, 1899.

---- _Pausanias's Description of Greece_. 6 vols. London, 1898.

{778} Frazer (_Sir_ J. G.), _Totemism_. Edinburgh, 1887.

---- _Totemism and Exogamy_. 4 vols. London, 1910.

Frederick II. (_Emperor_), 'Constitutiones Neapolitanæ sive Siculæ'; in Lindenbrog, _Codex legum antiquarum_. Francofurti, 1613.

Freeman (E. A.), _Comparative Politics_. London, 1896.

---- _The Reign of William Rufus_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1882.

Freytag (G. W.), _Arabum Proverbia_. 3 vols. Bonnae ad Rhenum, 1838-43.

Friedländer (L.), _Darstellungen aus der Sittengeschichte Roms_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1901.

Friedrichs (Karl), 'Einzeluntersuchungen zur vergleichenden Rechtswissenschaft'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. x. Stuttgart, 1892.

---- 'Mensch und Person'; in _Das Ausland_, vol. lxiv. Stuttgart, 1891.

Fries (J. F.), _Neue oder anthropologische Kritik der Vernunft_. 3 vols. Heidelberg, 1828-31.

Friis (J. A.), _Lappisk Mythologi_. Christiania, 1871.

Fritsch (Gustav), _Drei Jahre in Süd-Afrika_. Breslau, 1868.

---- _Die Eingeborenen Süd-Afrika's_. Breslau, 1872.

Fryer (G. E.), _The Khyeng People of the Sandoway District, Arakan_. (Reprinted from _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_.) Calcutta, 1875.

Fryer (John), _A New Account of East-India and Persia_. London, 1698.

Fuld (L.), 'Das Asylrecht im Alterthum und Mittelalter'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. vii. Stuttgart, 1887.

Fulgentius (_Saint_), 'De fide'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. lxv. Parisiis, 1847.

Funk (--), 'Die Entwicklung des Osterfastens'; in _Theologische Quartalschrift_, vol. lxxv. Tübingen, 1893.

Furness (W. H.), _The Home-Life of Borneo Head-Hunters_. Philadelphia, 1902.

Fustel de Coulanges (N. D.), _La Cité antique_. Paris, 1864. (Quoted in vol. ii.)

---- The same work. Paris, 1866. (Quoted in vol. i.)

Fytche (A.), _Burma Past and Present_. 2 vols. London, 1878.

Gadelius (Bror), _Om tvångstankar_. Lund, 1896.

Gage (Matilda J.), _Woman, Church and State_. Chicago, 1893.

Gaidoz (H.), 'Le suicide'; in _Mélusine_, vol. iv. Paris, 1888-89.

Gaius, _Institutionum juris civilis commentarii quattuor_. Ed. and trans. by E. Poste. Oxford, 1890.

Galton (Francis), 'Eugenics'; in _Sociological Papers_, vols. i.-ii., 1904-05. London, 1905-06.

---- _Inquiries into Human Faculty and its Development_. London, 1883.

Gans (E.), _Das Erbrecht in weltgeschichtlicher Entwickelung_. 4 vols. Berlin, &c., 1824-35.

Garcilasso de la Vega, _First Part of the Royal Commentaries of the Yncas_. Trans. ed. by C. R. Markham. 2 vols. London, 1869-71.

Gardiner (A. H.), 'Egyptian Ethics and Morality'; in Hastings, _Encyclopedia of Religion and Ethics_, vol. v. Edinburgh, 1912.

Garnett (Lucy M. J.), _The Women of Turkey and their Folk-Lore_. 2 vols. 1890-91.

Garofalo (R.), _La Criminologie_. Paris, 1890.

Garraud (R.), _Traité théorique et pratique du droit pénal Français_. 6 vols. Paris, 1898-1902.

{779} Gason (S.), 'The Manners and Customs of the Dieyerie Tribe'; in Woods, _The Native Tribes of South Australia_. Adelaide, 1879.

Gass (W.), _Geschichte der christlichen Ethik_. 3 vols. Berlin, 1881-87.

'Gautama,' trans. by G. Bühler; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. ii. Oxford, 1897.

Gautier (Léon), _La Chevalerie_. Paris, 1884.

Geiger (K. A.), _Der Selbstmord im klassischen Altertum_. Augsburg, 1888.

Geiger (W.), _Civilization of the Eastern Ir[=a]nians in Ancient Times_. Trans. 2 vols. London., 1885-86.

Geiseler (--), _Die Oster-Insel_. Berlin, 1883.

Gelli (J.), _Il duello_. Firenze, 1886.

Gellius (Aulus), _Noctes Atticæ_. Ed. by A. Lion. 2 vols. Gottingae, 1824.

Gennep (A. van), _Les rites de passage_. Paris, 1911.

---- _Tabou et totémisme à Madagascar_. Paris, 1904.

Geographical Journal (The). London.

Georgi (J. G.), _Russia_. Trans. 4 vols. London, 1780-83.

Georgisch (P.), _Corpus juris Germanici antiqui_. Halae Magdeburgicae, 1738.

Gerhohus, 'De aedificio Dei'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. cxciv. Parisiis, 1855.

Geusius (J.), _Victimæ Humanæ_. 2 vols. Groningae, 1675.

Geyer (A.), _Die Lehre von der Nothwehr_. Jena, 1857.

Ghani (M. A.), 'Social Life and Morality in India'; in _Internal. Jour. of Ethics_, vol. vii. London, 1897.

Ghillany (F. W.), _Die Menschenopfer der alten Hebräer_. Nürnberg, 1842.

Gibb (John), 'The Christian Church and War'; in _The British Quarterly Review_, vol. lxxiii. London, 1881.

Gibbon (Edward), _The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire_. Ed. by W. Smith. 8 vols. London, 1854-55.

Gibbons (A. S. H.), _Exploration and Hunting in Central Africa_. London. 1898.

Gibbs (George), 'Tribes of Western Washington and Northwestern Oregon'; in _U.S. Geographical and Geological Survey of the Rocky Mountain Region:--Contributions to North American Ethnology_, vol. i. Washington, 1877.

Giddings (F. H.), _The Principles of Sociology_. New York, 1896.

Gide (Paul), _Étude sur la condition privée de la femme_. Ed. by A. Esmein. Paris, 1885.

Gieseler (J. C. L.), _Text-Book of Ecclesiastical History_. Trans. 3 vols. Philadelphia, 1836.

Giles (H. A.), _Strange Stories from a Chinese Studio_. 2 vols. London, 1880.

Gill (W. W.), _Life in the Southern Isles_. London, 1876.

---- _Myths and Songs from the South Pacific_. London, 1876.

Gillen (F. J.), 'Notes on Some Manners and Customs of the Aborigines of the McDonnell Ranges belonging to the Arunta Tribe'; in _Report on the Work of the Horn Scientific Expedition to Central Australia_, pt. iv. London & Melbourne, 1896.

Gilmour (James), _Among the Mongols_. London, [1892].

Ginoulhiac (Ch.), _Histoire du régime dotal_. Paris, 1842.

Ginsburg (Ch. D.), _The Essenes_. London, 1864.

Girard (F.), _Manuel élémentaire de droit romain_. Paris, 1901.

Girard de Rialle (J.), _La mythologie comparée_. Paris, 1878.

Gisborne (William), _The Colony of New Zealand_. London, 1888.

{780} Gizycki (G. von), _An Introduction to the Study of Ethics_. Adapted from the German by Stanton Coit. London, 1891.

Glaber (R.), 'Historiarum sui temporis libri quinque'; in Bouquet, _Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France_, vol. x. Paris, 1760.

Gladstone (W. E.), _Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age_. 3 vols. Oxford, 1858.

Glanvilla (R. de), _Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ_. Londini, [1555?].

---- The same work. Trans. by John Beames. London, 1812.

Glasson (Ernest), _Le mariage civil et le divorce_. Paris, 1880.

Glimpses of the Eastern Archipelago. Trans. Singapore, 1894.

Globus. Illustrirte Zeitschrift für Länder- und Völkerkunde. Braunschweig, &c.

Gobineau (A. de), _The Moral and Intellectual Diversity of Races_. Trans. Philadelphia, 1856.

Goblet d'Alviella (Eugène), _Hibbert Lectures on the Origin and Growth of the Conception of God_. London, 1892.

Godwin (William), _Enquiry concerning Political Justice_. 2 vols. London, 1796.

Goehlert (V.), 'Die geschlechtsverschiedenheit der Kinder in den Ehen'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. xiii. Berlin, 1881.

Göpfert (F. A.), _Moraltheologie_. Vol. i. Paderborn, 1899.

Goesius (W.), _Rei agrariæ auctores legesque variæ_. Amstelredami, 1674.

Götte (W.), _Das Delphische Orakel_. Leipzig, 1839.

Göttinger Studien. Göttingen.

Göttingische gelehrte Anzeigen. Göttingen.

Goiten (E.), _Das Vergeltungsprincip im biblischen und talmudischen Strafrecht_. Frankfurt a.M., 1893.

Goldast (M.), _Collectio consuetudinum et legum imperialium_. Francofordiae ad Moenum, 1613.

Goldziher (Ignaz), _Abhandlungen zur arabischen Philologie_. 2 vols. Leiden, 1896-99.

---- _Muhammedanische Studien_. 2 vols. Halle a.S., 1889-90.

Gomara (F. Lopez de), 'Primera parte de la historia general de las Indias'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol. xxii. Madrid, 1852.

Gomme (G. L.), _Ethnology in Folklore_. London, 1892.

---- 'Some Traditions and Superstitions connected with Buildings'; in _The Antiquary_, vol. iii. London, 1881.

Goodell (William), _The American Slave Code in Theory and Practice_. New York, 1853.

---- _Slavery and Anti-Slavery_. New York, 1852.

Goos (C.), _Forelæsninger over den almindelige Retslære_. 2 vols. Kjøbenhavn, 1889-94.

Gop[vc]evi['c] (S.), _Oberalbanien und seine Liga_. Leipzig, 1881.

'Gospel of the Nativity of Mary (The)'; in _Ante-Nicene Christian Library_, vol. xvi. Edinburgh, 1870.

'Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (The)'; in _Ante-Nicene Christian Library_, vol. xvi. Edinburgh, 1870.

Gotlands-Lagen. Ed. by C. J. Schlyter. (_Corpus Juris Sueo-Gotorum Antiqui_, vol. vii.) Lund, 1852.

Gråberg di Hemsö (J.), _Specchio geografico, e statistico dell' impero di Marocco_. Genova, 1834.

Grágás, Hin forna lögbók Íslendínga. 2 vols. Havniae, 1829.

{781} Grange (--), 'Extracts from the Journal of an Expedition into the Naga Hills'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. ix. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1840.

Granger (F. S.), 'The Moral Life of the Early Romans'; in _Internal. Jour. of Ethics_, vol. vii. London, 1897.

---- _The Worship of the Romans_. London, 1895.

Granville (R. K.) and Roth (F. N.), 'Notes on the Jekris'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxviii. London, 1899.

Gratian, _Decretum_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. clxxxvii.) Parisiis, 1855.

Graul (K.), _Reise nach Ostindien_. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1854-56.

Gray (J. H.), _China_. 2 vols. London, 1878.

Green (J. R.), _History of the English People_. 4 vols. London, 1879-81.

Greenwood (Thomas), _The First Book of the History of the Germans_. London, 1836.

Gregor (Walter), _Notes on the Folk-lore of the North-East of Scotland_. London, 1881.

Gregorovius (Ferdinand), _Wanderings in Corsica_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1855.

Gregory I. (_Saint_), surnamed _the Great_, _Opera omnia_. 5 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. lxxv.-lxxix.) Parisiis, 1849.

Gregory III., 'Judicia congrua poenitentibus'; in Labbe-Mansi, _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_, vol. xii. Florentiæ, 1766.

Gregory IX., 'Decretales'; in _Corpus juris canonici_, ed. by A. Friedberg, vol. ii. Lipsiæ, 1881.

Gregory Nazianzen (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. 4 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. xxxv.-xxxviii.) Parisiis, 1857-58.

Gregory of Tours (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. lxxi.) Parisiis, 1849.

Grey (George), _Journals of Two Expeditions of Discovery in North-West and Western Australia_. 2 vols. London, 1841.

---- _Polynesian Mythology_. Auckland, 1885.

Grierson (G. A.), _Bih[=a]r Peasant Life_. Calcutta, 1885.

Griesinger (W.), _Mental Pathology and Therapeutics_. Trans. London, 1867.

Griffis (W. E.), _Corea_. London, 1882.

---- _The Mikado's Empire_. New York, 1883.

---- _The Religions of Japan_. London, 1895.

Griffith (William), 'Journal of a Visit to the Mishmee Hills in Assam'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. vi. Calcutta, 1837.

Grimm (Jacob), _Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer_. Ed. by A. Heusler and R. Hübner. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1899.

---- _Kinder- und Hausmärchen. Grosse Ausgabe_. Berlin, 1870.

---- _Kleinere Schriften_. 8 vols. Berlin, 1864-90.

---- _Reinhart Fuchs_. Berlin, 1834.

---- _Teutonic Mythology_. Trans. 4 vols. London, 1882-88.

Grinnell (G. B.), _Pawnee Hero Stories and Folk-Tales_. New York, 1889.

---- _The Story of the Indian_. London, 1896.

Gronovius (J.), _Thesaurus Græcarum antiquitatum_. 12 vols. Lugduni Batavorum, 1697-1702.

Groot (J. J. M. de), _The Religious System of China_. Leyden, 1892, &c. _In progress_.

Grosse (Ernst), _Die Formen der Familie und die Formen der Wirthschaft_. Freiburg i.B. & Leipzig, 1896.

{782} Grote (John), _A Treatise on the Moral Ideals_. Ed. by J. B. Mayor. Cambridge, 1876.

Grotius (Hugo), _De jure belli et pacis libri tres_. With a trans. by W. Whewell. 3 vols. Cambridge, 1853.

Gruppe (Otto), _Die griechischen Culte und Mythen_. Vol. i. Leipzig, 1887.

Guazzini (S.), _Tractatus ad defensam inquisitorum, carceratorum reorum, & condemnatorum super quocunque crimine_. Venetiis, 1639.

Gudgeon (W. E.), 'Maori Religion'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. xiv. Wellington, 1905.

Gudmundsson (V.) and Kålund (Kr.), 'Sitte. Skandinavische Verhältnisse'; in Paul, _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_, vol. iii. Strassburg, 1900.

Günther (L.), _Die Idee der Wiedervergeltung in der Geschichte und Philosophie des Strafrechts_. 3 vols. Erlangen, 1889-95.

Guérard (B. E. C.), _Collection des Cartulaires de France. Tomes I-II. Cartulaire de l'Abbaye de Saint-Père de Chartres_. 2 vols. Paris, 1840.

Guibal (Georges), _Histoire du sentiment national en France pendant la guerre de Cent ans_. Paris, 1875.

Guibertus de Novigento, 'Monodiarum sive de vita sua libri tres'; in Bouquet, _Recueil des Historiens des Gaules et de la France_, vol. xii. Paris, 1781.

Guinnard (A.), _Three Years' Slavery among the Patagonians_. Trans. London, 1871.

Gumilla (J.), _El Orinoco ilustrado_. 2 vols. Madrid, 1745.

Gummere (F. B.), _Germanic Origins_. London, 1892.

Guppy (H. B.), _The Solomon Islands_. London, 1887.

Gurney (J. J.), _Observations on the Distinguishing Views and Practices of the Society of Friends_. London, 1834.

Gutzlaff (Charles), _A Sketch of Chinese History_. 2 vols. London, 1834.

Guyau (J. M.), _Esquisse d'une morale sans obligation ni sanction_. Paris, 1885.

'Gwentian Code (The)'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales_. London, 1841.

Haberland (C.), 'Der Kindermord als Volkssitte'; in _Globus_, vol. xxxvii. Braunschweig, 1880.

---- 'Ueber Gebräuche und Aberglauben beim Essen'; in _Zeitschr. f. Völkerpsychologie und Sprachwissenschaft_, vols. xvii.-xviii. Leipzig, 1887-88.

Haddon (A. C.), 'The Ethnography of the Western Tribe of Torres Straits'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xix. London, 1890.

---- _Head-Hunters_. London, 1901.

---- _Magic and Fetishism_. London, 1906.

---- in _Reports of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits_. vol. v. Cambridge, 1904.

Haeckel (Ernst), _A Visit to Ceylon_. Trans. London, 1883.

Hagen (B.), _Unter den Papua's_. Wiesbaden, 1899.

Hagman (Lucina), 'Från samskolan'; in _Humanitas_, vol. ii. Helsingfors, 1897.

Hahn (C.), _Kaukasische Reisen und Studien_. Leipzig, 1896.

Hahn (J. G. von), _Albanesische Studien_. 3 vols. Jena, 1854.

Hahn (Theophilus), _Tsuni-Goam. The Supreme Being of the Khoi-Khoi_. London, 1881.

{783} Hale (Horatio), 'The Iroquois Sacrifice of the White Dog'; in _The American Antiquarian and Oriental Journal_, vol. vii. Chicago, 1885.

---- _U.S. Exploring Expedition under the Command of Ch. Wilkes. Vol. VI. Ethnography and Philology_. Philadelphia, 1846.

Hale (Matthew), _The History of the Pleas of the Crown_. 2 vols. London, 1800.

Halévy (J.), _Mélanges de critique et d'histoire relatifs aux peuples sémitiques_. Paris, 1883.

Hall (C. F.), _Arctic Researches and Life among the Esquimaux_. New York, 1865.

Hall (G. Stanley), 'Children's Lies'; in _The American Journal of Psychology_, vol. iii. Worcester, 1890-91.

---- 'A Study of Anger'; in _The American Journal of Psychology_, vol. x. Worcester, 1898-99.

Hall (W. E.), _A Treatise on International Law_, Oxford, 1890. (Referred to in vol. i.)

---- The same work. Ed. by J. B. Atlay. Oxford, 1904. (Referred to in vol. ii.)

Hallam (Henry), _View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages_. 3 vols. London, 1837. (Referred to in ch. xxvii.)

---- The same work. 3 vols. London, 1860.

Halleck (H. W.), _International Law_. Ed. by Sir Sherston Baker. 2 vols. London, 1893.

Hamilton (Augustus), _Maori Art_. Wellington, 1896-1901.

Hamilton (William), _Lectures on Metaphysics and Logic_. 2 vols. Edinburgh & London, 1877.

Hamilton (William J.), _Researches in Asia Minor, Pontus, and Armenia_. 2 vols. London, 1842.

[Hv]ammurabi (_King of Babylon_), _The Code of Laws promulgated by_. Trans. by C. H. W. Johns. Edinburgh, 1903.

Hanoteau (A.) and Letourneux (A.), _La Kabylie et les coutumes Kabyles_. 3 vols. Paris, 1872-73.

Hansard (T. C.), _The Parliamentary Debates from 1803 to the Present Time_. London, 1812, &c.

Hardeland (A.), _Dajacksch-deutsches Wörterbuch_. Amsterdam, 1859.

Hardisty (W. L.), 'The Loucheux Indians'; in _Smithsonian Report, 1866_. Washington, 1867.

Hardman (E. T.), 'Notes on some Habits and Customs of the Natives of the Kimberley District, Western Australia'; in _Proceed. Roy. Irish Academy_, ser. iii. vol. i. Dublin, 1889-91.

Hardy (R. Spence), _Eastern Monachism_. London, 1850.

---- _A Manual of Budhism, in its Modern Development_. London, 1880.

Harkness (H.), _A Description of a Singular Aboriginal Race inhabiting the Neilgherry Hills_. London, 1832.

Harmon (D. W.), _A Journal of Voyages and Travels in the Interior of North America_. Andover, 1820.

Harnack (A.), _History of Dogma_. Trans. 7 vols. London, 1894-99.

---- 'Manichaeism'; in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, vol. xv. Edinburgh, 1883.

Harris (S.), 'The Christian Doctrine of Labor'; in _The New Englander_, vol. xxiv. New Haven, 1865.

Harris (S. F.), _Principles of the Criminal Law_. London, 1899.

{784} Harris (Thomas) and Johnson (R.), _Reports of Cases argued and determined in the General Court and Court of Appeals of the State of Maryland, from 1800 to 1805, inclusive_. 4 vols. Annapolis, 1821-27.

Harris (W. Cornwallis), _The Highlands of Æthiopia_. 3 vols. London, 1844.

Harrison (Ch.), 'Religion and Family among the Haidas'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxi. London, 1892.

Harrison (Jane Ellen), _Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion_. Cambridge, 1903.

Hartknoch (Christ.), _Alt- und Neues Preussen_. 2 vols. Franckfurt & Leipzig, 1684.

Hartland (E. Sidney), 'Concerning the Rite at the Temple of Mylitta'; in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_. Oxford, 1907.

---- _The Legend of Perseus_. 3 vols. London, 1894-96.

---- _Ritual and Belief_. London, 1914.

Hartley (David), _Observations on Man_. 2 vols. London, 1810.

---- _Theory of the Human Mind, on the Principle of the Association of Ideas; with Essays relating to the Subject of it. By Joseph Priestley_. London, 1790.

Hartmann (R.), _Die menschenähnlichen Affen_. Leipzig, 1883.

Hartshorne (B. F.), 'The Weddas'; in _The Indian Antiquary_, vol. viii. Bombay, 1879.

Hartung (J. A.), _Die Religion der Römer_. 2 vols. Erlangen, 1836.

Harvard Law Review. Cambridge (Mass.).

Hastings (J.), _A Dictionary of the Bible_. 5 vols. Edinburgh, 1899-1904.

---- _Encyclopædia of Religion and Ethics_. Edinburgh, 1908, &c. _In progress_.

Haug (B.), _Die Alterthümmer der Christen_. Stuttgart, 1785.

Haupt (Paul), 'Die zwölfte Tafel des babylonischen Nimrod-Epos'; in _Beiträge zur Assyriologie_, vol. i. Leipzig, 1889.

Hawtrey (S. H. C.), 'The Lengua Indians of the Paraguayan Chaco'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxi. London, 1901.

Haxthausen (A. von), _The Russian Empire_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1856.

---- _Transcaucasia_. Trans. London, 1854.

Haynes (E. S. P.), _Religious Persecution_. London, 1904.

Haywood (John) and Cobbs (R. L.), _The Statute Laws of the State of Tennessee_. 2 vols. Knoxville, 1831.

Hearn (W. E.), _The Aryan Household_. London & Melbourne, 1879.

Hearne (S.), _A Journey from Prince of Wales's Fort to the Northern Ocean_. Dublin, 1796.

Heber (R.), _Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India_. 2 vols. London, 1828.

Hedley (J. C.), 'Dr. Mivart on Faith and Science'; in _The Dublin Review_, ser. iii. vol. xviii. London, 1887.

Hefele (C. J.), _Beiträge zur Kirchengeschichte, Archäologie und Liturgik_. 2 vols. Tübingen, 1864.

---- _A History of the Councils of the Church_. Trans. 5 vols. Edinburgh, 1871-96.

Heffter (A. W.), _Das Europäische Völkerrecht der Gegenwart_. Ed. by F. H. Geffken. Berlin, 1882.

Hegel (G. W. F.), _Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts_. Ed. by G. J. P. J. Bolland. Leiden, 1902.

---- _Philosophy of Right_. Trans. by S. W. Dyde. London, 1896.

{785} Hehn (V.), _The Wanderings of Plants and Animals from their First Home_. Ed. by J. S. Stallybrass. London, 1888.

Hellwald (F. von), _Die menschliche Familie_. Leipzig, 1889.

Hellwig (A.), _Das Asylrecht der Naturvölker_. Berlin, 1903.

Helmold (--), _Chronik der Slaven_. Trans. Berlin, 1852.

Helps (_Sir_ Arthur), _Some Talk about Animals and their Masters_. London, 1883.

---- _The Spanish Conquest in America_. 4 vols. London, 1855-61.

Helvetius (C. A.), _De l'Homme, de ses facultés intellectuelles et de son éducation_. 2 vols. London, 1773.

Henault (Ch. J. F.), _Nouvel abregé chronologique de l'histoire de France_. Paris, 1752.

Henderson (John), _Observations on the Colonies of N.S. Wales and Van Diemen's Land_. Calcutta, 1832.

Henke (A.), _Lehrbuch der gerichtlichen Medicin_. Ed. by C. Bergmann. Berlin, 1859.

Henke (E.), _Grundriss einer Geschichte des deutschen peinlichen Rechts und der peinlichen Rechtswissenschaft_. 2 vols. Sulzbach, 1809.

Henkenius (H.), 'Entstehung und Verbreitung der Anthropophagie'; in _Deutsche Rundschau für Geographie und Statistik_, vol. xv. Wien, &c., 1893.

Hennepin (Louis), _Description de la Louisiane_. Paris, 1683.

---- _A New Discovery of a Vast Country in America, . . . between New France and New Mexico._ Trans. 2 vols. London, 1698.

---- _Nouvelle Découverte d'un très Grand Pays situé dans l'Amerique, entre Le Nouveau Mexique, et La Mer Glaciale_. Utrecht, 1697.

Henry I. (_King_), 'Leges'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Hepp (F. C. Th.), _Die Zurechnung auf dem Gebiete des Civilrechts insbesondere die Lehre von den Unglücksfällen_. Tübingen, 1838.

Heriot (George), _Travels through the Canadas_. London, 1807.

Hermann (C. F.), _Disputatio de terminis eorumque religione apud Græcos_. Gottingae, 1846.

---- _Lehrbuch der gottesdienstlichen Alterthümer der Griechen_. Ed. by K. B. Stark. Heidelberg, 1858.

---- _Lehrbuch der Griechischen Privatalterthümer_. Ed. by H. Blümner. Freiburg i.B. & Tübingen, 1882.

---- _Lehrbuch der Griechischen Rechtsalterthümer_. Ed. by Th. Thalheim. (_Lehrbuch der Griechischen Antiquitäten_, vol. ii. pt. i.) Freiburg i.B. & Tübingen, 1884.

Hernsheim (Franz), _Beitrag zur Sprache der Marshall-Inseln_. Leipzig, 1880.

Herodotus, _Historiarum libri IX._ Ed. by G. Dindorfius. Parisiis, 1844.

---- The same work. English version, ed. by G. Rawlinson, Col. Rawlinson, and Sir J. G. Wilkinson. 4 vols. London, 1875.

Herrera (Antonio de), _The General History of the West Indies_. Trans. 6 vols. London, 1825-26.

Hershon (P. I.), _Treasures of the Talmud_. London, 1882.

Hertz (E.), _Voltaire und die französische Strafrechtspflege im achtzehnten Jahrhundert_. Stuttgart, 1887.

Hertz (R.), 'Contribution à une étude sur la représentation collective de la mort'; in _L'année sociologique_, vol. x., 1905-06. Paris, 1907.

Herzog (J. J.), _Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie_. Ed. by A. Hauck. Leipzig, 1896, &c. _In progress_.

{786} Herzog (J. J.), and Plitt (G. L.), _Realencyclopädie für protestantische Theologie_. 18 vols. Leipzig, 1877-88.

Herzog (R.), _Rücktritt vom Versuch und thätige Reue_. Würzburg, 1889.

Hesiod, _Carmina_. Ed. by F. S. Lehrs. Parisiis, 1840.

Hessey (J. A.), _Sunday_, London, 1889.

Hettner (H.), _Geschichte der französischen Literatur im achtzehnten Jahrhundert_. Braunschweig, 1894.

Hetzel (H.), _Die Todesstrafe in ihrer kulturgeschichtlichen Entwicklung_. Berlin, 1870.

Heuglin (M. Th. von), _Reise nach Abessinien_. Jena, 1868.

Hewitt (J. N. B.), 'The Iroquoian Concept of the Soul'; in _Jour. of American Folk-Lore_, vol. viii. Boston & New York, 1895.

Hickson (S. J.), _A Naturalist in North Celebes_. London, 1889.

Hilary (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. ix.-x.) Parisiis, 1844-45.

Hildebrand (R.), _Recht und Sitte auf den verschiedenen wirtschaftlichen Kulturstufen_. Vol. i. Jena, 1896.

Hildebrandt (J. M.), 'Ethnographische Notizen über Wakámba und ihre Nachbaren'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnologie_, vol. x. Berlin, 1878.

Hilhouse (William), _Indian Notices_. _S.l._, 1825.

Hill (Richard) and Thornton (George), _Notes on the Aborigines of New South Wales_. Sydney, 1892.

Hillebrandt (Alfred), 'Eine Miscelle aus dem Vedaritual'; in _Zeitschr. der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft_, vol. xl. Leipzig, 1886.

Hinde (S. L. and Mrs. Hildegarde), _The Last of the Masai_. London, 1901.

Hippel (Robert von), _Die Thielquälerei in der Strafgesetzgebung_. Berlin, 1891.

Hirn (Yrjö), _The Origins of Art_. London, 1900.

Hirschfeld (H.), 'Remarks on the Etymology of [vS]abb[=a]th'; in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc._ London, 1896.

Hirschfeld (Magnus), _Die Homosexualität des Mannes und des Weibes_. Berlin, 1914.

Hislop (S.), _Papers relating to the Aboriginal Tribes of the Central Provinces_. Ed. by R. Temple. _S.l._, 1866.

Hitopadesa. Trans. by F. Pincott. London, 1880.

Hlothhære and Eadric (_Kings_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Hobbes (Thomas), _Leviathan_. Oxford, 1881.

Hobhouse (L. T.), _Morals in Evolution_. 2 vols. London, 1906.

Hodge (Charles), _Systematic Theology_. 3 vols. London & Edinburgh, 1871-73.

Hodgson (B. H.), _Miscellaneous Essays relating to Indian Subjects_. 2 vols. London, 1880.

Hodgson (C. P.), _Reminiscences of Australia_. London, 1846.

Hodson (T. C.), 'The "Genna" amongst the Tribes of Assam': in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvi. London, 1906.

Høffding (H.), _Etik_. København, 1897.

Höfler (M.), 'Krankheits-Dämonen'; in _Archiv f. Religionswiss._ vol. ii. Freiburg i.B., 1899.

Högström (M. P.), _Beskrifning öfver de til Sveriges Krona lydande Lapmarker_. Stockholm, [1745?].

Hoffman (W. J.), 'The Menomini Indians'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xiv. Washington, 1896.

{787} Hoffmann (René), _La notion de l'Être suprême chez les peuples non civilisés_. Genève, 1907.

Holbach (P. H. D. d'), _Système de la nature_. Ed. by D. Diderot. 2 vols. Paris, 1821.

Holden (W. C.), _The Past and Future of the Kaffir Races_. London, [1866].

Holinshed (R.), _Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland_. 6 vols. London, 1807-08.

Holland (F. M.), _The Reign of the Stoics_. New York, _s.d._

Holland (Thomas A.), _A Time of War_. Brighton, 1855.

Hollis (A. C.), _The Masai_. Oxford, 1905.

Holm (G.), 'Ethnologisk Skizze af Angmagsalikerne'; in _Meddelelser om Grönland_, vol. x. Kjøbenhavn, 1888.

Holmberg (H. J.), 'Ethnographische Skizzen über die Völker des russischen Amerika'; in _Acta Soc. Scientiarum Fennicæ_, vol. iv. Helsingfors, 1856.

Holmes (O. W.), _The Common Law_. London, 1882.

Hoist (H. von), _The Constitutional and Political History of the United States_. Trans. 5 vols. Chicago, 1876-89.

Holtzendorff (F. von), _Encyclopädie der Rechtswissenschaft_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1873-76.

Holtzmann (Adolf), _Deutsche Mythologie_. Ed. by A. Holder. Leipzig, 1874.

Holub (E.), 'Central South African Tribes'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. x. London, 1881.

---- 'Die Ma-Atabele'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. xxv. Berlin, 1893.

---- _Seven Years in South Africa_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1881.

Holzman (M.), 'Sünde und Sühne in den Rigvedahymnen und den Psalmen'; in _Zeitschr. f. Völkerpsychologie und Sprachwissenschaft_, vol. xv. Berlin, 1884.

Home and Foreign Review (The). London.

Homer, _Carmina_. Parisiis, 1838.

Hommel (Fritz), _Die Semitischen Völker und Sprachen_. Leipzig, 1881-83.

Honoré de Sainte Marie, _Dissertations historiques et critiques sur la chevalerie_. Paris, 1718.

Hood (T. H.), _Notes of a Cruise in H.M.S. "Fawn" in the Western Pacific_. Edinburgh, 1863.

Hooker (J. D.), _Himalayan Journals_. 2 vols. London, 1855.

Hooker (Richard), _The Ecclesiastical Polity and other Works_. 3 vols. London, 1830.

Hooper (W. H.), _Ten Months among the Tents of the Tuski_. London, 1853.

Hopkins (E. W.), _The Religions of India_. London, 1896.

Horatius Flaccus (Q.), _Opera omnia_. 4 vols. Londini, 1825.

Horwicz (Adolf), _Psychologische Analysen auf physiologischer Grundlage_. 2 vols. Halle & Magdeburg, 1872-78.

Hose (Charles), 'A Journey up the Baram River to Mount Dulit and the Highlands of Borneo'; in _The Geographical Journal_, vol. i. London, 1893.

---- and McDougall (W.), _The Pagan Tribes of Borneo_. 2 vols. London, 1912.

---- and McDougall, 'The Relations between Men and Animals in Sarawak'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxi. London, 1901.

Hourst (--), _Sur le Niger et au pays des Touaregs_. Paris, 1898.

Howard (B. Douglas), _Life with Trans-Siberian Savages_. London, 1893.

{788} Howard (G. E.), _A History of Matrimonial Institutions_. 3 vols. Chicago & London, 1904.

Howell (T. B. and T. J.). See _State Trials_.

Howitt (A. W.), 'Australian Group Relations'; in _Smithsonian Report, 1883_. Washington, 1885.

---- _The Native Tribes of South-East Australia_. London, 1904.

---- 'The Native Tribes of South-East Australia'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. xvii. London, 1906.

---- 'On Australian Medicine Men'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xvi. London, 1887.

---- 'On some Australian Beliefs'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xiii. London, 1884.

---- 'On some Australian Ceremonies of Initiation'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xiii. London, 1884.

Hozumi (Nobushige), _Ancestor-Worship and Japanese Law_. Tokyo, Osaka & Kyoto, 1913.

'Hsiâo King (The),' trans. by J. Legge; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. iii. Oxford, 1879.

Hubert (H.) and Mauss (Marcel), 'Essai sur la nature et la fonction du sacrifice'; in _L'année sociologique_, vol. ii., 1897-98. Paris, 1899.

Huc (E. R.), _The Chinese Empire_. Trans. London, 1859.

---- _Travels in Tartary, Thibet, and China_. Trans. 2 vols. London, _s.d._

Hübbe-Schleiden (W.), _Ethiopien. Studien über West-Afrika_. Hamburg, 1879.

Hüllmann (K. D.), _Stædtewesen des Mittelalters_. 4 vols. Bonn, 1826-29.

Humboldt (A. von), _Personal Narrative of Travels to the Equinoctial Regions of the New Continent_. Trans. 7 vols. London, 1814-29.

Hume (_Baron_ David), _Commentaries on the Law of Scotland, respecting the Description and Punishment of Crimes_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1797.

Hume (David), _Philosophical Works_. Ed. by T. H. Green and T. H. Grose. 4 vols. London, 1874-75.

Hunt (A. E.), 'Ethnographical Notes on the Murray Islands'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxviii. London, 1899.

Hunter (W. A.), _A Systematical and Historical Exposition of Roman Law_. London, 1885.

Hunter (W. W.), _The Annals of Rural Bengal_. 3 vols. London, 1868-72.

Hutcheson (Francis), _An Essay on the Nature and Conduct of the Passions and Affections. With Illustrations on the Moral Sense_. London, 1730.

---- _An Inquiry into the Original of our Ideas of Beauty and Virtue; In Two Treatises . . . II. Concerning Moral Good and Evil_. London, 1738.

---- _A System of Moral Philosophy_. 2 vols. London, 1755.

Hyades (P.) and Deniker (J.), _Mission scientifique du Cap Horn, 1882-1883. Tome VII. Anthropologie, Ethnographie_. Paris, 1891.

Hyltén-Cavallius (G. O.), _Wärend och Wirdarne_. 2 vols. Stockholm, 1863-68.

Ignatius (_Saint_), 'Epistolae'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. v. Parisiis, 1857.

Im Thurn (E. F.), _Among the Indians of Guiana_. London, 1883.

Immerwahr (Walter), _Die Kulte und Mythen Arkadiens_. Vol. i. Leipzig, 1891.

Indian Antiquary (The), a Journal of Oriental Research. Bombay.

Indo-Chinese Gleaner (The). 3 vols. Malacca, 1818-21.

Ine (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

{789} Inge (W. R.), _Society in Rome under the Cæsars_. London, 1888.

Inglis (John), _In the New Hebrides_. London, 1887.

Ingram (J. K.), _A History of Slavery and Serfdom_. London, 1895.

Innes (Cosmo), _Scotland in the Middle Ages_. Edinburgh, 1860.

Institutes of Vishnu (The). Trans. by J. Jolly (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. vii.) Oxford, 1880.

Institutiones. See Justinian.

Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field. (Appendix No. 1 in Lorimer, _The Institutes of the Law of Nations_, vol. ii.) Edinburgh, 1884.

International Journal of Ethics. London & Philadelphia.

Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie. Ed. by J. D. E. Schmeltz. Leiden.

Irenaeus (_Saint_), _Contra hæreses libri quinque_. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. vii.) Parisiis, 1857.

Isaeus, 'Orationes'; in _Oratores Attici_, ed. by C. Müller, vol. i. Parisiis, 1847.

Isambert (F. A.) and others, _Recueil général des Anciennes Lois Françaises_. 29 vols. Paris, 1822-33.

Isocrates, _Orationes_. Ed. J. G. Baiter. Parisiis, 1846.

Itard (E. M.), _An Historical Account of the Discovery and Education of a Savage Man_. Trans. London, 1802.

Ives (George), _The Classification of Crimes_. [London], 1904.

Iyer (S. A.), 'Nay[=a]dis of Malabar'; in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, vol. iv. Madras, 1901.

Jackson (A. V. W.), _An Avesta Grammar_. Part i. Stuttgart, 1892.

Jackson (J. G.), _An Account of Timbuctoo and Housa_. See [(]Abd-es-Salâm Shabeeny.

Jacob (Georg), _Das Leben der vorislâmischen Beduinen_. Berlin, 1895.

Jacob (K. G.), 'Der muslimische Fastenmonat Rama[d.]ân'; in _VI. Jahres-bericht der Geographischen Gesellschaft zu Greifswald_, vol. i. 1893-1896. Greifswald, 1896.

Jacob (William), _An Historical Inquiry into the Production and Consumption of the Precious Metals_. 2 vols. London, 1831.

Jacobs (Joseph), _Studies in Biblical Archæology_. London, 1894.

Jacobs (Julius), _Eenigen Tijd onder de Baliërs_. Batavia, 1883.

Jähns (Max), _Ueber Krieg, Frieden und Kultur_. Berlin, 1893.

Jaffur Shurreef, _Qanoon-e-Islam, or the Customs of the Mussulmans of India_. Trans. by G. A. Herklots. Madras, 1863.

Jagor (F.), _Travels in the Philippines_. [Trans.] London, 1875.

Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen mit besonderer Berucksichtigung der Homosexualität. Ed. by M. Hirschfeld. Leipzig.

Jamblichus, _De mysteriis liber_. Ed. by G. Parthey. Berolini, 1857.

---- _De Pythagorica vita liber_. Ed. by A. Westermann. Parisiis, 1850.

James (Edwin), _Account of an Expedition from Pittsburgh to the Rocky Mountains, performed in the Years 1819 and 20, under the Command of S. H. Long._ 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1823.

James (William), _The Principles of Psychology_. 2 vols. London, 1891.

Jameson (Mrs.), _A Common-Place Book of Thoughts, Memories, and Fancies_. London, 1877.

Jamieson (G.), 'Marriage Laws'; in _The China Review_, vol. x. Hongkong, 1881-82.

Janka (Karl), _Der strafrechtliche Notstand_. Erlangen, 1878.

{790} Jarcke (C. E.), _Handbuch des gemeinen deutschen Strafrechts_. 3 vols. Berlin, 1827-30.

Jarves (J. J.), _History of the Hawaiian Islands_. Honolulu, 1872.

Jastrow (Morris), 'The Original Character of the Hebrew Sabbath'; in _The American Journal of Theology_, vol. ii. Chicago, 1898.

---- _The Religion of Babylonia and Assyria_. Boston, 1898.

J[=a]taka Tales, Buddhist Birth Stories. Trans. by T. W. Rhys Davids. London, 1880.

Jellinghaus (Th.), 'Sagen, Sitten und Gebräuche der Munda-Kolhs in Chota Nagpore'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. iii. Berlin, 1871.

Jensen (P.), _Assyrisch-Babylonische Mythen und Epen_. Berlin, 1900.

---- _Die Kosmologie der Babylonier_. Strassburg, 1890.

Jeremias (A.), _Die babylonisch-assyrischen Vorstellungen vom Leben nach dem Tode_. Leipzig, 1887.

---- _Izdubar-Nimrod. Eine altbabylonische Heldensage_. Leipzig, 1891.

Jerez (Francisco de), 'Verdadera relacion de la conquista del Perú y provincia del Cuzco'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol xxvi. Madrid, 1853.

Jerome (_Saint_), _Opera omnia_. 11 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. xxii.-xxx.) Parisiis, 1845-46.

Jessen (E. J.), _Afhandling om de Norske Finners og Lappers Hedenske Religion_. København, 1767.

Jevons (F. B.), _An Introduction to the History of Religion_. London, 1896.

Jewish Encyclopedia (The). 12 vols. New York & London, 1901-06.

Jhering (R. von), _Geist des römischen Rechts_. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1852-78.

---- _Das Schuldmoment im römischen Privatrecht_. Giessen, 1867.

---- _Der Zweck im Recht_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1877-83.

Jochelson (W.), _The Koryak Religion and Myth_. (_The Jesup North Pacific Expedition_, vol. vi. pt. i.) Leiden & New York, 1905.

Jodl (F.), _Lehrbuch der Psychologie_. Stuttgart, 1896.

Johnston (_Sir_ H. H.), _British Central Africa_. London, 1897.

---- 'The Ethics of Cannibalism'; in _The Fortnightly Review_, new ser. vol. xlv. London, 1889.

---- _The Kilima-njaro Expedition_. London, 1886.

---- _The River Congo_. London, 1884.

---- _The Uganda Protectorate_. 2 vols. London, 1902.

Johnstone (J. C.), _Maoria_. London, 1874.

Joinville (--), 'On the Religion and Manners of the People of Ceylon'; in _Asiatick Researches_, vol. vii. Calcutta, 1801.

Jolly (J.) 'Beiträge zur indischen Rechtsgeschichte'; in _Zeitschr. der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ vol. xliv. Leipzig, 1890.

---- 'Recht und Sitte'; in Bühler, _Grundriss der indo-arischen Philologie_, vol. ii. Strassburg, 1896.

Jones (_Sir_ William), 'The Tenth Anniversary Discourse'; in _Asiatick Researches_, vol. iv. Calcutta, 1795.

Jordanes, _Romana et Getica_. Ed. by Th. Mommsen. Berolini, 1882.

Josephus, _Opera_. Ed. by G. Dindorfius. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1845-47.

Joubert (J.), _Pensées, essais et maximes_. 2 vols. Paris, 1842.

Jourdan (A. J. L.) and others, _Recueil général des Anciennes Lois Françaises_. 29 vols. Paris, 1822-33.

Journal and Proceedings of the Royal Society of New South Wales. Sydney & London.

{791}_Journal Asiatique_. Paris.

---- _des Museum Godeffroy_. Hamburg.

---- _of the African Society_. London.

---- _of American Folk-Lore (The)_. Boston & New York.

---- _of the American Oriental Society_. New York.

---- _of the (Royal) Anthropological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland (The)_. London.

---- _of the Asiatic Society of Bengal_. Calcutta.

---- _of the Ceylon Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society_. Colombo.

---- _of the Ethnological Society of London_.

---- _of the Indian Archipelago and Eastern Asia_. Singapore.

---- _of the Polynesian Society_. Wellington.

---- _of the Royal Asiatic Society_. London.

---- _of the Royal Geographical Society of London_.

---- _of the Straits Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society_. Singapore.

Jousse (D.), _Traité de la justice criminelle de France_. 4 vols. Paris, 1771.

Jouuencel (Le), [A Romance commenced by J. de Soreuil, and completed by J. Tibergeau, M. Morin, and N. Riolai.] Paris, 1493.

Joyce (P. W.), _A Social History of Ancient Ireland_. 2 vols. London, 1903.

Juan (G.) and Ulloa (A. de), _A Voyage to South America_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1760.

Jung (C. E.), 'Aus dem Seelenleben der Australier'; in _Mittheilungen des Vereins für Erdkunde zu Leipzig_, 1877.

---- 'Die Mündungsgegend des Murray und ihre Bewohner'; in _Mittheilungen des Vereins für Erdkunde zu Halle a/S_, 1877.

Junghuhn (Franz), _Die Battaländer auf Sumatra_. Trans. 2 vols. Berlin, 1847.

Junker (Wilhelm), _Travels in Africa during the Years 1882-86_. Trans. London, 1892.

Junod (H. A.), _Les Ba-Ronga_. Neuchatel, 1898.

Jusserand (J. J.), _English Wayfaring Life in the Middle Ages_. Trans. London, 1892.

Justi (Ferd.), 'Die Weltgeschichte des Tabari'; in _Das Ausland_, vol. xlviii. Stuttgart, 1875.

Justin Martyr, 'Apologia prima pro Christianis'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. vi. Parisiis, 1857.

Justinian (_Emperor_), _Codex Justinianus_. Ed. by P. Krueger. (_Corpus juris civilis_, vol. ii.) Berolini, 1888.

---- 'Digesta,' ed. by Th. Mommsen; in _Corpus juris civilis_, vol. i. Berolini, 1889.

---- 'Institutiones,' ed. by P. Krueger; in _Corpus juris civilis_, vol. i. Berolini, 1889.

---- _Novellæ_. Ed. by R. Schoell and G. Kroll. (_Corpus juris civilis_, vol. iii.) Berolini, 1895.

Juvenalis (D. J.), _Opera omnia_. 3 vols. Londini, 1820.

Jydske Lovbog (Den). Ed. by P. K. Ancher. Kiøbenhavn, 1783.

Kaegi (Adolf), _The Rigveda: the Oldest Literature of the Indians_. Trans. Boston, 1886.

Kaibel (G.), _Epigrammata Græca_. Berolini, 1878.

Kålund (Kr.), 'Skandinavische Verhältnisse'; in Paul, _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_, vol. ii. Strassburg, 1893.

{792} Kames (_Lord_), _Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion_. Edinburgh, 1751.

---- _Sketches of the History of Man_. 4 vols. Edinburgh, 1788.

Kane (E. K.), _Arctic Explorations_. 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1856.

Kant (I.), _Metaphysische Anfangungsgründe der Tugendlehre_. Königsberg, 1803.

---- _Sämmtliche Werke_. Ed. by G. Hartenstein. 8 vols. Leipzig, 1867-68.

---- _Zum ewigen Frieden_. Königsberg, 1795.

Karsch-Haack (F.), _Das gleichgeschlechtliche Leben der Naturvölker_. München, 1911.

---- _Das gleichgeschlechtliche Leben der Ostasiaten_. München, 1906.

---- 'Päderastie und Tribadie bei den Tieren'; in _Jahrbuch f. sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, vol. ii. Leipzig, 1901.

---- 'Uranismus oder Päderastie und Tribadie bei den Naturvölkern'; in _Jahrbuch f. sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, vol. iii. Leipzig, 1901.

Karsten (R.), _The Origin of Worship_. Wasa, 1905.

---- _Studies in Primitive Greek Religion_. (_Ofversigt af Finska Vetenskaps-Societetens Förhandlingar_, vol. xlix., 1906-07, no. 1.) Helsingfors, 1907.

Kate (H. F. C. ten), _Reizen en onderzoekingen in Noord-Amerika_. Leiden, 1885.

Katscher (L.), _Bilder aus dem chinesischen Leben._ Leipzig & Heidelberg, 1881.

Katz (Albert), _Der wahre Talmudjude_. Berlin, 1893.

Katz (Edwin), _Ein Grundriss des kanonischen Strafrechts_. Berlin & Leipzig, 1881.

Kaufmann (Georg), _Deutsche Geschichte_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1880-81.

Kearns (J. F.), _The Tribes of South India_. [London, 1865.]

Keary (Ch. F.), _Outlines of Primitive Belief among the Indo-European Races_. London, 1882.

Keate (George), _An Account of the Pelew Islands_. London, 1788.

Keating (W. H.), _Narrative of an Expedition to the Source of St. Peter's River_. 2 vols. Philadelphia, 1824.

Keil (C. F.). _Manual of Biblical Archæology_. Trans. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1887-88.

Keller (A. G.), _Homeric Society_. New York, &c., 1902.

Kemble (J. M.), _The Saxons in England_. Ed. by W. De Gray Birch. 2 vols. London, 1876.

Kenny (C. S.), _Outlines of Criminal Law_. Cambridge, 1902.

Kern (H.), _Der Buddhismus und seine Geschichte in Indien_. Trans. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1882-84.

---- _Manual of Indian Buddhism_. Strassburg, 1896.

Kessler (K), 'Mani, Manichäer'; in Herzog-Hauck, _Realencyclopädie f. Protestantische Theologie und Kirche_, vol. xii. Leipzig, 1903.

Keyser (J. R.), _Efterladte Skrifter_. 2 vols. Christiania, 1865-67.

Kidd (Benjamin), _Social Evolution_. London, 1894.

Kidd (Dudley), _The Essential Kafir_. London, 1904.

King (Irving), _The Development of Religion_. New York, 1910.

King (J. H.), _The Supernatural_. 2 vols. London, 1892.

King (L. W.), _Babylonian Magic and Sorcery_. London, 1896.

King (P. P.) and Fitzroy (R.), _Narrative of the Voyages of the "Adventure" and "Beagle."_ 3 vols. London, 1839.

{793} King (Richard), 'On the Intellectual Character of the Esquimaux'; in _Jour. Ethn. Soc._ London, vol. i. London, 1848.

Kingsley (Mary H.), 'The Fetish View of the Human Soul'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. viii. London, 1897.

---- _Travels in West Africa_. London, 1897.

---- _West African Studies_. London, 1901.

Kipling (J. Lockwood), _Beast and Man in India_. London, 1891.

Kirke (Henry), _Twenty-five Years in British Guiana_. London, 1898.

Kittlitz (F. H. von), _Denkwürdigkeiten einer Reise nach dem russischen Amerika, nach Mikronesien und durch Kamtschatka_. 2 vols. Gotha, 1858.

Klemm (G.), _Allgemeine Cultur-Geschichte der Menschheit_. 10 vols. Leipzig. 1843-52.

Klenze (--), 'Die Cognaten und Affinen nach Römischem Rechte in Vergleichung mit andern verwandten Rechten'; in _Zeitschr. f. geschichtliche Rechtswiss._ ed. by F. C. von Savigny and others, vol. vi. Berlin & Stettin, 1828.

Kloss (C. B.), _In the Andamans and Nicobars_. London, 1903.

Klugmann (N.), _Die Frau im Talmud_. Wien, 1898.

Klunzinger (C.-B.), _Upper Egypt_. Trans. London, 1878.

Knox (William), _Three Tracts respecting the Conversion and Instruction of the Free Indians and Negroe Slaves in the Colonies_. London, 1789.

Kobelt (W.), _Reiseerinnerungen aus Algerien und Tunis_. Frankfurt a. M., 1885.

Koch (Theodor), 'Die Anthropophagie der südamerikanischen Indianer'; in _Internationales Archiv f. Ethnographie_, vol. xii. Leiden, 1899.

Köhler (J. A. E.), _Volksbrauch, Aberglauben, &c. im Voigtlande_. Leipzig, 1867.

Koenigswarter (L. J.), _Études historiques sur le développement de la société humaine_. Paris, 1850.

---- _Histoire de l'organisation de la famille en France_. Paris, 1851.

Kohl (J. G.), _Kitchi-Gami. Wanderings round Lake Superior_. Trans. London, 1860.

---- _Reise nach Istrien, Dalmatien und Montenegro_. 2 vols. Dresden, 1851.

Kohler (J.), _Altindisches Prozessrecht_. Stuttgart, 1891.

---- 'Das Banturecht in Ostafrika'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xv. Stuttgart, 1901.

---- 'Indisches Ehe- und Familienrecht'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. iii. Stuttgart, 1882.

---- 'Das Recht der Herero'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xiv. Stuttgart, 1900.

---- 'Das Recht der Hottentotten'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xv. Stuttgart, 1901.

---- 'Das Recht der Marschallinsulaner'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xiv. Stuttgart, 1900.

---- 'Das Recht der Papuas'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xiv. Stuttgart, 1900.

---- 'Die Rechte der Urvölker Nordamerikas'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergleichende Rechtswiss._ vol. xii. Stuttgart, 1897.

---- _Rechtsvergleichende Studien über islamitisches Recht, &c._ Berlin, 1889.

---- _Shakespeare vor dem Forum der Jurisprudenz_. Würzburg, 1883.--_Nachwort_. Würzburg, 1884.

{794} Kohler (J.) and Peiser (F. E.), _Aus dem Babylonischen Rechtsleben_. 4 vols. Leipzig, 1890-98.

Kolben (Peter), _The Present State of the Cape of Good-Hope_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1731.

Kolff (D. H.), _Voyage of the Dutch Brig of War Dourga, through the Southern Parts of the Moluccan Archipelago, &c._ London, 1840.

Kollmann (Paul), _The Victoria Nyanza_. Trans. London, 1899.

Koppenfels (H. von), 'Meine Jagden auf Gorillas'; in _Die Gartenlaube_, 1877. Leipzig.

Korân (The). Trans. by J. M. Rodwell. London, 1876.

---- See _Qur'ân (The)_.

Kosmos. Leipzig.

Kotzebue (O. von), _A Voyage of Discovery into the South Sea and Behring's Straits_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1821.

Kovalewsky (Maxime), _Coutume contemporaine et loi ancienne_. Paris, 1893.

---- _Modern Customs and Ancient Laws of Russia_. London, 1891.

---- 'Les origines du devoir'; in _Revue Internationale de sociologie_, vol. ii. Paris, 1894.

---- _Tableau des origines et de l'évolution de la famille et de la propriété_. Stockholm, 1890.

Krafft-Ebing (R. von), _Lehrbuch der Gerichtlichen Psychopatologie_. Stuttgart, 1900.

---- _Psychopathia sexualis_. Stuttgart, 1903.

Krapf (J. L.), _Reisen in Ost-Afrika_. 2 vols. Kornthal & Stuttgart, 1858.

---- _Travels, Researches, and Missionary Labours, during an Eighteen Years' Residence in Eastern Africa_. London, 1860.

Krasheninnikoff (S. P.), _The History of Kamschatka, and the Kurilski Islands_. Trans. Glocester, 1764.

Krause (Aurel), _Die Tlinkit-Indianer_. Jena, 1885.

Krause (Ernst), 'Die Ablösung der Menschenopfer'; in _Kosmos_, vol. iii. Leipzig, 1878.

Krauss (F. S.), 'Das Bauopfer bei den Südslaven'; in _Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien_, vol. xvii. Wien, 1887.

---- _Sitte und Brauch der Südslaven_. Wien, 1885.

Kremer (Alfred von), _Culturgeschichte des Orients unter den Chalifen_. 2 vols. Wien, 1875-77.

---- _Studien zur vergleichenden Culturgeschichte_. 2 parts. (Reprinted from _Sitzungsberichte der Kais. Akademie der Wissenschaften in Wien, Philosophisch-historische Classe_, vol. cxx.) Wien, 1889-90.

Kropf (A.), _Das Volk der Xosa-Kaffern im östlichen Südafrika_. Berlin, 1889.

Kropotkin (P.), _Mutual Aid_. London, 1902.

Kubary (J.), 'Die Bewohner der Mortlock Inseln'; in _Mittheilungen der Geographischen Gesellschaft in Hamburg_, 1878-79.

---- 'Die Ebongruppe im Marshall's Archipel'; in _Journal des Museum Godeffroy_, pt. i. Hamburg, 1873.

---- _Ethnographische Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Karolinischen Inselgruppe. Heft I.: Die socialen Einrichtungen der Pelauer_. Berlin, 1885.

---- 'Die Palau-Inseln in der Südsee'; in _Journal des Museum Godeffroy_, pt. iv. Hamburg, 1873.

---- 'Die Religion der Pelauer'; in Bastian, _Allerlei aus Volks- und Menschenkunde_, vol. i. Berlin, 1888.

{795} Kubary (J.), 'Die Verbrechen und das Strafverfahren auf den Pelau-Inseln'; in _Original-Mittheilungen aus der ethnologischen Abtheilung der königlichen Museen zu Berlin_, vol. i. Berlin, 1886.

Kükenthal (W.), _Ergebnisse einer zoologischen Forschungsreise in den Molukken und Borneo. Erster Teil: Reisebericht_. Frankfurt a. M., 1896.

Kuenen (A.), _Hibbert Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions_. London, 1882.

---- _The Religion of Israel_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1874-75.

Labat (J. B.), _Relation historique de l'Éthiopie occidentale_. 5 vols. Paris, 1732.

Labbe (Ph.), _Sacrorum Conciliorum collectio_. Ed. by J. D. Mansi. 31 vols. Florentiae, Venetiis, 1759-98.

Labillardière (J. J. Houtou de), _An Account of a Voyage in Search of La Pérouse in the Years 1791-93_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1800.

Laboulaye (E.), _Recherches sur la condition civile et politique des femmes_. Paris, 1843.

Lactantius (L. C. F.), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. vi.-vii.) Parisiis, 1844.

Läffler (L. F.), _Den gottländska Taksteinar-sägnen_. (_Bidrag till kännedom om de svenska landsmålen ock svenskt folkliv_, vol. xix. art. 6.) Stockholm, 1903.

---- 'Om den fornsvenska hednalagen'; in _Kongl. Vitterhets Historie och Antiquitets Akademiens Månadsbad_, vol. viii. Stockholm, 1879.

Lafitau (J. F.), _Moeurs des sauvages ameriquains_. 2 vols. Paris, 1724.

La Flesche (F.), 'Death and Funeral Customs among the Omahas'; in _The Journal of American Folk-Lore_, vol. ii. Boston & New York, 1889.

Lagerborg (Rolf), 'La nature de la morale'; in _Revue Internationale de sociologie_, vol. xi. Paris, 1903.

Lago (V.), _Memorie sulla Dalmazia_. 3 vols. Venezia, 1869-71.

Lahontan (J. de), _Mémoires de l'Amérique septentrionale_. La Haye, 1703.

Laing (A. Gordon), _Travels in the Timannee, Kooranko, and Soolima Countries in Western Africa_. London, 1825.

Laing (Samuel), _Notes of a Traveller, on the Social and Political State of France, Prussia, Switzerland, Italy, &c._ London, 1842.

Laistner (L.), _Das Recht in der Strafe_. München, 1872.

Lala (R. Reyes), _The Philippine Islands_. New York, 1899.

Lallemand (Léon), _Histoire des enfants abandonnés et délaissés_. Paris, 1885.

Lancelot du Lac. 3 vols. Paris, 1520.

Landa (Diego de), _Relacion de las cosas de Yucatan_. Paris, 1864.

'Landnámabók'; in _Íslendínga sögur, udgivne af Del Kongelige Nordiske Oldskrift-Selskab_, vol. i. Kjøbenhavn, 1843.

Landor (A. H. Savage), _Alone with the Hairy Ainu_. London, 1893.

Landtman (G.), _The Origin of Priesthood_. Ekenaes, 1905.

Lane (E. W.), _An Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians_. 2 vols. London, 1871.

---- The same work. London, 1896.

---- _Arabian Society in the Middle Ages_. Ed. by Stanley Lane-Poole. London, 1883.

Lane-Poole (Stanley), _The Speeches and Table-Talk of the Prophet Mohammad_. London, 1882.

---- _Studies in a Mosque_. London, 1893.

Lanessan (J.-L. de), _La morale des philosophes chinois_. Paris, 1896.

{796} Lang (Andrew), _Magic and Religion_. London, 1901.

---- _The Making of Religion_. London, 1898.

---- _Social Origins_. London, 1903.

Lang (J. D.), _Cooksland in North-Eastern Australia_. London, 1847.

---- _Queensland_. London, 1861.

Langkavel (B.), 'Pferde und Naturvölker'; in _Internationales Archiv für Ethnographie_, vol. i. Leiden, 1888.

Langsdorf (G. H. von), _Voyages and Travels in various Parts of the World, during the Years, 1803-1807_. 2 vols. London, 1813-14.

La Nouë (François de), _Discours politiques et militaires_. Basle, 1587.

La Pérouse (J. F. G. de), _A Voyage round the World, in the Years 1785-88_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1799.

Lappenberg (J. M.), _A History of England under the Anglo-Saxon Kings_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1881.

Larger Catechism (The), agreed upon by the Assembly of Divines at Westminster. Ed. by H. Cooke. Belfast, 1833.

La Roche-Fontenilles (L. A. M. de), _L'Église et la pitié envers les animaux_. Paris, &c., 1903.

La Rochefoucauld (F. de), _Les maximes_. Paris, 1881.

La Salle (R. R. de), 'An Account of Monsieur de la Salle's Last Expedition and Discoveries in North America'; in _Collections of the New-York Historical Society, for the Year 1814_, vol. ii. New-York, 1814.

Lasaulx (Ernst von), _Der Eid bei den Römern_. Würzburg, 1844.

---- _Der Fluch bei Griechen und Römern_. Würzburg, 1843.

---- _Die Sühnopfer der Griechen und Römer_. Würzburg, 1841.

Lasch (Richard), 'Die Behandlung der Leiche des Selbstmörders'; in _Globus_, vol. lxxvi. Braunschweig, 1899.

---- 'Besitzen die Naturvölker ein persönliches Ehrgefühl?' in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissensch._ vol. iii. Berlin, 1900.

---- 'Rache als Selbstmordmotiv'; in _Globus_, vol. lxxiv. Braunschweig, 1898.

---- 'Religiöser Selbstmord und seine Beziehung zum Menschenopfer'; in _Globus_, vol. lxxv. Braunschweig, 1899.

---- 'Der Selbstmord aus erotischen Motiven bei den primitiven Völkern'; in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissensch._ vol. ii. Berlin, 1899.

Lasson (Adolf), _System der Rechtsphilosophie_. Berlin & Leipzig, 1882.

Latham (R. G.), _Descriptive Ethnology_. 2 vols. London, 1859.

Laurent (François), _Études sur l'histoire de l'Humanité_. 18 vols. Paris, 1865-80.

Laurie (S. S.), _Ethica_. London, 1891.

Laurière (E. de), _Glossaire du droit françois_. Niort, 1882.

Laveleye (É. de), _De la propriété et de ses formes primitives_. Paris, 1874.

---- _Das Ureigenthum_. Ed. by K. Bücher. Leipzig, 1879.

Law Quarterly Review (The). Ed. by Sir F. Pollock. London.

Law Reports, Cases determined in the Queen's Bench Division. London, 1876, &c.

Lawrence (John), _A Philosophical and Practical Treatise on Horses, and on the Moral Duties of Man towards the Brute Creation_. 2 vols. London, 1796-98.

Lawrence (T. J.), _Essays on some disputed Questions in Modern International Law_. Cambridge, 1885.

{797}_Laws of Manu (The)_. Trans. by G. Bühler. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxv.) Oxford, 1886.

Layard (A. H.), _Discoveries in the Ruins of Nineveh and Babylon_. London, 1853.

Lea (H. C.), _An Historical Sketch of Sacerdotal Celibacy in the Christian Church_. Boston, 1884.

---- _A History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages_. 3 vols. London, 1888.

---- _Superstition and Force_. Philadelphia, 1892.

Le Blant (E.), _Inscriptions chrétiennes de la Gaule antérieures au VIII. siècle_. 2 vols. Paris, 1856-65.

Le Bon (Gustave), _La civilisation des Arabes_. Paris, 1884.

Lecky (W. E. H.), _Democracy and Liberty_. 2 vols. London, 1899.

---- _History of European Morals from Augustus to Charlemagne_. 2 vols. London, 1890.

---- _History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe_. 2 vols. London, 1893.

Leem (Knud), _Beskrivelse over Finmarkens Lapper_. Kjöbenhavn, 1767.

Leffler (L. F.). See Läffler.

'Leges Burgundionum'; in Pertz, _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_, Leges, vol. iii. Hannoverae, 1863.

Legge (James), _The Chinese Classics_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1893-95.

---- _The Notions of the Chinese concerning God and Spirits_. Hongkong, 1852.

---- _The Religions of China_. London, 1880.

Legis Duodecim Tabularum reliquiæ. Ed. by R. Schoell. Lipsiae, 1866.

Legoyt (A.), _Le suicide ancien et moderne_. Paris, 1881.

Legrand (Louis), _L'idée de patrie_. Paris, 1897.

Le Grand d'Aussy (P. J. B.), _Histoire de la vie privée des François_. Ed. by J. B. B. de Roquefort. 3 vols. Paris, 1815.

Leguével de Lacombe (B. F.), _Voyage à Madagascar et aux Iles Comores_. 2 vols. Paris, 1840.

Lehmann (Alfr.), _Hovedlovene for det menneskelige Følelseliv_. København, 1892.

Lehmann (E.), _Zarathustra_. 2 vols. København, 1899-1902.

Leibnitz (G. W.), _Essais de Theodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme, et l'origine du mal_. Amsterdam, 1712.

Leist (B. W.), _Alt-arisches Jus Civile_. 2 vols. Jena, 1892-96.

---- _Alt-arisches Jus Gentium_. Jena, 1889.

---- _Græco-italische Rechtsgeschichte_. Jena, 1884.

Le Mesurier (C. J. R.), 'The Veddás of Ceylon'; in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc. Ceylon Branch_, vol. ix. Colombo, 1887.

Leo Africanus, _The History and Description of Africa_. Trans. ed. by R. Brown. 3 vols. London, 1896.

Leo I. (_Saint_), surnamed _the Great_, _Opera omnia_. 3 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. liv.-lvi.) Parisiis, 1846.

Leonhardi (M. von), 'Über einige religiöse und totemistische Vorstellungen der Aranda und Loritja in Zentralaustralien'; in _Globus_, vol. xci. Braunschweig, 1907.

Lepsius (Richard), _Letters from Egypt, Ethiopia, and the Peninsula of Sinai_. Trans. London, 1853.

Leslie (David), _Among the Zulus and Amatongas_. Edinburgh, 1875.

{798} Letourneau (Ch.), _L'évolution de la morale_. Paris, 1887.

---- _L'évolution religieuse dans les diverses races humaines_. Paris, 1892.

Leuba (J. H.), _A Psychological Study of Religion_. New York, 1912.

Le Vaillant (François), _Travels from the Cape of Good-Hope, into the Interior Parts of Africa_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1790.

Levy (Jacob), _Neuhebräisches und Chaldäisches Wörterbuch über die Talmudim_. 4 vols. Leipzig, 1876-89.

Lewin (T. H.), _The Hill Tracts of Chittagong_. Calcutta, 1869.

---- _Wild Races of South-Eastern India_. London, 1870.

Lewis (A. H.), _A Critical History of Sunday Legislation_. New York, 1888.

---- _Paganism surviving in Christianity_. London, 1892.

Lewis (M.) and Clarke (W.), _Travels to the Source of the Missouri River, &c._ London, 1814.

'Lex Baiuwariorum'; in Pertz, _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_, Leges, vol. iii. Hannoverae, 1863.

Lex Duodecim Tabularum. See _Legis, &c._

Lex Frisionum. Ed. by E. T. Gaupp. Vratislaviae, 1832.

'Lex Ripuariorum'; in Georgisch, _Corpus juris Germanici antiqui_. Halae Magdeburgicae, 1738.

Lex Salica: The Ten Texts with the Glosses, and the Lex Emendata. Ed. by J. H. Hessels. London, 1880.

'Lex Saxonum'; in Pertz, _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_, Leges, vol. v. Hannoverae, 1875-89.

'Lex Wisigothorum'; in Georgisch, _Corpus juris Germanici antiqui_. Halae Magdeburgicae, 1738.

Leyden (J.), 'On the Languages and Literature of the Indo-Chinese Nations'; in _Asiatic Researches_, vol. x. Calcutta, 1811.

Lî Kî (The). Trans. by J. Legge. 2 vols. (_The Sacred Books of the East_. vols. xxvii.-xxviii.) Oxford, 1885.

Lichtenberg (G. Chr.), _Vermischte Schriften_. 9 vols. Göttingen, 1800-06.

Lichtenstein (H.), _Travels in Southern Africa_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1812-15.

Lichtschein (L.), _Die Ehe nach mosaisch-talmudischer Auffassung_. Leipzig, 1879.

Liddell (H. G.) and Scott (R.), _A Greek-English Lexicon_. Oxford, 1897.

Liebich (R.), _Die Zigeuner_. Leipzig, 1863.

Liebrecht (Felix), _Zur Volkskunde_. Heilbronn, 1879.

Lilly (W. S.), _On Right and Wrong_. London, 1891.

Lindenbrog (F.), _Codex legum antiquarum_. Francofurti, 1613.

Lippert (Julius), _Christenthum, Volksglaube und Volksbrauch_. Berlin, 1882.

---- _Kulturgeschichte der Menschheit_. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1886-87.

---- _Die Religionen der europäischen Culturvölker_. Berlin, 1881.

---- _Der Seelencult in seinen Beziehungen zur althebräischen Religion_. Berlin, 1881.

Lisiansky (U.), _A Voyage round the World_. London, 1814.

Lisle (E.), _Du suicide_. Paris, 1856.

Liszt (Franz von), _La législation pénale comparée. Publiée par l'Union Internationale de droit pénal. 1er volume: Le droit criminel des états européens_. Berlin, 1894.

---- _Lehrbuch des deutschen Strafrechts_. Berlin, 1891.

Little (H. W.), _Madagascar_. Edinburgh & London, 1884.

{799} Littré (É.), _Dictionnaire de la langue française_. 2 vols. Paris, 1863-72.

---- _Études sur les Barbares et le Moyen Age_. Paris, 1867.

Livingstone (D.), _The Last Journals of, in Central Africa_. Ed. by H. Waller. 2 vols. London, 1874.

---- _Missionary Travels and Researches in South Africa_. London, 1857.

---- and Livingstone (Charles), _Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi and its Tributaries_. London, 1865.

Livy (T.), _Historiarum libri qui supersunt_. 25 vols. Londini, 1828.

Lobo (J.), _A Voyage to Abyssinia_. Trans. London, 1887.

Locke (John), _Philosophical Works_. London, 1843.

---- _Two Treatises of Government_. London, 1713.

Locqueneuille (Scarsez de), _L'esclavage, ses promoteurs et ses adversaires_. Liège, 1890.

Löw (Leopold), _Gesammelte Schriften_. 4 vols. Szegedin, 1889-98.

Logan (James), _The Scottish Gaël_. Ed. by Alex. Stewart. 2 vols. Inverness [1876].

Logan (William), _Words of Comfort for Parents bereaved of Little Children_. London, 1861.

Loir (A.), 'L'esclavage en Tunisie'; in _Revue scientifique_, ser. iv. vol. xii. Paris, 1899.

Lomonaco (A.), 'Sulle razze indigene del Brasile'; in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, vol. xix. Firenze, 1889.

Lopez Cogolludo (Diego), _Historia de Yucathan_. Madrid, 1688.

Lorimer (James), _The Institutes of the Law of Nations_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1883-84.

Loskiel (G. H.), _History of the Mission of the United Brethren among the Indians in North America_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1794.

Lovisato (Domenico), 'Appunti etnografici con accenni geologici sulla Terra del Fuoco'; in _Cosmos_, ed. by Guido Cora, vol. viii. Torino, 1884-85.

Low (Hugh), _Sarawak_. London, 1848.

Loysel (Antoine), _Institutes coutumières_. Ed. by M. Dupin and Éd. Laboulaye. 2 vols. Paris, 1846.

Lubbock (_Sir_ John). See Avebury (_Lord_).

Lucian, _Opera_. Parisiis, 1867.

Ludwig (G.), _Tertullian's Ethik_. Leipzig, 1885.

Lumholtz (Carl), _Among Cannibals_. London, 1889.

---- _Unknown Mexico_. 2 vols. London, 1903.

'Lun Yü'; in Legge, _The Chinese Classics_, vol. i. Oxford, 1893.

Lyall (A. C.), _Asiatic Studies_. London, 1882.

Lycurgus, _Oratio in Leocratem_. Ed. by F. Blass. Lipsiae, 1899.

---- The same work. Ed. and trans. by E. Jenicke. Leipzig, 1856.

Lyon (G. F.), _The Private Journal during the Voyage of Discovery under Captain Parry_. London, 1824.

Lyttelton (George), _The History of the Life of King Henry the Second_. 4 vols. London, 1767-71.

Mabille (Paul), _La guerre_. Paris, 1884.

MacCauley (Clay), 'The Seminole Indians of Florida'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. v. 1887.

McCord (D. J.), _The Statutes at large of South Carolina_. 10 vols. Columbia (S. C.), 1836-41.

{800} McCoy (Isaac), _History of Baptist Indian Missions_. Washington, 1840.

McCurdy (J. F.), 'The Moral Evolution of the Old Testament'; in _The American Journal of Theology_, vol. i. Chicago, 1897.

Macdonald (D.), _Oceania_. Melbourne & London, 1889.

Macdonald (Duff), _Africana_. 2 vols. London, 1882.

Macdonald (James), 'East Central African Customs'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxii. London, 1893.

---- _Light in Africa_. London, 1890.

---- _Religion and Myth_. London, 1893.

Macdonell (A. A.), _Vedic Mythology_. Strassburg, 1897.

Macfie (M.), _Vancouver Island and British Columbia_. London, 1865.

McGee (W. J.), 'The Seri Indians'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xvii. pt. i. Washington, 1898.

---- 'The Siouan Indians'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xv. Washington, 1897.

Macgillivray (John), _Narrative of the Voyage of H.M.S. Rattlesnake_. 2 vols. London, 1852.

MacGregor (William), 'Lagos, Abeokuta, and the Alake'; in _Jour. African Soc._ nr. xii. London, 1904.

Machiavelli (Niccolo), _Opere_. 10 vols. Milano, 1804-05.

Macieiowski (W. A.), _Slavische Rechtsgeschichte_. Trans. 4 vols. Stuttgart & Leipzig, 1835-39.

Mackenzie (Alex.), _Voyages from Montreal to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans_. London, 1801.

Mackenzie (John S.), _A Manual of Ethics_. London, 1900.

Mackenzie (Thomas), _Studies in Roman Law_. Ed. by John Kirkpatrick. Edinburgh, 1886.

Mackintosh (John), _The History of Civilisation in Scotland_. 4 vols. Aberdeen, 1878-92.

Maclean (John), _A Compendium of Kafir Laws and Customs_. Mount Coke, 1858.

McLennan (J. F.), 'The Levirate and Polyandry'; in _The Fortnightly Review_, new ser. vol. xxi. London, 1877._

---- _Studies in Ancient History_. London, 1886.

M'Leod (John), _A Voyage to Africa, with some Account of the Manners and Customs of the Dahomian People_. London, 1820.

MacMahon (A. R.), _Far Cathay and Farther India_. London, 1893.

Macmillan (Michael), _The Promotion of General Happiness_. London, 1890.

McNair (F.), _Perak and the Malays_. London, 1878.

Macpherson (S. C.), 'An Account of the Religious Opinions and Observances of the Khonds'; in _Jour. Roy. Asiatic Soc._ vol. vii. London, 1843.

---- _Memorials of Service in India_. London, 1865.

Macrae (John), 'Account of the Kookies'; in _Asiatick Researches_, vol. vii. Calcutta, 1831.

Mac Ritchie (David), _The Aïnos_. Leiden, 1892.

Macrobius (A. T.), _Opera_. Ed. by L. Janus. 2 vols. Quedlinburgi & Lipsiae, 1845-52.

Madras Government Museum's _Bulletins_. Madras.

Magalhanes de Gandavo (Pero de), _Histoire de la Province de Sancta-Crux_. Trans. Paris, 1837.

Magazine of American History (The). New York & Chicago.

Magyar (L.), _Reisen in Süd-Afrika_. Pest & Leipzig, 1859.

{801}_Mahabharata of Krishna-Dwaipayana Vyasa_. Trans. by P. Chandra Roy. 18 vols. Calcutta, 1883-96.

Mahaffy (J. P.), _Social Life in Greece from Homer to Menander_. London, 1874.

Maine (_Sir_ H. Sumner), _Ancient Law_. London, 1885.

---- _Dissertations on Early Law and Custom_. London, 1891.

---- _Lectures on the Early History of Institutions_. London, 1875.

---- _The Whewell Lectures. International Law_. London, 1888.

Maitland (S. R.), _The Dark Ages_. London, 1844.

Makarewicz (J.), _Évolution de la peine_. _S. l. & d._

'Makkoth'; in _Le Talmud de Jérusalem_, trans. by M. Schwab, vol. xi. Paris, 1889.

Malalas (J.), 'Chronographia'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. xcvii. Parisiis, 1860.

Malcolm (_Sir_ John), _A Memoir of Central India_. 2 vols. London, 1823.

---- _Sketch of the Sikhs_. London, 1812.

Malinowski (B.), _The Family among the Australian Aborigines_. London, 1913.

Mallat (J.), _Les Philippines_. 2 vols. Paris, 1846.

Mallery (Garrick), _Israelite and Indian_. New York, 1889.

---- 'Manners and Meals'; in _The American Anthropologist_, vol. i. Washington, 1888.

Mallet (P. H.), _Northern Antiquities_. Trans. London, 1847.

Malloch (M. M.), 'How the Church dealt with Slavery'; in _The Month_, vol. xxvii. London, 1876.

Malone (R. E.), _Three Years' Cruise in the Australian Colonies_. London, 1854.

Man. A Monthly Record of Anthropological Science. London.

Man (E. G.), _Sonthalia and the Sonthals_. London, [1867].

Man (E. H.), 'On the Aboriginal Inhabitants of the Andaman Islands'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xii. London, 1885.

Manacéine (Marie), _Le surmenage mental dans la civilisation moderne_. Trans. Paris, 1890.

Mandeville (B. de), _The Fable of the Bees_. London, 1724.

Manning (James), 'Notes on the Aborigines of New Holland'; in _Jour. and Proceed. Roy. Soc. N.S. Wales_, 1882, vol. xvi. Sydney, 1883.

Mansel (H. L.), _Prolegomena Logica_. Oxford, 1860.

Mantegazza (Paolo), _Rio de la Plata e Tenerife_. Milano, 1867.

---- 'Studii sull' etnologia dell' India'; in _Archivio per l'antropologia e la etnologia_, vol. xiii. Firenze, 1883.

Manu, The Laws of. See _Laws of Manu (The)_.

Manual of the Laws of War on Land. Prepared by the Institute of International Law. Trans. (Appendix No. III. in Lorimer, _The Institutes of the Law of Nations_, vol. ii.) Edinburgh, 1884.

Manzoni (Alessandro), _Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica_. Firenze, 1887.

Marcellinus (Ammianus), _Rerum gestarum libri qui supersunt_. Ed. by V. Gardthausen. 2 vols. Lipsiae, 1874-75.

Marcgravius de Liebstad (G.), _Historia rerum naturalium Brasiliæ_. Lugduni Batavorum & Amstelodami, 1648.

Marculfus, 'Formularum libri duo'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_. vol. lxxxvii. Parisiis, 1851.

{802} Marcus Aurelius, _Commentariorum libri XII._ Ed. by I. Stich. Lipsiæ, 1903.

Mareschalcus (Nicolaus), 'Annalium Herulorum ac Vandalorum libri septem'; in _Monumenta inedita rerum Germanicarum, &c._, ed. by E. J. de Westphalen, vol. i. Lipsiae, 1739.

Marett (R. R.), _Anthropology_. London, 1912.

---- _The Threshold of Religion_. London, 1914.

Marillier (L.), _La survivance de l'âme et l'idée de justice chez les peuples non civilisés_. Paris, 1894.

Mariner (William), _An Account of the Natives of the Tonga Islands_. Compiled by John Martin. 2 vols. London, 1817.

Mariti (Giovanni), _Travels through Cyprus, Syria, and Palestine_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1791-92.

Markham (A. H.), _The Cruise of the "Rosario" amongst the New Hebrides and Santa Cruz Islands_. London, 1873.

Markham (_Sir_ C. R.), _A History of Peru_. Chicago, 1892.

---- 'A List of the Tribes in the Valley of the Amazon'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxiv. London, 1895.

---- 'On the Geographical Positions of the Tribes which formed the Empire of the Yncas'; in _Jour. Roy. Geo. Soc._ vol. xli. London, 1871.

Marquardt (J.), _Römische Staatsverwaltung_. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1873-78.

Marquette (Jacques), _Récit des voyages et des découvertes_. Albanie (N.Y.), 1855.

Marsden (W.), _The History of Sumatra_. London, 1811.

Marshall (Frederic), _International Vanities_. Edinburgh & London, 1875.

Marshall (H. R.), _Pain, Pleasure, and Æsthetics_. London, 1894.

Marshall (W. E.), _A Phrenologist amongst the Todas_. London, 1873.

Martensen (H.), _Christian Ethics_. [_General Part_.] Trans. Edinburgh, _s. d._

---- _Christian Ethics. Special Part. Individual Ethics_. Trans. Edinburgh, 1881.

Martialis (M. V.), _Epigrammata_. 3 vols. Londini, 1822-23.

Martin (Henri), _Histoire de France depuis les temps les plus reculés jusqu'en 1789_. 17 vols. Paris, 1878.

Martin (K.), _Reisen in den Molukken, &c._ Leiden, 1894.

Martineau (James), _Types of Ethical Theory_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1891.

Martinengo-Cesaresco (_Countess_ Evelyn), _Essays in the Study of Folk-Songs_. London, 1886.

Martius (C. F. Ph. von), _Beiträge zur Ethnographie und Sprachenkunde Amerika's zumal Brasiliens_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1867.

---- _Von dem Rechtszustande unter den Ureinwohnern Brasiliens_. München, 1832.

Marx (Karl), _Capital_. Trans. Ed. by F. Engels. London, 1896.

Mas (S. de), _Informe sobre el estado de las Islas Filipinas en 1842_. Vol. i. Madrid, 1843.

Mason (F.), 'On Dwellings, Works of Art, Laws, &c. of the Karens'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xxxvii. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1868.

---- 'Physical Character of the Karens'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xxxv. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1867.

---- 'Religion, Mythology, and Astronomy among the Karens'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xxxiv. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1865.

Mason (O. T.), _Woman's Share in Primitive Culture_. London, 1895.

Maspero (G.), _The Dawn of Civilization_. Trans. London, 1896.

{803} Maspero (G.), _Études de mythologie et d'archéologie égyptiennes_. 2 vols. Paris, 1893.

---- _Life in Ancient Egypt and Assyria_. Trans. London, 1892.

Massey (William), _A History of England during the Reign of George III._ 4 vols. London, 1865.

Mathew (John), 'The Australian Aborigines'; in _Jour. and Proceed. Roy. Soc. N.S. Wales_, vol. xxiii. London & Sydney, 1889.

---- _Eaglehawk and Crow_. London & Melbourne, 1899.

Mathews (R. H.), _Ethnological Notes on the Aboriginal Tribes of N.S. Wales and Victoria_. Sydney, 1905.

Matiegka (H.), 'Anthropophagie in der prähistorischen Ansiedlung bei Knovize und in der prähistorischen Zeit überhaupt'; in _Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien_, vol. xxvi. Wien, 1896.

Matignon (J.-J.), 'Deux mots sur la pédérastie en Chine'; in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, vol. xiv. Paris, 1899.

---- 'Le suicide en Chine'; in _Archives d'anthropologie criminelle_, vol. xii. Paris, 1897.

Matthews (Washington), _Ethnography and Philology of the Hidatsa Indians_. Washington, 1877.

---- _Navaho Legends_. (_Memoirs of the American Folk-Lore Society_, vol. v.) Boston & New York, 1897.

---- 'The Study of Ethics among the Lower Races'; in _Jour. American Folk-Lore_, vol. xii. Boston & New York, 1899.

Maudsley (Henry), _Responsibility in Mental Disease_. London, 1892.

Maurer (Konrad), _Die Bekehrung des Norwegischen Stammes zum Christenthume_. 2 vols. München, 1856.

Maury (L. F. A.), _Histoire des religions de la Grèce antique_. 3 vols. Paris, 1857-59.

Mauss (M.), 'La religion et les origines du droit pénal'; in _Revue de l'histoire des religions_, vols. xxxiv.-xxxv. Paris, 1896-97.

Maximus Tyrius, _Dissertationes_. Ed. by F. Dübner. Parisiis, 1840.

May (Th. Erskine), _The Constitutional History of England since the Accession of George III. 1760-1860_. 2 vols. London, 1863.

Mayer (S.), _Die Rechte der Israeliten, Athener und Römer_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1862-66.

Mayne (J. D.), _A Treatise on Hindu Law and Usage_. Madras, 1888.

Mayne (R. C.), _Four Years in British Columbia and Vancouver Island_. London, 1862.

Mazzarella (G.), _La condizione giuridica del marito nella famiglia matriarcale_. Catania, 1899.

Meade (H.), _A Ride through the disturbed Districts of New Zealand_. London, 1870.

Meakin (Budgett), _The Moors_. London, 1902.

Meares (John), _Voyages made in the Years 1788 and 1789 from China to the North-West Coast of America_. London, 1790.

Medhurst (W. H.), 'Marriage, Affinity, and Inheritance in China'; in _Trans. Roy. Asiatic Soc. China Branch_, vol. iv. Hongkong, 1855.

Medwin (Thomas), _The Angler in Wales_. 2 vols. London, 1834.

'Meghilla'; in _Le Talmud de Jérusalem_, trans. by M. Schwab, vol. vi. Paris, 1883.

Mehring (G. von), _Die Frage von der Todesstrafe_. Stuttgart, 1867.

Meier (M. H. E.) and Schömann (G. F.), _Der attische Process_. Ed. by J. H. Lipsius. Berlin, 1883-87.

{804} Meiners (C.), _Allgemeine kritische Geschichte der Religioner_. 2 vols. Hannover, 1806-07.

---- _Grundriss der Geschichte der Menschheit_. Lemgo, 1785.

---- _History of the Female Sex_. Trans. 4 vols. London, 1808.

---- _Vergleichung des ältern und neuern Russlandes_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1798.

Meissner (B.), _Beiträge zum altbabylonischen Privatrecht_. Leipzig, 1893.

Mela (Pomponius), _De chorographia (situ orbis) libri tres_. Ed. by C. Frick. Lipsiae, 1880.

Mélusine. Revue de mythologie, littérature populaire, traditions et usages. Ed. by H. Gaidoz. Paris.

Melville (H.), _Typee_. London, [1892].

Mémoires de l'Institut Royal de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres. Paris.

Memoirs of the American Folk-Lore Society. Boston & New York.

---- _of the American Museum of Natural History_. New York.

---- _of the International Congress of Anthropology_. Ed. by C. Staniland Wake. Chicago, 1894.

Ménabréa (Léon), _De l'origine de la forme et de l'esprit des jugements rendus au moyen-âge contre les animaux_. Chambéry, 1846.

Mencius, 'The Works of'; in Legge. _The Chinese Classics_, vol. ii. Oxford, 1895.

Mendelsohn (S.), _The Criminal Jurisprudence of the Ancient Hebrews_. Baltimore, 1891.

Menger (Anton), _The Right to the Whole Produce of Labour_. Trans. London, 1899.

Merker (M.), _Die Masai_. Berlin, 1904.

Merolla da Sorrento (J.), 'A Voyage to Congo.' Trans.; in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, vol. xvi. London, 1814.

Merzbacher (G.), _Aus den Hochregionen des Kaukasus_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1901.

Methodist Magazine. London.

Methodist Magazine. New York.

Methodius (_Saint_), 'Opera omnia'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. xviii. Parisiis, 1857.

Metz (F.), _The Tribes inhabiting the Neilgherry Hills_. Mangalore, 1864.

Meursius (J.), 'Themis Attica, sive de legibus Atticis'; in Gronovius, _Thesaurus Græcarum antiquitatum_, vol. v. Lugduni Batavorum, 1699.

Meyer (Eduard), _Geschichte des Alterthums_. Vol. i. Stuttgart, 1884.

Meyer (H. E. A.), 'Manners and Customs of the Aborigines of the Encounter Bay Tribe'; in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_. Adelaide, 1879.

Meyrick (F.), _Moral and Devotional Theology of the Church of Rome. No. I. S. Alfonso de Liguori's Theory of Truthfulness_. London, 1855.

Michaelis (J. D.), _Commentaries on the Laws of Moses_. Trans. 4 vols. London, 1814.

Michelet (J.), _Origines du droit français_. Paris, [1900].

Middleton (C.), _A Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers, Which are supposed to have subsisted in the Christian Church_. London, 1749.

Mielziner (M.), _Die Verhältnisse der Sklaven bei den alien Hebräern_. Kopenhagen, 1859.

Migne (J. P.), _Patrologiæ cursus completus_. 221 vols. Parisiis, 1844-64.

---- _Patrologiæ cursus completus_. Series Græca. 162 vols. Parisiis, 1857-66.

Miklosich (Franz), 'Die Blutrache bei den Slaven'; in _Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe_, vol. xxxvi. Wien, 1888.

{805} Miler (E.), 'Die Hauskommunion der Südslaven'; in _Jahrbuch der internationalen Vereinigung für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft und Volkswirtschaftslehre zu Berlin_, vol. iii. Berlin, 1897.

Mill (James), _Analysis of the Phenomena of the Human Mind_. Ed. by J. S. Mill. 2 vols. London, 1869.

---- _A Fragment on Mackintosh_. London, 1835.

Mill (John Stuart), _An Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy_. London, 1865.

---- _Principles of Political Economy_. 2 vols. London, 1865.

---- _Utilitarianism_. London, 1895.

Millar (John), _The Origin of the Distribution of Ranks_. Edinburgh, 1806.

Millingen (J. G.), _The History of Duelling_. 2 vols. London, 1841.

Mills (Charles), _The History of Chivalry_. 2 vols. London, 1826.

Milman (H. H.), _History of Latin Christianity_. 9 vols. London, 1867.

Milton (J.), _Poetical Works_. Ed. by D. Masson. 3 vols. London, 1874.

Mind. A Quarterly Review of Psychology and Philosophy. London.

Mindeleff (C.), 'Navaho Houses'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xvii. Washington, 1898.

Missions Catholiques (Les). Lyon.

Missions-Blatt aus der Brüdergemeine. Hamburg.

Mitchell (T. L.), _Three Expeditions into the Interior of Eastern Australia_. 2 vols. London, 1839.

Mitford (A. B.), _Tales of Old Japan_. 2 vols. London, 1871.

Mittermaier (C. J. A. von), 'Beyträge zur Lehre vom Verbrechen des Kindesmordes'; in _Neues Archiv des Criminalrechts_, vol. vii. Halle, 1824-25.

---- _Grundsätze des gemeinen deutschen Privatrechts_. 2 vols. Regensburg, 1847.

---- _On the Effect of Drunkenness on Criminal Responsibility_. Trans. Edinburgh, 1841.

---- _Die Todesstrafe_. Heidelberg, 1862.

Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien.

---- _der Geographischen Gesellschaft (für Thüringen) zu Jena_.

---- _der Geographischen Gesellschaft in Hamburg_.

---- _der kais. und König. Geographischen Gesellschaft in Wien_.

---- _des Vereins für Erdkunde zu Halle a. S._

---- _des Vereins für Erdkunde zu Leipzig_.

Mockler-Ferryman (A. F.), _British Nigeria_. London, 1902.

Modigliani (Elio), _Un viaggio a Nías_. Milano, 1890.

Mökern (Ph. von), _Ostindien_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1857.

Möller (P.), Pagels (G.), and Gleerup (E.), _Tre år i Kongo_. 2 vols. Stockholm, 1887-88.

Moerenhout (J. A.), _Voyages aux îles du Grand Océan_. 2 vols. Paris, 1837.

Moffat (Robert), _Missionary Labours and Scenes in Southern Africa_. London, 1842.

---- The same work. London, 1846.

Molina (Christoval de), 'The Fables and Rites of the Yncas'; in _Narratives of the Rites and Laws of the Incas_. Trans. and ed. by C. R. Markham. London, 1873.

Molina (J. J.), _The Geographical, Natural, and Civil History of Chili_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1809.

{806} Moll (Albert), _Die Conträre Sexualempfindung_. Berlin, 1891.

Mommsen (Theodor), _History of Rome_. Trans. 5 vols. London, 1894.

---- _Römisches Strafrecht_. Leipzig, 1899.

Monier-Williams (Monier), _Br[=a]hmanism and Hind[=u]ism_. London, 1887.

---- _Buddhism_. London, 1890.

---- _Hinduism_. London, s.d.

---- _Indian Wisdom_. London, 1893.

Monrad (H. C.), _Bidrag til en Skildring af Guinea-Kysten og dens Indbyggere_. Kjøbenhavn, 1822.

Montaigne (M. de), _[OE]uvres_. Ed. by J. A. C. Buchon. Paris, 1837.

Montefiore (C. G.), _Hibbert Lectures on . . . the Religion of the Ancient Hebrews_. London, 1892.

Montesquieu (C. de Secondat de), _[OE]uvres_. Paris, 1837.

Montgomery (James), _Journal of Voyages and Travels by D. Tyerman and G. Bennet_. 2 vols. London, 1831.

Month and Catholic Review (The). London.

Mooney (James), 'Myths of the Cherokee'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xix. pt. i. Washington, 1900.

Moorcroft (William) and Trebeck (George), _Travels in the Himalayan Provinces of Hindustan and the Panjab_. Ed. by H. H. Wilson. 2 vols. London, 1841.

Moore (Charles), _A Full Inquiry into the Subject of Suicide, &c._ 2 vols. London, 1790.

Moore (Samuel), _The Public Acts in force; passed by the Legislature of Barbados, 1762-1800_. London, 1801.

Moore (Theofilus), _Marriage Customs, &c. of the Various Nations of the Universe_. London, 1814.

More (_Sir_ Thomas), _Utopia_. Trans. ed. by E. Arber. London, 1869.

Morehead (C. S.) and Brown (Mason), _A Digest of the Statute Laws of Kentucky_. 2 vols. Frankfort (Ky.), 1834.

Morgan (C. Lloyd), _Animal Life and Intelligence_. London, 1890-91.

Morgan (L. H.), _Houses and House-Life of the American Aborigines_. Washington, 1881.

---- _League of the Ho-de'-no-sau-nee, or Iroquois_. Rochester, 1851.

Morley (John), _Voltaire_. London, 1886.

Morrison (W. D.), _Crime and its Causes_. London, 1891.

Morselli (E.), _Il suicidio_. Milano, 1879.

Mort de Garin le Loherain (La). Ed. by É. du Méril. Paris, 1846.

Morte Darthur. London, 1868.

Moschus (Joannes), 'Pratum spirituale'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. lxxxvii. Parisiis, 1860.

Moseley (H. N.), _Notes by a Naturalist on the "Challenger."_ London, 1879.

---- 'On the Inhabitants of the Admiralty Islands, &c.'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. vi. London, 1877.

Mosheim (J. L. von), _Institutes of Ecclesiastical History_. 3 vols. London. 1863.

Mouhot (H.), _Travels in the Central Parts of Indo-China, &c._ 2 vols. London, 1864.

Mozley (J. B.), _Sermons preached before the University of Oxford_. London, 1883.

Müller (C. O.), _Dissertations on the Eumenides of Æschylus_. Trans. London & Cambridge, 1853.

{807} Müller (C. O.), _The History and Antiquities of the Doric Race_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1830.

Müller (Friedrich), _Allgemeine Ethnographie_. Wien, 1879.

---- _Reise der österreichischen Fregatte Novara um die Erde_. Ethnographie. Wien, 1868.

Müller (Friedrich Max), _Anthropological Religion_. London, 1892.

---- _Physical Religion_. London, 1891.

Müller (J. G.), _Geschichte der Amerikanischen Urreligionen_. Basel, 1867.

Müller (Josef), _Das sexuelle Leben der alten Kulturvölker_. Leipzig, 1902.

---- _Das sexuelle Leben der christlichen Kulturvölker_. Leipzig, 1904.

Müller (W. J.), _Die Africanische, Auff der Guineischen Gold-Cust gelegene Landschafft Fetu_. Hamburg, 1673.

Mürdter (F.), _Geschichte Babyloniens und Assyriens_. Ed. by F. Delitzsch. Calw & Stuttgart, 1891.

Muir (John), _Additional Moral and Religious Passages metrically rendered from the Sanskrit_. London, [1875].

---- _Original Sanskrit Texts_. 5 vols. London, 1868-84.

---- _Religious and Moral Sentiments metrically rendered from Sanskrit Writers_. London, 1875.

Muir (William), _The Life of Mahomet_. 4 vols. London, 1858-61.

Muirhead (J. H.), _The Elements of Ethics_. London, 1897.

Munzinger (W.), _Ostafrikanische Studien_. Schaffhausen, 1864.

---- _Ueber die Sitten und das Recht der Bogos_. Winterthur, 1859.

Muratori (L. A.), _Dissertazioni sopra le antichità Italiane_. 5 vols. Milano, 1836-37.

---- _Rerum Italicarum scriptores_. 25 vols. Mediolani, 1723-51.

Murdoch (John), 'Ethnological Results of the Point Barrow Expedition'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. ix. Washington, 1892.

Murray (A. W.), _Forty Years' Mission Work in Polynesia and New Guinea_. London, 1876.

Murray (J. A. H.), _A New English Dictionary_. Oxford, 1884, &c. _In progress_.

Murray (J. Clark), _An Introduction to Ethics_. London, 1891.

Musters (G. C.), _At Home with the Patagonians_. London, 1873.

Nachtigal (G.), _Sahara und Sudan_. 3 vols. Berlin, 1879-89.

Nadaillac (_Marquis_ de), 'L'anthropophagie et les sacrifices humains'; in _Revue des Deux Mondes_, vol. lxvi. Paris, 1884.

Nägelsbach (C. F. von), _Homerische Theologie_. Ed. by G. Autenrieth. Nürnberg, 1884.

---- _Die nachhomerische Theologie des griechischen Volksglaubens bis auf Alexander_. Nürnberg, 1857.

Nansen (F.), _Eskimo Life_. Trans. London, 1893.

---- _The First Crossing of Greenland_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1890.

'Nârada,' trans. by J. Jolly; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxxiii. Oxford, 1889.

Narrative of the Chinese Embassy to the Khan of the Tourgouth Tartars. Trans. from the Chinese by Sir G. T. Staunton. London, 1821.

Narratives of the Rites and Laws of the Yncas. Trans. and ed. by C. R. Markham. London, 1873.

Nassau (R. H.), _Fetichism in West Africa_. London, 1904.

Nation (The); a Weekly Journal. New York.

{808}'National Personality'; in _The Edinburgh Review_, vol. cxciv. London, 1901.

'Nationality'; in _The Home and Foreign Review_, vol. i. London, 1862.

Natorp (Paul), _Die Ethika des Demokritos_. Marburg, 1893.

'Naturalization Act, 1870 (The)'; in Chitty, _Statutes of Practical Utility_, vol. i. London, 1894.

Nature; a Weekly Illustrated Journal of Science. London.

Naudet (--), 'Des secours publics chez les Romains'; in _Mémoires de l'Institut Royal de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres_, vol. xiii. Paris, 1838.

Navarette (D. F.), 'An Account of the Empire of China.' Trans.; in Awnsham and Churchill, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, vol. i. London, 1704.

Neale (E. V.), _Feasts and Fasts_. London, 1845.

Neander (Joseph), _General History of the Christian Religion and Church_. Trans. 9 vols. Edinburgh, 1847-55.

Nelson (E. W.), 'The Eskimo about Bering Strait'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ Washington, 1899.

Nelson (J. H.), _A View of the Hind[=u] Law_. Madras, &c., 1877.

Nennius, _The Irish Version of the Historia Britonum of_. Ed. and trans. by J. H. Todd. Dublin, 1848.

Nepos (Cornelius), _Vitæ excellentium imperatorum_. 2 vols. Londini, 1822.

Neubauer (A.), 'Notes on the Race-Types of the Jews'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xv. London, 1886.

Neues Archiv des Criminalrechts. Halle.

Neumann (K. F.), _Die Völker des südlichen Russlands_. Leipzig, 1847.

Nevill (Hugh), 'Vaeddas of Ceylon'; in _The Taprobanian_, vols. i.-ii. Bombay, 1887-88.

New (Charles), _Life, Wanderings, &c. in Eastern Africa_. London, 1874.

New Englander (The). New Haven.

Newbold (T. J.), _Political and Statistical Account of the British Settlements in the Straits of Malacca_. 2 vols. London, 1839.

Newman (F. W.), _Anglo-Saxon Abolition of Negro Slavery_. London, 1889.

Newman (J. H.), _Apologia pro vita sua_. London, 1873.

Nicolaus I. (_Pope_), 'Epistolae et decreta'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. cxix. Parisiis, 1852.

Nieboer (H. J.), _Slavery as an Industrial System_. The Hague, 1900.

Niebuhr (C.), _Travels through Arabia_. Trans. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1792.

Nielsen (F.), _Tertullians Ethik_. Kjøbenhavn, 1879.

Nietzsche (F.), _Also sprach Zarathustra_. 4 vols. Chemnitz & Leipzig, 1883-91.

Nisbet (Hume), _A Colonial Tramp_. 2 vols. London, 1891.

Njála. Ed. by Det Kongelige Nordiske Oldskrift-Selskab. 2 vols. Köbenhavn, 1875-89.

Nonius Marcellus, _De proprietate sermonis_. Lipsiae, 1826.

Noodt (G.), _Opera omnia_. 2 vols. Lugduni Batavorum, 1767.

Nordenskiöld (A. E.), _Den andra Dicksonska expeditionen till Grönland_. Stockholm, 1885.

---- _Vegas färd kring Asien och Europa_. 2 vols. Stockholm, 1880-81.

Nordström (J. J.), _Bidrag till den svenska samhälls-författningens historia_. 2 vols. Helsingfors, 1839-40.

Noreen (Ad.), _Spridda studier. Andra samlingen_. Stockholm, 1903.

{809} Norman (Henry), _The Real Japan_. London, 1892.

North Indian Notes and Queries: a Monthly Periodical. Ed. by W. Crooke. Allahabad.

Norton (A.), _Tracts concerning Christianity_. Cambridge, 1852.

Nowack (Wilhelm), _Lehrbuch der hebräischen Archäologie_. 2 vols. Freiburg i. B. & Leipzig, 1894.

Numa Praetorius, 'Die strafrechtlichen Bestimmungen gegen den gleichgeschlechtlichen Verkehr'; in _Jahrbuch für sexuelle Zwischenstufen_, vol. i. Leipzig, 1899.

Nuñez Cabeza de Vaca (Alvar), 'Naufragios y relacion de la jornada que hizo a la Florida'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol. xxii. Madrid, 1852.

Nyrop (K.), 'Navnets magt'; in _Mindre Afhandlinger udgivne af del Philologisk-historiske Samfund_. Kjøbenhavn, 1887.

---- _Romanske Mosaiker_. Kjøbenhavn, 1885.

Nys (Ernest), _Le droit de la guerre et les précurseurs de Grotius_. Bruxelles & Leipzig, 1882.

---- _Le droit international_. 2 vols. Bruxelles & Paris, 1904-05.

Oberländer (R.), 'Die Eingeborenen der australischen Kolonie Victoria'; in _Globus_, vol. iv. Hildburghausen, 1863.

Oehler (G. F.), _Theology of the Old Testament_. Vol. i. Trans. Edinburgh, 1874.

Oldenberg (H.), _Buddha_. Trans. London, 1882.

---- _Die Religion des Veda_. Berlin, 1894.

Oldfield (A.), 'On the Aborigines of Australia'; in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ new ser. vol. iii. London, 1865.

Olivecrona (K.), _Om dödsstraffet_. Upsala, 1866.

Olmsted (F. A.), _Incidents of a Whaling Voyage_. New York, 1841.

Open Court (The). Chicago.

Oppert (J.), 'La condition des esclaves à Babylone'; in _Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres--Comptes rendus des séances de l'année 1888_, ser. iv. vol. xvi. Paris.

---- and Ménant (J.), _Documents juridiques de l'Assyrie et de la Chaldée_. Paris, 1877.

Origen, _Opera omnia_. 7 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vols. xi.-xvii.) Parisiis, 1857-60.

Original-Mittheilungen aus der ethnologischen Abtheilung der königlichen Museen zu Berlin. Berlin.

Orosius (P.), 'Historiarum libri septem'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vol. xxxi. Parisiis, 1846.

Orpen (J. M.), 'A Glimpse into the Mythology of the Maluti Bushmen'; in _The Cape Monthly Magazine_, new ser. vol. ix. Cape Town, 1874.

Ortolan (J.), _Éléments de droit pénal_. Paris, 1859.

Osenbrüggen (E.), _Das Alamannische Strafrecht_. Schaffhausen, 1860.

---- _Studien zur deutschen und schweizerischen Rechtsgeschichte_. Schaffhausen, 1868.

Ostfriesische Land-Recht (Das). Aurich, [1746].

Ottoman Penal Code (The). Trans. by C. G. Walpole. London, 1888.

Ovidius Naso (P.), _Opera omnia_. 9 vols. Londini, 1821.

Oviedo y Valdés (G. Hernandez de), 'Summario de la natural historia de las Indias'; in _Biblioteca de autores españoles_, vol. xxii. Madrid, 1852.

{810} Paget (John), _Hungary and Transylvania_. 2 vols. London, 1839.

Paley (W.), _Complete Works_. 4 vols. London, 1825.

Palgrave (W. G.), _Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia_. 2 vols. London & Cambridge, 1865.

Palissot de Montenoy (Charles), _Les philosophes_. Paris, 1760.

Pallas (P. S.), _Travels through the Southern Provinces of the Russian Empire_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1802-03.

Palmer (Edward), 'Notes on some Australian Tribes'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xiii. London, 1884.

Panchatantram. With an English translation and a Glossary. 5 pts. Madras, 1891-93.

---- See _Pantschatantra_.

Panjab Notes and Queries, a Monthly Periodical. Ed. by R. C. Temple. Allahabad.

Pantschatantra. Trans. into German by Th. Benfey. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1859.

Paramo (L. de), _De origine et progressu Sanctæ Inquisitionis_. Matriti, 1598.

Pardessus (J. M.), _Collection de lois maritimes antérieures au XVIIIe siècle_. 6 vols. Paris, 1828-45.

---- _Loi Salique_. Paris, 1843.

---- _Us et coutumes de la mer_. 2 vols. Paris, 1847.

Paris (Gaston), _La poésie du moyen âge_. Paris, 1885.

Park (Mungo), _Travels in the Interior Districts of Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1816-17.

---- The same work. Edinburgh, 1860.

Parker (E. H.), 'Comparative Chinese Family Law'; in _The China Review_, vol. viii. Hongkong, 1879-80.

Parker (E. S.), _The Aborigines of Australia_. Melbourne, 1854.

Parker (_Mrs._ K. Langloh), _The Euahlayi Tribe_. London, 1905.

Parker (Theodore), _The Collected Works of_. Ed. by F. P. Cobbe. 14 vols. London, 1863-71.

---- _A Sermon of War_. Boston, 1846.

Parkinson (John), 'Notes on the Asaba People'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvi. London, 1906.

Parkinson (R.), _Zur Ethnographie der nordwestlichen Salomo Inseln_. Berlin, 1899.

Parkman (Francis), _The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century_. London, 1885.

Parkyns (M.), _Life in Abyssinia_. 2 vols. London, 1853.

Parliamentary History and Review; containing Reports of the Proceedings of the Two Houses of Parliament during the Session of 1825-26. London, 1826.

Parry (W. E.), _Journal of a Second Voyage for the Discovery of a North-West Passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific_. London, 1824.

Partridge (Charles), _Cross River Natives_. London, 1905.

Patetta (F.), _Le ordalie_. Torino, 1890.

Paul (Hermann), _Grundriss der germanischen Philologie_. Ed. by H. P. 2 vols. Strassburg, 1889-93.

---- The same work. 3 vols. Strassburg, 1896-1900.

Paulhan (F.), _L'activité mentale et les éléments de l'esprit_. Paris, 1889.

Paulitschke (Ph.), _Ethnographie Nordost-Afrikas_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1893-96.

Paulsen (F.), _System der Ethik_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1894.

{811} Pauly (A. F. von), _Real-Encyclopädie der classischen Alterthumswissenschaft_. 6 vols. Stuttgart, 1842-62.

Pausanias, _Descriptio Græciæ_. Ed. by L. Dindorfius. Parisiis, 1845.

---- See Frazer (_Sir_ J. G.).

Payne (E. J.), _History of the New World called America_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1892-99.

Peacock (Mabel), 'Executed Criminals and Folk-Medicine'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. vii. London, 1896.

Pearson (Charles H.), _National Life and Character_. London, 1893.

Peirce (L.), Taylor (M.), and King (W. W.), _The Consolidation and Revision of the Statutes of the State_ [_Louisiana_]. New Orleans, 1852.

Peltzer (A.), _Deutsche Mystik und deutsche Kunst_. Strassburg, 1899.

Penny (Alfred), _Ten Years in Melanesia_. London, 1887.

Percival (Peter), _The Land of the Veda_. London, 1854.

Percival (Robert), _An Account of the Island of Ceylon_. London, 1803.

Perelaer (M. T. H.), _Ethnographische beschrijving der Dajaks_. Zalt-Bommel, 1870.

Perez (Bernard), _The First Three Years of Childhood_. Trans. London, 1892.

Perham (J.), 'Petara'; in _Jour. Straits Branch Roy. Asiatic Soc._ no. 8. Singapore, 1882.

---- 'Sea Dyak Religion'; in _Jour. Straits Branch Roy. Asiatic Soc._ no. 10. Singapore, 1883.

Perrin du Lac (F. M.), _Voyage dans les deux Louisianes et chez les nations sauvages du Missouri_. Paris, 1805.

Perrot (Nicholas), _Memoire sur les m[oe]urs, coustumes et relligion des sauvages de l'Amerique septentrionale_. Ed. by R. P. J. Tailhan. Leipzig & Paris, 1864.

Perry (G. G.), _A History of the English Church. First Period_. London, 1881.

Pertile (Antonio), 'Gli animali in giudizio'; in _Atti del Reale Istituto Veneto di scienze, lettere ed arti_, ser. vi. vol. iv. Venezia, 1884-85.

Pertuiset (E.), _Le trésor des Incas à la Terre de Feu_. Paris, 1877.

Perty (Max.), _Ueber das Seelenleben der Thiere_. Leipzig & Heidelberg, 1876.

Pertz (G. H.), _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_. Leges. 5 vols. Hannoverae, 1837-75.

Peschel (O.), _The Races of Man_. Trans. London, 1876.

Petherick (John), _Egypt, the Soudan and Central Africa._ Edinburgh & London, 1861.

---- and Petherick (_Mrs._), _Travels in Central Africa, and Explorations of the Western Nile Tributaries_. 2 vols. London, 1869.

Petitot (C. B.), _Collection complète des Mémoires relatifs à l'histoire de France_. 130 vols. Paris, 1819-29.

Petitot (É.), _Les Grands Esquimaux_. Paris, 1887.

Petrie (W. M. Flinders), _Religion and Conscience in Ancient Egypt_. London, 1898.

Petroff (Ivan), 'Report on the Population, Industries, and Resources of Alaska'; in _Tenth Census of the United States_. Washington, 1884.

Pfeiffer (Ida), _A Lady's Second Journey round the World_. [Trans.] 2 vols. London, 1855.

Pfleiderer (Otto), _Philosophy and Development of Religion_. Trans. 2 vols. Edinburgh & London, 1894.

Philip (Robert), _The Life and Opinions of the Rev. William Milne_. London, 1840.

{812} Philo Judaeus, _Opera_. Ed. by Th. Mangey. 2 vols. London, 1742.

Piedrahita (L. Fernandez de), _Historia general de las conquistas del nuevo reyno de Granada_. Amberes, [1688].

Pierotti (Ermete), _Customs and Traditions of Palestine_. Trans. Cambridge, 1864.

Pike (L. Owen), _A History of Crime in England_. 2 vols. London, 1873-76.

Pindar, _Carmina_. Ed. by C. I. T. Mommsen. Berolini, 1864.

Pinel (Ph.), _Traité médico-philosophique sur l'aliénation mentale_. Paris, 1809.

Pinkerton (John), _A General Collection of Voyages and Travels_. 17 vols. London, 1808-14.

Pitcairn (Robert), _Criminal Trials in Scotland_. 3 vols. Edinburgh, 1838.

Pitcairn (W. D.), _Two Years among the Savages of New Guinea_. London, 1891.

Placucci (M.), _Usi e pregiudizj dei contadini della Romagna_. Ed. by G. Pitrè. Palermo, 1885.

Plato, _Dialogues_. Trans. by B. Jowett. 5 vols. Oxford, 1892.

---- _Opera_. 3 vols. Parisiis, 1846-73.

Plautus (T. M.), _Com[oe]diæ_. 5 vols. Londini, 1829.

Pliny, the Elder, _Historia naturalis_. 13 vols. Londini, 1826.

Pliny, the Younger, _Epistolarum libri decem_. Ed. by N. E. Lemaire. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1822-23.

Ploss (H. H.), _Das Kind im Brauch und Sitte der Völker_. 2 vols. Stuttgart, 1876.

---- _Das Weib in der Natur- und Völkerkunde_. Ed. by M. Bartels. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1902.

Plowden (E.), _The Commentaries or Reports of_. Trans. 2 parts. Savoy (London), 1661.

Plutarch, _Romane Questions._ Trans. ed. by F. B. Jevons. London, 1892.

---- _Scripta moralia_. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1839-41.

---- _Vitæ_. Ed. by Th. D[oe]hner. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1846-47.

Pogge (Paul), _Im Reiche des Muata Jamwo_. Berlin, 1880.

Poircy (L. de), _Histoire naturelle et morale des Iles Antilles de l'Amerique_. Ed. by C. de Rochefort. Rotterdam, 1681.

Polack (J. S.), _Manners and Customs of the New Zealanders_. 2 vols. London, 1840.

Polak (J. E.), _Persien_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1865.

---- 'Die Prostitution in Persien'; in _Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift_, vol. xi. Wien, 1861.

Pollock (_Sir_ Frederick), _Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics_. London, 1882.

---- 'The King's Peace'; in _The Law Quarterly Review_, vol. i. London 1885.

---- _The Law of Torts_. London, 1897.

---- _Oxford Lectures_. London, 1890.

---- and Maitland (F. W.), _The History of the English Law before the Time of Edward I._ 2 vols. Cambridge, 1898.

Pollux (Julius), _Onomasticum_. 2 vols. Amstelædami, 1706.

Polo (Marco), _The Book of, concerning the Kingdoms and Marvels of the East_. Trans. ed. by H. Yule. 2 vols. London, 1871.

Polybius, _Historiarum reliquiæ_. 2 vols. Parisiis, 1839.

Pommerol (Jean), _Among the Women of the Sahara_. Trans. London, 1900.

Pool (J. J.), _Studies in Mohammedanism_. Westminster, 1892.

{813} Poole (R. Lane), _Illustrations of the History of Medieval Thought in the Departments of Theology and Ecclesiastical Politics_. London, 1884.

Poole (S. Lane). See Lane-Poole (S.).

Popovi[vc] (Georg), _Recht und Gericht in Montenegro_. Agram, 1877.

Popular Science Monthly (The). New York.

Porphyry, _De abstinentia ab esu animalium_. Ed. by R. Hercher. Parisiis, 1858.

Porter (G. R.), _The Progress of the Nation from the Beginning of the Nineteenth Century to the Present Time_. London, 1843.

Post (A. H.), _Afrikanische Jurisprudenz_. 2 vols. Oldenburg & Leipzig, 1887.

---- _Die Anfange des Staats- und Rechtslebens_. Oldenburg, 1878.

---- _Die Geschlechtsgenossenschaft der Urzeit und die Entstehung der Ehe_. Oldenburg, 1875.

---- _Die Grundlagen des Rechts_. Oldenburg, 1884.

---- _Grundriss der ethnologischen Jurisprudenz_. 2 vols. Oldenburg & Leipzig, 1894-95.

---- _Studien zur Entwicklungsgeschichte des Familienrechts_. Oldenburg & Leipzig; 1890.

Potgiesser (J.), _Commentariorum juris Germanici de statu servorum veteri perinde atque novo libri quinque_. Lemgoviae, 1736.

Potter (John), _Archæologia Græca_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1832.

Powell (J. W.), 'Outlines of Sociology'; in _The Saturday Lectures delivered in the Lecture-Room of the U.S. National Museum_. Washington, 1882.

---- 'Sociology'; in _The American Anthropologist_, new ser. vol. i. New York, 1899.

---- 'Wyandot Government'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. i. Washington, 1881.

Powell (Wilfred), _Wanderings in a Wild Country; or, Three Years amongst the Cannibals of New Britain_. London, 1883.

Powers (Stephan), _Tribes of California_. Washington, 1877.

Prain (David), 'The Angami Nagas'; in _Revue coloniale internationale_, vol. v. Amsterdam, 1887.

Prejevalsky (N.), _Mongolia_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1876.

Preller (L.), _Griechische Mythologie_. Vol. i. Ed. by Carl Robert. Berlin, 1894.

Prem Ságar; or, the Ocean of Love. Trans. by E. B. Eastwick. Hertford & London, 1851.

Prentiss (G. L.), 'Infant Salvation and its Theological Bearings'; in _The Presbyterian Review_, vol. iv. New York, 1883.

Presbyterian Review (The). New York.

Prescott (W. H.), _History of the Conquest of Mexico_. Ed. by J. F. Kirk. London, 1887.

---- _History of the Conquest of Peru_. 3 vols. London, [1890].

Preuss (Theodor), _Die Begräbnisarten der Amerikaner und Nordostasiaten_. Königsberg, 1894.

Prexl (R.), 'Geburts- und Todtengebräuche der Rumänen in Siebenbürgen'; in _Globus_, vol. lvii. Braunschweig, 1890.

Price (Richard), _A Review of the Principal Questions in Morals_. London, 1787.

Prichard (H. H.), _Through the Heart of Patagonia_. London, 1902.

Pridham (Charles), _An Account of Ceylon_. 2 vols. London, 1849.

Priestley (Joseph). See Hartley, _Theory of the Human Mind_.

Prince (O. H.), _A Digest of the Laws of the State of Georgia_. Athens (U.S.), 1837.

{814} Pritchard (W. T.), _Polynesian Reminiscences_. London, 1866.

Proceedings of the Royal Geographical Society and Monthly Record of Geography. London.

---- _of the Royal Irish Academy_. Dublin.

---- _of the Royal Society of Edinburgh_.

---- _of the Society of Biblical Archæology_. London.

Procopius, ex recensione G. Dindorfii. 3 vols. Bonnae, 1833-38.

Proudhon (P.-J.), _La guerre et la paix_. 2 vols. Bruxelles, [1861].

Proyart (L. B.), 'History of Loango, &c.' Trans.; in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, vol. xvi. London, 1814.

Ptan-Hotep, 'The Precepts of'. Trans. by Ph. Virey; in _Records of the Past_, new ser. vol. iii. London, _s. d._

Puchta (G. F.), _Cursus der Institutionen_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1875.

Pufendorf (Samuel), _De jure naturæ et gentium_. Amstelodami, 1688.

Purcell (B. H.), 'Rites and Customs of Australian Aborigines'; in _Verhandl. Berliner Gesellsch. Anthrop._, 1893.

Quarterly Review (The). London.

Quatremère (E. M.), 'Mémoire sur les asiles chez les Arabes'; in _Mémoires de l'lnstitut Royal de France, Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres_, vol. xv. pt. ii. Paris, 1842.

Quintilian (M. F.), _Declamationes quæ supersunt CXLV._ Ed. by C. Ritter. Lipsiae, 1884.

Institutionis oratoriæ libri duodecim. Ed. by C. Halm. 2 vols. Lipsiae, 1868.

Qur'ân (The). Trans. by E. H. Palmer. 2 vols. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vols. vi. and ix.) Oxford, 1880.

Rabbinowicz (I. J. M.), _Législation criminelle du Talmud_. Paris, 1876.

Radde (G.), _Die Chews'uren und ihr Land_. Cassel, 1878.

Radloff (W.), _Das Schamanenthum_. Leipzig, 1885.

Raffenel (Anne), _Nouveau voyage dans le pays des nègres_. 2 vols. Paris, 1856.

Raffles (T. S.), _The History of Java_. 2 vols. London, 1817.

Rájendralála Mitra, _Indo-Aryans_. 2 vols. London & Calcutta, 1881.

Ralston (W. R. S.), _The Songs of the Russian People_. London, 1872.

Rambaud (A.), _Histoire de la civilisation française_. 2 vols. Paris, 1893-94.

Ramsay (W. M.), _The Church in the Roman Empire before A.D. 170_. London, 1903.

---- _The Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1895-97.

---- _The Historical Geography of Asia Minor_. London, 1890.

Ramseyer (F. A.) and Kühne (J.), _Four Years in Ashantee_. Ed. by Mrs. Weitbrecht. London, 1875.

Ranking (John), _Historical Researches on the Conquest of Peru, Mexico, &c._ London, 1827.

Rattray (R. S.), _Some Folk-Lore Stories and Songs in Chinyanja_. London, 1907.

Ratzel (F.), _The History of Mankind_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1896-98.

Ravenscroft (A. G. B.), 'Some Habits and Customs of the Chingalee Tribe'; in _Trans. Roy. Soc. South Australia_, vol. xv. Adelaide, 1892.

Rawlinson (George), _The Religions of the Ancient World_. London, _s. d._

{815} Read (C. H.) and Dalton (O. M.), _Antiquities from the City of Benin_. London, 1899.

Reade (W. Winwood), _Savage Africa_. London, 1863.

Réal de Courban (G. de), _La science du gouvernement_. 8 vols. Aix-la-Chapelle, &c., 1761-65.

Recopilacion de leyes de los reinos de las Indias. 4 vols. Madrid, 1841.

Records of the Past. London.

Rée (Paul), _Die Entstehung des Gewissens_. Berlin, 1885.

---- _Der Ursprung der moralischen Empfindungen_. Chemnitz, 1877.

Reed (_Sir_ E. J.), _Japan_. 2 vols. London, 1880.

Rehme (Paul), 'Das Recht der Amaxosa'; in _Zeitschr. f. vergl. Rechtswiss._ vol. x. Berlin, 1892.

Reichard (Paul), 'Die Wanjamuesi'; in _Zeitschr. der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin_, vol. xxiv. Berlin, 1889.

Reid (A. P.), 'Religious Belief of the Ojibois or Sauteux Indians'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. iii. London, 1874.

Reid (Thomas), _An Inquiry into the Human Mind_. London, 1785.

Rein (J. J.), _Japan_. Trans. London, 1884.

Rein (Wilhelm), _Das Criminalrecht der Römer_. Leipzig, 1844.

Reinhard (F. V.), _System der Christlichen Moral_. 5 vols. Wittenberg, 1805-15.

Remy (Jules), _Ka Mooolelo Hawaii_. Paris & Leipzig, 1862.

Renan (Ernest), _Hibbert Lectures on the Influence of the Institutions, Thought and Culture of Rome, on Christianity_. London, 1885.

Rengger (J. R.), _Naturgeschichte der Säugethiere von Paraguay_. Basel, 1830.

Renouf (P. Le Page), _Hibbert Lectures on . . . the Religion of Ancient Egypt_. London, 1884.

Renton (A. W.), _Encyclopædia of the Laws of England_. London, [1897, &c.].

Report on the Work of the Horn Scientific Expedition to Central Australia. Ed. by B. Spencer. Part iv. London & Melbourne, 1896.

Reports of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits. Ed. by A. C. Haddon. Vol. v. Cambridge, 1904.

Réville (Albert), _Hibbert Lectures on . . . the Native Religions of Mexico and Peru_. London, 1884.

---- _Prolegomena of the History of Religions_. Trans. London, 1884.

---- _La Religion Chinoise_. Paris, 1889.

---- _Les religions des peuples non-civilisés_. 2 vols. Paris, 1883.

Réville (André), 'L'abjuratio regni'; in _Revue historique_, vol. l. Paris, 1892.

Revised Statutes of the State of North Carolina (The), passed by the General Assembly at the Session of 1836-7. 2 vols. Raleigh, 1837.

Revue Celtique. Paris.

---- _coloniale internationale_. Amsterdam.

---- _de législation et de jurisprudence_. Paris.

---- _de l'histoire des religions_. Paris.

---- _des Deux Mondes_. Paris.

---- _historique_. Paris.

---- _historique de droit français et étranger_. Paris.

---- _internationale de sociologie_. Ed. by R. Worms. Paris.

---- _scientifique_. Paris.

Rheinisches Museum für Philologie. Frankfurt a. M.

Rh[^y]s (John), _Celtic Folklore_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1901.

{816} Ribbe (Ch. de), _Les families et la société en France avant la Révolution_. Paris, 1873.

Ribeiro de Sampaio (F. X.), _Diario da viagem_. Lisboa, 1825.

Ribot (Th.), _The Psychology of the Emotions_. [Trans.] London, 1897.

Richardson (C. H.), 'Observations among the Cameroon Tribes of West Central Africa'; in _Memoirs of the International Congress of Anthropology_. Chicago, 1894.

Richardson (James), _Narrative of a Mission to Central Africa performed in the Years 1850-51_. 2 vols. London, 1853.

Richardson (John), _Arctic Searching Expedition_. 2 vols. London, 1851.

Richmond (Legh), 'A Sermon on the Sin of Cruelty to the Brute Creation'; in _The Methodist Magazine_, vol. xxx. London, 1807.

Richter (W.), _Die Sklaverei im Griechischen Altertume_. Breslau, 1886.

Rickaby (J.), _Moral Philosophy_. London, 1892.

Ridley (William), _The Aborigines of Australia_. Sydney, 1864.

---- _Kámilarói, and other Australian Languages_. N. S. Wales, 1875.

---- _Kamilaroi, Dippil, and Turrubul_. N. S. Wales, 1866.

Riedel (J. G. F.), _De sluik- en kroesharige rassen tusschen Selebes en Papua_. 's-Gravenhage, 1886.

Rigveda (Der). Trans. into German by A. Ludwig. 6 vols. Prag, 1876-88.

Rink (H. J.), _Danish Greenland_. Ed. by R. Brown. London, 1877.

---- _The Eskimo Tribes_. Copenhagen & London, 1887.

---- _Tales and Traditions of the Eskimo_. Edinburgh & London, 1875.

Risley (H. H.), _Census of India, 1901. Vol. I. Ethnographic Appendices_. Calcutta, 1903.

---- _Tribes and Castes of Bengal. Ethnographic Glossary_. 2 vols. Calcutta, 1891.

Ritchie (D. G.), _Natural Rights_. London, 1895.

Ritson (Jos.), _An Essay on Abstinence from Animal Food as a Moral Duty_. London, 1802.

Ritter (B.), _Philo und die Halacha_. Leipzig, 1879.

Rivers (W. H. R.), _The Todas_. London, 1906.

Rivier (Alphonse), _Précis du droit de famille romain_. Paris, 1891.

Rivière (Armand), _L'Église et l'esclavage_. Paris, 1864.

Rivista italiana di sociologia. Roma.

Roberts (George), _The Social History of the People of the Southern Counties of England in Past Centuries_. London, 1856.

Robertson (_Sir_ G. Scott), _The Káfirs of the Hindu-Kush_. London, 1896.

Robertson (H. A.), _Erromanga, the Martyr Isle_. Ed. by J. Eraser. London, 1902.

Robertson (John M.), _Patriotism and Empire_. London, 1899.

Robertson (William), _The History of America_. 2 vols. London, 1777.

---- _The History of the Reign of the Emperor Charles V._ 4 vols. London, 1806.

Robinson (A.), _Life in California_. New York, 1846.

Robinson (Cecilia), _The Ministry of Deaconesses_. London, 1898.

Robinson (Edward), _Biblical Researches in Palestine_. 3 vols. London, 1867.

Rochas (V. de), _La Nouvelle Calédonie et ses habitants_. Paris, 1862.

Rochefort (C. de). See Poircy (L. de).

Rochholz (E. L.), _Deutscher Glaube und Brauch im Spiegel der heidnischen Vorzeit_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1867.

{817} Rochon (A. M.), _A Voyage to Madagascar and the East Indies_. Trans. London, 1793.

---- The same work. Trans.; in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages and Travels_, vol. xvi. London, 1814.

Rockhill (W. W.), _The Land of the Lamas_. London, 1891.

---- 'Notes on Some of the Laws, Customs, and Superstitions of Korea'; in _The American Anthropologist_, vol. iv. Washington, 1891.

Rogers (Ch.), _Social Life in Scotland_. 3 vols. Edinburgh, 1884-86.

Rohde (Erwin), 'Paralipomena'; in _Rheinisches Museum für Philologie, neue Folge_, vol. xv. Frankfurt a. M., 1895.

---- _Psyche_. Freiburg i. B. & Leipzig, 1894.

Romanes (G. J.), _Animal Intelligence_. London, 1895.

---- 'Conscience in Animals'; in _The Quarterly Journal of Science_, vol. xiii. London, 1876.

---- _Mental Evolution in Animals_. London, 1883.

Romanische Forschungen. Erlangen.

Romans de Raoul de Cambrai et de Bernier (Li). Ed. by E. Le Glay. Paris, 1840.

Romilly (H. H.), _From my Verandah in New Guinea_. London, 1889.

---- _The Western Pacific and New Guinea_. London, 1887.

Romilly (Henry), _The Punishment of Death_. London, 1886.

Rorarius (Hieronymus), _Quod Animalia bruta ratione utantur melius Homine_. Paris, 1648.

Roscoe (J.), 'The Bahima'; in _Jour. Roy. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvii. London, 1907.

Rosenbaum (Julius), _Geschichte der Lustseuche im Alterthume_. Halle, 1845.

Rosenberg (C. F. V. M.), _Nordboernes Aandsliv_. 3 vols. Kjøbenhavn, 1878-85.

---- _Traek af Livet paa Island i Fristats-Tiden_. Kjøbenhavn, 1894.

Rosenberg (H. von), _Der malayische Archipel_. Leipzig, 1878.

Roskoff (G. G.), _Geschichte des Teufels_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1869.

Ross (B. R.), 'The Eastern Tinneh'; in _Smithsonian Report, 1866_. Washington, 1867.

Ross (John), _History of Corea_. Pasley, [1879].

Rossbach (A.), _Untersuchungen uber die römische Ehe_. Stuttgart, 1853.

Rossi (P.), _Traité de droit pénal_. 3 vols. Genève, 1829.

Roth (H. Ling), _The Aborigines of Tasmania_. London, 1890.

---- _Great Benin_. Halifax, 1903.

---- _The Natives of Sarawak and British North Borneo_. 2 vols. London. 1896.

---- 'On the Origin of Agriculture'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xvi. London, 1887.

---- 'On Salutations'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xix. London, 1890.

---- 'On the Signification of Couvade'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxii. London, 1893.

Roth (Rud.), 'Brahma und die Brahmanen'; in _Zeitschr. der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ vol. i. Leipzig, 1846.

---- 'On the Morality of the Veda.' Trans.; in _Journal of the American Oriental Society_, vol. iii. New York, 1853.

Roth (Walter E.), _Ethnological Studies among the North-West-Central Queensland Aborigines_. Brisbane & London, 1897.

{818} Rothar (_King_), 'Edictus'; in Pertz, _Monumenta Germaniæ historica_, Leges, vol. iv. Hannoverae, 1868.

Rouse (W. H. D.), _Greek Votive Offerings_. Cambridge, 1902.

Rousseau (J. J.), _[OE]uvres complètes_. 4 vols. Paris, 1837.

Rowlatt (E. A.), 'Report of an Expedition into the Mishmee Hills'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xiv. pt. ii. Calcutta, 1845.

Rowley (Henry), _Africa Unveiled_. London, 1876.

---- _The Religion of the Africans_. London, [1877].

Rowney (H. B.), _The Wild Tribes of India_. London, 1882.

Rühs (F.), _Handbuch der Geschichte des Mittelalters_. Berlin, 1816.

Rüppell (E.), _Reise in Abyssinien_. 2 vols. Frankfurt a. M., 1838-40.

Ruskin (John), _The Works of_. 11 vols. Keston, Orpington, 1871-83.

Sabatier (Paul), _Life of St. Francis of Assisi_. Trans. London, 1894.

Sachau (E.), _Muhammedanisches Recht nach Schafiitischer Lehre_. Stuttgart & Berlin, 1897.

Saco (_Don_ J. A.), _Historia de la esclavitud_. 3 vols. Paris & Barcelona, 1875-78.

Sacred Books of the East (The). Ed. by F. Max Müller. Oxford, 1879, &c.

'Sad Dar,' trans. by E. W. West; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxiv. Oxford, 1885.

Sagard Théodat (G.), _Le grand voyage du pays des Hurons_. Paris, 1632.

Sahagun (F. Bernardino de), _Historia general de las cosas de Nueva España_. 3 vols. Mexico, 1829-30.

Sainte-Palaye (De la Curne de), _Mémoires sur l'ancienne chevalerie_. 3 vols. Paris, 1781.

St. John (Bayle), _Adventures in the Libyan Desert_. London, 1849.

---- _Village Life in Egypt_. 2 vols. London, 1852.

St. John (Spenser), _Life in the Forests of the Far East_. 2 vols. London, 1863.

Saint Louis, _Les Établissements de_. Ed. by Paul Viollet. 4 vols. Paris, 1881-86.

Saint-Simon (_Duc_ de), _Mémoires complets et authentiques_. 40 vols. Paris, 1840-41.

Sale (George), 'Preliminary Discourse'; in Wherry, _A Comprehensive Commentary on the Qurán_, vol. i. London, 1882.

Salt (H. S.), _Animals' Rights_. London, 1900.

Salt (Henry), _A Voyage to Abyssinia_. London, 1814.

Salvado (R.), _Mémoires historiques sur l'Australie_. Paris, 1854.

Salvioli (G.), _Manuale di storia del diritto italiano_. Torino, 1892.

Samuelson (James), _The History of Drink_. London, 1880.

Sandys (Edwin), _The Sermons of_. Ed. by John Ayre. Cambridge, 1841.

Santos (Joano dos), 'History of Eastern Ethiopia.' Trans.; in Pinkerton, _Collection of Voyages_, vol. xvi. London, 1814.

Sarasin (Paul and Fritz), _Ergebnisse naturwissenschaftlicher Forschungen auf Ceylon_. 3 vols. Wiesbaden, 1887-93.

Sarbah (J. M.), _Fanti Customary Laws_. London, 1897.

Sartori (Paul), 'Die Sitte der Alten- und Krankentötung'; in _Globus_, vol. lxvii. Braunschweig, 1895.

---- 'Ueber das Bauopfer'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnologie_, vol. xxx. Berlin, 1898.

{819} Sarytschew (G.), 'Account of a Voyage of Discovery to the North-East of Siberia, the Frozen Ocean, and the North-East Sea.' Trans.; in _A Collection of Modern and Contemporary Voyages and Travels_, vols. v.-vi. London, 1807.

Satapatha-Brâhmana (The). Trans. by J. Eggeling. 5 vols. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vols. xii., xxvi., xli., xliii., and xliv.) Oxford, 1882-1900.

Sauer (M.), _An Account of a Geographical and Astronomical Expedition to the Northern Parts of Russia performed by J. Billings_. London, 1802.

Savage (T. S.), 'Observations on the External Characters and Habits of the _Troglodytes Niger_'; in _Boston Journal of Natural History_, vol. iv. Boston, 1844.

Sayce (A. H.), _Hibbert Lectures on . . . the Religion of the Ancient Babylonians_. London, 1887.

Scaramucci (F.) and Giglioli (E. H.), 'Notizie sui Danakil'; in _Archivio per l'anthropologia e la etnologia_, vol. xiv. Firenze, 1884.

Schaafhausen (H.), 'Die Menschenfresserei und das Menschenopfer'; in _Archiv für Anthropologie_, vol. iv. Braunschweig, 1870.

Schadenberg (Alex.), 'Ueber die Negritos in den Philippinen'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. xii. Berlin, 1880.

Schaff (Philip), _History of the Christian Church: Ante-Nicene Christianity, A.D. 100-325_. Edinburgh, 1884.

Scherman (L.), 'Eine Art visionärer Höllenschilderung aus dem indischen Mittelalter'; in _Romanische Forschungen_, vol. v. Erlangen, 1890.

---- _Materialien zur Geschichte der Indischen Visionslitteratur_. Leipzig, 1892.

Scherzer (K. von), _Reise der Oesterreichischen Fregatte Novara um die Erde_. 3 vols. Wien, 1861-62.

Schiaparelli (E.), _Del sentimento religioso degli antichi egiziani_. Torino, 1877.

Schinz (Hans), _Deutsch-Süd-West-Afrika_. Oldenburg & Leipzig, 1891.

Schmidt (Bernhard), _Das Volksleben der Neugriechen und das hellenische Alterthum_. Leipzig, 1871.

Schmidt (C. C.), _Jahrbücher der in- und ausländischen gesammten Medicin_. Leipzig.

Schmidt (Emil), _Ceylon_. Berlin, [1897].

Schmidt (Leopold), _Die Ethik der alten Griechen_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1882.

Schneider (Wilhelm), _Die Naturvölker_. 2 vols. Paderborn & Münster, 1885-86.

---- _Die Religion der afrikanischen Naturvölker_. Münster i. W., 1891.

Schoemann (G. F.), _Griechische Alterthümer_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1855-59.

Schoen (J. F.) and Crowther (Samuel), _Journals of, who accompanied the Expedition up the Niger in 1841_. London, 1842.

Schönwerth (Fr.), _Aus der Oberpfalz. Sitten und Sagen_. 3 vols. Augsburg, 1857-59.

Schomburgk (_Sir_ Robert H.), 'Journal of an Expedition from Pirara to the Upper Corentyne'; in _Jour. Roy. Geo. Soc._ vol. xv. London, 1845.

---- 'On the Natives of Guiana'; in _Jour. Ethn. Soc. London_, vol. i. London, 1848.

Schoolcraft (H. R.), _Historical and Statistical Information respecting the History, Condition, and Prospects of the Indian Tribes of the United States_ (the title pages of vols. iv.-vi. read: _Archives of Aboriginal Knowledge, &c._). 6 vols. Philadelphia, 1851-60.

---- _The Indian in his Wigwam_. New York, 1848.

{820} Schopenhauer (Arthur), _Die beiden Grundprobleme der Ethik_. (_Sämmtliche Werke in zwölf Bänden_, vol. vii.) Stuttgart, _s. d._

---- _Essays_. Trans. by Mrs. R. Dircks. London, _s. d._

---- _Parerga und Paralipomena_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1851.

---- _Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1859.

Schrader (E.), _Die Keilinschriften und das Alte Testament_. Ed. by H. Zimmern and H. Winckler. Berlin, 1903.

Schrader (O.), _Prehistoric Antiquities of the Aryan Peoples_. Trans. by F. B. Jevons. London, 1890.

---- _Reallexikon der indogermanischen Altertumskunde_. Strassburg, 1901.

Schröder (Richard), _Lehrbuch der deutschen Rechtsgeschichte_. Leipzig, 1898.

Schuermann (C. W.), 'The Aboriginal Tribes of Port Lincoln'; in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_. Adelaide, 1879.

Schütz-Holzhausen (D. von), _Der Amazonas_. Freiburg i. B., 1895.

Schulchan Aruch oder Die vier judischen Gesetzbücher. Trans. by H. G. F. Löwe. 2 vols. Wien, 1896.

Schultz (H.), _Old Testament Theology_. Trans. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1892.

Schultze (Fritz), _Der Fetischismus_. Leipzig, 1871.

---- _Vergleichende Seelenkunde_. Leipzig, 1892, &c.

Schurtz (H.), _Das afrikanische Gewerbe_. Leipzig, 1900.

---- 'Die Anfänge des Landbesitzes'; in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissensch._ vol. iii. Berlin, 1900.

---- _Die Speiseverbote_. Hamburg, 1893.

---- _Urgeschichte der Kultur_. Leipzig & Wien, 1900.

Schuyler (E.), _Turkistan_. 2 vols. London, 1876.

---- _Schwabenspiegel (Der)_. Ed. by F. L. A. von Lassberg. Tübingen, 1840.

Schwally (F.), _Das Leben nach dem Tode nach den Vorstellungen des alten Israel und Judentums_. Giessen, 1892.

Schwaner (C. A. L. M.), _Borneo_. 2 vols. Amsterdam, 1853.

Schwarz (W.), _Prähistorisch-anthropologische Studien_. Berlin, 1884.

Schweinfurth (Georg), _The Heart of Africa_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1873.

Science. An Illustrated Journal. Cambridge (Mass.).

Scott (_Sir_ Walter), 'An Essay on Chivalry'; in _Miscellaneous Prose Works_, vol. vi. Edinburgh, 1827.

Scotus Novanticus. See Laurie (S. S.).

Seaver (James E.), _A Narrative of the Life of Mrs. Mary Jemison, Who was taken by the Indians, in the Year, 1755_. Howden, 1826.

'Second Helvetic Confession'; in _Sylloge confessionum sub tempus reformandæ ecclesiæ_. Oxonii, 1804.

Seebohm (F.), _The English Village Community_. London, 1883.

---- _Tribal Custom in Anglo-Saxon Law_. London, 1902.

---- _The Tribal System in Wales_. London, 1895.

Seeger (Hermann), _Ueber die Ausbildung der Lehre vom Versuch der Verbrechen in der Wissenschaft des Mittelalters_. Tübingen, 1869.

---- _Der Versuch der Verbrechen nach römischen Recht_. Tübingen, 1879.

Seeley (J. R.), _Ecce Homo_. London, 1892.

---- _Natural Religion_. London & New York, 1895.

Seemann (B.), _Narrative of the Voyage of H.M.S. Herald during the Years 1845-51_. 2 vols. London, 1853.

---- _Viti_. Cambridge, 1862.

{821} Selden (J.), _De Synedriis et Præfecturis Juridicis veterum Ebræorum_. Francofurti, 1696.

Selenka (Emil and Lenore), _Sonnige Welten. Ostasiatische Reise-Skizzen_. Wiesbaden, 1896.

Seligmann (C. G.), in _Reports of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits_, vol. v. Cambridge, 1904.

---- 'Sexual Inversion among Primitive Races'; in _The Alienist and Neurologist_, vol. xxxiii. St. Louis, 1902.

Sell (Edward), _The Faith of Islám_. London, 1896.

Semper (Karl), _Die Palau-Inseln im Stillen Ocean_. Leipzig, 1873.

Seneca (L. A.), _Opera quæ supersunt_. Ed. by F. Haase. 3 vols. Lipsiae, 1853-62.

Sepp (Johannes), _Völkerbrauch bei Hochzeit, Geburt und Tod_. München, 1891.

Serpillon (F.), _Code Criminel, ou Commentaire sur l'Ordonnance de 1670_. 2 vols. Lyon, 1784.

Servius Maurus Honoratus, _Commentarii in Virgilium_. Ed. by H. A. Lion. 2 vols. Gottingae, 1826.

Seth (James), _A Study of Ethical Principles_. Edinburgh & London, 1898.

Sextus Empiricus, _Opera Græce et Latine_. Ed. by I. A. Fabricius. 2 vols. Lipsiae, 1842.

Shaftesbury (Antony _Earl of_), _Characteristicks_. 3 vols. London, 1733.

Shakespeare (W.), _Works_. Ed. by A. Dyce. 9 vols. London, 1864-67.

Shand (A. F.), 'Character and the Emotions'; in _Mind_, new ser. vol. v. London, 1896.

---- 'The Sources of Tender Emotion'; in Stout, _The Groundwork of Psychology_. London, 1903.

'Shâyast Lâ-Shâyast,' trans. by E. W. West; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. v. Oxford, 1880.

Shaw (Thomas), 'On the Inhabitants of the Hills near Rájamahall'; in _Asiatick Researches_, vol. iv. Calcutta, 1795.

Sheane (J. H. West), 'Some Aspects of the Avemba Religion'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvi. London, 1906.

Sherwill (W. S.), 'Notes upon a Tour through the Rájmahal Hills'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xx. Calcutta, 1852.

Shooter (Joseph), _The Kafirs of Natal and the Zulu Country_. London, 1857.

Short Treatise upon the Propriety and Necessity of Duelling (A). Bath, 1779.

Shortland (Edward), _Traditions and Superstitions of the New Zealanders_. London, 1854.

Shortt (John), 'An Account of the Hill Tribes of the Neilgherries'; in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ new ser. vol. vii. London, 1869.

---- 'A Contribution to the Ethnology of Jeypore'; in _Trans. Ethn. Soc._ new ser. vol. vi. London, 1868.

---- _The Hill Ranges of Southern India_. 5 parts. Madras, 1870-76.

Shway Yoe (_i.e._ Sir J. G. Scott), _The Burman_. 2 vols. London, 1882.

Sibree (James), _The Great African Island. Chapters on Madagascar_. London, 1880.

Siculus Flaccus, 'De conditionibus agrorum'; in Goesius, _Rei agrariæ auctores_. Amstelredami, 1674.

Sidgwick (H.), _The Methods of Ethics_. London, 1901.

---- 'The Morality of Strife'; in _Internal. Jour. of Ethics_, vol. i. Philadelphia & London, 1891.

{822} Sidonius (C. Sollius Apollinaris), _Epistulæ_. Ed. by P. Mohr. Lipsiae, 1895.

Siebold (H. von), _Ethnologische Studien über die Aino auf der Insel Yesso_. Berlin, 1881.

Simancas (Jacobus), _De catholicis institutionibus liber_. Romae, 1575.

Simcox (E. J.), _Primitive Civilizations_. 2 vols. London, 1894.

Simmel (Georg), _Einleitung in die Moralwissenschaft_. 2 vols. Berlin, 1892-93.

---- 'Die Verwandtenehe'; in _Vossische Zeitung_, June 3rd and 10th, 1894. Berlin.

Simonde de Sismondi (J. C. L.), _Histoire des républiques italiennes du moyen âge_. 16 vols. Paris, 1826.

Simons (F. A. A.), 'An Exploration of the Goajira Peninsula, U.S. of Colombia'; in _Proceed. Roy. Geo. Soc._ new ser. vol. vii. London, 1885.

Simson (Alfred), _Travels in the Wilds of Ecuador_. London, 1886.

Skeat (W. W.), _Malay Magic_. London, 1900.

---- and Blagden (Ch. O.), _Pagan Races of the Malay Peninsula_. 2 vols. London, 1906.

Skene (W. F.), _Celtic Scotland_. 3 vols. Edinburgh, 1876-80.

Skertchly (J. A.), _Dahomey as it is_. London, 1874.

Sleeman (_Sir_ W. H.), _Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Official_. 2 vols. London, 1844.

Smaragdus, 'Via Regia'; in d'Achery, _Spicilegium_, vol. i. Parisiis 1723.

Smeaton (D. Mackenzie), _The Loyal Karens of Burma_. London, 1887.

Smellie (William), _The Philosophy of Natural History_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1790-99.

Smith (Adam), _An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations_. Edinburgh, 1863.

---- _The Theory of Moral Sentiments_. London, 1887.

Smith (Arthur H.), _Chinese Characteristics_. London, 1895.

---- _The Proverbs and Common Sayings of the Chinese_. Shanghai, 1888.

Smith (E. R.), _The Araucanians_. New York, 1855.

Smith (Erminnie A.), 'Myths of the Iroquois'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. ii. Washington, 1883.

Smith (George), _Chaldäische Genesis_. Trans. by H. Delitzsch, ed. by F. Delitzsch. Leipzig, 1876.

---- _The Chaldean Account of Genesis_. Ed. by A. H. Sayce. London, 1880.

Smith (Gerrit), _Letter to Rev. James Smylie, of the State of Mississippi_. New York, 1837.

Smith (Goldwin), _Lectures and Essays_. Toronto, 1881.

Smith (R. Bosworth), _Mohammed and Mohammedanism_. London, 1889.

Smith (S. Percy), 'Futuna'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. i. Wellington 1892.

---- 'Uea'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. i. Wellington, 1892.

Smith (_Sir_ Thomas), _The Common-wealth of England_. London, 1635.

Smith (W. Robertson), _Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia_. Ed. by S. A. Cook. London, 1903.

---- _Lectures on the Religion of the Semites_. London, 1894.

---- 'Sacrifice'; in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, vol. xxi. Edinburgh, 1886.

Smithsonian Institution, Annual Reports of the Board of Regents. Washington.

Smyth (R. Brough), _The Aborigines of Victoria_. 2 vols. London, 1878.

Snorri Sturluson, _Edda_. Ed. by Þ. Jónsson. Kaupmannahöfn, 1875.

{823} Snorri Sturluson, _Heimskringla. Nóregs Konunga Sögur_. Ed. by F. Jónsson. 4 vols. København, 1893-1901.

Snow (W. Parker), 'Remarks on the Wild Tribes of Tierra del Fuego'; in _Trans. Ethn. Soc. London_, new ser. vol. i. London, 1861.

---- _A Two Years' Cruise off Tierra del Fuego_. 2 vols. London, 1857.

Sociological Papers. Published for the Sociological Society. London.

Socrates, 'Historia ecclesiastica'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. lxvii. Parisiis, 1859.

Söderblom (Nathan), _Gudstrons uppkomst_. Stockholm, 1914.

Solinus, _Collectanea rerum memorabilium_. Ed. by Th. Mommsen. Berlin, 1864.

Sommerville (B. T.), 'Ethnographical Notes in New Georgia'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxvi. London, 1897.

Sophocles, _The Plays and Fragments_. Ed. and trans. by R. C. Jebb. 7 vols. Cambridge, 1883-96.

---- _Trag[oe]diæ et Fragmenta_. Ed. by E. A. J. Ahrens. Parisiis, 1842.

Soppitt (C. A.), _A Short Account of the Kuki-Lushai Tribes on the North-East Frontier_. Shillong, 1887.

Soto (Dominicus), _De justitia et jure._ Lugduni, 1582.

South American Missionary Magazine (The). London.

Southey (R.), _History of Brazil_. 3 vols. London, 1810-19.

Sozomenus (Hermias), 'Historia ecclesiastica'; in Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Graeca, vol. lxvii. Parisiis, 1859.

Spangenberg (--), 'Ueber das Verbrechen der Abtreibung der Leibesfrucht'; in _Neues Archiv des Criminalrechts_, vol. ii. Halle, 1818.

---- 'Ueber das Verbrechen des Kindermords und der Aussetzung der Kinder'; in _Neues Archiv des Criminalrechts_, vol. iii. Halle, 1819-20.

Sparrman (A.), _A Voyage to the Cape of Good Hope_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1785.

Spartian, 'Vita Hadriani,' ed. by J. Centerwall; in _Upsala Universitets Årsskrift, 1870_. Upsala, 1869.

'Speculum Saxonum'; in Goldast, _Collectio consuetudinum et legum imperialium_. Francofordiae ad Moenum, 1613.

Spencer (Baldwin) and Gillen (F. J.), _The Native Tribes of Central Australia_. London, 1899.

---- _The Northern Tribes of Central Australia_. London, 1904.

Spencer (Herbert), _Descriptive Sociology_. 8 vols. London, 1873-81.

---- _The Principles of Ethics_. 2 vols. London, 1892-93.

---- _The Principles of Psychology_. 2 vols. London, 1890.

---- _The Principles of Sociology_. 3 vols. London, 1879-96.

Spiegel (F.), _Erdnische Alterthumskunde_. 3 vols. Leipzig, 1871-78.

Spieth (Jakob), _Die E[(w]e-Stämme_. Berlin, 1906.

Spinoza (B. de), _Opera philosophica omnia_. Ed. by A. Gfr[oe]rer. Stuttgardiae, 1830.

Spix (J. B. von) and Martius (C. F. Ph. von), _Reise in Brasilien_. 3 vols. München, 1823-31.

---- _Travels in Brazil in the Years 1817-20_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1824.

Sproat (G. M.), _Scenes and Studies of Savage Life_. London, 1868.

Squier (E. G.), _Nicaragua_. 2 vols. London, 1852.

---- 'Observations on the Archaeology and Ethnology of Nicaragua'; in _Trans. American Ethn. Soc._ vol. iii. pt. i. New York, 1853.

Stäudlin (C. F.), _Geschichte der Vorstellungen und Lehren vom Selbstmorde_. Göttingen, 1824.

{824} Stanley (A. P.), _Christian Institutions_. London, 1884.

Stanley (Hiram M.), _Studies in the Evolutionary Psychology of Feeling_. London, 1895.

Starbuck (E. D.), _The Psychology of Religion_. London, 1899.

Starcke (C. N.), _La famille dans les différentes sociétés_. Paris, 1899.

State Trials, Cobbett's Complete Collection of. Continued by T. B. and T. J. Howell. 33 vols. London, 1809-26.

Statutes of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. 110 vols. Cambridge, London, 1762-1869.

Staunton (_Sir_ G. Thomas), _An Inquiry into the Proper Mode of rendering the Word "God" in translating the Sacred Scriptures into the Chinese Language_. London, 1849.

Stavorinus (J. S.), _Voyages to the East Indies_. Trans. 3 vols. London, 1798.

Steinen (Karl von den), _Durch Central-Brasilien_. Leipzig, 1886.

---- _Unter den Naturvölkern Zentral-Brasiliens_. Berlin, 1894.

Steinmetz (S. R.) 'Gli antichi scongiuri giuridici contro i creditori'; in _Rivista italiana di sociologia_, vol. ii. Roma, 1898.

---- 'Continuität oder Lohn und Strafe im Jenseits der Wilden'; in _Archiv für Anthropologie_, vol. xxiv. Braunschweig, 1897.

---- _Endokannibalismus_. (Reprinted from _Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien_, vol. xxvi.) Wien, 1896.

---- _Ethnologische Studien zur ersten Entwicklung der Strafe_. 2 vols. Leiden & Leipzig, 1894.

---- 'Die neueren Forschungen zur Geschichte der menschlichen Familie,' in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissensch._ vol. ii. Berlin, 1899.

---- _Rechtsverhältnisse von eingeborenen Völkern in Afrika und Ozeanien_. Ed. by S. R. S. Berlin, 1903.

---- 'Suicide among Primitive Peoples'; in _The American Anthropologist_, vol. vii. Washington, 1894.

---- 'Das Verhältnis zwischen Eltern und Kindern bei den Naturvölkern'; in _Zeitschr. f. Socialwissensch._ vol. i. Berlin, 1898.

Steller (E.), _De Sangi-Archipel_. Amsterdam, 1866.

Steller (G. W.), _Beschreibung von dem Lande Kamtschatka_. Frankfurt & Leipzig, 1774.

Stemann (Chr. L. E.), _Den danske Retshistorie indtil Christian V.'s Lov_. Kjöbenhavn, 1871.

Stengel (Paul), _Die griechischen Kultusaltertümer_. München, 1898.

Stephen (A. M.), 'The Navajo'; in _The American Anthropologist_, vol. vi. Washington, 1893.

Stephen (H. J.), _New Commentaries on the Laws of England_. 4 vols. London, 1903.

Stephen (James), _The Slavery of the British West India Colonies delineated_. 2 vols. London, 1824-30.

Stephen (James Fitzjames), _A Digest of the Criminal Law_. London, 1894.

---- _A History of the Criminal Law of England_. 3 vols. London, 1883.

---- _Hora Sabbaticæ_. 3 vols. London, 1891-92.

---- _Liberty, Equality, Fraternity_. London, 1873.

Stephen (Leslie), _The Science of Ethics_. London, 1882.

Stephens (Edward), 'The Aborigines of Australia'; in _Jour. & Proceed. Roy. Soc. N. S. Wales_, vol. xxiii. Sydney & London, 1889.

Stevenson (Matilda C.), 'A Chapter of Zuñi Mythology'; in _Memoirs of the International Congress of Anthropology_. Chicago, 1894.

{825} Stevenson (Matilda C.), 'The Sia'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xi. Washington, 1894.

Stewart (David), _Sketches of the Character, Institutions, and Customs of the Highlanders of Scotland_. Inverness, &c., 1885.

Stewart (Dugald), _The Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers of Man_. 2 vols. Edinburgh, 1828.

Stewart (R.), 'Notes on Northern Cachar'; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. xxiv. Calcutta, 1855.

Stirling (E. C.), 'Anthropology'; in _Report on the Work of the Horn Scientific Expedition to Central Australia_, pt. iv. London & Melbourne, 1896.

Stobaeus (Joannes), _Florilegium_. Ed. by Th. Gaisford. 4 vols. Oxonii, 1822.

Stokes (J. Lort), _Discoveries in Australia_. 2 vols. London, 1846.

Stokes (W.), _All War inconsistent with the Christian Religion_. London, 1855.

Stoll (Otto), _Die Ethnologie der Indianerstämme von Guatemala_. Leiden, 1889.

Stone (O. C.), _A Few Months in New Guinea_. London, 1880.

Storch (Henri), _Cours d'économie politique_. 6 vols. St. Pétersbourg, 1815.

Storr (F.), 'Duel'; in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, vol. vii. Edinburgh, 1877.

Stout (G. F.), _The Groundwork of Psychology_. London, 1903.

Strabo, _Geographica_. Parisiis, 1853.

Strachey (William), _The Historie of Travaile into Virginia Britannia_. Ed. by R. H. Major. London, 1849.

Strack (H. L.), _Der Blutaberglaube in der Menschheit_. München, 1892.

Strafgesetzbuch für das Deutsche Reich (Das). Leipzig, 1876.

Strauss (D. F.), _Der alte und der neue Glaube_. Leipzig, 1872.

Strausz (Adolf), _Die Bulgaren_. Leipzig, 1898.

Strieker (W.), 'Ethnographische Notizen über den Kindermord und die künstliche Fruchtabtreibung'; in _Archiv f. Anthropologie_, vol. v. Braunschweig, 1872.

Strickland (Samuel), _Twenty-seven Years in Canada West_. 2 vols. London, 1853.

Stroud (G. M.), _A Sketch of the Laws relating to Slavery in the Several States of the United States of America_. Philadelphia, 1856.

Strutt (Joseph), _A Complete View of the Manners, Customs, Arms, &c. of the Inhabitants of England_. 3 vols. London, 1775-76.

Struve (B. von), 'Die Samojeden im Norden von Sibirien'; in _Das Ausland_, vol. liii. Stuttgart, 1880.

Strzelecki (P. E. de), _Physical Description of New South Wales and Van Diemen's Land_. London, 1845.

Stuhlmann (Franz), _Mit Emin Pascha ins Herz von Afrika_. Berlin, 1894.

Sturt (Charles), _Narrative of an Expedition into Central Australia_. 2 vols. London, 1849.

Suarez de Paz (Gonçalo), _Praxis ecclesiastica et secularis_. Salamanticae, 1583.

Suetonius Tranquillus (C.), _De vita Cæsarum_. Ed. by C. L. Roth. Lipsiae, 1886.

Sugenheim (S.), _Geschichte der Aufhebung der Leibeigenschaft und Hörigkeit in Europa_. St. Petersburg, 1861.

Sully (James), _Studies of Childhood_. London, 1895.

Sumner (W. G.), 'The Yakuts,' from the Russian of Sieroshevski; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxi. London, 1901.

Suomi. Helsingfors.

{826} Sutherland (Alex.), _The Origin and Growth of the Moral Instinct_. 2 vols. London, 1898.

Swan (James G.), _The Northwest Coast; or, Three Years' Residence in Washington Territory_. New York, 1857.

Swettenham (F. A.), _Malay Sketches_. London & New York, 1895.

Swift (J.), _Works_. With notes by Sir W. Scott. 19 vols. Edinburgh, 1824.

'Tâ Hsio'; in Legge, _The Chinese Classics_, vol. i. Oxford, 1893.

Ta Tsing Leu Lee. Trans. by Sir G. Th. Staunton. London, 1810.

Tacitus (C. C.), _Opera omnia_. 11 vols. Londini, 1821.

Tallqvist (K. L.), 'Die assyrische Beschwörungsserie maqlû'; in _Acta Soc. Scientiarum Fennicæ_, vol. xx. Helsingfors, 1895.

Talmud de Jérusalem (Le). Trans. by M. Schwab, 11 vols. Paris, 1871-89.

'Tâo Teh King (The),' trans. by J. Legge; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxxix. Oxford, 1891.

Taplin (George), _The Folklore, Manners, Customs, and Languages of the South Australian Aborigines_. Ed. by G. T. Adelaide, 1879.

---- 'The Narrinyeri'; in Woods, _Native Tribes of South Australia_. Adelaide, 1879.

Taprobanian (The). Bombay.

Tasmanian Journal of Natural Science, &c. Hobart Town.

Taylor (Jeremy), _The Whole Works of_. Ed. by R. Heber. 15 vols. London, 1822.

Taylor (R.) _Te Ika a Maui; or, New Zealand and its Inhabitants_. London, 1870.

Tedeschi (P.), _La schiavitù_. Piacenza, 1882.

Teit (James), 'The Thompson Indians of British Columbia'; in _Memoirs of the American Museum of Natural History, vol. ii., Anthropology_, vol. i. New York, 1900.

Tennent (_Sir_ J. Emerson), _Ceylon_. 2 vols. London, 1860.

Terme (J.-F.) and Montfalcon (J.-B.), _Histoire des enfants trouvés_. Paris, 1840.

Tertullian, _Opera omnia_. 3 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, vols. i.-iii.) Parisiis, 1844.

Tettau (W. J. A. von), and Temme (J. D. H.), _Die Volkssagen Ostpreussens, Litthauens und Westpreussens_. Berlin, 1837.

Texte (J.), _Jean-Jacques Rousseau and the Cosmopolitan Spirit in Literature_. Trans. London, 1899.

'Thâi-Shang (The),' trans. by J. Legge; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xl. Oxford, 1891.

Theal (G. M. M'Call), _History of the Boers in South Africa_. London, 1887.

Theognis, _Studies in, together with a Text of the Poems_. By E. Harrison. Cambridge, 1902.

Theologische Quartalschrift. Tübingen.

Thérou (_Abbé_), _Le christianisme et l'esclavage_. Paris, 1841.

Thesleff (A.), 'Zigenarlif i Finland'; in _Nya Pressen_, 1897, no. 331 B. Helsingfors.

Thiers (A.), _De la propriété_. Paris, 1848.

Thomas (N. W.), 'Baiame and the Bell-bird'; in _Man_, 1905. London.

---- _Kinship Organisations and Group Marriage in Australia_. Cambridge, 1906.

---- 'Religious Ideas of the Arunta'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. xvi. London, 1905.

{827} Thomas Aquinas (_Saint_), _Summa theologica_, 4 vols. (Migne, _Patrologiæ cursus_, Ser. Secunda, vols. i.-iv.) Parisiis, 1845-46.

Thomassin (Louis), _Dictionnaire de discipline ecclésiastique_. Ed. by J.-J. Bourassé. 2 vols. Paris, 1856.

Thoms (W. J.), _Anecdotes and Traditions, Illustrative of Early English History and Literature_. London, 1839.

Thomson (A. S.), _The Story of New Zealand_. 2 vols. London, 1859.

Thomson (Basil C.), _Savage Island_. London, 1902.

Thomson (J. P.), _British New Guinea_. London, 1892.

Thomson (Joseph), _Through Masai Land_. London, 1887.

Thon (August), _Rechtsnorm und subjectives Recht_. Weimar, 1878.

Thonissen (J. J.), _Le droit pénal de la république athénienne_. Bruxelles & Paris, 1875.

Thorpe (Benjamin), _Northern Mythology_. 3 vols. London, 1851.

Three Early Assize Rolls for the County of Northumberland, sæc. xiii. (_The Publications of the Surtees Society_, vol. lxxxviii.) Durham, 1891.

Threlkeld (L. E.), _An Australian Language as spoken by the Awabakal_. Sydney, 1892.

Thrupp (John), _The Anglo-Saxon Home_. London, 1862.

Thucydides, _Historia Belli Peloponnesiaci_. Parisiis, 1840.

Thunberg (Ch. P.), _Travels in Europe, Africa, and Asia, performed between the Years 1770 and 1779_. 4 vols. London, 1795.

Thurston (Edgar), 'Anthropology of the Todas and Kotas of the Nilgiri Hills'; in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, vol. i. Madras, 1896.

---- 'The Badágas of the Nilgiris'; in the Madras Government Museum's _Bulletin_, vol. ii. Madras, 1897.

Tickell (--), 'Memoir on the Hodésum; in _Jour. Asiatic Soc. Bengal_, vol. ix. Calcutta, 1840.

Tiele (C. P.), _Elements of the Science of Religion_. 2 vols. Edinburgh & London, 1897-99.

---- _History of the Egyptian Religion_. Trans. London, 1882.

---- _Max Müller und Fritz Schultze über ein Problem der Religionswissenschaft_. Trans. Leipzig, 1871.

Tissot (J.), _Le droit pénal étudié dans ses principes_. 2 vols. Paris, 1860.

Tönnies (F.), 'Philosophical Terminology'; in _Mind_, new ser. vol. viii. London, 1899.

Toplady (A. M.), _The Works of_. London, 1853.

Torday (E.) and Joyce (T. A.), 'Notes on the Ethnography of the Ba-Huana'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvi. London, 1906.

---- 'Notes on the Ethnography of the Ba-Mbala'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxv. London, 1905.

---- 'Notes on the Ethnography of the Ba-Yaka'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxvi. London, 1906.

Torquemada (Juan de), _Veinte y un libros rituales y Monarchia Indiana_. 3 vols. Madrid, 1723.

Tout (Ch. Hill), 'Report on the Ethnology of the S[=i]ciatl of British Columbia; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxiv. London, 1904.

---- 'Report on the Ethnology of the Stlatlumh of British Columbia'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxv. London, 1905.

Toy (C. H.), _Judaism and Christianity_. London, 1890.

Transactions and Proceedings of the New Zealand Institute. Wellington.

{828}_Transactions of the American Ethnological Society_. New York.

---- _of the Asiatic Society of Japan_. Yokohama.

---- _of the China Branch of the Royal Asiatic Society_. Hongkong.

---- _of the Ethnological Society of London_. New Series. London.

---- _of the Royal Society of Edinburgh_.

---- _of the Royal Society of South Australia_. Adelaide.

Travers (W. T. L.), 'On the Life and Times of Te Rauparaha'; in _Trans. and Proceed. New Zealand Inst. 1872_, vol. v. Wellington, 1873.

Tregear (E.), 'Easter Island'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. i. Wellington, 1892.

---- _The Maori-Polynesian Dictionary_. Wellington, 1891.

---- 'Niue'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. ii. Wellington, 1893.

Tristram (H. B.), _The Great Sahara_. London, 1860.

Trollope (Anthony), _South Africa_. 2 vols. London, 1878.

Tromp (S. W.), 'Uit de Salasila van Koetei'; in _Bijdragen tot de taal-, land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, vol. xxxvii. (ser. v. vol. iii.). 's Gravenhage, 1888.

Truman (B. C.), _The Field of Honor_. London, 1884.

Trumbull (H. Clay), _The Blood Covenant_. Philadelphia, 1893.

---- _The Threshold Covenant_. New York, 1896.

Trummer (C.), _Vorträge über Tortur, Hexenverfolgungen, &c. in der Hamburgischen Rechtsgeschichte_. 3 vols. Hamburg, 1844-49.

Tschudi (J. J. von), _Reisen durch Südamerika_. 5 vols. Leipzig, 1866-69.

Tucker (Abraham), _The Light of Nature pursued_. 2 vols. London, 1840.

Tuckey (J. K.) _Narrative of an Expedition to explore the River Zaire_. London, 1818.

Tuke (D. H.), _Chapters in the History of the Insane in the British Isles_. London, 1882.

---- _A Dictionary of Psychological Medicine_. 2 vols. London, 1892.

Turnbull (John), _A Voyage round the World, in the Years 1800-1804_. London, 1813.

Turner (George), _Nineteen Years in Polynesia_. London, 1861.

---- _Samoa_. London, 1884.

Turner (James), _Pallas Armata_. London, 1683.

Turner (L. M.), 'Ethnology of the Ungava District, Hudson Bay Territory'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. xi. Washington, 1894.

Turner (Sharon), _The History of England._ 12 vols. London, 1839.

Tutuila (--), 'The Line Islanders'; in _Jour. Polynesian Soc._ vol. i. Wellington, 1892.

Twells (Leonard) and others, _The Lives of Dr. E. Pocock, &c._ 2 vols. London, 1816.

Twiss (_Sir_ Travers), _The Law of Nations_. Oxford & London, 1875.

Tyler (Josiah), _Forty Years among the Zulus_. Boston & Chicago, [1891].

Tylor (_Sir_ E. B.), _Anthropology_. London, 1895.

---- 'On the Limits of Savage Religion'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxi. London, 1892.

---- 'On a Method of investigating the Development of Institutions'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xviii. London, 1889.

---- _Primitive Culture_. 2 vols. London, 1903.

---- 'Primitive Society'; in _The Contemporary Review_, vols. xxi.-xxii. London, 1873.

{829} Tylor (E. B.), 'Remarks on Totemism'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxviii. London, 1899.

---- _Researches into the Early History of Mankind_. London, 1878.

---- 'Salutations'; in _Encyclopædia Britannica_, vol. xxi. London, 1886.

Uhlhorn (G.), _Die christliche Liebesthätigkeit_. 3 vols. Stuttgart, 1882-90.

Unger (F. W.), 'Der gerichtliche Zweikampf bei den germanischen Völkern'; in _Göttinger Studien_, 1847, Zweite Abtheilung: Philosophische, philologische und historische Abhandlungen. Göttingen.

Urquhart (D.), _The Spirit of the East_. 2 vols. London, 1838.

Usener (H.), _Götternamen_. Bonn, 1896.

Utie[vs]enovi['c] (O. M.), _Die Hauskommunionen der Südslaven_. Wien, 1859.

Valerius Maximus, _Factorum dictorumque memorabilium libri novem_. 3 vols. Londini, 1823.

Valikhanof (--) and others, _The Russians in Central Asia_. Trans. by J. and R. Michell. London, 1865.

Vallon (Ch.) and Marie (A.), 'Des psychoses religieuses'; in _Archives de neurologie_, ser. ii. vol. iii. Paris, 1897.

Valroger (L. de), _Les Celtes_. Paris, 1879.

Vámbéry (H.), _Der Islam im neunzehnten Jahrhundert_. Leipzig, 1875.

---- _Travels in Central Asia_. London, 1864.

---- _Das Türkenvolk_. Leipzig, 1885.

Vangerow (K. A. von), _Lehrbuch der Pandekten_. 3 vols. Marburg & Leipzig, 1876.

Varro (M. Terentius), _De lingua Latina_. Ed. by M. Nisard. Paris, 1850.

---- _Rerum rusticarum libri tres_. Lipsiae, 1889.

'Vasishtha,' trans. by G. Bühler; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xiv. Oxford, 1882.

Vattel (E. de), _Le droit des gens_. 2 vols. Neuchatel, 1777.

Velten (C.), _Sitten und Gebräuche der Suaheli_. Göttingen, 1903.

Vendîdâd (The). Trans. by J. Darmesteter. (_The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. iv.) Oxford, 1895.

'Venedotian Code (The)'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales_. London, 1841.

Verhandlungen der Berliner Gesellschaft für Anthropologie, Ethnologie und Urgeschichte. Berlin.

Vierkandt (A.), _Naturvölker und Kulturvölker_. Leipzig, 1896.

Vigfusson (Gudbrand) and Powell (F. York), _Corpus Poeticum Boreale_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1883.

Vignioli (Tito), _Myth and Science_. London, 1882.

Villemain (A. F.), _Cours de littérature française. Littérature du moyen âge_. 2 vols. Paris, 1830.

Villot (E.), _M[oe]urs, coutumes et institutions des indigènes de l'Algérie_. Alger, 1888.

Vincentius Bellovacensis, _Speculum naturale_. Venetijs, 1494.

Vinnius (A.), _In quatuor libros institutionum imperialium commentarius_. Lugduni, 1747.

Vinogradoff (Paul), _Villainage in England_. Oxford, 1892.

Virgilius Maro (P.), _Opera omnia_. 10 vols. Londini, 1819.

Vischer (Wilhelm), _Kleine Schriften_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1877-78.

Vishnu, _The Institutes of_. See _Institutes of Vishnu (The)_.

{830}_Vish['n]u Purá['n]a (The)_. Trans. by H. H. Wilson. London, 1840.

Volkens (Georg), _Der Kilimandscharo_. Berlin, 1897.

Voltaire (F. M. Arouet de), _[OE]uvres complètes_. 70 vols. _S. l._, 1785-89. (Quoted in vol. i.)

---- _[OE]uvres complètes_. 13 vols. Paris, 1836-38. (Quoted in vol. ii.)

Vos (H.), 'Die Verbreitung der Anthropophagie auf dem asiatischen Festlande'; in _Internat. Archiv f. Ethnogr._ vol. iii. Leiden, 1890.

Vossische Zeitung. Berlin.

Wachsmuth (Wilhelm), _Hellenische Alterthumskunde_. 2 vols. Halle, 1846.

Waddell (L. A.), _The Buddhism of Tibet_. London, 1895.

Wachter (C. G. von), _Beiträge zur Deutschen Geschichte_. Tübingen, 1845.

Waitz (Theodor), _Anthropologie der Naturvölker_. 6 vols. (vols. v. pt. ii. and vol. vi. by G. Gerland). Leipzig, 1859-72.

---- _Introduction to Anthropology_. Trans. London, 1863.

Wall (W.), _The History of Infant-Baptism_. 2 vols. Oxford, 1862.

Wallace (A. Russel), _The Malay Archipelago_. London, 1890.

---- _Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro_. London, 1853.

Wallace (D. Mackenzie), _Russia_. 2 vols. London, 1877.

Wallin (G. A.), _Första Resa från Cairo till Arabiska öknen 1845_. Helsingfors, 1853.

---- _Notes taken during a Journey through Part of Northern Arabia, in 1848_. (Reprinted from _Jour. Roy. Geo. Soc._ vol. xx.) London, 1850-51.

---- _Reseanteckningar från Orienten åren 1843-1849_. Ed. by S. G. Elmgren. 4 vols. Helsingfors, 1864-66.

Wallon (H.), _Histoire de l'esclavage dans l'antiquité_. 3 vols. Paris, 1879.

Walter (Ferdinand), _Das alte Wales_. Bonn, 1859.

---- _Geschichte des Römischen Rechts bis auf Justinian_. 2 vols. Bonn, 1860-61.

Ward (Herbert), _Five Years with the Congo Cannibals_. London, 1890.

Ward (Robert), _An Enquiry into the Foundation and History of the Law of Nations in Europe, from the Time of the Greeks and Romans, to the Age of Grotius_. 2 vols. London, 1795.

Ward (W.), _A View of the History, Literature, and Religion of the Hindoos_. 4 vols. London, 1817-20.

Wardlaw (R.), _Four Sermons: Two on Man's Accountableness for his Belief, &c._ Glasgow, 1830.

Waronen (Matti), _Vainajainpalvelus muinaisilla suomalaisilla_. Helsingissä, 1895.

Wasserschleben (F. W. H.), _Die Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche_. Halle, 1851.

Waterland (D.), 'Sermon on Self-Love'; in _The English Preacher_, vol. i. London, 1773.

Watson (J. Selby), _The Reasoning Power in Animals_. London, 1867.

Wayland (Francis), _The Elements of Moral Science_. London, 1863.

Weber (A.), _Indische Streifen_. 3 vols. Berlin & Leipzig, 1868-79.

---- 'Eine Legende des Çatapatha-Brâhma[n.]a über die strafende Vergeltung nach dem Tode'; in _Zeitschr. der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellsch._ vol. ix. Leipzig, 1855.

Weber (E. von), _Vier Jahre in Afrika_. 2 vols. Leipzig, 1878.

Webster (Hutton), _Rest Days_. New York, 1916.

Weddell (James), _A Voyage towards the South Pole_. London, 1825.

{831} Wegener (H.) _Geschichte der christlichen Kirche auf dem Gesellschafts-Archipel_. Berlin, 1844.

Weinhold (Karl), _Altnordisches Leben_. Berlin, 1856.

---- _Die deutschen Frauen in dem Mittelalter_. 2 vols. Wien, 1882.

Welcker (F. G.), _Griechische Götterlehre_. 3 vols. Göttingen, 1857.

---- _Kleine Schriften_. 3 vols. Bonn, 1844-50.

Wellhausen (J.), _Prolegomena to the History of Israel_. Trans. London, 1885.

---- _Reste des arabischen Heidentums_. Berlin, 1897.

Welling (J. C.), 'The Law of Torture'; in _The American Anthropologist_, vol. v. Washington, 1892.

'Welsh Laws'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales_. London, 1841.

Westcott (B. F.), _Essays in the History of Religious Thought in the West_. London, 1891.

Westcott (W. W.), _Suicide_. London, 1885.

Westermarck (Edward), '_L-[(]âr_, or the Transference of Conditional Curses in Morocco'; in _Anthropological Essays presented to E. B. Tylor_. London, 1907.

---- _Ceremonies and Beliefs connected with Agriculture, certain Dates of the Solar Year, and the Weather in Morocco_. (_Öfversigt af Finska Vetenskaps-Societetens Förhandlingar. Bd. LIV., 1911-1912. Afd. B. N: o_ 1) Helsingfors, 1913.

---- _The History of Human Marriage_. London, 1894.

---- 'The Magic Origin of Moorish Designs'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxxiv. London, 1904.

---- _Marriage Ceremonies in Morocco_. London, 1914.

---- 'Méthode pour la recherche des institutions préhistoriques à propos d'un ouvrage du professeur Kohler'; in _Revue internationale de sociologie_, vol. v. Paris, 1897.

---- 'Midsummer Customs in Morocco'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. xvi. London, 1905.

---- _The Moorish Conception of Holiness (Baraka)_. (_Öfversigt af Finska Vetenskaps-Societetens Förhandlingar. Bd. LVIII., 1915-1916. Afd. B. N: o_ 1) Helsingfors, 1916.

---- 'The Nature of the Arab _[vG]inn_, Illustrated by the present Beliefs of the People of Morocco'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxix. London, 1900.

---- 'Normative und psychologische Ethik'; in _Bericht über den III. International Congress für Psychologie in München_. München, 1897.

---- 'The Popular Ritual of the Great Feast in Morocco'; in _Folk-Lore_, vol. xxii. London, 1911.

---- 'The Position of Woman in Early Civilisation'; in _Sociological Papers_, vol. i., 1904. London, 1905.

---- 'Sul culto dei santi nel Marocco'; in _Actes du douzième Congrès International des Orientalistes_, Rome, 1899, vol. iii. pt. i. Florence, 1902.

Westgöta-Lagen. Ed. by H. S. Collin and C. J. Schlyter. (_Corpus Juris Sueo-Gotorum Antiqui_, vol. i.) Stockholm, 1827.

Wheaton (Henry), _Elements of International Law_. Ed. by A. C. Boyd. London, 1889.

Wheeler (G. C.), _The Tribe, and Intertribal Relations in Australia_. London, 1910.

Wheeler (J. D.), _A Practical Treatise on the Law of Slavery_. New York & New Orleans, 1837.

Wheeler (J. Talboys), _The History of India_. 4 vols. London, 1867-74.

{832} Wherry (E. M.), _A Comprehensive Commentary on the Qurán_. 4 vols. London, 1882-86.

Whewell (William), _The Elements of Morality_. Cambridge, 1864.

Whitney (W. D.), 'On the Main Results of the later Vedic Researches in Germany'; in _Jour. American Oriental Soc._ vol. iii. New York, 1853.

Wichmann (Yrjö), 'Tietoja Votjaakkien mytologiiasta'; in _Suomi_, ser. iii. vol. vi. Helsingissä, 1893.

Wied-Neuwied (Maximilian Prinz zu), _Reise nach Brasilien in den Jahren 1815 bis 1817_. 2 vols Frankfurt a.M., 1820-21.

---- _Travels in the Interior of North America_. Trans. London, 1843.

Wiedemann (Alfred), _The Ancient Egyptian Doctrine of the Immortality of the Soul_. Trans. London, 1895.

---- _Herodots zweites Buch mit sachlichen Erläuterungen herausgegeben von_. Leipzig, 1890.

---- 'Ma[=a], déesse de la vérité'; in _Annales du Musée Guimet_, vol. x. Paris, 1887.

---- _Religion of the Ancient Egyptians_. London, 1897.

Wiener (J.), 'Die alttestamentarischen Speiseverbote'; in _Zeitschr. f. Ethnol._ vol. viii. Berlin, 1875.

Wiener Medizinische Wochenschrift. Wien.

Wigmore (J. H.), 'Responsibility for Tortious Acts'; in _Harvard Law Review_, vol. vii., 1893-94. Cambridge (Mass.), 1894.

Wihtræd (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Wilda (W. E.), _Das Strafrecht der Germanen_. Halle, 1842.

Wilken (G. A.), _Het animisme bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel_. Amsterdam, 1884-85.

---- _Huwelijken tusschen bloedverwanten_. (Reprinted from _De Gids_, 1890, no. 6.) Amsterdam.

---- _Over de verwantschap en het huwelijks- en erfrecht bij de volken van het maleische ras_. (Reprinted from _De Indische Gids_, May, 1883.) Amsterdam.

---- 'Plechtigheden en gebruiken bij verlovingen en huwelijken bij de volken van den Indischen Archipel'; in _Bijdragen tot de taal-, land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, ser. v. vols. i., iv. 's Gravenhage, 1886, 1889.

---- 'Het Strafrecht bij de volken van het maleische ras'; in _Bijdragen tot de taal-, land- en volkenkunde van Nederlandsch-Indië_, Land- en volkenkunde, 1883. 's Gravenhage.

---- 'Ueber das Haaropfer und einige andere Trauergebräuche bei den Völkern Indonesien's'; in _Revue coloniale internationale_, vols. iii.-iv. Amsterdam, 1886, vol. ii., and 1887, vol. i. Amsterdam.

Wilkes (Charles), _Narrative of the United States Exploring Expedition during the Years 1838-42_. 5 vols. Philadelphia & London, 1845.

Wilkin (Anthony), in _Reports of the Cambridge Anthropological Expedition to Torres Straits_, vol. v. Cambridge, 1904.

Wilkins (D.), _Concilia Magnæ Britanniæ et Hiberniæ_. 4 vols. London, 1737.

Wilkins (W. J.), _Modern Hinduism_. London, 1887.

William the Conqueror (_King_), 'The Laws of'; in _Ancient Laws and Institutes of England_. London, 1840.

Williams (Charles), _Dogs and their Ways_. London, 1863.

Williams (John), _A Narrative of Missionary Enterprises in the South Sea Islands_. London, 1837.

{833} Williams (Monier). See Monier-Williams (Monier).

Williams (S. Wells), _The Middle Kingdom_. 2 vols. New York, 1883.

Williams (Thomas) and Calvert (James), _Fiji and the Fijians_. London, 1870.

Wilson (Andrew), _The Abode of Snow_. Edinburgh & London, 1876.

Wilson (C. T.) and Felkin (R. W.), _Uganda and the Egyptian Soudan_. 2 vols. London, 1882.

Wilson (H. H.), 'A Sketch of the Religious Sects of the Hindus'; in _Asiatic Researches_, vol. xvi. Calcutta, 1828.

---- _Works_. 12 vols. London, 1862-71.

Wilson (J. Leighton), _Western Africa_. London, 1856.

Wilson (J. M.) and Fowler (Th.), _The Principles of Morals_. 2 parts. Oxford, 1886-87.

Wilson (James), _A Missionary Voyage to the Southern Pacific Ocean, performed in the Years 1796-1798_. London, 1799.

Wilson (M.), _Charity Mistaken_. St. Omer, 1630.

Wilson (_Sir_ R. K.), _History of Modern English Law_. London, &c., 1875.

Wilson (S. G.), _Persian Life and Customs_. Edinburgh & London, 1896.

Windischmann (F.), _Zoroastrische Studien_. Ed. by F. Spiegel. Berlin, 1863.

Winroth (A.), _Offentlig rätt. Familjerätt: Äktenskapshindren_. Lund, 1890.

Winter (J.), _Die Stellung der Sklaven bei den Juden in rechtlicher und gesellschaftlicher Beziehung nach talmudischen Quellen_. Breslau, 1886.

Winterbottom (Thomas), _An Account of the Native Africans in the Neighbourhood of Sierra Leone_. 2 vols. London, 1803.

Winternitz (M.), 'Das altindische Hochzeitsrituell'; in _Denkschriften der kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philosophisch-historische Classe_, vol. xl. Wien, 1892.

---- 'Einige Bemerkungen über das Bauopfer bei den Indern'; in _Mittheilungen der Anthropologischen Gesellschaft in Wien_, vol. xvii. Wien, 1887.

Wissmann (H. von), _Unter deutscher Flagge quer durch Afrika_. Berlin, 1889.

---- Wolf (L.), François (C. von), and Mueller (H.), _Im Innern Afrikas_. Leipzig, 1891.

Wissowa (Georg), _Religion und Kultus der Römer_. München, 1902.

Wlislocki (H. von), _Volksglaube und religiöser Brauch der Magyaren_. Münster i.W., 1893.

---- _Volksglaube und religiöser Brauch der Zigeuner_. Münster i.W., 1891.

Woldt (A.), _Kaptein Jacobsens Reiser til Nordamerikas Nordvestkyst 1881-1883_. Trans. Kristiania, 1887.

Wolff (Christian von), _Jus Gentium_. Francofurti & Lipsiae, 1764.

Wolseley (G. J. _Viscount_), _The Soldier's Pocket-Book for Field Service_. London, 1886.

Wood (John), _A Personal Narrative of a Journey to the Source of the River Oxus_. London, 1841.

Wood-Martin (W. G.), _Traces of the Elder Faiths of Ireland_. 2 vols. London, 1902.

Wood-Renton (A.), 'Moral Mania'; in _The Law Quarterly Review_, vol. iii. London, 1887.

Woods (J. D.), _The Native Tribes of South Australia_; with an Introductory Chapter by J. D. W. Adelaide, 1879.

Woodthorpe (R. G.), 'Some Account of the Shans and Hill Tribes of the States on the Mekong'; in _Jour. Anthr. Inst._ vol. xxvi. London, 1897.

{834} Worcester (Dean C.), _The Philippine Islands and their People_. New York, 1898.

World (The). By Adam Fitz-Adam. 4 vols. London, 1753-56.

Wrangell (F. von), _Narrative of an Expedition to the Polar Sea, in the Years 1820-1823_. Trans. London, 1840.

Wrede (A. von), _Reise in [H.]adhramaut_. Ed. by H. von Maltzan. Braunschweig, 1870.

Wrede (Richard), _Die Körperstrafen bei alten Völkern_. Dresden, 1898-99.

Wright (Julia McNair), _Among the Alaskans_. Philadelphia, 1883.

Wright (Thomas), _Essays on Archæological Subjects_. 2 vols. London, 1861.

---- _A History of Domestic Manners and Sentiments in England during the Middle Ages_. London, 1862.

Wundt (W.), _Ethics_. Trans. by E. B. Titchener and others. 3 vols. London, 1897-1901.

---- _Ethik_. Stuttgart, 1892.

Wuttke (A.), _Der deutsche Volksaberglaube der Gegenwart_. Ed. by E. H. Meyer. Berlin, 1900.

Wyatt (William), 'Some Account of the Manners and Superstitions of the Adelaide and Encounter Bay Aboriginal Tribes'; in Woods, _The Native Tribes of South Australia_. Adelaide, 1879.

Xenophon, _Scripta quæ supersunt_. Parisiis, 1838.

Yanoski (J.), _De l'abolition de l'esclavage ancien au moyen âge_. Paris, 1860.

Yarrow (H. C.), 'A Further Contribution to the Study of the Mortuary Customs of the North American Indians'; in _Ann. Rep. Bur. Ethn._ vol. i. Washington, 1881.

---- _Introduction to the Study of Mortuary Customs among the North American Indians_. Washington, 1880.

'Yasna (The),' trans. by L. H. Mills; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxxi. Oxford, 1887.

'Yasts (The),' trans. by J. Darmesteter; in _The Sacred Books of the East_, vol. xxiii. Oxford, 1883.

Yate (William), _An Account of New Zealand_. London, 1835.

Ymer. Tidskrift utgifven af Svenska Sällskapet för Antropologi och Geografi. Stockholm.

Young (Thomas), _An Essay on Humanity to Animals_. London, 1798.

Zachariä (H. A.), _Die Lehre vom Versuche der Verbrechen_. 2 vols. Göttingen, 1836-39.

Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft. Leipzig.

---- _der Gesellschaft für Erdkunde zu Berlin_.

---- _für die Criminal-Rechts-Pflege in den Preussischen Staaten_. Ed. by E. Hitzig. Berlin.

---- _für Ethnologie_. Berlin.

---- _für geschichtliche Rechtswissenschaft_. Ed. by F. C. von Savigny and others. Berlin & Stettin.

---- _für Socialwissenschaft_. Ed. by J. Wolf. Berlin.

---- _für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft_. Ed. by J. Kohler. Stuttgart.

---- _für Völkerpsychologie und Sprachwissenschaft_. Leipzig.

Zeller (E.), _A History of Greek Philosophy from the Earliest Period to the Time of Socrates_. Trans. 2 vols. London, 1881.

---- _Socrates and the Socratic School_. Trans. London, 1885.

{835} Zeller (E.), _The Stoics, Epicureans and Sceptics_. Trans. London, 1892.

Zend-Avesta (Le). Trans. into French by J. Darmesteter. 2 vols. Paris, 1892.

Ziegler (Th.), _Social Ethics_. Trans. London, 1892.

Zimmer (Heinrich), _Altindisches Leben_. Berlin, 1879.

Zimmermann (W. F. A.), _Die Inseln des indischen und stillen Meeres_. 3 vols. Berlin, 1863-65.

Zimmern (Heinrich), _Babylonische Busspsalmen_. Leipzig, 1885.

---- _Babylonische Hymnen und Gebete in Auswahl_. Leipzig, 1905.

---- _Beiträge zur Kenntnis der Babylonischen Religion. Die Beschwörungstafeln [vS]urpu, &c._ Leipzig, 1901.

Zöckler (Otto), _Askese und Mönchtum_. 2 vols. Frankfurt a. M., 1897.

Zöller (Hugo), _Forschungsreisen in der deutschen Colonie Kamerun_. 3 vols. Berlin & Stuttgart, 1885.

---- _Das Togoland und die Sklavenkuste_. Berlin & Stuttgart, 1885.

Zscharnack (L.), _Der Dienst der Frau in den ersten Jahrhunderten der christlichen Kirche_. Göttingen, 1902.

SUBJECT INDEX

ABLUTIONS, i. 53-56, ii. 294, 295, 352-354, 358-359, 415, 416, 726

Abortion, i. 378, 408, 409, 413-417, ii. 705

Accessio, ii. 50

Accident, injuries due to, i. 217-240, 315, 316, 319, ii. 714; benefits due to, i. 318 _sq._; the future state of persons who have died by, ii. 238, 239, 241

Acts, i. 203-206

Adopted children, rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 46; maternal affection for, ii. 187-189

Adoption, of prisoners of war, i. 336; of unintentional manslayers, i. 484; the blood-covenant represented as a rite of, ii. 206 _sq._; marriage between relations by, ii. 369, 374, 375, 748-750, 752

Adultery, ii. 447-455; punishment of, i. 189, 311, 492, 521, 630, ii. 447-45. 452, 453, 558; self-redress in case of, i. 290-293, 491 _sq._, ii. 447; as a ground for divorce or judicial separation, ii. 397, 455; supposed to injure the harvest, ii. 417, 747; stigmatised by religion, ii. 447, 448, 450, 453-455, 675, 676, 684, 686, 700, 717; refuge denied to persons guilty of, ii. 632 _sq._

Aesthetic emotions, i. 326

---- judgments, i. 8

Affection. See Altruistic sentiment; Conjugal, Filial, Fraternal, Marital, Maternal, Paternal, Social affection

Age, restrictions in diet depending on, ii. 319 _sq._ See Children, Old age, Old persons, Seniority

Agricultural tribes, the position of women among, i. 660 _sq._; slavery among, i. 673, 674, 681; social aggregates of, ii. 201; sympathy for domestic animals among, ii. 506, see Oxen

Agriculture, originally a feminine pursuit, i. 634, 635 n. ^4, 637; moral valuation of, ii. 273-277, 280, 402

Albinos, religious veneration of, ii. 590

All Souls, ii. 550

All-father. See Supreme beings

Alliance, prohibition of marriage between relations by, ii. 369, 377

Alms, connection between sacrifices offered to gods and, i. 565-569; between fasting and the giving of, ii. 316-318; between offerings to the dead and, ii. 550-552; to be given with an ungrudging eye, and not before witnesses, i. 594. See Charity

Altruistic sentiment, the, its origin and development, ch. xxxiv. (ii. 186-228); i. 94, 95, 110-114, 129, 373, 468, 559, ii. 494-506, 510-514. See Conjugal, Filial, Fraternal, Marital, Maternal, Paternal, Social affection

Ancestors. See Dead

Anger, the nature and origin of, i. 21-23, 30, 38-42; in animals, i. 22, ii. 51; in children, i. 22 _sq._; towards inanimate things, i. 26, 27, 260-263, 315; appeased by repentance, i. 87; sympathetic resentment produced by the cognition of the signs of, i. 114 _sq._; injuries inflicted in, i. 290-298, 311, 316 _sq._; a cause of suicide, ii. 233

Animals, regard for the lower, ch. xliv. (ii. 490-514), i. 11 _sq._; anger in, i. 22, ii. 51; revenge taken upon, i. 26, 27, 251-253, 255, 256, 258; revenge taken by, i. 37 _sq._; self-regarding pride in, i. 39, ii. 137 _sq._; retributive kindly emotion in, i. 94; sympathetic resentment in, i. 112, ii. 52; killing of sacred, i. 227, ii. 603-606, 609; of totemic, ii. 210, 603, 604, 606; {838} of various kinds of, see Killing; eating of totemic, i. 227, ii. 210, 211, 323, 324, 606; credited with a conscience, i. 249-251; not responsible for their acts, i. 249-251; treated as responsible agents, i. 251-260, 264, 308; believed to take vengeance upon men, i. 252, 258, ii. 491, 497, 500, 502, 504, 603; subject to regular punishment, ii. 253-260, 264, 308; sexual intercourse between men and, i. 253 _sq._, ii. 409, 749; believed to be rewarded or punished after death, i. 258 _sq._; regarded as on a footing of equality with man, i. 258-260, ii. 494, 510; non-moral resentment in the case of injuries inflicted by, i. 316; sacrificed instead of human victims, i. 469 _sq._; sacrificed for the purpose of saving the lives of men or of other animals, i. 469 _sq._, ii. 616 _sq._; their desire to appropriate and to keep that which has been appropriated, ii. 51; maternal affection among, ii. 186-190, 193; paternal affection among, ii. 189, 190, 193; conjugal attachment among, ii. 191 _sq._; abstinence from eating various kinds of, ii. 319-335; from eating any kind of, ii. 335-338, 499; belief in the transmigration of human souls into, ii. 324, 328, 338, 490, 496, 500, 504, 516, 517, 693, 709 _sq._; homosexual intercourse among, ii. 456, 466, 475 n. ^2; their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 582 _sq._; worship of, ii. 590, 598; sheltered by sacred places, ii. 627-629, 631, 635

Animism, ii. 595-597

Annihilation of the soul, belief in the, ii. 236, 515, 516, 559, 565, 580, 679

Anthropomorphism, ii. 595, 597-600

Antipathies, disinterested, i. 116, 117, 533, 713 _sq._, ii. 113, 166, 185, 227, 262, 266-268, 291, 334, 335, 351, 368, 372-375, 381, 382, 403, 404, 434, 439, 440, 483, 484, 744-746

Antivivisectionists, ii. 512, 514

Apes, the man-like, paternal care among, ii. 189 _sq._; the duration of their conjugal unions, ii. 192; not gregarious, ii. 195; chiefly monogamous, ii. 391. See Monkeys Arbitration, i. 368 _sq._

Arms, stealing of, i. 287, ii. 14; regarded with superstitious veneration, i. 506; oaths taken upon, i. 506, ii. 119-121

Arson, i. 187, 188, 293, 676, ii. 633

Asceticism, ii. 281, 315-318, 355-363, 421

Astronomical changes, abstinence from work connected with, ii. 284-288, 747; fasting connected with, ii. 309-315

Asylums, ii. 628-638; i. 221, 224, 295-297, 307, 308, 380, 427, 579, 580, 585, 668, 669, 690, 692, 696

Atheism, ii. 643 _sq._

Atonement. See Expiation, Expiatory sacrifice

---- the day (fast) of, i. 65, ii. 311, 312, 316, 357-359. 617

Attempts to commit crimes, i. 200, 241-247, 374

"BAD," analysis of the concept, i. 134

Badger-baiting, ii. 509

Bananas, abstinence from, ii. 321

Banishment, as a punishment, i. 46, 58, 172, 173, 224, 225, 227, 228, 267, 287, 312, 424, 601, ii. 4, 6, 7, 10, 12, 74, 123 n. ^1, 331, 424, 425, 452, 475 n. ^10, 478, 525

Baptism, i. 55, 411, 416, 417, 666, ii. 295, 417, 721-723

Barrenness of a wife, human sacrifices offered in cases of, i. 457 _sq._; a cause of polygyny, ii. 388

Bear-baiting, ii. 508-510

Beating, as a religious rite, ii. 294, 357-359

Beef, abstinence from, ii. 327, 330

Bees, prohibition of killing, ii. 490

Beliefs, as subjects of moral judgments, i. 215 _sq._

Benefit of Clergy, i. 491

Benevolence, ch. xxxiii. (ii. 153-185). See Charity, Hospitality

Bestiality, i. 253 _sq._, ii. 409, 749

Birds, defending their nests, ii. 51; paternal care among, ii. 189 _sq._; the duration of conjugal unions among, ii. 192

---- of night, abstinence from eating, ii. 333

---- of prey, prohibition of eating, ii. 321

Blasphemy, ii. 639, 640, 719

Blessings, materialistic conception of, i. 98, 562; pronounced by {839} recipients of gifts, i. 561-565; gods appealed to in, i. 562, 564 _sq._, ii. 686, 731; of strangers, i. 581-584, ii. 446; of parents, i. 621-627; of old persons, i. 626; in salutations, ii. 151

Blood, effusion of, at funerals, i. 26, 27, 476, ii. 544, 545, 547; abstinence from, i. 187, ii. 334 _sq._; as a religious rite, i. 470 _sq._, ii. 294, 557; pollution of, i. 225, 232, 233, 375-382, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2, 262, 714; shedding of, prohibited in sacred places, i. 380, ii. 635; offered to the dead, i. 475 _sq._; drunk or licked in blood-revenge, i. 483 _sq._; as a conductor of curses, i. 586, 587, 591, ii. 69, 118-121, 208, 209, 566, 567, 618-622, 687-689; primitive ideas concerning, i. 664 n. ^1; oaths taken upon, ii. 118-121, 621, 622, 687-689; supernatural or medicinal effect ascribed to the partaking of human, ii. 564 _sq._ See Cannibalism

---- -covenant, the, ii. 206-209, 566 _sq._

---- -money. See Compensation for homicide

---- -revenge, i. 477-492, ii. 748; collective responsibility in, i. 24, 25, 30-36, 43; vow of, i. 58; restricted to the actual culprit, i. 71; a cause of social disturbance, i. 182 _sq._; in cases of accidental injury, i. 217, 218, 231 _sq._; taken upon animals, i. 251-253, 255 256, 258; upon lunatics, i. 271; connection between inheritance and, ii. 54 _sq._; between the system of tracing descent and, ii. 211

Bodily integrity, the right to, ch. xxii. (i. 511-525); of the dead, ii. 516 _sq._; of gods, ii. 602, 610

Boundaries. See Landmarks

Brother, killing of a, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2. See Fraternal affection, duties

---- the elder, allowed to inflict corporal punishment upon the younger one, i. 515; respect for, i. 605, 606, 614; curses of, i. 626, ii. 703

Buffaloes, abstinence from the flesh of, ii. 320, 322; prohibition of killing, for food, ii. 330

Buildings, human sacrifices offered at the foundation of, i. 447 n. ^5, 461-465; animals sacrificed at the foundation of, ii. 617

Bull-baiting, ii. 509 _sq._

Burglary, i. 187, 312, ii. 58, 633

Burial, ii. 521-523, 525-527. 542, 543, 546-548, 704; depending on the mode of death, i. 26, ii. 238-240, 246, 248, 252, 255 _sq._; denied to suicides, ii. 238, 250, 549; to murdered persons, ii. 239, 549; to persons struck by lightning, ii. 2 39, 549; to persons who have killed a parent, brother, or child, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; of criminals, ii. 694

Butchers, regarded as unclean, ii. 493; despised, ii. 498

Butter, abstinence from, ii. 326

CALUMNY, ii. 140-142; against dead persons, ii. 519, 552

Calves, abstinence from slaughtering, ii. 331

Camels, revenge in, i. 37 _sq._; abstinence from the flesh of, ii. 332, 334 n. ^2

Cannibalism, ch. xlvi. (ii. 553-581); old persons victims of, i. 390, ii. 554, 568 _sq._; practised for medicinal purposes, i. 401, ii. 562, 564 _sq._; the firstborn a victim of, i. 458 _sq._, ii. 562; as a punishment, ii. 4, 367, 554, 558 _sq._; considered polluting, ii. 538, 575 _sq._

Carelessness, i. 210-212, 305-310, 317 _sq._

Castes, intermarriage between different, ii. 379. See Rank

Casuistry, ii. 100, 101, 117

Cats, sympathetic resentment in, ii. 52; abstinence from eating, ii. 327, 330, 332; taken for spirits in disguise, ii. 491; their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 583

Cattle, stealing of, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 14; abstinence from killing, ii. 330, 493 _sq._; reverence for, ii. 331 _sq._; affection for, ii. 331, 494. See Beef, Calves, Cows, Oxen

---- -rearing, largely a masculine pursuit, i. 634, 636. See Pastoral peoples

Celibacy, ch. xli. (ii. 399-421); a cause of unchastity, ii. 432; of homosexual practices, ii. 467

Character, i. 214, 215, 310-314, 318 _sq._; the innate, i. 325 _sq._

Charity, ch. xxiii. (i. 526-569); as a duty emphasised by religion, i. {840}549-558, 561-569, ii. 669, 672, 699, 705, 711, 717, 718, 725, 726, 732. See Alms

Charms, made from dead bodies, ii. 204, 546; against the evil eye, ii. 256 n. ^2; put in tombs, ii. 701

Chastity, ch. xlii. (ii. 422-455); suicide as a means of preserving, ii. 242, 251 _sq._; fasting the beginning of, ii. 318; required in connection with the religious cult, ii. 406-421, 736

Chiefs, tied by custom, i. 161 _sq._; justice administered by, i. 173-176, 180-184, 490 _sq._; protecting foreigners and persons who have no relations, i. 180; killing of, i. 43; human sacrifices offered for the purpose of saving the lives of, i. 454-456, 466; sacrificed, i. 466; the practice of compensation encouraged by, i. 490 _sq._; disrespect for, punished by gods, i. 626; proprietary rights of, ii. 33; suicide committed on the graves of, ii. 234; labour suspended on the death of, ii. 284; abstinence from fish after the death of, ii. 301; treatment of the dead bodies of, ii. 527; cannibalism practised by, ii. 558, 574; their tombs asylums, ii. 630; their houses asylums, ii. 636; their persons asylums, ii. 636 _sq._ See King.

Children, the subjection of, ch. xxv. (i. 597-628); cursed or blessed by their parents, i. 58, 538, 621-627, ii. 703, 715. 716 n. ^2, 732; punished if convicted of a design to kill their father or mother, i. 245; parents killing their infant, i. 378 394-413, 633, ii. 562, 752 _sq._; killing their parents, i. 383-386, 522, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; killing or abandoning their aged parents, i. 386-390, 606, 607, 612, 620; eating their parents, i. 390, ii. 554, 568 _sq._; parents killing their grown-up, i. 393 _sq._, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; a father's affection for his, i. 401, 402, 405, 529-533, ii. 187-190, 193, 397, 748; a mother's affection for her, i. 405, 529-531, ii. 186-190, 193, 748; eaten by their parents or others, i. 401, 458 _sq._, ii. 554, 555, 562, 568 _sq._; parents exposing their new-born, i. 406-412, 689; sacrificed to save the lives of their parents, i. 455, 456, 459-461; sacrificed by their parents, i. 455-461; committing suicide on the death of their parents, i. 473; parents inflicting corporal punishment upon their, i. 513-515, 607, 610; using violence against their parents, i. 513 624 _sq._, ii. 677; parents' duty of taking care of their, i. 526-533; their duty of taking care of their parents, i. 533-538; their respect for their parents, i. 534-538, 600, 601, 607-613, 616-628, ii. 194; their affection for their parents i. 534-538, 618, ii. 194, 748; for their mothers, i. 618, 659; their duties to their parents emphasised by religion, i. 536, 537, 608, 610, 612, 613, 616, 617, 620-627, ii. 711, 714, 715, 716 n. ^2, 717 732; cursing their parents, i. 564; sold as slaves by their parents, i. 599, 607, 609, 611, 612, 615, 675, 681, 682, 684, 685, 689, 691 _sq._; proprietary incapacities of, ii. 27, 28, 57; rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 44-49, 53-57; telling a falsehood in the presence of their parents, ii. 96; addressing abusive language to their parents, ii. 142; their duties to their parents, ii. 166, 748; parents' duties to their, ii. 166, 748; parents committing suicide on the death of their, ii. 232, 244 n. ^3; parents fasting after the death of their, ii. 298-300; fasting after the death of their parents, ii. 298-301; punished after death for inflicting injuries upon their parents, ii. 715; adopted, see Adopted children; illegitimate, see Illegitimate children

Children, young, the anger of, i. 22 _sq._; sympathetic resentment in, i. 112; their ideas of right and wrong, i. 115; their respect for the customary, i. 159; injuries committed by, i. 217, 218, 264-269, 316; treatment of, in war i. 335, 336, 342, 343, 369 _sq._; sacrificed, i. 454-461; their desire to appropriate and to keep that which has been appropriated, ii. 51; truthfulness and mendacity of, ii. 88 n. ^5, 111 n. ^3, 116, 117, 124-126, 129; disposed to believe what they are told, ii. 109; their {841} dislike of that which is strange or unfamiliar, ii. 227; the altruistic sentiment in, i. 228; treatment of the dead bodies of, ii. 526, 527, 549; their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 583; the future state of, ii. 673, 727; the future state of unbaptised, ii.

721-723

Chivalry, i. 352-355

Clan, the, i. 627 _sq._, ii. 202, 213, 214, 216-220, 222 _sq._

Class distinction, cleanliness a, ii. 351

Classes, intermarriage between different, ii. 379-382. See Rank

"Classificatory system," the, ii. 393

Cleanliness, ii. 346-356; ceremonial, ii. 294, 295, 352-354, 358, 359, 415-420, 700 n. ^5, 705, 718, 726, 752

Climate, connection between industry and, ii. 269-271; between cleanliness and, ii. 349 _sq._

Cock-fighting, ii. 509 _sq._

Cocks, prohibition of eating tame, ii. 330

Cocoa, abstinence from, ii. 321; religious veneration of, ii. 591

Common enjoyment of merits, i. 96-99

---- responsibility, in blood-revenge, i. 24, 25, 30-36, 43, 71; in the case of punishment, i. 43-48, 69-72; in the case of sin, i. 48-57, 61-72

"Communal marriage," ii. 445

Community of goods, ii. 50 _sq._

Compacts, sealing of, i. 587, ii. 622-624

Compensation, the relation between punishment and, i. 168 _sq._; for involuntary destruction of property, i. 222-225, 38 _sq._; for bodily injuries, i. 511-513, 517-520, 524 n. ^3, ii. 263; for the seduction of an unmarried woman, ii. 425, 426, 436 _sq._; for rape, ii. 438; for adultery, ii. 447 _sq._

---- for homicide, i. 183, 484-491; if committed accidentally, i. 217, 219-221, 224, 226; if committed by a child, i. 268; by an idiot, i. 272; if the victim is a woman, i. 420 _sq._; if the victim is a slave, i. 423; influenced by the rank of the victim, i. 430 _sq._

---- for sin, i. 86 _sq._

Compulsion, injuries committed under, i. 284, 285, 316, 319; confounded with causation, i. 322-326

"Compulsion by necessity," i. 285-287, ii. 1

Conduct, i. 202, 203, 214, 215, 314

Confession, i. 84 _sq._, ii. 360

Conjugal affection, i. 113, 532 _sq._, ii. 190-193; its influence on the form of marriage, ii. 192, 389, 391; on the duration of marriage, ii. 397; on moral ideas concerning unchastity, ii. 439 _sq._

Conscience, i. 105-107, 123-125; an unjust retributer, i. 15 _sq._; animals credited with a, i. 249-251

Contributions, military, ii. 27

Contubernium, of slaves, i. 693, 697, 706 _sq._; between freemen and slaves, ii. 381

Cooking, abstained from after a death, ii. 304-306

Corporal punishment, ii. 520-525

Cosmopolitanism, ii. 176-179, 182-185

Courage, admiration of, i. 16, 117, ii. 16, 58, 273, 590; the duel regarded as a test of, i. 509; suicide regarded as a test of, ii. 251, 261 _sq._; approved of by the supreme being, ii. 679; the future state of a warrior supposed to be determined by his, ii. 698

Couvade, the, ii. 205

Covenanting rites, i. 334 _sq._, ii. 622-624, 686. See Blood-covenant

Cowardice, forgiveness of enemies regarded as a sign of, i. 73, 74, 485, ii. 145; the secret commission of offences despised as, ii. 58, 96 _sq._; lying a sign of, ii. 113; suicide regarded as an act of, ii. 240, 262

Cow-dung, a means of purification, i. 54, ii. 353, 545; suicide committed in, ii. 244

Cows, contact with, regarded as purifying, i. 54; prohibition of eating the flesh of, ii. 327, 330; the killing of, abstained from or prohibited, ii. 330, 331, 497; reverence for, ii. 332. See Cattle

Coyness, female, ii. 435

Cremation, i. 476, ii. 522, 523, 526, 527, 542, 543, 546-548; of suicides, ii. 256 _sq._

Criminals, absence of remorse in, i. 90 n. ^1; punished in public, i. 191 {842}_sq._; detection of, i. 193; sacrificed, i. 439, 440, 467, 471 _sq._, ii. 651; enslaved, i. 518, 675, 676, 681, 682, 685, 688-691, ii. 7, 8, 12, 13, 74; eaten, ii. 4, 367, 554, 558 _sq._; their blood partaken of, ii. 464 _sq._; treatment of the bodies of, ii. 527, 528, 549. See Asylums, Punishment

Crops, robbery of, i. 287, ii. 14 _sq._; human sacrifices offered for the purpose of securing good, i. 443-451; unchastity supposed to injure the, ii. 417, 747

Cross, the, ii. 256 n. ^2

Cross-roads, i. 502, ii. 256, 256 _sq._ n. ^2

Crown, miraculous virtue attributed to the royal, ii. 608 n. ^4, 753

Crucifixion, ii. 256 n. ^2

Cruelty to animals, ii. 496, 508-510

Curiosity, ii. 109, 110, 135, 149, 595, 597

Curses, materialistic conception of, i. 57-61, 70, 233 _sq._, ii. 583. 584, 703; holiness not allowed to be defiled by, i. 58, 625, ii. 638; of parents, i. 58, 538, 621-627, ii. 703, 715, 716 n. ^2, 732; of the poor, i. 561-565; of magicians and priests, i. 563; of saints, i. 563, 622; of dying persons, i. 563, 626, ii. 245; of dissatisfied guests, i. 584-594, ii. 715, 732; of dissatisfied refugees, i. 585, 587 _sq._, ii. 636-638; of old persons, i. 622, 626; of husbands, i. 626; of elder brothers and sisters, i. 626, ii. 703; of superiors, i. 626 _sq._, ii. 703; of women, i. 668; of slaves, i. 716; of their masters, ii. 703; of kings, ii. 703; personified and elevated to the rank of supernatural beings, i. 60, 379, 482, 561, 585, 623, 624, 626, ii. 68, 116, 715, 732; transformed into attributes of gods, i. 379, 561, 562, 585, 624, ii. 68, 116, 715; supernatural beings appealed to in, i. 561, 564 _sq._, ii. 66-68, 120-123, 658, 686-690, 699, 731; supernatural beings exposed to men's, i. 564, 566, 585, ii. 584, 585, 618-624, 636, 638, 656-659, 700; conducted by various vehicles, i. 586-594, ii. 121, 151, 208, 209, 567, 622-624, 687-690; by blood, i. 586, 587, 591, ii. 69, 118-121, 208, 209, 618-622, 687-689; by human blood or flesh, ii. 566 _sq._; in reception ceremonies and salutations, i. 590 _sq._, ii. 151; pronounced on thieves or as a means of protecting property, ii. 62-69, 703; sacrifices to gods as a means of transferring, ii. 618-624, 658; method of protecting the king against criminals, ii. 637; prayers assuming the character of, ii. 656-659; contained in ordeals, ii. 687-690; influencing men's state in the future life, ii. 692, 693, 708, 709, 715 _sq._ See _L-[(]âr_

Customs, and laws as expressions of moral ideas, ch. vii. (i. 158-201); rules of duty, i. 118-122, 159-162; their relations to laws, i. 163-166; stronger than law and religion combined, i. 164; the variety of, i. 327 _sq._; the rigidity of ancestral, ii. 519, 520, 541; transgressions of, punished by gods, ii. 670, 728; instituted by the supreme being, ii. 671

DARK, prohibition of eating in the, ii. 309

Daughters, committing suicide on the death of their parents, i. 473. See Children

Days, tabooed, ii. 283-289, 747

Dead, regard for the, ch. xlv. (ii. 515-552); human sacrifices to the, i. 26-28, 472-476, 486, ii. 234, 450, 451, 518; vindictiveness of murdered, i. 232, 372, 375, 376, 378, 379, 406, 476, 481 _sq._, ii. 559 _sq._; the property of the, i. 399, ii. 44, 518, 539 _sq._, see Inheritance, Wills; the treatment of old persons influenced by beliefs regarding the, i. 620 _sq._; interred in the field belonging to the family, ii. 66 n. ^1; charms made from the bodies of the, ii. 204, 546; offerings to the, ii. 302, 303, 400-404, 517, 518, 524, 539, 547 550, 692, 700, 701, 704, 708, _cf._ Alms; polluting influence attributed to the, ii. 303, 537 _sq._; marriages of the, ii. 400; self-regarding pride attributed to the, ii. 519; beliefs as regards the character and activity of the, ii. 528-535, 693; fear of the, ii. 535-546, 548-550, 576; believed to be easily duped, ii. 548; worship of the, ii. 591, 596; revenge taken by the living upon {843} the, ii. 692 _sq._; supposed to be taken by the dead upon other, ii. 693 _sq._ See Annihilation, Burial, Cannibalism, Cremation, Funeral rites, Future life, Future state, Mourning, Scalping, Suicide, Transmigration, Vampires

Death, attributed to the influence of magic, i. 24, 29, ii. 534, 651; self-mutilation after a, i. 26, 27, 476, ii. 524, 528, 544, 545, 547; work suspended after a, ii. 283, 284, 306; polluting influence ascribed to, ii. 283, 302-307, 416, 536-539, 544 _sq._; to self-inflicted, ii. 257 n. ^5, 262; to natural, ii. 416, 609; fasting after a, ii. 298-308, 524, 544; abstinence from cooking after a, ii. 304-306; abstinence from sexual intercourse after a, ii. 306; fear of, ii. 535 _sq._

Debtors, enslaved, i. 422, 675, 677, 680, 684, 688, 689, 691; creditors starving themselves to death before the doors of their, ii. 245

Debts, the owing of, ii. 93, 705

Deceit. See Truth, regard for Deformed persons, religious veneration of, ii. 590

Deodand, i. 262-264, 308

Descent, the social influence of a common, ii. 198, 201-206, 220, 224, 227, 748; congruity or discrepancy between the principle of local proximity and the principle of, ii. 202, 219 _sq._ See Kinship

----, the system of tracing, connection between the authority over children and, i. 597 _sq._; supposed connection between the position of women and, i. 655 _sq._; the rules of inheritance influenced by, ii. 44-47, 54; the influence of local connections on, ii. 203, 368 _sq._; difference between the notion of actual blood-relationship and, ii. 205 _sq._; connection between the blood-feud and, ii. 211, 748

Despotism, a cause of the severity of criminal codes, i. 193-196, 198; a cause of deceitful habits, ii. 89, 130 _sq._; politeness engendered by, ii. 152; love of youths considered inimical to, ii. 478 _sq._

Determinism, i. 320-322, 325 _sq._

Dharna, the custom of sitting, ii. 245

Diet, restrictions in, ch. xxxvii, _sq._ (ii. 290-345). See Food

Disease, cured by contact with a saint, i. 63; transference of, i. 64 _sq._; supposed to be caused by supernatural beings, i. 392 _sq._, ii. 592-594; by the dead, ii. 535; the future state of persons who have died of, i. 392, ii. 238 n. ^3, 698; human flesh or blood partaken of as a remedy against, i. 401, ii. 562, 564 _sq._; human sacrifices offered for the purpose of curing, i. 446, 447, 454-457; cured at cross-roads, ii. 256 n. ^2. See Epidemics, Sick persons

Disinterested antipathies. See Antipathies

---- likings. See Likings

Disinterestedness, a characteristic of moral concepts, i. 101; of the moral emotions, i. 102, 103, 107-122

Divorce, i. 514, 528, 630, 632, 638, 641, 646-654, ii. 192, 396-398, 455

Dog-fighting, ii. 509

Dogs, self-regarding pride in, i. 39, ii. 137 _sq._; sympathetic resentment in, i. 112, ii. 52; credited with a conscience, i. 249-251; the killing of, considered polluting, i. 381 n. ^6; fighting for their kennels or their prey, ii. 51; supposed deceitfulness of, ii. 125; abstinence from eating, ii. 330, 332; taken for spirits in disguise, ii. 491; regard for, ii. 493, 501, 705; affection for, ii. 495 _sq._; Erinyes of, ii. 504; their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 583

Drink, as a conductor of curses, i. 586, 589-591, ii. 121, 208, 209, 567, 687-689

---- , intoxicating, prohibition of, i. 228, ii. 341-345; abstained from after a death, ii. 302. See Drunkenness, Intoxicants, Wine

Droit d'aubaine, ii. 49

Drowned persons, the future state of, ii. 238, 521, 678, 697 _sq._

Drunkenness, i. 310, ii. 338-344; injuries committed in, i. 277-282, 306; attributed to possession by a god or spirit, i. 278, 281, ii. 344

Duel, the, ch. xxi. (i. 497-510); i. 163, 306, ii. 9, 145, 449

"Duty," analysis of the concept, i. 134-137; corresponding to a "right," i. 140 _sq._; the relation between "virtue" and, i. 149 _sq._; between "merit" and, i. 151

{844} Duty, the feeling of, as a motive, i. 283 _sq._

EAGLEHAWKS, abstinence from eating, ii. 326, 332

Earthly desires, sinfulness of, ii. 361-363

Eclipses, supposed connection between human activity and, ii. 284 _sq._; fasting in connection with, ii. 309 _sq._; of the moon, attributed to the influence of evil spirits, ii. 313

Education, a means of communicating resentment, i. 114 _sq._; its influence on the regard for truth, ii. 124; on moral ideas relating to self-regarding conduct, ii. 266-268; leading to homosexual practices, ii. 468-470

Eggs, abstinence from, ii. 320, 325, 326, 329

Election, divine, the future state of men determined by, ii. 719 _sq._

Elephants, the feeling of revenge in, i. 37 _sq._; abstinence from eating, ii. 329

Emasculation, as a punishment, i. 45, 521. See Eunuch priests

Emigration, punished by law, ii. 175; more injurious to the State than suicide, ii. 259

Emotions, moral judgments referring to, i. 215

Endogamy, ii. 378-382

Enemies, killing of, regarded as praiseworthy, i. 331-333; the future state influence by the killing of, i. 332, 373, ii. 693; hospitality towards, i. 576, 577, 587 _sq._ See Blood-revenge, Forgiveness, Revenge, War

Envy, a hindrance to sympathetic retributive kindliness, i. 129; of gods, ii. 361, 714, 716

Epidemics, supposed to be caused by supernatural beings, i. 27, ii. 592-594; human sacrifices offered for the purpose of stopping or preventing, i. 66, 441, 442, 449; fasting during, ii. 315

Equinoxes, fasting at, ii. 309, 310, 312 _sq._

Equivalence, the rule of, i. 177-180; i. 34, 35, 200, 217-219, 494, 496, 501, 511, 519 _sq._, ii. 233

Equivocation, ii. 100, 101, 117

Erinyes, i. 60, 379, 482, 561, 585, 623, 626, ii. 68, 504, 714, 715, 732

Ethics, the object of scientific, i. 18

Eucharist, the, i. 666, ii. 295, 415 n. ^8, 417, 480, 564; the ordeal of, ii. 690

Eunuch priests, ii. 408, 414, 488 n. ^6

Evil, materialistic conception of, i. 56, 57, 457; transference of, combined with a sacrifice, i. 62-65

---- eye, the, i. 561, 563, 584, 591-594, ii. 256 n. ^2, 354

---- spirits, lunatics supposed to be possessed with, i. 270, 274, 275, ii. 593; intoxicated persons supposed to be possessed with, i. 281, ii. 344; persecuting ghosts replaced by, i. 378 _sq._, ii. 493; disease supposed to be caused by, i. 392 _sq._, ii. 592-594; old women regarded as, i. 619; burying apart of persons supposed to have been killed by, ii. 239; eclipses of the moon attributed to the influence of, ii. 313; water regarded as haunted by, ii. 355; scourging as a means of driving away, ii. 358; sacred words as a weapon against, ii. 418; certain animals taken for, ii. 491; butchers regarded as haunted by, ii. 493; prevented from doing harm to the dead, ii. 523, 524, 544; the ghosts of dead persons regarded as, ii. 531-534, 693; places of striking appearance supposed to be haunted by, ii. 589; unexpected events ascribed to the influence of, ii. 594; taboos imposed upon the names of, ii. 640, 642; magic practised with the assistance of, ii. 649 _sq._; struggle of men and gods against, ii. 701, 702, 704-706, 729

Executioner, tribal, i. 174 _sq._; the injured party acting as, i. 184 _sq._

Exogamy. See Incest

Expiation, ii. 356-361; fasting as a means of, ii. 315-318; vicarious, ii. 719 _sq._

Expiatory sacrifice, vicarious, i. 65-70, 438-440

Exposure of infants, i. 406-412; a source of slavery, i. 689

FAITH, considered necessary for salvation, ii. 719-721, 725-727. See Unbelief

Faithfulness. See Good faith

False accusation, i. 522, ii. 79, 80, 140-142

{845} False testimony, ii. 86 n. ^4, 91, 92, 96-98, 123 n. ^1, 717

Falsehood. See Truth, regard for Family, the, i. 113, 533, 627 _sq._, ii. 195, 196, 198, 199, 202, 223; the joint, i. 539 _sq._, ii. 213-216

Famines, human sacrifices offered in connection with, i. 442 _sq._; cannibalism caused by, ii. 555, 577 _sq._ See Crops

Fas, i. 579 _sq._, ii. 717

Fasting, ii. 292-318; enjoined by religion, i. 271, ii. 246, 292-298, 308-318, 358, 406, 725; as a means of purification, i. 375, ii. 294-296, 358; as a penance, ii. 246, 315-318, 406; after a death, ii. 298-308, 524, 544

Fat, abstinence from, i. 187, 229, ii. 312

Fatalism, i. 323-326

Father, the, his authority over his children, ch. xxv. (i. 597-628); permitted to punish his children with death, i. 393 _sq._; to kill or expose his new-born children, i. 394-411; to inflict corporal punishment upon his children, i. 513-515, 607, 610; to sell his children, i. 599, 607, 609, 611, 612, 615, 675, 681, 682, 684, 685, 689, 691; his affection for his children, i. 401, 402, 405, 529-533. ii. 187-190, 193, 397, 748; obliged to protect and support his family, i. 526-533; descent traced through, i. 655 _sq._, ii. 44-47, 54, 202, 203, 205, 206, 211, 220; the son allowed to eat only certain foods after the death of, ii. 301 _sq._ See Parents

Fear, i. 40 _sq._; of death, ii. 535 _sq._; as an element in the religious sentiment, ii. 612-614, 725; of punishment in the future life, ii. 735

Females, the sexual impulse of, i. 657 _sq._, ii. 435

Feticide, i. 378, 408, 409, 413-417, ii. 705

Filial affection, i. 534-538, 618, 659, ii. 194, 748

---- reverence, i. 533-538, 600, 601, 607-613, 616-628, ii. 194

Firstborn child, the, all children killed except, i. 398; killed, i. 458-460, ii. 562; eaten, i. 458, ii. 562; regarded as sacred, ii. 538 n. ^2

Firstborn son, the, sacrifice of, i. 457-461; eaten, i. 458 _sq._; considered identical with his father, i. 460; fasting on the eve of Passover, ii. 296. See Primogeniture

Fish, anger shown by, i. 22, ii. 51; abstinence from eating, ii. 321, 322, 324 _sq._; after a death, ii. 301; deference shown for, ii. 492; killing of, ii. 497 _sq._

Fishing peoples, the position of women among, i. 660; slavery among, i. 672; social aggregates of, ii. 198-200; filthiness a characteristic of, ii. 349

Flagellation, ii. 294, 357-359

Flagrante delicto, offenders caught, i. 290-294, ii. 8, 13, 17, 18, 58, 429, 447

Food, prohibitory rules relating to, ch. xxxvii. _sq._ (ii. 290-345); stealing of, i. 286, 287, 676, ii. 14, 15, 57 _sq._; as a conductor of curses, i. 586-592, ii. 622-624; detrimental to holiness, ii. 294-296; the eating of certain kinds of, forbidden by gods, ii. 326, 33, 335, 671

Forbearances, i. 209, 210, 303-305

Foreigners, protected by the chief or king, i. 180, 181, 338; killing of, i. 331-334, 337-34, 370, 371, 373; sacrifice of, i. 467 _sq._; infliction of bodily injuries upon, i. 519; kindness to, i. 545, 556-558, 570-572, 581; enslaving of, i. 674, 675, 689, 690, 691, 714 _sq._; respect for the proprietary rights of, ii. 2, 11, 59; demoralising influence of, ii. 2, 126-129, see White men; robbery committed upon, ii. 20-25, 58 _sq._; reduced to serfdom, ii. 24; rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 49; deceiving of, ii. 87, 88, 90, 94, 97, 112, 126-129; duties to, ii. 166; despised, ii. 171-174, 532; disregard of their interests, ii. 176; antipathy to, ii. 227; marriages with, ii. 378, 381 _sq._; eaten, ii. 554; sacrilege committed by, ii. 648. See Strangers

Forgery, punished with death, i. 187 _sq._; with mutilation, i. 521

Forgiveness, i. 73-79, 84-88, 99, 311, 318, ii. 145, 360

Foundation sacrifices. See Buildings

Fowls, abstinence from eating, ii. 320-322, 325, 327, 329, 332; affection for, ii. 495

{846} Foxes, abstinence from eating, ii. 327

Fraternal affection, ii. 194, 195, 748

---- duties, i. 538, ii. 748

Fraud. See Truth, regard for Free love, ch. xlii. (ii. 422-455). See Unchastity

Freedmen, marriages with, i. 688, ii. 379; not allowed to bring criminal charges against freeborn persons, i. 697

Freedom, personal, i. 597, ii. 265

Free-will, moral valuation and, i. 320-326

Frogs, prohibition of eating, ii. 321

Funeral rites, ii. 519-528, 536-552; the ordinary, denied to suicides, ii. 238, 248, 250, 252-254, 549. See Blood (effusion of, at funerals; offered to the dead), Burial, Cremation, Dead (human sacrifices to the; offerings to the), Self-mutilation (after a death)

Future life, belief in retribution in a, among civilised races, i. 258, 259, 519, 550-553, 555, 556, 579, 580, 625, 650, 683, 687, ii. 165, 284, 341, 417, 479, 497, 700, 705, 706, 708-713, 715, 716, 718-720, 725, 734 _sq._; among uncivilised peoples, i. 403, 542-544, 578, ii. 59, 60, 69, 115, 271, 272, 671-681, 683-685, 690-695; the belief in a, ii. 515 _sq._; its influence on the notions concerning homicide, i. 382; concerning the killing of old or sick persons, i. 390, 392; concerning infanticide, i. 411 _sq._; concerning feticide, i. 416 _sq._; concerning suicide, ii. 235-237, 244, 253, 262. See Dead

---- state, the, of persons who have been struck by lightning, i. 26, ii. 544, 549, 697 _sq._; who have not slain any enemies, i. 332; who have slain enemies, i. 373, ii. 693; who have died of old age, i. 390, ii. 235, 238 n. ^3, 698; of disease, i. 392, ii. 238 n. ^3, 698; by violence, i. 481 _sq._, ii. 237-239, 242; by accident, ii. 238, 239, 241; by starvation, ii. 238 n. ^3; who have committed suicide, ii. 235-239, 242-244, 246, 253, 262, 694, 710; who have been killed in war, ii. 237, 521, 694, 697, 704, 708; who have been drowned, ii. 238, 521, 678, 697 _sq._; who have suffered pain in this life, ii. 360; who have died unmarried and childless, ii. 399-404; who have refrained from connections with women, ii. 414 _sq._; who have committed perjury, ii. 715 _sq._; of women, i. 662 _sq._, ii. 673; of women who have died in childbirth, ii. 238 n. ^3, 678; of children, ii. 673, 727; of unbaptised children, i. 411, 412, 416 _sq._, ii. 721-723; of the heathen, ii. 720 _sq._; influenced by human sacrifices offered to the dead, i. 472-476, ii. 518; by the mutilations and self-bleedings of mourners, i. 476, ii. 547; by knowledge of religious truth, ii. 132-134, 719-721, 725-727; by the treatment of the dead person's corpse, ii. 238, 521-523, 546, 548, 694, 704; by offerings made to the dead, ii. 400-404, 517, 518, 524, 539, 692, 700, 701, 704, 708; by alms given on behalf of the dead, ii. 550-552; by prayer on behalf of the dead, ii. 552; by curses, ii. 692, 693, 708, 709, 715 _sq._; by rank, ii. 698; by magical practices, ii. 700, 701, 706, 709, 710, 712; by vicarious expiation, ii. 719 _sq._; by divine election, ii. 719 _sq._; by faith, ii. 719-721, 725-727; by sacramental grace, ii. 719 _sq._, by baptism, ii. 721-723

GENERALITY, the moral emotions characterised by a flavour of, i. 104, 105, 107, 117-123

Generosity, charity and, ch. xxiii. (i. 526-569)

Gifts, blessings pronounced by recipients of, i. 561-565; the danger of accepting, i. 593 _sq._

Girls, at puberty, ii. 307 _sq._

Gluttony, ii. 290 _sq._

Goat-dung, a means of purification, i. 376

-----flesh, abstinence from, ii. 322, 332

"God," definition of the term, ii. 602

Goddesses, jealous of the chastity of their priests, ii. 414

Gods, duties to, ch. xlviii. _sq._ (ii. 602-662); as guardians of morality, chs. l.-lii. (ii. 663-737); punish innocent persons in consequence of the sins of the guilty, i. 48-72, ii. 660; punish unchastity, i. 49, ii. 675; curses personified {847} and elevated to the rank of supernatural agents or, i. 60, 379, 482, 561, 585, 623, 624, 626, ii. 68, 116, 715, 732; human sacrifices offered to, i. 62, 63, 65, 66, 339, 434-472, ii. 295, 296, 419, 559, 562, 563, 579, 651, 697; reward undeserving persons in consequence of the merits of others, i. 96-99, ii. 660; connection between the severity of punishment and the belief in, i. 193-198; disobedience to, i. 194-198, ii. 659 _sq._; revengeful feelings attributed to, i. 194, 198, 438-440, 471 _sq._, ii. 660, 661, 667, 668, 702, 714; attach undue importance to the outward aspect of conduct, i. 227-231, 233-235, ii. 714; judge upon human actions without much regard to their motives, i. 299-302; punish homicide, i. 378-380, ii. 669, 672, 676, 684, 686, 700, 714, 717, 732; curses transformed into attributes of, i. 379, 561, 562, 585, 624, ii. 68, 116, 715; blood pollution shunned by, i. 380-382; enjoin or approve of charity, i. 549-558. 561-569, ii. 669, 672, 699, 705, 711, 717, 718, 725, 726, 732; appealed to in curses or oaths, i. 561, 564 _sq._, ii. 66, 67, 120-123, 658, 686-690, 699, 731 _sq._; in blessings, i. 562, 564 _sq._, ii. 686, 731; enjoin hospitality, i. 578-580, ii. 669, 711, 714, 717, 718, 726, 732; exposed to the curses of men, i. 585, ii. 618-624, 636, 638, 656-659, 700; protect refugees, i. 585, ii. 629-633, 636, 638, 714; enjoin regard for parents, i. 610, 624, ii. 711, 714, 717, 732; punish abandoning of old persons, i. 620; punish disrespect for chiefs, i. 626; women shunned by, i. 664-666; guardians of property, ii. 59-69, 669, 675-677, 679, 684, 686, 699, 700, 705, 714, 717, 732; guilty of falsehood, ii. 94, 95, 98; guardians of truth and good faith, ii. 96, 114-123, 128, 129, 669, 672, 675-677, 684, 686, 699, 700, 703-705, 707, 711, 714, 717, 726, 732; perjury regarded as an offence against, ii. 122, 122 _sq._ n. ^10; perjury punished by, ii. 123 n. ^1, 684, 686, 714; condemn pride, ii. 144 _sq._; different, fused into one, ii. 225 _sq._; approve of suicide, ii. 236, 244, 261; suicide offensive to, ii. 237, 243, 245-249, 251-254, 260, 263; agriculture pleasing to, ii. 275, 277; commend industry, ii. 275, 280, 281, 675, 705; require pure sacrifices, ii. 295 _sq._; prohibit the eating of certain foods, ii. 326, 330, 335 671; disapprove of abstinence from intoxicating drink, ii. 339; disapprove of drunkenness, ii. 342; demand ceremonial cleanliness, ii. 352, 353, 700 n. ^5, 705, 718, 726; punish ablutions, ii. 355; self-mortification pleasing to, ii. 356-361, 421; exciting the compassion of, ii. 361; envious of men, ii. 361, 714, 716; punish incest, ii. 375, 376, 671; women married to, ii. 412-414; sexual pollution shunned by, ii. 418; addicted to homosexual practices, ii. 472, 474; eating of, ii. 563 _sq._, see Totem; the tendency to make them more and more perfect, ii. 599, 600, 730, 731, 733 _sq._; not necessarily immortal, ii. 602 _sq._; killing of, ii. 602-610, 753 _sq._, see Totem; punished by men, ii. 610; subject to human needs, ii. 610 _sq._; sacrifices to, ii. 611-626, see Sacrifice; fear of, ii. 612-614, 725; malevolent, ii. 613, 665-667, 706, 707, 709, 714, 716, 728, 729, 733; benevolent, ii. 613-615, 667-669, 697-708, 712, 713, 716, 725, 728, 729, 731; assistance expected from, ii. 614-616; gratitude to, ii. 615 _sq._; property of, ii. 626 _sq._; self-regarding pride of, ii. 639-655; blasphemy against, ii. 639, 640, 719; taboos imposed upon the names of, ii. 640-643; intolerance of, ii. 643-647, 649, 650, 652; tolerance of, ii. 647-649, 652 _sq._; free from human weaknesses, ii. 652; prayers to, ii. 653-659, see Prayer; priests regarded as manifestations of, ii. 657, 709; the communal character of the relations between men and their, ii. 661; selection of, ii. 662, 729 _sq._; punish transgressions of custom, ii. 670, 728; punish bad behaviour towards old and sick persons, ii. 672, 675; punish adultery, ii. 675, 676, 684, 686, 700, 717; love justice, ii. 675, 684, 686, 699, 700, 703, 704, 732; approve of valour, ii. 679; fighting against evil {848} spirits, ii. 701, 702, 704-706, 729; invoked by thieves, ii. 733. See Guardian spirits, Religion, Supernatural beings, Supreme beings, Totem

"Golden rule, the," i. 102 _sq._

"Good," analysis of the concept, i. 145-147

"---- deeds," i. 299-302

Good faith, regard for truth and, ch. xxx. _sq._ (ii. 72-131)

Gratitude, i. 21, 42, 43, 93, 94, 318, 319, 538, 618, ii. 154-166; to gods, ii. 615 _sq._

Greetings, i. 590-592, ii. 146, 147, 149-151

Gregarious instinct, the, ii. 197 _sq._

Gregariousness, i. 94, 95, 113, ii. 195-197. 748

Grief, expressions of, ii. 283, 308, 316, 528

Group marriage, ii. 387, 392-396, 752

Guardian spirits, i. 373, 464 _sq._, ii. 210, 406, 528-531, 588, 666, 668, 669, 675, 676, 702

HABIT, the influence of, on moral ideas, i. 159, 160, 402, 533, 559, 646, ii. 52, 125-131, 146, 185, 272, 335, 343, 351, 392, 440, 441, 455, 471, 484, 509, 577, 578, 580; on the authority of the law, i. 163 _sq._

Hair, conditional curses seated in the, i. 57 _sq._

Handicraft, moral valuation of, ii. 273, 274, 278-280, 282 _sq._

Handshaking, ii. 150, 151, 623 _sq._

Happiness, regard for other persons' ch. xxxiii. (ii. 153-185); for one's own, ii. 265

Hares, abstinence from eating, ii. 333 _sq._

Head-hunting, i. 333, 373, 544

Heedlessness, i. 211, 305-310

Hell, notions about, ii. 60, 284, 417, 672, 674, 675, 677, 678, 683, 692, 706, 723, 724, 727

Heresy, ii. 646 _sq._; punishment of, i. 47, 50, 245, 493; considered a legitimate cause of war, i. 349-352, 359; judicial torture in cases of, i. 523; a bar to intermarriage, ii. 380 _sq._; homosexual practices associated with, ii. 486-489; the future state influenced by, ii. 721

Holiness, must not be defiled by curses or oaths, i. 58, 625, ii. 638; by blood, i. 380-382; by women, i. 664-666; by food, ii. 294-296; by certain kinds of food, ii. 322; by intoxicating drink, ii. 344 _sq._; by sexual pollution, ii. 415-420, 752; very susceptible to any polluting influence, ii. 352, 353, 608-610; objects endowed with, must not be appropriated for ordinary purposes, ii. 627 _sq._; a god's, polluted by his name being mentioned in profane conversation, ii. 643; attributed to sacrificial victims, i. 63, 65, 69, 444-447, ii. 563, 625, 658; its magic virtue transferred by contact, i. 63-65, 69, 444-446, ii. 605, 606, 625, 754; by eating, i. 446, ii. 562-564, 605, 625; by sexual intercourse, i. 593, ii. 444-446, 488; looked upon as a transferable entity, i. 586, ii. 607-610, 754; contact with, regarded as dangerous, ii. 538 n. ^2 See

Sacred places

Home, love of, ii. 167-169, 179 _sq._

Homestead, sanctity of the, i. 587, ii. 635 n. ^4

Homicide, in general, chs. xiv-xvi. (i. 327-382); punished with death i. 171, 172, 187, 189, 491, 492; considered polluting, i. 225, 232, 233, 375-382, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2, 262, 714; stigmatised by religion, i. 345, 346, 378-380, 382, ii. 669, 672, 676, 684, 686, 700, 705, 714, 716 n. ^2, 717, 732; the influence of rank on the criminality of, i. 430-433; duels in cases of, i. 501 _sq._ See Blood-revenge, Compensation for homicide, Duel, Head hunting, Human sacrifice, Killing, Manslaughter, Manslayers, Punishment of Death, War

Homosexual love, ch. xliii. (ii. 456-489), 752 _sq._

Honey, abstained from after a death, ii. 301

Honour, duels of, i. 498-503, 507-510; respect for other men's, ii. 137-143

Hope, as an element in religion, ii. 614, 735; in rewards after death, ii. 735

Horses, stealing of, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 14; abstinence from the flesh of, ii. 322, 335

Hospitality, ch. xxiv. (i. 570-596); i. 333, 340, 540, 542, 543, 545, 548, 549, 555; enjoined by religion, i. {849} 578-580, ii. 669, 711, 714, 715, 717, 718, 726, 732

Houses, stealing from, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 15, 16, 58, see Burglary; asylums, i. 587, ii. 630, 635 n. ^4, 636 _sq._

Human effigies, sacrifice of, i. 468-470, 475

---- sacrifice, ch. xix. (i. 434-476); i. 26-28, 62, 63, 65-67, 339, 486, ii. 234, 295, 296, 419, 450, 451, 518, 579, 651, 697; the execution of blood-revenge a kind of, i. 476, 481 _sq._; suicide as a kind of, ii. 234-236; combined with cannibalism, ii. 559, 562 _sq._

Humility, ii. 144-146; sacrifice as a symbol of, ii. 625 _sq._

Hunting peoples, vegetable food provided by the women among, i. 634, ii. 273; the position of women among, i. 660 _sq._; slavery hardly known among, i. 672; social aggregates of, ii. 198-200; the form of marriage among, ii. 389 _sq._

Husbands, their power over their wives, ch. xxvi. (i. 629-669); wives punished if convicted of a design to kill their, i. 245; crimes committed by wives in the presence of their, i. 284; killing their wives, i. 418, 419, 631; wives killing their, i. 419 _sq._; wives sacrificed on the death of their, i. 472-474, ii. 450 _sq._; wives committing suicide on the death of their, i. 473 _sq._, ii. 232, 234, 235, 241, 242, 244, 247; inflicting bodily injuries upon their wives, i. 514-516, 631; their duty to protect and support their wives, i. 526-529, 532 _sq._; lending their wives to guests, i. 575, 593; living with their fathers-in-law, i. 601, 656 _sq._, ii. 202, 203; curses of, i. 626; selling their wives as slaves, i. 675. 684; belief in a mysterious bond of sympathy between wives and, ii. 205; wives fasting on the death of their, ii. 298-301; adultery committed by, ii. 397, 451-455; eating their wives, ii. 555. See Marital affection, Marriage,

Widowers

IDIOTS, injuries committed by, i. 269-273, 275; objects of religious reverence, i. 270 _sq._; kindness to, i. 547

Idleness, ii. 268-277, 281 _sq._; a cause of uncleanliness, ii. 350 _sq._

Illegitimate children, rules of inheritance relating to, i. 47, ii. 46, 48, 49, 56 _sq._; treatment of, i. 47, ii. 431, 439; sacrifice of, i. 467

Impartiality, apparent, a characteristic of the moral emotions, i. 103, 104, 107, 117-122

Inanimate things, revenged upon or punished, i. 26, 27, 260-264, 308; retributive emotions evoked by, i. 26, 27, 260-264, 315, 318; conceived as animate, i. 27, 263, ii. 595; moral praise and blame not applied to, i. 319

Incantations, ii. 656-659

Incest, prohibition and horror of, i. 174. 175, 177, 197. 492, ii. 364-378, 747-752; stigmatised by religion, ii. 375, 376, 671

Indemnification, i. 168, 169, 308 _sq._ See Compensation

Independence, love of national, ii. 170, 175

"Indifferent, the morally," i. 154-157

Industry, ii. 268-282; commended by religion, ii. 275, 280, 281, 675, 705; cleanliness promoted by, ii. 35

Infanticide, i. 378, 394-413, 633, ii. 562; supposed relationship between the social reaction against homosexuality and against, ii. 484, 485, 752 _sq._

Infants, exposure of, i. 406-412; a source of slavery, i. 689. See Infanticide

Inheritance, rules of, ii. 44-49, 53-57

Initiation ceremonies, instituted by the All-father, ii. 671

"Injustice," analysis of the concept, i. 141-145

Injustice, punished by the supreme being, ii. 675

"Instinct," the meaning of the word, ii. 374 n. ^2

Insults, i. 39, 502, 503, 509, 510, 524 _sq._, ii. 110, 138-143; to the dead, ii. 519; to gods, ii. 639-652

Intellectual disability, agents under, ch. x. (i. 249-282)

Intemperance, ii. 290 _sq._

Intentions, i. 204-206, 212 _sq._; punishment of bare, i. 244 _sq._

Intolerance, religious, ii. 643-653

{850} Intoxicants, religious, veneration of, ii. 591 _sq._ See Drink, intoxicating; Drunkenness; Wine

Inversion, sexual, ii. 465-470, 752 _sq._

JEALOUSY, ii. 387, 389, 449, 450, 751

Jinn (_jnûn_), i. 378, 379, 619, ii. 355, 493. 589, 593-594, 640, 642, 650

Joint family, the, i. 539 _sq._, ii. 213-216

"Judgment of God," war looked upon as a, i. 358, 360; the duel as a, i. 504-507. See Ordeals

Jus primæ noctis, ii. 395, 752

"Justice," analysis of the concept, i. 141-145

Justice, the sense of, among savages, i. 124, 126-129; loved by gods, ii. 675, 684, 686, 699, 700, 703, 704. 732

Karma, ii. 711

Killing, in self-defence, i. 288-290; of foreigners, i. 331-334, 337-34, 370, 371, 373; of enemies, i. 331-333, 373, ii. 693; of slaves, i. 378, 421-429, 696, 707; of infants by their parents, i. 378, 394-413, 633, ii. 562; of human embryos, i. 378, 408, 409, 413-417, ii. 705; of parents by their children, i. 383-386, 522, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; or abandoning of aged parents, i. 386-390, 606, 607, 612, 620; or abandoning of sick persons, i. 391-393, ii. 542; of grown-up children by their parents, i. 393 _sq._, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; of wives by their husbands, i. 418, 419, 631; of women, i. 418-421; of husbands by their wives, i. 419 _sq._; of freemen by slaves, i. 429, 430, 491 n. ^5; of chiefs, i. 430; of the firstborn child, i. 458-460, ii. 562; of the firstborn son, i. 458-461; of departed souls, ii. 516 _sq._; of divine beings, ii. 602-610, 753 sq.; of disappointing magicians, ii. 609. See Blood-revenge, Compensation for homicide, Duel, Head hunting, Homicide, Human sacrifice, Manslaughter, Manslayers, Punishment of death, Suicide, War

Killing of animals, ch. xliv. (ii. 490-514); in consequence of harm done by them, i. 26, 27, 251-260; of sacred animals, i. 227, ii. 603-606, 609; of totem animals, ii. 210, 603, 604, 606; of vermin, i. 26, 27, 251; dogs, i. 381 n. ^6, ii. 501; monkeys, ii. 329, 490, 513; buffaloes, ii. 330; sheep, ii. 330; cattle, ii. 330, 493 _sq._; cows, ii. 330, 331, 497; the ploughing ox, ii. 330, 331, 493. 494, 504; calves, ii. 331; bees, ii. 490; pigeons, ii. 490; storks, ii. 490; swallows, ii. 490; ravens, ii. 491; toads, ii. 491; fish, ii. 497 _sq._ See Sacrifice

King, the, tied by custom, i. 161 _sq._; the poor and the weak protected by, i. 180 _sq._; the right of pardon a prerogative of, i. 192, 196, 226; an object of religious veneration, i. 194, ii. 606-610, 754; homicide committed by the command of, i. 285; strangers protected by, i. 338; homicide regarded as an injury inflicted upon, i. 374; sacrificed, i. 443, 466; human sacrifices offered for the purpose of saving the life of, i. 454-457, 466; proprietary rights of, ii. 33; loyalty to, ii. 180, 182; suicide regarded as an offence against, ii. 240, 263 n. ^1; taboos imposed upon, ii. 287 _sq._, 407, 418; the custom of shutting up doors used by, ii. 538 n. ^2; cannibalism as a duty incumbent upon, ii. 558; killing of, ii. 606-610, 753 _sq._; his burial place an asylum, ii. 630; his house an asylum, ii. 636; his person an asylum, ii. 636 _sq._; swearing on the life of, ii. 637; criminals prevented from cursing, ii. 637; curses pronounced by, ii. 703

Kinship, mutual assistance imposed as a duty by, i. 538-540; the social influence of, ii. 198, 201-206, 220, 224, 227, 748. See Descent

Knots, magic, ii. 585, 619, 652

Knowledge, regard for, ii. 131-136; of religious truth, influencing the future state, ii. 132-134, 719-721, 725-727

Known concomitants of acts, i. 212-214, 249

LABOUR, ii. 268-283; the division of, between the sexes i. 633-637, ii. 271; property acquired by, ii. 41-43, 53, 69-71; suspension of, {851} on various occasions, ii. 283-289; temporarily forbidden to men who have eaten human flesh, ii. 575

L-[(]ahd, ii. 623 _sq._

Lamentations at funerals, ii. 524, 528, 541 _sq._

Landmarks, removing of, i. 186, ii. 60, 61, 67-69, 703, 714, 717

Language, as a communicator of moral emotions, i. 115-117; as an expression of moral concepts, i. 131-133; the influence of a common, ii. 167, 170, 181; as an emblem of nationality, ii. 224 _sq._

_L-[(]âr_, i. 57, 58, 566, 586, 587, 591, ii. 584-586, 618-620, 623, 638

Laws, customs and, as expressions of moral ideas, ch. vii. (i. 158-201); their relations to customs, i. 163-166

Lent fast, ii. 295, 308 _sq._

Levirate, the, i. 528

Lex talionis. See Equivalence, the rule of Libel, i. 522, ii. 96, 141

Lightning, persons struck by, i. 26, ii. 239, 544, 549, 697 _sq._

Likings, disinterested, i. 117, ii. 16, 58, 185, 227, 261, 262, 266, 267, 744-746

Limbus, ii. 722

Lions, their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 583

Love. See Affection, Free love, Homosexual love

Loyalty, ii. 180, 182

Lunacy, attributed to demoniacal possession, i. 270, 274 _sq._, ii. 593; to malignant magical agency, i. 317, ii. 531 _sq._; regarded as a divine punishment, i. 274 _sq._; as a punishment inflicted by a saint, ii. 628

Lunatics, injuries committed by, i. 189, 269-277, 298, 299, 316, 317, 319; objects of religious reverence, i. 270 _sq._, ii. 590; burned as witches, i. 273

Luxury, ii. 266

Lying. See Truth, regard for Lynching, i. 91

MADNESS. See Lunacy

Magic, regarded as a cause of death, i. 24, 29, ii. 534, 651; as a cause of lunacy, i. 317, ii. 531 _sq._; expertness in, attributed to strangers, i. 584; to old persons, i. 619 _sq._; to women, i. 620, 666-668; the position of slaves influenced by the dread of, i. 716; fasting in connection with, ii. 293 _sq._; definitions of, ii. 584, 753; attitude of religion towards, ii. 649, 650, 652, 753; its influence on moral ideas, ii. 696; supposed to influence the future state of men, ii. 700, 701, 706, 709, 710, 712. See Blessings, Blood, Charms, Cross, Cross-roads, Curses, Evil eye, Knots, _L-[(]ahd_, _L-[(]âr_, Magicians, Oaths, Ordeals, Prayer, Purificatory ceremonies, Sacrifice, Sexual intercourse (as a magical or religious rite), Spitting, Transference, Witchcraft

----, hom[oe]opathic, ii. 446 n. ^7, 753

----, sympathetic, i. 589 _sq._, ii. 204, 205, 209 n. ^5, 546, 566, 643

Magicians, curses of, i. 563; sexual intercourse with, i. 593 n. ^1; abstain from certain foods, ii. 322, 327; purificatory ceremonies of, ii. 352; celibacy compulsory on, ii. 405 _sq._; conjugal faithfulness compulsory on persons who wish to become, ii. 419; addicted to homosexual practices, ii. 458, 459, 465, 472, 477, 484, 486 _sq._; treatment of the dead bodies of, ii. 527; cannibalism of, ii. 564; killing of disappointing, ii. 609; their residences asylums, ii. 631. See Witches; _cf._ Priests

Males, the sexual impulse of, i. 657

Mammals, paternal care among, ii. 189 _sq._; maternal care among, ii. 190; the duration of conjugal unions among, ii. 192

Man-gods, eating of, ii. 563 _sq._; killing of, ii. 606-610, 753 _sq._

Mankind at large, duties to. See Cosmopolitanism

Manslaughter, distinguished from murder, i. 294-298, ii. 633

Manslayers, regarded as unclean, i. 225, 232, 233, 375-382, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; adoption of unintentional, i. 484; refuge denied to, ii. 632 _sq._

Marital affection, i. 113, 532 _sq._, ii. 190-193. See Conjugal affection

Marriage, ch. xl. (ii. 364-398); as a compensation for homicide, i. 484; the father's consent required for a daughter's, i. 599, 609, 611, 613, 615 _sq._, ii. 383; for a son's, i. 609, 613, 615 _sq._; the parents' {852} consent required for a child's, i. 607, 608, 617, 618, 624 _sq._; slaves prohibited from contracting a legal, i. 693, 697, 706 _sq._; prohibition of, between white and coloured persons, i. 714; between relations by adoption, ii. 369, 374, 375, 748-750, 752; regarded as a duty, ii. 399-405; enjoined by religion, ii. 399-404; between dead persons, ii. 400; forbidden to persons whose function it is to perform religious or magical rites, ii. 405-409, 412-414, 418-421; considered impure, ii. 410-412; between a god and a woman, ii. 412-414; avoidance of, between cannibals and their non-cannibal neighbours, ii. 571; the contracting of a second, forbidden to widows, i. 475, ii. 450 _sq._; to priests, ii. 412; considered improper for widowers, ii. 451. See Divorce, Group marriage, Incest, Levirate

Marriage by capture, ii. 382 _sq._

---- by purchase, i. 421, 599, 632 _sq._, ii. 382-385, 751; a hindrance to polygyny, ii. 389; the marriage tie strengthened by, ii. 397; the standard of female chastity raised by, ii. 436, 437, 440

---- portion, ii. 385 _sq._; the marriage tie strengthened by the, ii. 397

Maternal affection, i. 405, 529-531, ii. 186-190, 193, 748

---- duties, i. 526, 533, ii. 748

---- rights, ch. xxv. (i. 597-628), ii. 748

Matter, regarded as impure, ii. 362 _sq._

Meat, manslayers prohibited from eating, i. 375; abstained from before the offering of a sacrifice, ii. 296; after a death, ii. 301, 302, 304 _sq._ See Vegetarianism

----, fresh, abstained from after a death, ii. 300 _sq._; by girls at puberty, ii. 307 _sq._

Medicines, religious veneration of, ii. 591, 641

Men, the occupations of, i. 633-637; the sexual impulse of, i. 657; forbidden to eat certain foods, ii. 321 _sq._; extra-matrimonial intercourse of, ii. 422-434, 436-455; the preference given to virgin brides by, ii. 434-437, 440; homosexual practices between, ch. xliii. (ii. 456-489), ii. 752 _sq._

"Merit," analysis of the concept, i. 150-152

Merits, i. 86, ii. 360 _sq._, common enjoyment of, i. 96-99; the conferring of, upon the dead, ii. 550-552

Midsummer customs, i. 56 _sq._

Milk, prohibition of boiling, i. 197; offered to strangers, i. 590 _sq._; abstinence from, ii. 325 _sq._; after a death, ii. 301

Miracles, ii. 590 _sq._

Modesty, ii. 144 _sq._

Monkeys, the feeling of revenge in, i. 37 _sq._; self-regarding pride in, i. 39, ii. 138; sympathetic resentment in, i. 112; credited with a conscience, i. 249; adoption of young among, ii. 189; abstinence from eating, ii. 328 _sq._; aversion to killing, ii. 329, 490, 513. See Apes

Monks, sexual intercourse forbidden to, ii. 409, 412; addicted to homosexual practices, ii. 462, 467

Monogamy, ii. 192, 387-392

Monotheism, intolerance of, ii. 644-647, 649, 650, 652; its tendency to attribute the most exalted qualities to the deity, ii. 734

Moon, abstinence from work in connection with changes in the, ii. 284-287, 747; fasting in connection with changes in the, ii. 296, 297. 309-313

---- gods, appealed to in oaths, ii. 121, 122, 699; regarded as judges, ii. 699, 703 _sq._

Moral approval, the nature of, i. 21, 93-107; the origin of, i. 108-111, 117-123, 129 _sq._; moral concepts springing from, i. 145-154; only indirectly expressed in custom, i. 160; hardly at all expressed in law, i. 166 _sq._; the resemblance between the phenomena which give rise to gratitude and those which call forth, i. 318 _sq._

"---- axioms," i. 12

---- concepts, based on moral emotions, ch. i. (i. 4-20); analysis of the principal, ch. vi (i. 131-157); among non-European peoples, i. 131-133

---- disapproval, the nature of, i. 21-93, 100-107; the origin of, i. {853}108-129; moral concepts springing from, i. 134-145; expressed in customs and laws, ch. vii. (i. 158-201); the resemblance between the phenomena which give rise to non-moral resentment and those which call forth, i. 315-319

Moral emotions, the moral concepts based on, chs. i. (i. 4-20), vi. (i. 131-157); the nature of the, chs. ii.-iv. (i. 21-107); the origin of the, ch. v. (i. 108-130); expressed in customs and laws, ch. vii. (i. 158-201); the resemblance between the phenomena which give rise to non-moral retributive emotions and those which call forth, i. 314-319; not determined by the cognition of free-will, i. 321-326

---- evolution, general characteristics of, ii. 743-746

---- ideals, i. 153 _sq._

---- judgments, the emotional origin of, ch. i. (i. 4-20); the assumed objectivity of, i. 6-20, 104 _sq._; the general nature of the subjects of, chs. viii.-xii. (i. 202-313); why conduct and character form the subjects of, i. 314-320; the relation between free-will and, i. 320-326; the innate character the proper subject of, i. 326

---- law, the authoritativeness attributed to the, i. 14-17

"---- reason," i. 7 _sq._

"---- truth," i. 17 _sq._

Morbid impulses, injuries committed under the influence of, i. 298 _sq._

Morning gift, ii. 385

Mos, i. 119, 122

Mother, children's affection for their, i. 534-538, 618, 659, ii. 194, 748; descent traced through the, i. 597 598, 655 _sq._, ii. 44-46, 54, 202, 203, 205, 206, 211, 220; committing suicide on the death of her only son, ii. 244 n. ^3. See Maternal affection, duties, rights; Parents

Motives, ch. xi. (i. 283-302); i. 207-209, 316, 318

Mourners, delicate state of, ii. 283, 307; considered polluted, ii. 306, 307, 545; purificatory ceremonies of, ii. 354

Mourning costume, ii. 524, 545, 547

---- customs, ii. 283, 284, 298-308, 520, 524, 526, 528, 541, 542, 544-548; forbidden in the case of suicide, ii. 247. See Death

Murder, manslaughter distinguished from, i. 294-298, ii. 633. See Homicide

Mutilation, as a punishment, i. 192, 195. 311, 312, 513, 518-523. ii. 8, 9, 12, 13, 74, 84, 123 n. ^1, 143 n. ^1, 447, 449 _sq._

Mutton, abstinence from, ii. 322, 327

Mutual aid, i. 538-569

NAMES, certain superstitions relating to, i. 460, ii. 369; social influence of, ii. 203 _sq._; their influence on exogamy, ii. 369, 748; prohibition of mentioning dead persons', ii. 524, 545-547, 550; of mentioning supernatural beings', ii. 640-643

National conceit, ii. 170-174

Nationalism, i. 367-369, ii. 184, 185, 224 _sq._

Nationality, the feeling of, ii. 183-185. See Patriotism

Negative commandments, why more prominent than positive commandments, i. 303

Negligence, i. 210, 211, 303-305

Negro slavery, i. 428, 429, 516-518, 683, 704-714, ii. 32 _sq._

Negroes, not accepted as witnesses against white persons, i. 429; antipathy to, i. 713 _sq._; injuries inflicted upon white persons by, i. 713 _sq._; white persons prohibited from marrying, i. 714

New, fear of anything, i. 462 _sq._

Nuns, sexual intercourse forbidden to, ii. 409, 412

OATHS, materialistic conception of, i. 58-61, 233 _sq._; the taking of, forbidden to the high priest, i. 58, ii. 638; to priestesses, ii. 638; contained in ordeals, i. 505 _sq._, ii. 687-690; taken upon arms, i. 506, ii. 119-121; upon tent-poles, i. 588 n. ^5; in connection with theft, ii. 62, 63, 66, 68; sworn by the eldest sister, i. 606; on the life of the king, ii. 637; supernatural beings appealed to in, ii. 67, 68, 120-123, 686-690, 699, 731 _sq._; prohibition of taking, ii. 99, 124; not considered binding if contrary to the good of the Church, ii. 100; methods of adding supernatural {854} energy to, ii. 118-122; taken upon blood, ii. 118-121, 621, 622, 687-689; blood-covenants accompanied by, ii. 208, 209, 567. See Perjury

Obedience, to parents, ch. xxv. (i. 597-628); to husbands, ch. xxvi. (i. 629-669); slaves, to their masters, ch. xxvii (i. 670-716); to rulers, i. 194-196; to gods, i.

194-198, ii. 659 _sq._; to the dead, ii. 519, 520, 541

Occupation, acquisition of property by, ii. 35-39, 51, 52, 54 _sq._

Occupations of life, divided between the sexes, i. 633-637, ii. 271

Offerings to the dead, ii. 302, 303, 400-404, 517, 518, 524, 539, 547, 550, 692, 700, 701, 704, 708; connection between almsgiving and, ii. 550-552

---- to gods. See Sacrifice

Offspring, man's desire for, i. 533, ii. 388, 391, 400-404, 423, 440; the future state of persons who have died without, ii. 400-404

Old age, criminal responsibility affected by, i. 266 _sq._; the future state of persons who have died of, i. 390, ii. 235, 238 n. ^3, 698

---- persons, killing or abandoning of, i. 386-390, 606, 607, 612, 620; eaten by their relatives, i. 390, ii. 554, 568 _sq._; kind treatment of, i. 540, 546, 625 _sq._, ii. 672; respect for, i. 603-605, 614, 615, 619-621, ii. 194, 675; supposed to be versed in magic, i. 619 _sq._; curses and blessings of, i. 622, 626; suicide committed by, ii. 232, 235, 236, 247 _sq._

Omissions, i. 210-212, 303-305, 317

Opera supererogativa, i. 86, 98 _sq._ See Merits

Opinions, moral judgments relating to, i. 215 _sq._

Ordeals, ii. 686-690, 732; duels as, i. 504-507

"Ought," analysis of the concept, i. 134-137

Outlawry, i. 46, 47, 172, 173, 311

Owls, prohibition of eating, ii. 321

Oxen, prohibition of killing ploughing, ii. 330, 331, 493, 494, 504

PARDON, the right of, as a prerogative of the Crown, i. 192, 196, 226

Parental affection. See Maternal, Paternal affection

Parents, their authority over their children, ch. xxv. (i. 597-628); curses or blessings of, i. 58, 538, 621-627, ii. 703, 715, 716 n. ^2, 732; children punished if convicted of a design to kill their, i. 245; killing their infant children, i. 378, 394-413, 633, ii. 562, 752 _sq._; children killing their, i. 383-386, 522, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2, 749; children killing or abandoning their aged, i. 386-390, 606, 607, 612, 620; eaten by their children, i. 390, ii. 554, 568 _sq._; killing their grown up children, i. 393 _sq._, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2; exposing their new-born children, i. 406-412, 689; children sacrificed to save the lives of their, i. 455, 456, 459-461; sacrificing their children, i. 455-461; eating their children, i. 458 _sq._, ii. 554, 555. 562, 568 _sq._; daughters committing suicide on the death of their, i. 473; inflicting corporal punishment upon their children, i. 513-515, 607, 610; children using violence against their, i. 513, 624 _sq._, ii. 677; their duty of taking care of their children, i. 526-533; children's duty of taking care of their, i. 533-538; children's respect for their, i. 534-538, 600, 601, 607-613,

616-628, ii. 194; children's affection for their, i. 534-538, 618, 659, ii. 194, 748; religion emphasising children's duties to their, i. 536, 537, 608, 610, 612, 613, 616, 617, 620-627, ii. 711, 714, 715, 716 n. ^2, 717, 732; children cursing their, i. 564; selling their children as slaves, i. 599, 607, 609, 611, 612, 615, 675, 681, 682, 684, 685, 689, 691 _sq._; children telling a falsehood in the presence of their, ii. 96; children addressing abusive language to their, ii. 142; their duties to their children, ii. 166, 748; children's duties to their, ii. 166, 748; committing suicide on the death of their children, ii. 232, 244 n. ^3; fasting after the death of their children, ii. 298-300; children fasting after the death of their, ii. 298-301; children punished after death for {855} inflicting injuries upon their, ii. 715. See Maternal, Paternal affection

Parricide. See Parents

Parricidium, i. 384 _sq._

Pastoral life, supposed connection between the custom of ultimogeniture and a, ii. 48 n. ^4, 56 n. ^5

---- peoples, vegetable food provided by the women among, i. 634, ii. 273; the position of women among, i. 660 _sq._; slavery among, i. 672, 673, 681; social aggregates of, ii. 201; their sympathy for their domestic animals, ii. 506

Passing-bell, the, ii. 524, 544

Passover, the, i. 459, 470, ii. 296

Paternal affection, i. 401, 402, 405, 529-533. ii. 187-190, 193, 748; its influence on the duration of marriage, ii. 397

Patriotism, ii. 167-185

Peace, perpetual, i. 334, 337, 367

---- Societies, i. 369

Peculium, of slaves, i. 690, 697, ii. 31-33; of sons, ii. 28; of women, ii. 29

Pederasty. See Homosexual love

Penance, ii. 356-361, 363, 708, 735; fasting as a form of, ii. 246, 315-318, 406

Perjury, considered contagious, i. 58-61; considered sinful though committed unconsciously, i. 229, 231, 233 _sq._; punished by custom or law, i. 505, 521 _sq._, ii. 123 n. ^1; regarded as an offence against the deity, i. 507, ii. 122, 122 _sq._ n. ^10; no civil punishment affixed to, ii. 123 n. ^1; believed to incur divine punishment, ii. 123 n. ^1, 684, 686, 714; to cause misery after death, ii. 715 _sq._

Phratry, the, ii. 217, 218, 222 _sq._

Pigeons, prohibition of killing, ii. 490; eating of, ii. 737

Pilgrimage, ii. 314, 416, 538 n. ^2, 725

"Pious fraud," ii. 100, 104, 112

Pocket-picking, i. 187, 243

Politeness, i. 160, ii. 146-152

Pollution, of sin, i. 52-57, 61-65, 70, 71, 85, 86, 407, ii. 256 n. ^2, 654 _sq._; of curses, i. 57-61, 70, 233, 234, 624 _sq._, ii. 583, 584, 703; of blood, i. 225, 232, 233, 375-382, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2, 262, 714; of women, i. 663-666, ii. 538 n. ^2; of self-inflicted death, ii. 257 n. ^5 262; of death, ii. 283, 302-307, 416, 536-539, 544 _sq._; of natural death, ii. 416, 609; of food, ii. 294-296; of wine, ii. 344 _sq._; sexual, ii. 414-420, 752; caused by partaking of human flesh, ii. 538, 575 _sq._; holiness very susceptible to, i. 58, 380-382, 625, ii. 294-296, 322, 344, 345. 352, 353, 415-420, 608-610, 638, 643, 752

Polyandry, ii. 387, 395

Polygyny, ii. 387-392, 395; connection between illegitimate children's right to inheritance and, ii. 57; a cause of homosexual practices, ii. 466

Polytheism, tolerance of, ii. 647-652

Pork, abstinence from, ii. 321, 322, 326-330, 335

Positive commandments, i. 303-305, 310

Possession, acquisition of property by continued, ii. 39-41, 52

Potatoes, abstinence from, after a death, ii. 301

Poverty, estimation of, i. 556, ii. 280 _sq._; a cause of uncleanliness, ii. 351; monogamy associated with, ii. 392

Prayer, ii. 653-659; for remission of sin, i. 49, 54, 55, 228 _sq._, ii. 654, 655. 72, 707; purification preparatory to, i. 380 _sq._, ii. 352, 353, 358, 359, 415. 416, 418 _sq._; development of a curse or a blessing into a, i. 564 _sq._, ii. 66-68, 120-123, 658, 686-690, 731; almsgiving connected with, i. 567 _sq._; forbidden to women, i. 664, 667 n. ^1; used as greeting, ii. 150; fasting an appendage to, ii. 316 _sq._; magic efficacy ascribed to, ii. 353, 418, 419, 656-659, 706, 712; continence a preparation for, ii. 417-419

Preparation, acts of, i. 243-246

Prescription, ii. 40, 41, 52 _sq._

Pride, condemnation of, ii. 144 _sq._ See Self-regarding pride

Priestesses, forbidden to marry or to have intercourse with men, ii. 406-408, 412-414, 420; continence compulsory on women who wish to become, ii. 419; prostitution of, ii. 443 _sq._; asylums, ii. 637 _sq._; prohibited from taking an oath, ii. 638

Priests, forbidden to take an oath, i. 58, ii. 638; to engage in warfare, {856} i. 348, 381; to shed human blood, i. 381 _sq._; to take part in a capital charge, i. 381, 382, 493; to engage in hunting, ii. 506; the law of torture relating to, i. 523 _sq._; curses of, i. 563; enslaving of children of incontinent, i. 700; certain foods forbidden to, or rejected by, ii. 322, 329, 333, 338; forbidden to marry and to have intercourse with women, ii. 405-409, 412, 414, 418-421; eunuch, ii. 408, 414, 488 n. ^6; forbidden to contract a second marriage, ii. 412; to marry widows, ii. 412, 420; to marry harlots or divorced wives, ii. 420; taboos imposed upon, ii. 417 _sq._; continence compulsory on persons who wish to become, ii. 419; temporary continence compulsory on, ii. 419 _sq._; the punishment of unchastity in the daughters of, ii. 420; represented as corrupters of domestic virtue, ii. 432; their celibacy a cause of homosexual practices, ii. 467; boys kept as, ii. 473; used as temple prostitutes, ii. 473, 488; cannibalism of, ii. 563, 574; their residences asylums, ii. 630, 634, 637; opposing sorcery, ii. 652; regarded as manifestations of gods, ii. 657, 709; encouraging the belief in the magic efficacy of prayer, ii. 658 _sq._ See Benefit of Clergy; _cf._ Magicians

Primogeniture, ii. 45, 46, 48, 55 _sq._

Promiscuity, the theory of, ii. 396

Promises. See Good faith

Property, the right of, ch. xxviii. _sq._ (ii. 1-71); forfeiture of, as a punishment, i. 47, ii. 254; acquired by a successful duel, i. 498, 503, ii. 9; of wives, i. 632, 637-641, 643, 645, 661, ii. 28-31, 41; of women, i. 661, ii. 28-30, 41; of slaves, i. 677, 684, 688, _cf._ _Peculium_ of slaves; of the dead, i. 399, ii. 44, 518, 539 _sq._, see Inheritance, Wills; of supernatural beings, ii. 626 _sq._; supernatural beings as guardians of, ii. 59-69, 669, 675-677, 679, 684, 686, 699, 700, 705, 714, 717, 732

Prostitution, i. 608, ii. 428-431, 437, 439-446; religious, ii. 443-446, 488; of men, ii. 459-462, 463, 476, 478, 488

Provocation, i. 290-298, 311, 316 _sq._

Prudence, i. 560, 581, 715, ii. 52, 59, 114, 124, 176, 185, 265-268, 331, 332, 334. 335, 342, 428, 497, 539, 547, 548, 660

Puberty, girls at, ii. 307 _sq._

Public approval, the prototype of moral approval, i. 9, 122, 129

---- disapproval, the prototype of moral disapproval, i. 9, 119-122

Pulse, abstinence from, ii. 322, _cf._ ii. 430 _sq._

Punishment, inflicted on others than the culprit, i. 43-48, 69 _sq._; restricted to the culprit, i. 70-72; essentially an expression of the moral indignation of the society which inflicts it, i. 79, 89-91, 169, 185, 198-201; theories as to the proper object of, i. 79-91; regarded as a means of eliminating the criminal, i. 80-82; as a deterrent, i. 80-84, 88-91; as a means of reforming the criminal, i. 80-91; defined, i. 82, 169 _sq._; the limited efficiency of, as a deterrent, i. 90 n. ^1; a source of moral disapproval, i. 115; the relation between indemnification and, i. 168 _sq._; among savages, i. 170-177; transition from revenge to, i. 180-185; the opinion that determent actually is or has been the chief object of, i. 185-200; the increasing severity of, i. 186-198; inflicted on criminals in public, i. 191 _sq._; of unintentional injuries, i. 219, 221-226, 231, 232, 235-240; of attempts to commit crimes, i. 241-247, 374; of acts of preparation, i. 243-246; of bare intentions, i. 245; inflicted on animals, i. 253-260, 264, 308; on inanimate things, i. 261-264, 308; of injuries committed by children, i.

265-269; by old persons, i. 266 _sq._; by lunatics, i. 271-277, 298 _sq._; by idiots, i. 273; in drunkenness, i. 279-282; inflicted upon the offending member, i. 311, 312, 513, 518, 519, 521 _sq._, ii. 9, 13, 74, 84, 123 n. ^1, 143 n. ^1; from a deterministic point of view, i. 320 _sq._; influenced by rank, i. 430-433, 491, 518, 519, 524, ii. 19, 20, 58, 142, 143, 448-450; corporal, i. 520-525; suicide committed out of fear of, ii. 233; redeems the sufferer from {857} punishment in a future existence, ii. 360; inflicted on gods, ii. 610. For various kinds of punishment see Banishment, Cannibalism (as a punishment), Emasculation, Mutilation, Outlawry, Property (forfeiture of), Serfdom (as a punishment), Shame (putting offenders to), Slavery (as a punishment)

Punishment in a future existence. See Future life

---- of death, i. 491-496; among savages, i. 188-190, 195-197; as a kind of human sacrifice, i. 440, 471 _sq._; suicide as an alternative to, ii. 243; inflicted for a variety of crimes, i. 44-46, 171, 172, 174, 177, 186-197, 253, 254, 287, 306, 311, 312, 331, 383-386, 404, 407, 409, 412, 416, 419, 420, 423, 424, 429-433, 439, 440, 491, 492, 495, 496, 508, 509, 513, 516, 518, 685, ii. 4, 5, 7-9, 12-15, 19, 96, 140-142, 256 n. ^2, 276, 331, 366-368, 378, 406-408, 420, 424-426, 428, 429, 431, 442, 447-450, 453, 474, 475 n. ^10, 477-482, 497, 558, 640, 647, 650-652

Purificatory ceremonies, i. 53-57, 69, 233, 375-377, 379-381, 625, ii. 256 _sq._ n. ^2, 257 n. ^5, 294, 295, 328, 352-354, 358, 359, 415, 416, 472 n. ^7, 476, 538, 545, 726

RAIN, human sacrifices offered for the purpose of producing, i. 449-451; certain other methods of procuring, ii. 315, 361

Rama[d.]ân, the fast of, i. 271, ii. 313-315, 725

Rank, influencing customs or laws relating to homicide, i. 34, 35, 178, 430-433, 491; to capital punishment, i. 491; to bodily injuries, i. 518, 519, 524; to corporal punishment, i. 522-524; to torture, i. 523 _sq._; to theft, ii. 19, 20, 58; to sincerity, ii. 103; to insults, i. 142 _sq._; to politeness, i. 151 _sq._; to suicide, i. 243; to marriage, ii. 379, 380, 384; to chastity, ii. 428, 433 _sq._; to rape, ii. 437 _sq._; to adultery, ii. 448-450; to the disposal of the dead, ii. 527, 549; to cannibalism, ii. 573 _sq._; supposed to influence the efficacy of curses, i. 626 _sq._; to influence men's state in the other world, ii. 698

Rape, i. 187, 188, 311, 521, ii. 437, 438, 476, 633, 679; self-defence in the case of, i. 290

Rashness, i. 211, 305-310

Ravens, fear of killing, ii. 491

Reason, the theory according to which moral judgments are ultimately based on, i. 7-17

Reception ceremonies, i. 590-592

Reflection, its influence on moral estimates, i. 10, 11, 70, 216, 237, 247, 248, 251, 283, 303, 310, 312-314, ii. 111, 136, 267, 268, 274, 283, 405, 512-514, 580, 581, 744-746; on non-moral resentment, i. 315, 316, 318

Reflex action, i. 22

Regalia, regarded as wonder-working talismans, ii. 608 n. ^4, 753 _sq._

Regret, the similarity between remorse and, i. 123 _sq._

Religio, the meaning of the word, ii. 584-586

Religion, belief in supernatural being an essential element in, ch. xlvii., (ii. 582-601); duties to gods inculcated by, ch. xlviii. _sq._ (ii. 602-662); relations between morality and, chs. l.-lii. (ii. 663-737), 745 _sq._; custom stronger than, i. 164; enjoins abstinence from work on certain days, i. 187, ii. 284-289, 718; the severity of punishment increased by, i. 193-198; enjoins fasting, i. 271, ii. 246, 292-298, 308-318, 358, 406, 725; a source of war, i. 339, 349-352, 359; attitude of, towards war, i. 339, 341, 342, 345-366, 369 _sq._, ii. 711; condemns homicide, i. 345, 346, 378-380, 382, ii. 669, 672, 676, 684, 686, 700, 705, 714, 716 n. ^2, 717, 732; condemns the killing or exposure of infants, i. 407, 411 _sq._; condemns feticide, i. 414-417, ii. 705; attitude of, towards slavery, i. 424, 426, 516, 683-689, 693-700, 711-713, ii. 711; gives support to capital punishment, i. 496; influences the right to bodily integrity, i. 520; inculcates filial duties, i. 536, 537, 608, 610, 612, 613, 616, 617, 620-627, ii. 711, 714, 715, 716 n. ^2, 717, 732; enjoins charity, i. 549-558, 561-569, ii. 669, 672, 699, 705, 711, 717, 718, 725, 726, 732; enjoins hospitality, i. 578-580, ii. 669, 711, 714, {858} 715, 717, 718, 726, 732; influences the treatment of old persons, i. 620 _sq._, ii. 672, 675; influences the position of women, i. 663; regards women as unclean, i. 663-666; attitude of, towards serfdom, i. 703 _sq._; the right of property sanctioned by, ii. 59-69, 669, 675-677, 679, 684, 686, 699, 700, 705, 714, 717, 732; the regard for truth and good faith sanctioned by, ii. 96, 114-124, 128, 129, 669, 672, 675-677, 684, 686, 699, 700, 703-705, 707. 711, 714, 717, 726, 732; leads to "pious fraud," ii. 100, 104, 112; condemns pride, ii. 144 _sq._, its relation to national feeling and patriotism, ii. 174, 175, 178 _sq._; as a social tie, ii. 209-213, 225-227, 725; the opinions as regards suicide influenced by, ii. 234, 236, 237, 242-254, 260, 261, 263; the moral ideas relating to self-regarding conduct influenced by, ii. 267 _sq._; commends agriculture, ii. 275; attitude of, towards labour, ii. 275, 280-289, 675, 705, 747; commends poverty, ii. 280-282; requires ceremonial cleanliness, ii. 294, 295, 352-354, 358, 359, 415-420, 700 n. ^5, 705, 718, 726; enjoins pilgrimage, ii. 314, 725; imposes various restrictions in diet, ii. 322-338, 671; encourages drunkenness, ii. 339; enjoins sobriety or total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, ii. 341-345; a cause of uncleanliness, ii. 354-356; leads to various forms of asceticism, ii. 355-363; stigmatises incest, ii. 375, 376, 671; enjoins various forms of endogamy, ii. 378-382; a bar to inter-marriage, ii. 380-382; enjoins monogamy, ii. 392; prohibits divorce, ii. 397; enjoins marriage, ii. 399-404; enjoins celibacy or continence, ii. 406-421; regards marriage as impure, ii. 410-412; condemns second marriages, ii. 412, 451; enjoins sexual cleanliness, ii. 415-420, 736, 752; requires chastity of unmarried women, i. 49, ii. 427 _sq._; condemns extra-matrimonial intercourse, ii. 431-433, 439,

675; prostitution connected with, ii. 443-446, 488; condemns adultery, ii. 447, 448, 450, 453-455, 675, 676, 684, 686, 700, 717; homosexual practices connected with, ii. 458, 459, 472-474, 484, 486-489, 752; stigmatised by, ii. 475, 476, 479-482, 485-489, 705; inculcates regard for the lower animals, ii. 497-504, 705; looks down upon the lower animals, ii. 505-508; cannibalism in connection with, ii. 562 _sq._; definitions of, ii. 584, 753; born of fear, ii. 612-614; hope an element in every, ii. 614-616; attitude of, towards magic, ii. 649, 650, 652, 753; the communal character of, ii. 661. See Asylums, Atheism, Baptism, Blasphemy, Blood (effusion of, as a religious rite), Eucharist, Flagellation, Future life, Future state, "God," Goddesses, Gods, Guardian spirits, Hell, Heresy, Holiness, Human sacrifice, Intolerance, Monotheism, Oaths, Ordeals, Penance, Perjury, Pilgrimage, Polytheism, Prayer, Priestesses, Priests, Purificatory ceremonies, Sacred places, Sacrifice, Sacrilege, Saints, Self-mortification, Self-mutilation (as a religious rite), Sin, Supreme beings, Tolerance, Totem, Totemism, Unbelief

Remorse, i. 105-107, 123-125, 136; absence of, in criminals, i. 90 n. ^1; a cause of suicide, i. 106, ii. 233

Repentance, i. 105-107, 123-125; as a ground for forgiveness, i. 84-88, 99, 311, 318, ii. 360, 735; adequate, deemed impossible in the case of blasphemy, ii. 640

Repetition of an offence, i. 186, 187, 189, 257, 306, 311, 312, 318, ii. 7

Reptiles, aversion to eating, ii. 324

Requisitions, military, ii. 27

Resentment, i. 21-93; towards animals, i. 26, 27, 251-260, 264, 308, 316; towards inanimate things, i. 26, 27, 260-264, 315; the phenomena which call forth, i. 315-318

----, sympathetic, i. 111-116, 169, 179, 180, 185, 372, 373, 429, 433, 524, 533, 559, 560, 659, 714 _sq._, ii. 52, 109, 112, 113, 140, 166, 176, 185, 262, 266, 496, 528, 580, 661; in animals, i. 112, ii. 52

Rest, ii. 283-289, 747

Retaliation, moral valuation of, i. 73-79. See Punishment, Revenge

Retributive emotions, i. 21-99; the phenomena which call forth, i. {859} 314-319; not determined by the cognition of free-will, i. 322, 326

Retributive kindly emotion, i. 21, 93-99; in animals, i. 94; the phenomena which call forth, i. 318 _sq._; sympathetic, i. 117, 129

Revenge, taken upon animals, i. 26, 27, 251-253, 255, 256, 258; upon inanimate things, i. 26, 27, 260-263; regarded as a duty, i. 73 _sq._; condemned, i. 73-79; demanded by public opinion, i. 176 _sq._; regulated by the rule of equivalence, i. 177-180; succeeded by punishment, i. 180-185; believed to be taken by animals upon men, i. 252, 258, ii. 491, 497. 500, 502, 504, 603; taken upon offenders caught _flagrante delicto_, i. 290-294, ii. 8, 13, 17, 429, 447; not to be taken upon a guest, i. 576, 587 _sq._; taken for injuries inflicted upon guests, i. 577 _sq._; suicide as a method of taking, ii. 233, 234, 242-245; supposed to be taken by the dead upon the living, ii. 530, 531, 548, 576; taken by the living upon the dead, ii. 692 _sq._; supposed to be taken by ghosts upon other ghosts, ii. 693 _sq._ See Blood-revenge

----, the feeling of, its nature and origin, i. 21-42; in animals, i. 37 _sq._; appeased by repentance, i. 87, 88, 318; attributed to gods, i. 194, 198, 438-440, 471 _sq._, ii. 660, 661, 667, 668, 702, 714; to the souls of murdered persons, i. 232, 372, 375, 376, 378 379, 406, 476, 481 _sq._, ii. 559 _sq._; to the dead, ii. 530, 531, 534; a motive for committing suicide, ii. 233, 234, 242-245; a motive for cannibalism, ii. 557-559

Rewards, vicarious, i. 96-99; a source of moral approval, i. 117; public, i. 166 _sq._; in a future existence, see Future life

Rice, abstinence from, after a death, ii. 301

"Right," analysis of the concept, i. 137-139; the relation between "good" and, i. 146 _sq._

"Rights," analysis of the concept, i. 139-141

Rivers, human sacrifices offered to, i. 452-454

Robbery, i. 187-189, ii. 1-27, 57-69; distinguished from theft, ii. 16, 17, 58; of tombs, ii. 518, 519, 540 _sq._; of temples, ii. 627; refuge denied to persons guilty of, ii. 633. See Stealing

SABBATH, the Jewish, i. 187, ii. 286-289, 718, 747; originally a fast-day, ii. 310 _sq._

Sacramental grace, considered necessary for salvation, ii. 719 _sq._

Sacred places, polluted persons prohibited from entering, i. 58, ii. 294, 415 _sq._; shedding of human blood prohibited in, i. 380, ii. 635; women excluded from, i. 664 _sq._; sexual intercourse prohibited in, ii. 416, 752; fear of disturbing the peace in, ii. 635 _sq._ See Asylums

Sacrifice, ii. 611-626; transference of evil combined with a, i. 62-65; vicarious expiatory, i. 65-70, 438-440; purification preparatory to, i. 380, ii. 294, 352, 353, 358, 359, 415; connection between alms giving and, i. 565-569, ii. 550-552; as a means of transferring curses, i. 586 _sq._, ii. 618-624, 658; as a reception ceremony, i. 591, ii. 621; women prohibited from offering a, i. 664 _sq._; fasting in connection with, ii. 294-298; fasting the survival of an expiatory, ii. 316-318; asceticism in some other instances the survival of an earlier, ii. 359; oaths taken in connection with a, ii. 621 _sq._; connected with prayer, ii. 655 _sq._; importance of, ii. 705, 707-712, 714, 716, 718. See Human sacrifice, Offerings to the dead

Sacrificial victims, magic virtue ascribed to, i. 63, 65, 69, 444-447, ii. 563, 625, 658; looked upon as guardian spirits, i. 464 _sq._; as messengers, i. 465 _sq._, ii. 618; privilege granted to, i. 585 n. ^1; must be free from pollution, ii. 295, 296, 419

Sacrilege, punished with death, i. 188, 197, 439, 492; refuge denied to persons guilty of, ii. 633; if committed by foreigners, ii. 648

Sago, abstinence from, after a death, ii. 301

Saints, oaths taken at the shrines of, i. 59 _sq._, ii. 120; diseases cured by contact with, i. 63; lunatics regarded as, i. 270 _sq._; curses pronounced by, i. 563, 622; _l-[(]âr_ (implying {860} the transference of a conditional curse) made upon, i. 566, ii. 584, 585, 618, 619, 636, 638; robbed of their holiness, i. 586, ii. 608; compacts made at the shrines of, i. 587, ii. 623 _sq._; old men regarded as, i. 619; looked upon as guardians of property, ii. 67 _sq._; the saliva of, ii. 322; ceremonial cleanliness required of those who approach the shrines of, ii. 416, 418, 752; sexual intercourse with, ii. 444, 488; places of striking appearance associated with, ii. 589, 627; miracles performed by, ii. 590-592; gifts offered to, ii. 619; offerings to, participate in their sanctity, i. 445 _sq._, ii. 625; sacredness of the shrines of, ii. 627, 628, 635; lunacy attributed to the resentment of, ii. 628; their shrines asylums, ii. 628, 635, 636, 638; persons attached to the shrines of, ii. 635; unconcerned about the worldly morality of their devotees, ii. 669; invoked by thieves, ii. 669

Salmon, abstinence from eating, after a death, ii. 306 _sq._

Salutations, i. 590-592, ii. 146, 147, 149-151

Sanctuary, the right of. See Asylums

Scalping, i. 333, 375, ii. 525

Scape-goats, i. 53-55, 61-65

Scientific research, ii. 133-136

Scourging, as a religious rite, ii. 294, 357-359

Sea, human sacrifices offered to the, i. 452-454

Self-approval, i. 105-107, 123

-----defence, i. 288-290; lying in, ii. 92, 94, 97-101, 103-106, 112

-----mortification, ii. 281, 315-318, 355-363, 421

-----mutilation, after a death, i. 26, 27, 476, ii. 524, 528, 544, 545, 547; as a religious rite, i. 470 _sq._, ii. 357

Self-regarding duties and virtues, ii. 265-268

-----regarding pride, respect for other men's, ch. xxxii. (ii. 137-152); in men, i. 23, 24, 30, 38-40, 94, 179, 315, ii. 110, 137-140; a cause of suicide, ii. 73, 139, 140, 231-233, 243; in animals, i. 39, ii. 137 _sq._; attributed to the dead, ii. 519; to gods, ii. 639-655

-----reproach, i. 105-107, 123-125

-----respect, ii. 265

Self-sacrifice, i. 213, 214, 565, ii. 154, 265, 359

Seniority, respect for, i. 605, 606, 614, 615, 619, 626, ii. 703

Sensuous pleasures, condemnation of, ii. 291, 292, 361-363

Sentiment, i. 110 n. ^3

Separation, judicial, ii. 397, 455

Serfdom, i. 701-704; as a punishment, ii. 19; strangers reduced to, ii. 24; shipwrecked persons reduced to, ii. 25

Serfs, bodily injuries inflicted upon, i. 524 n. ^3; proprietary rights or in capacities of, i. 701 _sq._, ii. 32; intermarriage between freewomen and, ii. 379

Serpents, worship of, ii. 590. See Snakes

Seven, the number, ii. 311 _sq._

Seventh day, the, ii. 286-289. See Sabbath

Sexual impulse, the, in males, i. 657, ii. 435 _sq._; in females, i. 657 _sq._, ii. 435; connection between religious feelings and, ii. 375 n. ^3; regarded as sinful in the unmarried, ii. 432; associated with affection, ii. 439 _sq._, see Conjugal affection

---- intercourse, between man and beast, i. 253 _sq._, ii. 409, 749; manslayers temporarily prohibited from, i. 375, 377; abstinence from, with women who are pregnant or who suckle a child, i. 399, ii. 388, 391; with strangers, i. 575, 593, ii. 444-446; with holy persons, i. 593 n. ^1, ii. 444, 488; abstained from after a death, ii. 306; abstained from during the month of Rama[d.]ân, ii. 313; abstinence from, a means of propitiating or pleasing the deity, ii. 358, 420 _sq._; as a magical or religious rite, ii. 395, 443-446, 488; between a man and a married woman, ii. 397, 447-455; between a married man and a woman, ii. 397, 451-455; forbidden to priests and priestesses, ii. 405-409, 412-414, 418-421; to monks and nuns, ii. 409, 412; considered impure, ii. 410, 411, 414-420, 752; regarded as a consequence of Adam's sin, ii. 411; supposed to have been originally free from all carnal desire, ii. 411 n. ^4; supposed to take place between gods and women, ii. 412 _sq._; the future state of persons {861} who have refrained from, ii. 414 _sq._; danger attributed to, ii. 415, 446; prohibited in sacred places, ii. 416, 752; abstained from in connection with religious observances, ii. 416-420, 736, 752; admission into priesthood preceded by abstinence from, ii. 419; regarded as a transmitter of hereditary sin, ii. 421; between unmarried persons, ii. 422-446, 675, 747; between persons of the same sex, ch. xliii. (ii. 456-489), 752 _sq._; between animals of the same sex, ii. 456, 466, 475 n. ^2; temporarily forbidden to men who have eaten human flesh, ii. 575. See Adultery, Incest, _Jus primæ noctis_, Sodomy

Sexual inversion, congenital, ii. 465-467; acquired, ii. 467-470

Shame, putting offenders to, i. 170; a cause of suicide, ii. 233

Shaving, as a means of purification, ii. 294 _sq._

Sheep, stealing of, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 14; abstinence from killing, for food, ii. 330. See Mutton Shipwrecked persons, sacrifice of, i. 467; treatment of, ii. 25, 37 _sq._

Sick persons, killing or abandoning of, i. 391-393, ii. 542; kind treatment of, i. 546-548; suicide committed by, ii. 232; unkindness to, punished by the supreme being, ii. 672. See Disease

Sin, collective responsibility in the case of, i. 48-57, 61-72; prayers for remission of, i. 49, 54, 55, 228 _sq._, ii. 654, 655, 702, 707; materialistic conception and transference of, i. 52-57, 61-65, 70, 71, 85, 86, 407, ii. 256 n. ^2, 654 _sq._; committed accidentally or unknowingly, i. 227-231, 233-235; the sense of, ii. 361; sexual intercourse regarded as a transmitter of hereditary, ii. 421

Sister, the elder, respect for, i. 605, 606, 614; swearing by, i. 606; curses of, i. 626, ii. 703

Slander, ii. 96, 98, 140-142, 700

Slavery, ch. xxvii. (i. 670-716); as a punishment for crime, i. 45, 46, 494, 518, 675, 676, 681, 682, 685, 688-691, ii. 7, 8, 12, 13, 74; a cause of suicide, ii. 233, 235, 241; produces contempt for manual labour, ii. 272, 273, 278

Slaves, sacrificed to gods, i. 66, 452, 455, 456, 467 _sq._; to dead persons, i. 472, 474, 486, ii. 234; killing of, i. 378, 421-429, 696, 707; of free men by, i. 429, 430, 491 n. ^5; refuge denied to, i. 427; granted to, i. 690, 692, 696, ii. 637; not allowed as witnesses, i. 429, 697; bodily injuries inflicted upon, i. 515-518, 524, 677, 707; upon freemen by, i. 516-518; corporal punishment inflicted upon, i. 522-524; children sold as, by their parents, i. 599, 607, 609, 611, 612, 615, 675, 681, 682, 684, 685, 689, 691 _sq._; curses of, i. 716; proprietary rights and incapacities of, i. 677, 684, 688, 690, 697, ii. 28, 31-33, 57; rules of inheritance relating to, i. 679, ii. 46 _sq._; addicted to falsehood, ii. 113, 129 _sq._; insults offered by, ii. 142 _sq._; offered to, ii. 143; marriages between free men and, ii. 379; treatment of the dead bodies of, ii. 527, 549; eaten, ii. 559 567; cursed by their masters, ii. 703

Snakes, abstinence from eating, ii. 324. See Serpents

Social affection, i. 94, 95, 112-114, 559, ii. 197, 198, 226-228

---- aggregates, the evolution of, ii. 198-226

Socialism, ii. 69-71

Society, the birthplace of the moral consciousness, i. 117-123

Sodomy, i. 188, ii. 460, 465 n. ^2, 474-476, 479-483, 486-489. See Homosexual love

Solstices, fasting at, ii. 309 _sq._ See Midsummer customs

Soma, ii. 591, 592, 707 _sq._

Son, sacrificed to save the life of his father, i. 455 _sq._; the parents' or father's consent required for the marriage of the, i. 607-609, 613, 615-618, 624 _sq._; mother committing suicide on the death of her only, ii. 244 n. ^3; allowed to eat only certain foods after the death of his father, ii. 301 _sq._ See Children, Firstborn, Primogeniture, Ultimogeniture

Sorrow expressions of, ii. 283, 308, 316, 528

Soul, the immateriality of the, ii. 595 _sq._ See Annihilation, Dead, Future Life, Future state, Transmigration

{862} Spiders, prohibition of killing white, ii. 490

Spirits, evil. See Evil spirits

"Spiritual relationship," a bar to inter-marriage, ii. 369, 377

Spitting, superstitions relating to, i. 588, 594, ii. 65, 151, 209, 322, 546 n. ^2, 636 _sq._

State, the, as a social unit, ii. 221-226; its influence on the smaller units of which it was composed, i. 627 _sq._, ii. 222 _sq._; suicide regarded as a wrong against, ii. 248, 253, 259, 263; celibacy regarded as a wrong against, ii. 404

Stealing, ii. 1-27, 57-69; of horses, cattle, or sheep, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 14; from houses, i. 187 _sq._, ii. 15, 16, 58, see Burglary; of letters, i. 188; of food, i. 286, 287, 676, ii. 14, 15, 57 _sq._; at night, i. 289, ii. 16, 58; self-defence in the case of, i. 289 _sq._; persons who are caught, i. 293. 294. 311, ii. 8, 13, 17-19, 58; punishment inflicted on the offending member in the case of, i. 311, 312, 521 n. ^1, ii. 9, 13; from relatives, ii. 53 _sq._ n. ^4; punished by supernatural beings, ii. 59-69, 669, 675-677, 679, 684, 686, 699, 700, 705, 714, 717, 732; curses pronounced to punish or prevent, ii. 62-69, 703; adultery regarded as a form of, ii. 449 _sq._; from tombs, ii. 518, 519, 540 _sq._; of property belonging to gods, ii. 626 _sq._

Stimulants, religious veneration of, ii. 591

Storks, abstinence from killing, ii. 490

Strangers, protected by the chief or king, i. 180, 181, 338; killing of, i. 331-334, 337-34, 370, 371, 373; sacrificed, i. 467 _sq._; infliction of bodily injuries upon, i. 519; kindness to, i. 556-558, see Hospitality; blessings of, i. 581-584, ii. 446; regarded as semi-supernatural beings, i. 583 _sq._; supposed to be versed in magic, i. 584; the evil eye of, i. 584, 591-593; curses of, i. 584-594, ii. 715, 732; reception of, i. 590-592, ii. 621; gifts of, i. 593 _sq._; sexual intercourse with, i. 593, ii. 444-446; enslaving of, i. 674, 675, 689, 690, 691, 714 _sq._; respect for the proprietary rights of, ii. 2, 11, 59; robbery committed upon, ii. 20-25, 58 _sq._; reduced to serfdom, ii. 24; rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 49; deceiving of, ii. 87, 88, 90, 94, 97, 112, 126-129; politeness to, ii. 152; duties to, ii. 166; despised, ii. 171-174, 532; disregard of their interests, ii. 176; antipathy to, ii. 227; marriages with, ii. 378, 381 _sq._; treatment of departed, ii. 525, 548 _sq._; eaten, ii. 554; sacrilege committed by, ii. 648. See Hospitality

Stratagems, ii. 106, 107, 112

Suicide, ch. xxxv. (ii. 229-264); punished with forfeiture of property, i. 47, ii. 254; prompted by remorse, i. 106, ii. 233; of daughters, i. 473; of widows, i. 473 _sq._, ii. 232, 234, 235, 241, 242, 244, 247; caused by wounded pride, ii. 73, 139, 140, 231-233, 243; the future state of persons who have committed, ii. 235-239, 242-244, 246, 253, 262, 694, 710

Sun, fasting in connection with the, ii. 309, 310, 312 _sq._

---- gods, appealed to in oaths, ii. 121 _sq._; regarded as judges, ii. 698, 699, 703

Sunday, as a day of rest, ii. 288 _sq._; a cause of drunkenness, ii. 343 _sq._

Supernatural, the, ii. 582-584

---- beings, the belief in, ch. xlvii. (ii. 582-601); disease supposed to be caused by, i. 392 _sq._, ii. 593; curses personified and elevated to the rank of, i. 60, 379, 482, 561, 585, 623, 624, 626, ii. 68, 116, 715, 732; fear of mentioning the names of, ii. 640-642; distinction between offences committed against gods and offences against other, ii. 661 _sq._ See Animals (killing of sacred), Erinyes, Evil spirits, Goddesses, Gods, Guardian spirits, _Jinn_, Saints, Supreme beings, Totem

"Superobligatory, the," i. 151-154

Suppliants. See Asylums, _L-[(]âr_

Supreme beings in savage beliefs, ii. 670-687

Swallows, prohibition of killing, ii. 490

Sympathetic feelings springing from association, i. 109 _sq._

---- magic. See Magic, sympathetic

{863} Sympathetic resentment. See Resentment, sympathetic

---- retributive kindly emotion. See Retributive kindly emotion, sympathetic

Sympathy, i. 109-111; for animals, ii. 494-506, 510-514. See Affection, Altruistic sentiment

TABOO, i. 197, 233, ii. 63-66, 583, 584, 675

Talion. See Equivalence, the rule of Testation, ii. 43, 53. See Wills

Thank offerings, i. 441, ii. 615 _sq._

Theft. See Stealing

Thrift, ii. 265

Throne, the Royal, regarded as holy, ii. 608, 754

Thunder, religious veneration of, ii. 587, 592

Tigers, abstinence from the flesh of, ii. 321; their fear of strange phenomena, ii. 583

Toads, fear of killing, ii. 491

Tobacco, religious veneration of, ii. 591

Tolerance, religious, ii. 647-653

Tombs, theft or violation committed at, ii. 518, 519, 525, 540 _sq._; places of refuge, ii. 630

Tomb-stones, ii. 544, 546

Tortoises, prohibition of eating, ii. 321

Torture, infliction of death by, i. 186-188, 190; judicial, i. 523 _sq._

Totem, eating of the, i. 227, ii. 210, 211, 323, 324, 606; killing of the, ii. 210, 603, 604, 606; regardful treatment of the, ii. 490

Totemism, as a social tie, ii. 210-213; represented as the source of the prohibition of incest, ii. 376, 376 _sq._ n. ^7, 377 n. ^1, 747; believed to be instituted by the All-father, ii. 671

Tournaments, i. 354 _sq._

Trade, moral valuation of, ii. 274, 276, 278-280, 282

Transference, of blessings, see Blessings; of curses, see Curses; of disease, see Disease; of evil, see Evil; of holiness, see Holiness; of the holiness temporarily seated in the ruling sovereign, ii. 607-610, 753 _sq._; of magic virtue ascribed to sacrificial victims, i. 69, 444-447, ii. 563, 624 _sq._; of magic virtue, by sexual intercourse, i. 593, ii. 444-446, 488; by eating or by contact, ii. 562-564, 605, 606, 625; of merits, see Merits; of qualities inherent in animals, men, or man-gods, by eating their flesh or drinking their blood, ii. 320, 333, 334, 560-564; of sin, see Sin; of the souls of divine kings, ii. 606, 607, 753 _sq._; of virtue, see Virtue

Transmigration of human souls, into animals, ii. 324, 328, 338, 490, 496, 500, 504, 516, 517, 693, 709 _sq._; into trees, ii. 516

Treason, punishment of, i. 45-48, 187-189, 492, ii. 558; judicial torture in cases of, i. 523

Trees, revenge taken upon, i. 26, 27, 260-263; transmigration of human souls into, ii. 516

Tribe, the, ii. 202, 217-219, 222 _sq._

Tribes, associations of, ii. 220 _sq._

Tribunals among savages, i. 173-175

Truce of God, the, i. 356 _sq._

Truth and good faith, regard for, ch. xxx. _sq._ (ii. 72-136); gods as guardians of, ii. 96, 114-123, 128, 129, 669, 672, 675-677, 684, 686, 699, 700, 703-705, 707, 711, 714, 717, 726, 732

Turtle, abstinence from eating, ii. 319, 333

Twilight, prohibition of eating, travelling, and sleeping during, ii. 309

Twins, i. 395, 396, 408, 460

ULTIMOGENITURE, ii. 46, 48, 56

Unbelief, ii. 644-646, 705; as a subject of moral judgment, i. 216; considered a legitimate cause of war, i. 339, 349-352, 359; the right to bodily integrity influenced by, i. 520; a cause of uncharitableness, i. 557, 696; a ground for enslaving captives, i.

686, 695; the valuation of theft or robbery influenced by, ii. 20, 25; does not justify breach of faith, ii. 93; a legitimate ground for deceiving an enemy, ii. 94; a bar to intermarriage, ii. 380 _sq._; homosexual practices associated with, ii. 486-489; the right to life influenced by, ii. 705; the future state influenced by, ii. 719-721, 725-727

Unchastity, ch. xlii. _sq._ (ii. 422-489); of unmarried persons, supposed to incur divine punishment, i. 49, ii. 675; forbidden to priests and priestesses, ii. 406-409, 412-414, 419 _sq._; to monks and nuns, ii. {864} 409, 412; to persons who wish to become priests or priestesses, ii. 419; supposed to injure the harvest, ii. 417, 747; celibacy a cause of, ii. 432

Uncle, children in the power of their maternal, i. 597 _sq._

Uncleanliness, ii. 348-356

Uncleanness. See Pollution

Unearned income, ii. 70 _sq._

Unintentional injuries, i. 217-240, 315, 316, 319, ii. 714; benefits, i. 318 _sq._

Unnatural love. See Homosexual love

Usucapio, ii. 40

VAMPIRES, i. 476, ii. 564, 709

Veal, considered unwholesome, ii. 332

Vegetarianism, ii. 335-338, 499

Venison, abstinence from, ii. 320

Veracity. See Truth, regard for Vermin, revenge taken upon, i. 26, 27, 251; regard for, ii. 492, 493, 498 _sq._

Vestal virgins, i. 439, 453, ii. 407, 408, 637 _sq._

"Vice," analysis of the concept, i. 134

Village communities, ii. 200-202, 213, 214, 216, 219

Violent death, the future state of persons who have died a, i. 481 _sq._, ii. 237-239, 242

Virginity, required of priestesses, ii. 406-408; religious veneration of, 409-411, 429; not required of a bride, ii. 422-424, 440, 441, 444-446; required of unmarried women, ii. 424-442; the preference given by men to, ii. 434-437, 440

"Virtue," analysis of the concept, i. 147-150

Virtue, transference of, i. 98

Vivisection, ii. 510, 512, 514

Volitions, as subjects of moral judgments, i. 202-210; as a source of non-moral retributive emotions, i. 314-319

---- absence of, a subject of moral judgment, i. 210-214; a cause of non-moral retributive emotions, i. 317-319

WAGER of battle, i. 306, 504-507

War, i. 331-382; provoked by a homicide, i. 33; humanity towards enemies in, i. 335, 336, 342-344, 369, 370, 558, ii. 711; private, i. 355-358; human sacrifices offered in, i. 440, 441, 447 n. ^5, 449; ending in a duel, i. 497 _sq._; destruction of property in, ii. 25 _sq._; seizure of property in, ii. 26, 27, 38, 58 _sq._; deceit in, ii. 94, 106-108, 112; the future state of persons who have fallen in, ii. 237, 521, 694, 697, 704, 708; burial of persons who have fallen in, ii. 239; considered a nobler occupation than labour, ii. 272-274, 278, 282; fasting after a reverse in, ii. 315; a cause of polygyny, ii. 389, 391; prevalence of homosexual love among peoples addicted to, ii. 467, 479, 752

War, prisoners of, treatment of, i. 336, 343, 422; sacrificed to gods, i. 339, 441, 450, 452, 467; to the dead, i. 472, 474; bodily injuries inflicted upon, i. 519 _sq._; enslaved, i. 674, 675, 677, 681-686, 688-691, 695, 701, 715; ransom accepted for, i. 701; eaten, ii. 554, 561, 578

Water, human sacrifices offered for the purpose of getting drinking, i. 451 _sq._

White men, atrocities committed by, among coloured peoples, i. 370 _sq._; coloured persons not accepted as witnesses against, i. 429; their demoralising influence upon savages, i. 548, 549, 571 _sq._, ii. 2, 126-129, 424, 735; injuries inflicted by coloured persons upon, i. 713 _sq._; prohibited from marrying coloured persons, i. 714; looked down upon by savages, ii. 171 _sq._; taken for spirits, ii. 590

Widowers, suicide committed by, ii. 232, 233, 235 _sq._; fasting of, ii. 299-301; second marriages of, prohibited or condemned, ii. 412, 451

Widows, sacrifice of, i. 472-474, ii. 450 _sq._; suicide committed by, i. 473 _sq._, ii. 232, 234, 235, 241, 242, 244, 247; prohibited from remarrying, i. 475, ii. 450 _sq._; rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 45, 47 55 _sq._; fasting of, ii. 298-301; priests forbidden to marry, ii. 412, 420

Will, the, as the subject of moral judgment, ch. ix. (i. 217-248), i. 214-216, 310-314; as a cause of non-moral retributive emotions, i. 315, 319. See Free-will

{865} Wills, ii. 43, 53; the sacredness attached to, ii. 519, 541, 552

Wine, superstitious notions concerning, i. 278, 281, ii. 344, 345, 591 _sq._; prohibition of, ii. 341-345; after a death, ii. 302, 305; in honour of the sun, ii. 312

Wishes, deliberate, as subjects of moral judgments, i. 206 _sq._

Witchcraft, ii. 649-652; punishment of, i. 45, 189, 190, 492, ii. 650-652. See Magic Witches, lunatics burned as, i. 273; old women regarded as, i. 620; addicted to homosexual practices, ii. 484 n. ^1; the custom of swimming, ii. 690. See Witchcraft Wives, the subjection of, ch. xxvi. (i. 629-669); punished if convicted of a design to kill their husbands, i. 245; crimes committed by, in the presence of their husbands, i.

284; husbands killing their, i. 418, 419, 631; killing their husbands, i. 419 _sq._; acquired by duels, i. 499, 500, 503; husbands inflicting bodily injuries upon their, i. 514-516, 631; the duty of husbands to protect and support their, i. 526-529, 532 _sq._; lending of, to guests or others, i. 575, 593, ii. 752; cursed by their husbands, i. 626; sold as slaves by their husbands, i. 675, 684; proprietary rights and incapacities of, i. 632, 637-641, 643, 645, 661, ii. 28-31, 41, 57; belief in a mysterious bond of sympathy between husbands and, ii. 205; suicide committed by husbands on the death of their, ii. 232, 233, 235 _sq._; fasting of husbands on the death of their, ii. 299-301; adultery committed by, ii. 397, 447-455; of gods, ii. 412-414; priests forbidden to marry divorced, ii. 420; exchange of, ii. 752; eaten by their husbands, ii. 555. See Conjugal affection, Marriage, Widows

Wizards. See Magicians

Wolf's flesh, abstinence from, ii. 320, 322, 327

Women, the position of, ch. xxvi. (i. 629-669); rape committed upon, i. 187, 188, 290, 311, 521, ii. 437, 438, 633, 679; punished by being burned alive, i. 188; treatment of, in war, i. 335, 336, 342, 343, 369 _sq._; killing of, i. 418-421; not allowed to be beaten, i. 514; the evil eye of, i. 592; regarded as versed in magic, especially when old, i. 620, 666-668; the occupations of, i. 633-637; the sexual impulse of, i. 657 _sq._, ii. 435; ideas held about, i. 661-669, ii. 192; the future state of, i. 662 _sq._, ii. 673; of such as have died in child-birth, ii. 238 n. ^3, 678; menstruous, i. 663; ii. 307 n. ^2, 538 n. ^2, 586; regarded as unclean, i. 663-666, ii. 538 n. ^2; forbidden to enter sacred places, i. 664, 665, ii. 752; to offer sacrifices, i. 664 _sq._; to pray, i. 664, 667 n. ^1; curses of, i. 668; serving as asylums, i. 668 _sq._; proprietary rights and incapacities of, i. 661, ii. 28-30, 41, 57; rules of inheritance relating to, ii. 44, 45, 47, 48, 55; addicted to falsehood, ii. 76, 113; to suicide, ii. 232; politeness to, ii. 152; certain foods forbidden to, ii. 320 sq.; celibacy and continence of religious, ii. 406-414, 419-421; married to gods, ii. 412-414; chastity of unmarried, i. 49, ii. 422-446, 675; coyness of, ii. 435 _sq._; homosexual practices between, ii. 464, 465, 752; the lack of accessible women a cause of homosexual practices between men, ii. 466 _sq._; their mental inferiority a cause of pederasty, ii. 470 _sq._; treatment of the dead bodies of, ii. 526, 527, 549; forbidden to eat human flesh, ii. 554, 555 n., 573, 575; refuge denied to kidnappers of, ii. 633. See Daughters, Mother, Wives, Widows

Work. See Labour

World, renunciation of the, ii. 361-363

"Wrong," analysis of the concept, i. 134

YOUNG PERSONS, certain foods forbidden to, ii. 319 _sq._ See Children, young

THE END

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN BY R. CLAY AND SONS, LTD., BRUNSWICK STREET, STAMFORD STREET, S.E., AND BUNGAY, SUFFOLK.

The Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas

BY EDWARD WESTERMARCK, PH.D., LL.D.

SOME PRESS OPINIONS ON VOL. I.

ATHENÆUM.--

"The first attempt to deal with the subject of the evolution of human morality in the concrete on a scale at all corresponding to its complexity and sheer bulk. . . . This book remains an achievement unsurpassed in its own kind, a perpetual monument of the courage, the versatility, and the amazing industry of its author."

R. R. Marett, in MIND.--

"Dr. Westermarck's work fills me with profound admiration. . . . There is no book in any language that deals concretely with the evolution of morality on so grand a scale or in so authoritative a way."

Havelock Ellis, in THE JOURNAL OF MENTAL SCIENCE.--

"Throughout marked by an extraordinary degree of erudition which never becomes pedantic, by an invariably fair-minded and well-balanced attitude towards difficult problems, and by a power of broad and lucid presentation which recalls Buckle."

Q. C. Wheeler, in REVUE DE DROIT INTERNATIONAL.--

"Une des contributions les plus importantes à la sociologie qui aient été produites pendant les dernières années. . . . Cet ouvrage aura pour effet de rendre presque impossible toute étude scientifique de la morale sur les anciennes bases."

Franz Oppenheimer, in DAS BLAUBUCH.--

"Ein neues Buch von Edward Westermarck bedeutet ein soziologisches Ereignis. Westermarck, das heisst: profundestes ethnographisches Wissen, meisterhaft beherrscht durch ordnenden Verstand und durchleuchtet von schürfster Kritik und spürkräftigster Psychologie. Wie seine 'Geschichte der Ehe' ein _standard work_ der Gesellschaftslehre bleiben wird, als dasjenige Buch, das zum erstenmal eines der schwierigsten Gebiete des menschlichen Zusammenlebens auf brietester Grundlage schilderte und erklärte, so wird auch dieses zweite mächtige Werk, dessen erster Band uns jetzt vorliegt, auf lange Zeit hinaus zu den Grundsteinen der werdenden Wissenschaft von Menschen gehören."

PHILOSOPHICAL REVIEW.--

"Altogether it is perhaps safe to say that the work is the most important contribution to ethical literature within recent years."

W. R. Sorley, in THE BOOKMAN.--

"Dr. Westermarck is the only writer who can claim to have systematically examined the whole of the evidence, and to have produced a comprehensive treatise on the development of men's ideas of good and evil. . . . He is to be congratulated on having produced a standard work on a subject of first-rate importance. It is distinguished alike by breadth of view and mastery of detail, by skilful marshalling of evidence and by sound judgment."

NATURE.--

"The readers of his 'History of Human Marriage'--all of them his debtors--were doubtless prepared for the vast array of footnotes, the excellent way in which long series of facts are arranged, the clearness of the style, the sanity and reasonableness of a work which certainly was needed to keep ethical theory abreast of anthropological research, and which will add greatly to its author's reputation. . . . The account of the moral emotions, the treatment of punishment (in which subtle arguments are offered against determent as a sufficient guiding principle), the discussion of the various distinctions suggested by terms like act, agent, motive, intention, the detailed examination of the facts advanced by such authorities as Lord Avebury, Dr. J. G. Frazer, Dr. Steinmetz, are all excellent."

NORTHERN WHIG.--

"For learning and research the book is simply a marvel. . . . It will be an authoritative book for many a day on the subjects with which it deals."

L. T. Hobhouse, in TRIBUNE.--

"It has remained for Dr. Westermarck, a Finn writing in English, to give to the English-speaking world the first comprehensive and systematic account of the genesis of moral ideas on the basis of a detailed survey of the customs of mankind. . . . It is not too much to predict that it will mark the beginning of a new era in the study of general sociology."

GUARDIAN.--

"This work, by the author of 'The History of Human Marriage,' will undoubtedly take its place, and that a foremost place, amongst the standard works on the subject of ethics. . . . The width and depth of his learning will be recognised by every reader, and will be utilised by many generations of students."

DAILY NEWS.--

"A perfect graveyard of the hasty generalisations of his predecessors."

CAMBRIDGE REVIEW.--

"The purpose of the present work is to arrange and examine all the available evidence regarding the nature of men's moral judgments and the kind of objects which they approve or condemn. No one could be found more competent than Dr. Westermarck to carry this great undertaking to a successful issue."

EXPOSITORY TIMES.--

"One of the greatest contributions of recent years to the study of Comparative Religion."

S. Alexander, in THE SPEAKER.--

"Dr. Westermarck's book is without doubt of the first importance, whether it be regarded as a philosophical treatise on ethics or as a history of moral institutions. Neither of these descriptions singly does justice to it, for its merit lies in its blending of the analytical with the historical method, so that the long history which begins in the second half of this volume and is to be completed in the next volume, constitutes a continuous verification of his main ethical thesis that moral disapprovals und approvals arise from and express social indignation and social gratitude. . . . I conclude by expressing my unqualified admiration of Dr. Westermarck's work, which is worthy of the years of labour he has bestowed upon it. Besides its scientific importance it is recommended to readers by the unfailing interest and lucidity of its manner."

UNIVERSITY REVIEW.--

"Dr. Westermarck belongs to no accepted school of moralists. He endorses neither the humanist nor the religious views of society. He is neither a utilitarian nor an intuitionalist. He is both an anthropologist and a historian; he is also a sociologist and a traveller. In neglected lands where he might escape from European prejudices he has lived and studied the problems of the human heart and mind, accumulating at first hand a mass of material which throws much light on the origin and development of peculiar customs and beliefs. This, added to a remark able erudition, a scientific temper, a felicity and abundance of illustration, and a clear and vigorous style, gives us a contribution to ethics, psychology, and sociology which is undoubtedly of the first rank, and, in our opinion, the most comprehensive and luminous work which has yet been written on the subject."

GLOBE.--

"Both by the clarity and the philosophical insight of its arguments, and the wide range of its investigations and illustrative details, it will claim securely to rank among those epoch-marking works which define the steady progress of mankind in the study and understanding of its sociological developments."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.--

"The fuller consideration of Dr. Westermarck's book as a philosophic treatise must wait; meanwhile we can only congratulate him and the Duchy, of which he is so conspicuous an ornament, on the production of a book that is really epoch-marking."

SCOTSMAN.--

"One of its prime characteristics is the skill with which it traces out the historical connection between moral opinions and magic and religious beliefs."

YORKSHIRE POST.--

"In Dr. Westermarck's hands a subject which might be impossibly abstruse becomes almost as attractive as a romance. . . . In pure philosophy he is to some extent a pioneer, and will have the noble satisfaction of the pioneer in arousing doubt, interest, and admiration."

* * * * *

LONDON: MACMILLAN & CO., LTD.

* * * * *

Transcriber's Note

This text combines the two separate volumes of Westermarck's book into one file.

Footnotes have been renumbered sequentially through each chapter and placed below the paragraph in which they occur.

Conventions for transcription of foreign languages, etc.

Page numbers

Page numbers are preserved in the text, and are placed inside curly brackets with a space on each side, even if that means breaking some other PG transcription guideline. Pages without a printed number (such as initial pages of chapters) are left unmarked, even though the table of contents etc. may refer to those particular pages.

Greek alphabet

Greek expressions are transliterated in normal PG style (upsilon always as "u"), except that accents are marked thus, with symbols following the Greek letter: acute / grave \ circumflex ^

Breathings are marked thus, with symbols following the Greek letter: rough (smooth)

Other Non-English alphabetic symbols

The oe-ligature is written [oe].

Again, other non-standard symbols not in the basic ASCII range are marked as usual in PG: the transcription is placed in square brackets; marks above the basic letter are symbolised with a character preceding the basic character, those beneath the letter with a character following the basic character: Acute accent (or a similar mark on consonants) is marked with ' Circumflex with ^ Macron (long mark) with = Breve above a vowel (short mark) with) Inverted circumflex/breve below with v Dot with .

Westermarck uses some other unusual letters: this text uses "(" for the transcription left half ring for Arabic ayin and for something like a rough breathing above "w" in the name "E[(w]e".

Corrected text

Corrected text is marked with "" preceding the correction (except for volume 2, p. 234, footnote 31 where  is the original text).

Corrections to the text:

Page Text of 2nd edition Correction ch. 2, p. 32 n. 57 Obaralbanien Oberalbanien ch. 7, p. 181 n. 89 _Du Boys_ Du Boys ch. 7, p. 195 n. 186 slove slave ch. 9, p. 232 neglected neglectful ch. 10, p. 260 n. 60 pr[oe]mio præmio ch. 10, p. 262 text for n. 81 has no initial " ch. 16, p. 381 has hast ch. 18, p. 427 n. 65 Communtarii Commentarii ch. 18, p. 432 larcency larceny ch. 19, p. 437 text for n. 28 has no final " ch. 19, p. 451 Anthenians Athenians ch. 19, p. 468 text for n. 251 has no final " ch. 21, p. 502 text for n. 21 has no final " ch 22, p. 517 n. 45 abuse abused ch. 22, p. 521 memtioned mentioned ch. 23, p. 531 n. 42 Magazin Magazine ch. 23, p. 558 n. 254 Law is not italicised ch. 24, p. 572 n. 11 the Discovery Discovery ch. 25, p. 601 text for n. 33 has no initial " ch. 26, p. 634 n. 39 Globus is not italicised ch. 29, p. 35 n. 3 tibes tribes ch. 30, p. 74 text for n. 6 has no final " ch. 30, p. 99 n. 256 100 110 ch. 33, p. 166 m-dash . ch. 35, p. 248 n. 151 Phædro Phædo ch. 35, p. 257 n. 211 everbody everybody ch. 35, p. 261 m-dash . ch. 37, p. 301, n. 80 . , ch. 39, p. 349, n. 21 , . ch. 42, p. 422 text for n. 2 has no final " ch. 43, p. 459 n. 6. . , ch. 43, p. 487 n. 209 italics omitted from Sacred Books etc. ch. 44, p. 498 n.,* n. *, ch. 46, p. 553 n. 1 , ch. 46, p. 555 If It ch. 48, p. 618 n. 85 i 1 ch. 51, p. 727 wordly worldly ch. 52, p. 734 wordly worldly Authorities, p. 786 Indan Indian Authorities, p. 798 mosaich mosaisch Authorities, p. 800 Reisin Reisen Authorities, p. 826 Museun Museum Authorities, p. 828 Soceity Society Index, p. 828 London 1839 London, 1839 Index, p. 842 514 515 Index, p. 844 n. ^2 n. ^8 Index, p. 847 polution pollution Index, p. 850 i. ii. Index, p. 852 (twice) ii. Index, p. 862 ; , Index, p. 862 i. ii. Index, p. 865 ii.